THE PREFACE.

TO expatiate on the merits and utility of Hiſtory, would ſurely be a taſk both needleſs and unneceſſary at preſent. What would a man be whoſe underſtanding is not furniſhed with a ſufficient knowledge of life? for no character can be ſaid to know the world better than he who is well verſed in the hiſtorical pages. It is a ſtudy which ſhould claim the attention of both ſexes, being the grand repoſitory of every uſeful and intereſting knowledge. A perſon, unacquainted with the lives and actions of his forefathers, is in compariſon no better than the new-born babe, who has not yet attained a juſt ſenſe of his parents. The moral leſſons which may be derived from Hiſtory, are worthy the conſideration of perſons of every rank and ſituation in life. We meet with characters, remarkable either for virtue or vice; and knowing them to be real, we muſt, if poſſeſſed of any feeling, be inſpired with an admiration of the one, and an abhorrence of the other. When every ſcene of paſt life is drawn by the pencil of truth, curioſity is doubly gratified; and it is certainly the intereſt of a writer, who would fain reſcue his works from obſcurity, to adhere to FACTS as much as poſſible; not to be led aſtray by falſe partiality, nor lead others aſtray by vain prolixity.

The cultivation of Hiſtory in younger minds, has been ſtrongly recommended by our moſt ingenious authors, who have likewiſe, and at the ſame time, acknowledged that the HISTORY OF ENGLAND is moſt particularly eſſential. We ſhould be indeed ſtrangers at home, if unacquainted with our OWN affairs; and frequently expoſed to the bluſh, if unable to anſwer the many queſtions which argumentative diſcourſes may ſuggeſt. Beſides, there being no Hiſtory ſo replete with variety of incidents as the preſent, it is of courſe the moſt entertaining, and conſequently the moſt likely to engage the attention of younger minds. Nor is it unworthy the conſtant peruſal of the grown-up, there being herein diſplayed circumſtances of ſo much importance and utility, that men of all ages ſhould ſeize every leiſure moment to conſider the different occurrences, events, actions, characters, governments, policy, conſtitutional liberty, religious eſtabliſhment, and other momentous concerns which the Hiſtory of England ALONE furniſhes. How can an ENGLISHMAN reſt ſatisfied without daily enquiring into the Hiſtory of his own nation? Is it not the greateſt ſatisfaction poſſible to that praiſe-worthy Curioſity which ſhould animate the ſpirit of man, to know the wonderful progreſs which has been made in the fine arts of his country, with alſo the amazing extention of its commerce, the origin and riſe thereof? It is a field of knowledge worthy the ſearch of all; who enters therein muſt be delighted with the prodigious fund of uſeful information he diſcovers; his ſcrutiny is amply repaid with the divers relations of our renowned anceſtors, by whoſe virtuous actions we are ſtimulated to a bold imitation, and hope to be ourſelves the ſame examples for poſterity. 'Tis not a mere ſketch that will ſuffice, "drink deep, or taſte not"—Then ſhall we be delighted with the amazing revolutions which we behold, and admire the wonderful tranſitions of a ſmall iſland, once in a ſtate of barbariſm, ſubject to the attacks of vile ambitious invaders, now grown to a powerful nation, boaſting of every literary accompliſhment, and excelling in every political refinement. In ſhort, 'tis a work of ſuch national conſequence, that few perſons of either ſex can forbear to read and make a ſtudy of that, from which both Edification and Entertainment are together derived.

As therefore Hiſtory, and particularly this of England, is univerſally allowed to be a proper ſtudy, a natural queſtion ariſes, Which author ſhould be preferred? And no wonder, indeed, ſo many writers have vied with each other, and offered ſuch various reaſons for the recommendation of their own. Some, to avoid prolixity, have been too brief; while others, for an oppoſite reaſon, have run into a contrary error. Many have omitted parts, through a ſuppoſition that they were fictitious, and ſeveral have expatiated on thoſe incidents, to the great diſſatisfaction of their readers. But medio tutiſſimus ibis—We have therefore endeavoured to avoid that tediousneſs which confounds, and alſo that brevity which ſcarcely ſatisfies. We do not cut ſhort and mangle, under pretence of ABRIDGING; nor lengthen and ſpin out, for the purpoſe of QUANTITY, regardleſs of the QUALITY. This New, Impartial, and Complete Hiſtory of England is deduced from the earlieſt period of time; the chronology, geography, date and place have been particularly attended to; and as no application or expence has been ſpared to render this work the moſt perfect of its kind, we may preſume, with ſome degree of modeſty too, that it cannot be equalled by any. We pronounce this Hiſtory NEW, IMPARTIAL, and COMPLETE, there being accurately united all the material facts of former annals, without thoſe vain and biaſſed remarks which have been introduced according to the diſpoſition of ſome writers, or rather compilers, who ſelect without diſcernment, preferring the unintereſting to the eſſential; and ſometimes add, under pretence of elucidating, what frequently miſguides the reader. Theſe have been too often the failings of many pretended hiſtorians, whoſe errors and abſurdities being unworthy of US, we have ventured to offer the public a work, which we flatter ourſelves will be found, by every impartial and candid reader, as Complete as the title has announced it. Nor ſhall it be found deficient with reſpect to Embelliſhments, as, we muſt beg leave to obſerve, the Engravings of our work ſhall not only excel in their number, but in their quality. A moſt ſuperb Frontiſpiece, with four other Engravings, in our firſt number, executed in a truly maſterly manner, by eminent artiſts, declare, we think, a good beginning. And that we ſhall both continue and conclude with equal credit, we flatter ourſelves the great number of curious original Deſigns and other Embelliſhments which ſhall be ſeen in this undertaking will likewiſe demonſtrate; which for ſize, beauty of ſtyle, and novelty of invention, will ſufficiently recommend themſelves without any further illuſtration from the pen. Depending therefore on the juſt hopes of Merit alone, to a judicious and diſcerning Public, the WHOLE of this undertaking is moſt humbly ſubmitted.

With reſpect to the antient Hiſtory of this Country, it is not in the power of modern writers to offer any juſt opinion; its uncertainty, therefore, muſt remain; but, doubtleſs, what is tranſmitted by former pens, we ought, for the ſatisfaction of every reader, to inſert. For this reaſon, a ſufficient abſtract from the writings of Geofrey of Monmouth, relative to the antient affairs of Britain, are herein included; it being our ambition to give every neceſſary information, forming the BEST, of this country, from the earlieſt period (upon record) to the preſent time. In our title, it is true, we have promiſed nothing but what is authentic; and as the veracity of Geofrey's account has been by ſome Hiſtorians diſputed, and therefore omitted; yet (as appears in the preceding part of our work) ſeeing that others have defended and vouched for the truth thereof, we ſhould think ourſelves highly blameable for ſuch omiſſion. From the obſervations of others, we find the Hiſtory, as delivered by Geofrey of Monmouth, neither improbable nor impoſſible; no Hiſtory of England can, therefore, be deemed Complete without it; it being abſolutely the prior part, as accounting for the Origin of England, and neceſſary, even allowing it a fable, to be known by every reader. What has not been contradicted by writers of the ſame age, but, on the contrary, corroborated, certainly claims our attention; and though it may ſeem to have been exaggerated by former pens, yet it is at leaſt to be believed that there have been ſome grounds for the information. Many facts have doubtleſs been left out in ſeveral Hiſtories, through the baſe inſinuations of lazy compilers, who have omitted them under pretence of their being ill-founded. Let us one moment conſider the preſent tranſactions at home and abroad; are there not every day occurrences, ſo ſtrange and wonderful, that if recorded by only one or two honeſt Hiſtorians hereafter, our poſterity may look upon them as fictitious and unmeaning? Therefore, what is not truly contradicted, can never be deemed really falſe. Proper allowances ſhould be made for the exaggerations of authors who may, for pecuniary motives, increaſe a work; yet when we conſider how, on the other hand, facts have been diminiſhed by the careleſſneſs and inattention of others, it is not to be wondered at that by ſuch changes and tranſitions, by ſuch additions and curtailments, truth often becomes a fable! We have adhered, therefore, to all the probabilities of Geofrey's account; and flatter ourſelves that we have given his Hiſtory in a more full, and ſatisfactory manner, than it has ever yet appeared ſince the original. Though the improbability of Diana's prophecy muſt be certainly obvious to every reader of underſtanding; yet, when we recollect that theſe ſuperſtitious ceremonies were general among the Heathens in thoſe times, and that mere idle dreams were frequently conſtrued into ſome prophetic viſitation, it may be reaſonably ſuppoſed that this part of Geofrey's Hiſtory originated from nothing more than a dream of Brutus's, to which a favourable interpretation had been given. It is therefore inſerted here, according to the Hiſtorian's manner, as by ſuch link the ſtory is united; and had we omitted it, we ſhould have been guilty of thereby breaking the chain of the whole. The good ſenſe of the reader will certainly diſtinguiſh the fabulous from the natural, and make allowances for thoſe liberties which antient writers have taken.

In reſpect to Giants, we cannot conceive why their exiſtence ſhould be doubted. We have in ſeveral other Hiſtories many accounts of over-grown people, in different parts of the world. Surely the ſacred volume furniſhes us with divers inſtances. We read therein of Philiſtines of amazing ſtature. The giant whom David deſtroyed is repreſented as one of a remarkable height. We alſo read in ſome of the deſcriptions made by many of our travellers, that the inhabitants of Patagonia, in South America, were people of a moſt extraordinary ſize. Such then might have been the firſt inhabitants of that iſland. Britain is ſaid to have been in its priſtine ſtate before it had been entered and cultivated by Brutus and his companions. The reality of giants having been in exiſtence is confirmed by Moſes, who, in his Book of Geneſis (chapter vi. verſe 4.) informs us there were giants on the earth.

As a great proof of the authenticity of ſome parts of Geofrey's Hiſtory, it is neceſſary to obſerve, that upon a very famous contention concerning the ſubjection of the crown of Scotland to that of England, Edward the Firſt ſent a letter to Pope Boniface VIII. (to whom the Scots had applied for redreſs) and declared in defence of his right, that the direct and ſuperior dominion of Scotland had, from all antiquity, belonged to his crown; and in this declaration he was ſupported by all his nobles, who ſeverally ſet their ſeals to the letter.

It may be neceſſary, for the ſatisfaction of the Curious, to inſert herein a quotation from Walſingham, which in a great meaſure juſtifies the account delivered by Geofrey; that part, therefore, which ſo materially relates to what at preſent concerns us, we ſhall give the reader in his own words:

"About the time of Eli and Samuel the prophet, a valiant and famous man of the Trojan nation, named Brutus, after the deſtruction of Troy, arrived with many of the Trojan nobility at a certain iſland then called Albion, inhabited by giants, and having routed and ſlain them with his forces, he called it after his name Britain, and his companions Britons, and built a city which he called Trinovantum, now called London, and afterwards divided his kingdom between his three ſons, viz. to Locrin, the firſt-born, he gave that part of Britain which is now called England; and to Albanact, his ſecond ſon, that part which was from him named Albania, now Scotland; and to Camber, his youngeſt ſon, that part, which after his name was called Cambria, now Wales; reſerving to Locrin the royal dignity. Two years after the death of Brutus, a certain king of the Huns, named Humber, arrived in Britain, and ſlew Albanact, the brother of Locrin; upon which news Locrin, king of the Britons, purſued him, and he in his flight was drowned in the river, which is called after his name, Humber; and ſo Albania returned to Locrin. Alſo Dunwallo, king of the Britons, preferred Saterus to be king of Scotland; and upon his rebelling, cauſed both him and his kingdom to be ſurrendered up to him. Alſo the two ſons of Dunwallo, Belinus and Brennius, divided their father's kingdom between them, in ſuch ſort, that Belinus the elder poſſeſſed the crown of the iſland, with Britain, Wales, and Cornwall; and Brennius, the younger, held the kingdom of Scotland under him: the Trojan Conſtitution requiring, that the hereditary dignity ſhould go to the firſt-born. Alſo Arthur, king of the Britons, a moſt renowned Prince, ſubdued Scotland, when in rebellion againſt him, and almoſt deſtroyed the whole nation; and afterwards advanced one Anſelm to be king of Scotland. And when after this, the ſame king Arthur made his moſt famous feaſt in the city of Legions, all the kings that were ſubject to him were preſent at it, amongſt whom Anſelm, king of Scotland, doing homage for the kingdom of Scoland, carried king Arthur's ſword before him. All the kings of Scotland have ſucceſſively been ſubject to all the kings of the Britons, &c. &c."

This being an Abſtract (and for the brevity thereof exceedingly ingenious) taken evidently from the Hiſtory of Geofrey, it is ſufficient we think to ſhow the great eſtimation in which it was held in former days; and ſurely if it could gain credence then, why ought it to be doubted now? But it is not for us to dwell upon this ſubject; nor is it the right of any Hiſtorian to demand the Reader's belief, when his faith may not be eaſy. Let it then be read by all thoſe who are willing to ſatisfy their Curioſity, and according to the light in which it appears the Reader will ſee whether he ſhould give it credence.

Having ſaid thus much reſpecting the great improvement of introducing into this Work, the Hiſtory of upwards a Thouſand Years not noticed in any other Publication of the kind, let us now obſerve that ſeveral years having elapſed ſince any Real New HISTORY of ENGLAND has been publiſhed, all other Hiſtories of England are conſequently different with reſpect to the records of RECENT TRANSACTIONS of this Country, of which they particularly require Full and Complete Information. To remedy which Defects this Work is moſt reſpectfully offered to the Public, and the Author will be particular in giving a Copious Hiſtory of our own Times, and carry it down to the Year 1795. In performing this part of his Duty, the alarming ſituation of the times, will naturally require that a Full Account of the preſent War between France and the Combined Powers be introduced into this Work—the Revolution of France, and the ſucceeding tranſactions of the National Convention, will therefore be narrated in our Hiſtory with the pen of Truth and Impartiality.

He will alſo (to render it the moſt complete Work of the kind,) add the Hiſtories of SCOTLAND and IRELAND (which ſhould always accompany the Hiſtory of England) from the earlieſt authentic Intelligence,—Improvements which have never been given in any former Publication, though eſſentially neceſſary in a Work of ſuch an important nature as the preſent Undertaking.

The Whole forming a Complete HISTORY of GREAT-BRITAIN and IRELAND, and our Britiſh Dominions Abroad, embelliſhed with a moſt elegant and ſtriking Set of Engravings, among which will be introduced many relating to Military and Naval Affairs, repreſenting various Modes of Attack and Defence at different Periods of the Britiſh Hiſtory.

G. W. SPENCER.

☞ We ſhall carefully avoid that obſcure, ambiguous, and diſguſtful Style of Writing, which in ſome other Works of the kind require the Printer's Notes to explain thoſe Paſſages, which ſhould have been made ſufficiently clear, in their proper place, by the Hiſtorian himſelf.

BOOK I.

FROM THE FIRST SETTLEMENT OF BRUTUS IN THIS ISLAND, UPWARDS OF A THOUSAND YEARS BEFORE THE TIME OF JULIUS CÆSAR, TO THE ROMAN INVASION, BY THAT RENOWNED EMPEROR.

CHAPTER I.

PRELIMINARY REMARKS on the HISTORY of BRITAIN.

THE opinions of writers have varied exceedingly reſpecting the derivations of names peculiar to this iſland; ſome, who have adhered more ſtrictly to probability, declare the appellative Britain to have originated from the word Brith, which ſignified blue, as the natives were accuſtomed to paint their bodies with a compoſition of that colour.

Albion is evidently derived from the Greek word Alphon, and the Latin word Albus (white) which epithet probably proceeded from the whiteneſs of the chalky cliffs at Dover, and which are to be ſeen in many parts of the whole iſland. This conjecture is countenanced by the writings of antient Bards, who called England Inis-wen, or White Iſland.

The name of England was given this iſland by our Saxon anceſtors, derived from an Anglo-Saxon province, called Anglen, from whence emigrating and landing on the coaſt of Kent, they gave to all the eaſtern provinces under their ſubjection the name of England.

Geofrey of Monmouth has tranſmitted to us an account of the antient affairs of Britain, which, as appears therein, derives its name from Brutus. Notwithſtanding the appearance of ſome fictitious circumſtances in this hiſtory, there are many probabilities apparent; in defence thereof Aaron Thompſon the tranſlator, obſerves, "That it had no adverſary before William of Newburgh, about the end of the reign of Richard the Firſt, whoſe invectives proceeded from a mean revenge; that Giraldus Cambrenſis, who was very learned in the Britiſh antiquities, acknowledges many parts to be juſt, particularly the ſtory of Brutus, and the deſcent of the Britons from the Trojans; that John of Wethemſtede, who oppoſed the work, was an obſcure writer of the fifteenth century, whoſe obſervations had but little weight; but that ſeveral men of reputation and judgment wrote in favour thereof, by which means it came into great eſtimation." And when we conſider that it has been both eſpouſed and ſupported by Edward the Firſt, it cannot be ſuppoſed that the Hiſtory is altogether fictitious. The author was a Monk of the Benedictine order, and tranſlated his Hiſtory from the Welch into Latin in the twelfth century.

There is extant in the Tower of London, relative to the antiquity of the city thereof, a curious tranſcript of a very ancient document which was preſented to King Henry the Sixth, in the ſeventh year of his reign, when taken out of the city archives. A brief tranſlation of this inſtrument is abſolutely neceſſary here, as a further demonſtration of the authenticity of Geofrey's Hiſtory.

"Among the noble and famed cities of the world, that of London, the only ſeat of the realm of England, is the chief; the fame of which is known far and near; it is remarkable for wholeſome air; but, above all, for the Chriſtian religion; its liberties and ancient foundation being, according to records, older than Rome; built by Brute after the manner of Troy, long before the time of Romulus and Remus; and to this day the manners, cuſtoms, liberties and rights of Troy are univerſally enjoyed."

It has been obſerved by Sheringham, that the ancient Britons had the ſame religious ideas and names as the Greeks, conſequently as the Trojans; that they alſo wrote the ſame character, and ſpoke nearly the ſame language. It is evident from the works of Cæſar, that the Druids of Britain made uſe of Greek letters in all their communications. —(VIDE Commentariorum de Bello Gallico, lib. vi. cap. 13.)—He ſays, ſpeaking of the Druids, "This diſcipline is ſuppoſed to have originated in Britain, and to have paſſed from thence into Gaul; and now thoſe who have an inclination to be acquainted with that knowledge, frequently go to Britain for inſtruction." He alſo adds, "It is not deemed lawful for them to commit their myſteries of religion to writing, though in almoſt all public tranſactions and private accounts they make uſe of the Greek characters."

The following account, therefore, as delivered by Geofrey of Monmouth, is not entirely fictitious nor improbable.

AFTER the Trojan war Æneas fled with his ſon Aſcanius to Italy, A. M. 2768. He was honourably received by King Latinus, to the great envy of Turnus, King of the Rutuli, who conſequently waged war againſt him. But Æneas being ſucceſsful, and having deſtroyed Turnus, obtained the kingdom of Italy, and with it Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus. Aſcanius ſucceeded his father, A. M. 2774; whoſe ſon, Sylvius, being in purſuit of a private amour, at laſt married a niece of Lavinia. Aſcanius now diſcovering the pregnancy of his daughter-in-law, conſulted the magicians in reſpect to her conception. They informed him, that ſhe ſhould bring forth a ſon, who ſhould deſtroy his parents, and, after many years baniſhment and travelling, would at laſt arrive to every degree of honour. Theſe predictions came to paſs. The woman brought forth a ſon, and died of his birth; he was immediately delivered to a nurſe, and named Brutus. In the fifteenth year of his age he accompanied his father in hunting, and while he was aiming at a deer, which the ſervants were driving up, undeſignedly ſhot his father. For this, which was deemed a heinous offence, he was expelled from Italy. Now baniſhed, he went to Greece, where he found the poſterity of Helenus, the ſon of Priam, enſlaved by Pandraſus, King of the Grecians. Pyrrhus, the ſon of Achilles, having, after the deſtruction of Troy, brought Helenus and many others here in chains, Brutus diſcovering them to be by deſcent his old countrymen, now took up his abode with them, and, gaining their eſteem by his bravery and good conduct, was ſoon choſen as their commander, to liberate them from the baſe ſervitude of the Grecians; and as their numbers encreaſed conſiderably, he at length accepted the propoſal. At this time there was a brave youth, named Aparacus, in Greece, who eſpouſed their cauſe, being partly deſcended from the Trojans. Brutus now aſſembles the Trojans from all parts, and fortifies the towns belonging to Aparacus, with whom and his forces he retired to a wood, and ſends the following letter to the King:

"Brutus, general of the remainder of the Trojans, to Pandraſus, king of the Grecians, ſendeth greeting. As it was beneath the dignity of a nation, ſprung from the illuſtrious race of Dardanus, to be treated in your kingdom otherwiſe than the nobility of their birth required, they have betaken themſelves to the coverts of the woods, for they preferred living like wild beaſts upon fleſh and herbs, with the enjoyment of liberty, than ſuffer the yoke of ſlavery, though lightened ever ſo much with all the luxury of feaſting. If this gives your Majeſty any offence, impute it not to them alone, as it is the common ſentiment of every captive, that fain would recover his former dignity; but pardon it. Let pity induce you to beſtow freely their long-loſt liberty, and permit them to inhabit the thickets of the woods, whither they have retreated to avoid ſlavery; but if this favour is denied, then, with your permiſſion and aſſiſtance, ſuffer them to depart into ſome foreign country."

Pandraſus ſoon perceived the purport of this letter, and was ſurpriſed at receiving ſo bold a meſſage from thoſe he had kept in captivity. A council of nobles being held, it was ſoon determined to raiſe an army, in order to purſue them. But Brutus being apprized of their coming, found means to enter the town of Sparatinum the preceding night, with a deſign to ſurpriſe them while unarmed, and marching without order: the ſally being accordingly made, the unprepared Grecians gave way on all ſides, and with their king at their head, haſtened to paſs the river Akalon, adjoining the place, wherein ſeveral periſhed. But the King's brother, Antigonus, reſolving to die by the ſword, and not the ſtream, reproached his ſcattered troops and re-attacked the Trojans, but to little or no purpoſe, as he was ſoon taken with his companion, Anacletus, and made priſoner.

Brutus, after this victory, reinforced the town with ſix hundred men, and then retired to the woods, where the Trojan people were expecting his protection. In the interim Pandraſus grieved at his own flight and his brother's captivity, endeavoured that night to reaſſemble his ſcattered troops, and the next morning, with his remaining forces, went to beſiege the town of Sparatinum, where he ſuppoſed Brutus had retired with his priſoners. When he had reached the walls, and viewed the ſituation of the caſtle, he divided his army into ſeveral bodies, and placed them around in different ſtations. One party had orders not to ſuffer any of the beſieged to eſcape, another to turn the courſes of the rivers, and a third to beat down the walls with battering-rams and other engines. Now, in obedience to his commands, they exerted their utmoſt to diſtreſs the beſieged; and on the approach of night elected the braveſt men to defend the camp and tents from the incurſions of the enemy, while the reſt, overcome with fatigue, refreſhed themſelves with ſleep.

The beſieged, however, taking a view of the enemy upon the top of the walls, ceaſed not to repel their force, and with darts and firebrands continually returned their attacks; whenever they made a breach through the wall, they were ſoon compelled to retire by the Trojans, who bravely threw upon them wild-fire and ſcalding water. But through ſcarcity of proviſion, and exerciſe of daily labour, becoming at length much diſtreſſed, a meſſage was diſpatched to Brutus, requeſting his immediate aſſiſtance, fearing that otherwiſe, through fatigue and weakneſs, they muſt be at laſt obliged to ſurrender. Brutus, deſirous of relieving them, was now extremely embarraſſed; for the Trojans being in number inferior to the Grecians, he did not deem it proper to ſtand a pitched battle, and therefore wiſely makes uſe of a ſtratagem, by which he propoſes to enter the enemy's camp by night, and having previouſly deceived their watch, ſurpriſe and kill them in their ſleep. But as ſuch ſcheme was totally impracticable without the concurrence and ſecret aſſiſtance of ſome Grecian, he ordered Anacletus his priſoner to be brought to him, and, with a drawn ſword in his hand, addreſſed him in the following manner:

"Valiant youth, except you will now vouchſafe to perform with integrity the duties I ſhall exact, believe me, not only your own, but the life of Antigonus, ſhall ſhortly be at an end. It is my intention this night to ſurpriſe the camp of the Grecians, and fall upon them unawares, but am apprehenſive of meeting an oppoſition from the watch, who, before I can accompliſh the great deſign, may diſcover the ſtratagem; ſince their previous deſtruction is abſolutely neceſſary to procure an eaſier acceſs to the reſt, I therefore requeſt your aſſiſtance in order to deceive them; and conjure you, that you will not only manage this buſineſs with the moſt profound ſecrecy and art, but likewiſe obſerve a ſtrict adherence to the commands that I ſhall give you. At the ſecond hour of the night, go to the watch, and with cajoling ſpeeches inform them, that you have ſecretly conveyed Antigonus from priſon, and that he is now come to the bottom of the woods, where he lies concealed among the ſhrubs, and cannot poſſibly advance further, on account of the burthenſome fetters, with which you ſhall pretend he is moſt inhumanly bound. Then you ſhall conduct them to the end of the wood, for the ſake, as it were, to deliver him from thoſe oppreſſive chains, where, in his ſtead, I ſhall attend with a choſen band of men, ready to deſtroy them."

Alarmed at the drawn ſword, which threatened immediate death while theſe words were pronouncing, the terrified Anacletus promiſed upon oath to execute, with all due punctuality, theſe orders, provided he and Antigonus might have their lives ſecured to them. With this condition Brutus cheerfully acquieſced; and the agreement being accordingly confirmed, Anacletus, at the ſecond hour of the watch, directed his ſteps towards the Grecian camp, and when he had nearly approached it, the watch, whoſe circumſpective eyes were upon all dark and lurking places, no ſooner perceived him but they ran from all parts to meet him, and demanding the occaſion of his coming, deſired to know if his intention was to betray the Grecian army, and thereby deliver them to the Trojans. But Anacletus, aſſuming a cheerful and happy countenance, with all apparent joy, made this reply:

"O Grecians, think not ſo meanly of me, that I am come baſely and treacherouſly to betray my dear countrymen: no; on the contrary I am come to aſſiſt them. I have made my eſcape from the Trojan priſon, and have haſtened here with all poſſible expedition, to requeſt you would accompany me to poor Antigonus, whom I have delivered from the captivity of Brutus: but, alas! not being able to keep up with me, on account of the cruel weight of his fetters, which ſorely oppreſs him, he has, at my inſtigation, concealed himſelf among the ſhrubs, at the end of the wood, till, according to promiſe, I could return to him with ſome aſſiſtance."

The guards being now in great ſuſpence about the truth of this ſtory, there happened to approach one who knew Anacletus, and, after their mutual ſalutations, aſſured them who he was. Their ſuſpicions accordingly ceaſed, and without any heſitation they collected all their abſent companions, and immediately attended him to the wood where they imagined Antigonus was concealed. But while, unſuſpecting any evil, they were ranging the ſhrubs, behold! Brutus and his armed companions ſpring forth, and falling upon them, unprepared and aſtoniſhed, with violent impetuoſity, ſoon completes his bloody deſign. Immediately then he marches to the ſiege, and divides his men into three bands, aſſigning to each of them a different part of the camp, to which he enjoins them to go quietly and diſcreetly, and when entered, not to attempt the life of any till he and his company ſhould be poſſeſſed of the King's tent, and ſhould cauſe the trumpet to ſound for a ſignal.

After Brutus had given theſe inſtructions, the attentive Trojans ſoftly entered the Grecian camp, and, taking their appointed ſtations, waited with anxious expectation the promiſed ſignal; this Brutus did not delay to give, as ſoon as he had arrived before the tent of Pandraſus, to ſurpriſe which was the great deſign and end of his ambition. On the ſignal's being given, the eager Trojans inſtantaneouſly drew their ſwords, and entering among the unwary Grecians, who were enjoying their repoſe, now traverſed the camp, and allowing no quarter, made rapid progreſs in their intended ſlaughter and devaſtation. Thoſe who awaked with the groans of the dying, now beholding their blood-thirſty aſſailants approach, are ſolely filled with diſmay, and become an eaſy conqueſt, for they had neither time to take up arms nor even eſcape by flight: but running up and down, naked as they were, among the armed, whitherſoever the fury of the aſſaults drove them, they were cut to pieces by the enemy, who ruſhed in among them on all ſides. Some, who eſcaped half-dead, were in the eagerneſs and agitation of flight, daſhed againſt the rocks, and by ſuch encreaſed miſery ſuffered a double death. Others, that had only a ſhield or ſome like covering for their defence, in attempting the ſame rocks to avoid death, fell down in the hurry and darkneſs of the night, undergoing the moſt excruciating torments, by breaking ſeveral of their limbs. And many, who even eſcaped all theſe diſaſters, yet not knowing where to fly to for ſafety, were drowned in the adjacent rivers. Thus, by means of one misfortune or other, few remained to mourn their unhappy fellow-ſufferers. Add to this, the garriſon in the town, upon receiving notice of this attack, ſallied forth to meet their fellow-ſoldiers and redouble the ſlaughter.

But Brutus being now, as before mentioned, poſſeſſed of the King's tent, made it his ſole buſineſs to ſecure Pandraſus, and keep him a ſafe priſoner. Being well aſſured that his purpoſes would be anſwered more effectually by preſerving his life than delivering him up to death. However, the men who were with him, allowing no quarter, were inclined to put all to the ſword.

The night being thus ſpent, and the next morning repreſenting to their view a ſcene ſo much in their favour, by the great blood that was ſhed of their enemy, Brutus, in loud exultations, gave his men full liberty to act as they pleaſed with the plunder, and then enters the town with the captive King, to ſtay there till the ſpoils were ſhared among them.

This done, he reſortifies the caſtle, and giving orders to bury the ſlain, retires with his forces to the wood in great triumph. After the ſhouts and rejoicings uſual on this occaſion, the renowned general ſummoned the oldeſt of the people, in order to conſult him what he had beſt deſire of Pandraſus, who, being a priſoner in their power, would of courſe readily grant whatever requeſt they might be pleaſed to make, for the ſake of his liberty. According to their different inclinations, they now ſolicited different favours. Some moving him to requeſt that a certain part of the kingdom might be aſſigned them for their habitation; others, that he would ſeek permiſſion to depart, and be ſupplied with neceſſaries for their voyage. Thus, after having delayed much time in thinking what they ſhould do, one of them, whoſe name was Mempricius, aroſe, and ſilence being enjoined, thus addreſſed them:

"Fathers, what can be the reaſon of this perplexity and ſuſpence in a matter which ſo much concerns your ſafety? There is but one thing, and only one you can requeſt, with any degree of propriety, or any proſpect of a firm and ſecure peace to yourſelves and poſterity, and that is—liberty to depart. If you make no ſurer conditions with Pandraſus for his life, than merely to have a portion of land allotted yourſelves to live among the Grecians, what will the conſequence be? Bethink yourſelves, I pray. Surely your peace cannot be durable while the brothers, ſons, or grandſons of thoſe you deſtroyed yeſterday ſhall continue to be your neighbours. Undoubtedly, as long as the deaths of their relations ſhall be engraved upon their memory, their enmity againſt you muſt ſtill remain, and, upon the leaſt trifling provocation, they will naturally ſeek for revenge. Nor will it be poſſible for your inferior number to withſtand the ſudden attacks of ſo powerful a nation; beſides, ſhould it ſo happen that domeſtic altercations took place between us, the fatal conſequences will prove that our numbers, ſmall as they are, will be ſtill diminiſhing, while theirs will be more and more encreaſing. It is therefore my propoſal, which I ſubmit to your ſerious conſideration, that Ignoge, his eldeſt daughter, be forthwith demanded as wife for our general, and, in addition to her, gold, ſilver, corn, and all the other neceſſaries for a voyage. If this be obtained we may, with his permiſſion, remove to ſome other country."

The veteran having concluded in words to this effect, the whole aſſembly immediately acquieſced with his advice, and unanimouſly moved that Pandraſus ſhould be brought in among them, and in caſe of his non-compliance with thoſe terms, condemned to a moſt cruel death. He was forthwith introduced, and being ſeated in a chair above the reſt, apprized of their deſigns, and informed at the ſame time of the tortures which were preparing for him, ſhould their requeſt be not in every reſpect complied with. Accordingly the King made the following reply:

"Seeing my unpropitious and adverſe ſtars have delivered me and my brother Antigonus into your power, I can do no other than grant your petition, leſt a refuſal may endanger our lives, which are now, I confeſs, in your hands. In my opinion, the advantage and pleaſure of life are far preferable to all other conſiderations; therefore be not ſurpriſed that I am willing to redeem it, even at ſo great a price. Yet, though it is againſt my inclination that I acquieſce with your deſire, ſtill it is ſome conſolation that I am to give my daughter to a youth ſo noble and deſerving, whoſe deſcent from the illuſtrious race of Priam and Anchiſes, is obvious, both from the magnanimity of mind which he has diſplayed, and the certain accounts that we have had beſides. For who leſs than himſelf could have releaſed from bondage the baniſhed Trojans, reduced under ſlavery to ſo many and great princes? Who elſe could have encouraged them to riſe againſt the Grecians? What hero but himſelf could, with a band ſo few, have overcome ſuch a powerful army, and made their King a captive in the engagement? And, therefore, ſince this noble youth has acquired ſo much renown by the oppoſition he has made againſt me, I give him my daughter Ignoge, and alſo gold, ſilver, ſhips, corn, wine, oil, and every other article which you ſhall find neceſſary for your voyage. Moreover, if you ſhould be pleaſed to alter your reſolutions, and think fit to remain with us, I am alſo willing to grant you the third part of my kingdom for your habitation. But if not, I will faithfully perform my former promiſe, and, for your greater ſecurity, ſtay here as a hoſtage with you, till it be punctually fulfilled."

A council was accordingly held by the captive King, and meſſengers forthwith directed to all the ſhores of Greece to aſſemble ſhips together. Which done, King Pandraſus delivered them to his conquerors, to the number of three hundred and twenty-four, laden with all manner of proviſions; and Ignoge, his eldeſt daughter, he gave in marriage to Brutus; to every man, according to his quality, he alſo preſented a ſum of gold and ſilver. The King's promiſe being thus fulfilled, his liberty was immediately reſtored him; and the Trojans, alſo releaſed from his power, now ſet ſail with a propitious wind. But Ignoge, overcome with grief, ſtanding upon the ſtern of the ſhip, ſwooned away ſeveral times in her huſband's arms, lamenting, with many ſighs and tears, the loſs of her dear parents and country; nor did her gazing eyes forſake the ſhore while the ſmalleſt particle remained in ſight! The fond huſband endeavoured all in his power to alleviate her ſorrow, by the moſt tender words and embraces, intermixed with tears; nor did he forbear thoſe uxorious blandiſhments 'till her inceſſant grief had lulled her to repoſe.

The wind now continuing fair for two days and a night together, they arrived at a certain iſland called Leogecia, which had been formerly laid waſte by the incurſions of pirates, and was then uninhabited. Brutus, not aware of this, commiſſioned three hundred armed men to go aſhore, and diſcover who were the inhabitants; but finding nobody, they killed ſeveral kinds of wild beaſts, which they met within the groves and woods, and at laſt came to a certain deſolate city, wherein they found a temple of Diana, and a ſtatue therein of that goddeſs, which gave reſponſes to all thoſe who came to conſult her. Returning now to their ſhips, loaded with the ſpoils they had taken in hunting, they gave their companions a ſatisfactory account of all they had ſeen, and adviſed their commander to viſit the city, and, after duly offering the neceſſary ſacrifices, enquire of the deity, what place was allotted them by fate for their retirement. This propoſal being univerſally approved of, Brutus, attended with Gerion the augur, and twelve of the oldeſt men, repaired immediately for the temple, having provided every thing neceſſary for the occaſion. Having now reached the place, and preſenting themſelves before the ſhrine with garlands round their temples, as was the manner of the antient rites, they made three fires; one to Jupiter, another to Mercury, and the third to Diana, and offered ſacrifices to each. Now Brutus, holding before the altar of the goddeſs a conſecrated veſſel filled with wine and the blood of a white hart, looking up with all due reverence, addreſſed the image in the following manner:

“ Diva potens nemorum, terror ſylveſtribus apris;
Cui licit amfractus ire per æthereos,
Infernaſque domos; terreſtria jura reſolve,
Et dic quas terras nos habitare velis?
Dic certam ſedem quâ te venerabor in ævum,
Quâ tibi virgineis templa dicabo choris?”

“ Goddeſs of woods, tremendous in the chace
To mountain boars, and all the ſavage race!
Wide o'er th' æthereal walks extend thy ſway,
And o'er th' infernal manſions void of day!
On thy third realm look down! unfold our fate,
And ſay what region is our deſtin'd ſeat;
Where ſhall we next thy laſting temples raiſe,
And choirs of virgins celebrate thy praiſe?”

Nine times he repeated theſe words, after which, taking four turns round the altar, he poured the wine into the fire, and then laid himſelf down upon the hart's ſkin, which he had ſpread before the altar, where at laſt he fell aſleep. About the third hour of the night, the uſual time for deep ſlumber, the goddeſs ſeemed to preſent herſelf before him, and foretel him his future ſucceſs, as follows:

“ Brute, ſub occaſum ſolis trans Gallica regna,
Inſula in oceano eſt undique clauſa mari;
Inſula in oceano eſt habitata gigantibus olim,
Nunc deſerta quidem; gentibus apta tuis.
Hanc pete, namque tibi ſedes erit illa perennis:
Sic fiet natis altera Troja tuis.
Sic de prole tua reges naſcentur; et ipſis
Totius terræ ſubditus orbis erit.”

“ Brutus, there lies beyond the Gallic bounds,
An iſland which the Weſtern Sea ſurrounds;
By giants once poſſeſs'd: now few remain
T' oppoſe thy entrance, or obſtruct thy reign.
In view of this bleſs'd ſhore thy ſails employ;
There fate decrees to raiſe a ſecond Troy,
And found an empire in thy royal line,
Which time ſhall ne'er deſtroy, nor bounds confine.”

Brutus, now rouſed by the viſion he had ſeen, was for ſome time in doubt with himſelf, whether or no it was the mere effects of empty fancy, or the real appearance of the goddeſs herſelf, foretelling him the land for which he ſhould make. At laſt he aſſembled his companions, and giving them a full and preciſe relation of what he had ſeen, they teſtified the greateſt marks of joy, and eagerly urged him to return to their ſhips, while the wind was ſtill propitious, in order to renew their journey, and haſten towards the weſt, in purſuit of the promiſed land. Without delay, therefore, they viſit their other friends, and ſetting ſail again, after a courſe of thirty days, arrived at Africa, being as yet ignorant where they ſhould ſteer. Thence they came to the Philenian altars, and to a place called Salinæ, and ſailed between Ruſcicada and the mountains of Azara, where they underwent ſome difficulties and danger, on account of pirates; but having happily overcome them, they enriched themſelves with their ſpoils. Paſſing afterwards the river Malua, they arrived at Mauritania, where, for want of proviſions, they were obliged to go aſhore. Here, dividing themſelves into different parties, they laid waſte that whole country. Having now ſufficiently ſtored their ſhips with all kind of neceſſaries which they could conveniently provide, they ſteered to Hercules's Pillars, where they ſaw ſeveral of thoſe ſea-monſters called ſyrens, which ſurrounded their veſſels, and were very near overturning them. Here, after a narrow eſcape, and other dangers of a ſimilar kind, they reached at laſt the Tyrrhenian ſea, upon the ſhores of which they diſcovered four ſeveral nations deſcended from the baniſhed Trojans, who had accompanied Antenor in his flight. Their leader's name was Corineus, who was exceedingly condeſcending and meek in all private buſineſs, and yet, for the public welfare, courageous, brave, and active; ſo much ſo indeed, that even in an encounter with any perſon of immenſe ſize or uncommon ſtature, he would immediately overthrow him with the ſame facility that he would a child. As ſoon as their deſcent was mutually confeſſed, they joined each other, while thoſe who were under Corineus's government were, from the name of their leader ſtyled the Corniſh people, and indeed were more ſerviceable to Brutus than even his own followers.

Having now come to Aquitain, and entering the mouth of the Loire, they caſt anchor. Here they remained ſeven days, during which time they made their curſory obſervations of the country. Goffarius Pictus was king of Aquitain at this time, who, being informed of the arrival of a foreign people with a great fleet upon his coaſts, entertained no ſmall ſuſpicions on this account; immediately diſpatched ambaſſadors, to demand of them whether they brought with them peace or war? Theſe ambaſſadors, according to their commands, directing their ſteps towards the fleet, happening now to meet Corineus and two hundred of his men, who had come out together to hunt in the woods; they demanded of him by whoſe permiſſion they dared to enter the king's foreſt, and deſtroy his game (which, according to an antient law, was not allowable for any to do without the prince's leave.) However Corineus replied, that, for his part, he ſaw no great occaſion for leave. Upon which one of them, Imbertus by name, advancing haſtily, with a full-drawn bow, levelled a ſhot at Corineus, which he, with amazing agility, avoiding, immediately cloſed upon him, and with the bow in his hand, ſtruck him ſenſeleſs. The reſt he put to flight, who immediately carried tidings of this diſaſter to the king. Goffarius was not a little ſurpriſed with the account, and in order to revenge inſtantly the death of his ambaſſador, whom he much lamented, without delay he prepares a vaſt army, and purpoſes at that moment to attack the bold invaders. But Brutus, hearing of his arrival, diſmiſſes all the women and children, whom he had carefully guarded to the veſſels, and enjoins them therein to ſtay, while he and his armed companions ſhould meet the enemy. The attack being now made, a warm conteſt enſued, in which, after a great part of the day had been ſpent, Corineus was aſhamed to ſee the Aquitains ſo bravely ſtand their ground, while the Trojans remained invictorious; therefore, taking freſh courage, and drawing off his men to the right wing, he breaks in upon the thickeſt of the enemy's ranks, and dealing forth ſuch terror on every ſide, that ruſhing at laſt through the cohort, he puts them all to flight. During the encounter he had loſt his ſword, but happily meeting with a battle-ax, he therewith fought his way, and felled to the ground all that had courage to oppoſe him. Brutus and all his friends, nay even his enemies, were amazed at his fortitude and ſurpriſing ability; for, brandiſhing about his battle-ax among the flying troops, he did not a little terrify them with theſe inſulting words:

“ Oh, cowards, cowards, whither fly ye? Baſe and infamous wretches, where do you ſhelter? Stand your ground, that you may encounter Corineus. Oh, for ſhame—is it poſſible that ſo many thouſands ſhould be put to flight by only one man. However, poor fugitives, be this your conſolation, this your temporary comfort, that you are purſued by one before whom not even the Tyrrhenian giants could ſtand, but fell down in heaps, ſlain together.”

Subardus, who was a conſul, rouſed with indignation at theſe words, returns with three hundred men to renew the aſſault; but Corineus with his ſhield, wards off his blows, and raiſing his battle-ax, gave him ſuch a deadly ſtroke upon the top of his helmet, that he was almoſt divided in twain; then wheeling about his battle-ax among the reſt, and ruſhing upon them inſtantaneouſly, he made ſuch terrible havock of the men, that he diſplayed no leſs bravery in receiving and throwing aſide their blows, than he did in all thoſe he gave, with which they were deſtroyed. During this outrageous ſcuffle, they all experienced divers diſaſters, ſome the loſs of hands and arms, and others their legs, nay even their heads. All fought with him alone, and he alone engaged with them all. But Brutus, perceiving him thus beſet, ſtimulated through eſteem for the ſafety of ſo brave a warrior, now fled to his aſſiſtance with a band of men. The battle is again renewed with additional vigour and loud huzzas, while great are the numbers ſlain on both ſides. The Trojans becoming victorious, ſoon put Goffarius, with his Pictavians, to flight.

The king, after much danger, betook himſelf to ſeveral parts of Gaul, to procure aſſiſtance from thoſe princes to whom he had been either known or related. Gaul was at this time ſubject to twelve princes, who with equal authority poſſeſſed the government of the whole country. Theſe received him with every mark of kindneſs, and unanimouſly promiſed that they would aſſiſt him in repelling thoſe bold invaders from the coaſts of Aquitain.

The triumphant Brutus, elate with ſucceſs, now enriches his men with the ſpoils of the ſlain, and then dividing them again into ſeveral bodies, marches into the country, with a determination of finally deſtroying it, and lade his fleet with the riches thereof. For this purpoſe he ſets fire to the cities, previouſly ſeizing all the wealth that was concealed in them, and deſtroys the fields, making ſad deſtruction among the citizens and common people, unwilling to ſpare ſo much as one of that unhappy nation. During this general ſlaughter of the Pictavians, Brutus entered a place where the city of Tours now ſtands, which he afterwards built, as is recorded by Homer. Having diſcovered a place convenient for his deſign, he therein pitched his camp, deeming it his moſt ſafe retreat in caſe of any ſurpriſe; for he ſuſpected, on account of Goffarius's taking refuge with the kings of Gaul, that they would ſupply him with men to renew the battle. Having, therefore, encamped his men, he expected ſhortly to engage with Goffarius, and placed all his hopes of future ſucceſs in the well-known valour and prudence of his men.

But Goffarius, underſtanding that the Trojans were in thoſe parts, ceaſed not to march day and night till he approached within ſight of the camp of Brutus; then, with an indignant ſmile and auſtere look, he gave vent to his paſſion:

“ Oh, wretched Fate, have theſe vile exiles made a camp alſo of my kingdom. Arm, arm, my ſoldiers, and march through the thickeſt ranks. We ſhall quickly take theſe pitiful fellows, like ſo many ſheep, and ſend them about our kingdom for ſlaves.”

With theſe words he excited his men to arms; and now, divided into twelve bodies, they advanced towards the enemy.

Brutus, on the other hand, having drawn up his forces in order, and giving them previouſly their neceſſary inſtructions, where they ſhould aſſault and where be on their guard, boldly prepares for the attack.

Fortune ſeemed favourable to the Trojans at the beginning, as they made great havock among the enemy, having deſtroyed near two thouſand.—Alarmed at this, the Pictavians were almoſt ready to fly for their ſafety; but as ſucceſs is generally the happy lot of thoſe who boaſt a ſuperiority of number, ſo the Gauls, being three to one of the other, now uniting in a great body together, ruſhed in upon the Trojans, who had overpowered them at firſt, and obliged them to retire to their camp during the ſlaughter. Being thus victorious, they beſieged them in their camp, with a full determination of encloſing them therein, till they ſhould either ſurrender themſelves priſoners in chains, or ſuffer lingering death by a tedious famine.

Corineus, the ſucceeding night, conſulted with Brutus upon the beſt meaſures to be taken for their relief. It was therefore propoſed that he ſhould, with a ſufficient army, ſteal out ſecretly from the camp that night, and remain concealed in ſome adjacent wood till the break of day; then early in the morning, while Brutus ſhould ſally forth upon the enemy, it was deſigned that Corineus with his party ſhould ſurpriſe them from behind, and ruſhing from their concealment, put them to the ſword. This ſtratagem of Corineus was highly approved of by Brutus. It was immediately put into execution; and Corineus eſcaping with three thouſand men, concealed himſelf and party under the covert of the woods. As ſoon as it was day Brutus prepared his men, and ſallied forth to battle.—The Gauls readily meet and join in a fierce engagement. Numbers fell on both ſides, but neither party as yet gave way. A young Trojan, Turonus, the nephew of Brutus, was now preſent, inferior to none, except Corineus, in ſtrength and valour. He alone with his ſword deſtroyed ſix hundred men, but was at laſt unfortunately ſlain himſelf, by a multitude of the enemy, who ſurrounded him. It is from him the city of Tours takes its name, as he was herein interred. While both armies were thus warmly engaged, behold, Corineus came upon them unexpectedly, and attacked the rear of the Gauls in a fierce manner. This revived the courage of his oppoſite friends, who now exerted themſelves with additional vigour. The enemy was alarmed at the unexpected ſhout of Corineus's party, and imagining them greater in number than they really were, attempted to quit the field; but the Trojans purſuing, deſtroyed them in their flight, and by theſe means obtained a complete victory.

Brutus, though now rejoiced at his uncommon ſucceſs, was ſtill grieved at the loſs of his men, and regretted that his forces were diminiſhing, while thoſe of the other ſide were, by continual ſuccours, daily encreaſing. He was for ſome time in doubt, whether it was prudent to continue the war, or, while the major part of his followers were ſtill ſafe, and hitherto victorious, return to his ſhips, and go in queſt of that iſland which the goddeſs had foretold him of. Without further delay, with the unanimous conſent of his men, he now repaired to the fleet, and lading it with the treaſures he had procured, ſet ſail with a fair wind towards the promiſed land, and arrived at the ſhore of Totneſs, which is a town of Devonſhire.

The iſland was then called Albion, and was inhabited by none but a few giants. Here, the plenty of rivers, abounding with fiſh, and the beautiful ſituation of the place ſo much delighted Brutus and his companions, that they were very deſirous of making it their fixed habitation. Therefore, in paſſing through all the provinces, they obliged all the giants to retreat, who ſheltered in the caves of the mountains; and the country was divided among them as their commander deemed prudent. It was now they began to till the ground and erect houſes (or more properly, huts), ſo that in a ſhort time Albion looked like a place that had been long inhabited. It was called Britain, by Brutus, after his own name, and the inhabitants Britons; being willing to perpetuate his memory by this title. On this account the language of the nation, which was at firſt ſtyled Trojan, or rough Greek, was now called Britiſh.

In imitation of Brutus, Corineus alſo called the part of the iſland which was allotted to him, Corinea, and the people Corineans, after his own name; and though, for his ſingular valour, he had his choice of all the provinces before any of the reſt, yet he gave the preference to this country, which the Latins call Cornubia, either on account of its being in the ſhape of a horn, or through a corruption of its original title.

To encounter with the giants was always the great entertainment of Corineus, which no doubt was the chief reaſon of his preferring this place, as they abounded more in number here than in any of the other provinces. Among theſe giants was one deteſtable monſter, whom they called Goëmagot, in ſtature twelve cubits, and of ſurpriſing ſtrength. One day, when Brutus was holding a ſolemn feſtival to the gods, in the port where they at firſt landed, this giant, with twenty more of his companions, came in among the Britons, and was the occaſion of much ſlaughter. But Brutus, gathering his men into a large body, ſoon put them to the rout, and deſtroyed them all, except Goëmagot; for it was the general's command that he ſhould be preſerved alive, in order to ſee a combat between him and Corineus, as his friend delighted therein. Accordingly, Corineus, elate with the meſſage, ſoon accoutres himſelf, and throwing aſide his arms, now challenges the giant to a wreſtle. Standing face to face, the intrepid couple began the rencounter, and fettering each other in their arms, panted aloud for breath; but Goëmagot, ſuddenly graſping Corineus with all his might, broke two ribs on his right ſide, and one on the left. This highly enraged his antagoniſt, he now reſumed his utmoſt ability, and flinging him upon his ſhoulders, ran with him as faſt as the gigantic burthen would permit, to the next ſhore, and, aſcending the ſummit of a high rock, he hurled down the ſavage monſter into the ſea, where falling on the ſides of craggy rocks, he was ſo terribly lacerated, that he dyed the waves with his blood! From this giant's fall the place is therefore called Lam-Goëmagot to this day; which ſignifies the leap of Goëmagot.

Brutus, having now diſcovered his kingdom, entertained the deſire of building a city; for the promotion of which deſign he traverſed all the land through to ſeek a convenient ſituation, and reaching the river Thames, walked along the ſhore, and at laſt fixed upon a place the moſt ſuitable for his great intention. Here, therefore, he erected a city, which he called New Troy; by this name it continued for ſome time, till afterwards, through a corruption of the original word, it bore the title of Trinovantum. However, King Lud, the brother of Caſſibellaun, having waged war with Julius Cæſar, obtained the government of this kingdom, and ſurrounding it with ſtately walls and towers, of curious workmanſhip, which he called after his own name, Kaer-Lud, ſignifying Lud's city. But this occaſioned a conteſt between him and his brother Nennius, who took this alteration in dudgeon, and was exceedingly chagrined that the name of Troy was aboliſhed. But to proceed.

After Brutus had accompliſhed his deſign, he made choice of thoſe citizens whom he deemed moſt worthy to inhabit the new city, and preſcribed laws for their future peace and tranquillity. At this time Eli the prieſt governed in Judea, and the ark of the covenant was taken by the Philiſtines; alſo at the ſame time the ſons of Hector, after the expulſion of the poſterity of Antenor, reigned in Troy; as did Sylvius Æneas in Italy, who was the ſon of the famed Æneas, uncle of Brutus, and third king of the Latins.

In the courſe of theſe tranſactions Brutus had by his wife, Ignoge, three ſons, Locrin, Albanact, and Kamber, all youths of great promiſe. The father now dying, in the twenty-fourth year after his arrival, was buried by theſe ſons in the city he had built.

The three youths, upon the death of their father, having divided the kingdom of Britain between themſelves, mutually agreed to ſeparate, and each retire to his own goverment. Locrin, the eldeſt, took poſſeſſion of the middle part of the iſland, which was called afterwards from his name, Loegria. Kamber made himſelf maſter of that other part which lies beyond the river Severn, which, for ſome time, was known by the name of Cambria, after him, though afterwards it was called Wales; however, the people ſtill call themſelves in the Britiſh tongue, Cambri, from the name of Cambria. The youngeſt brother, Albanact, enjoyed the country which he called Albania, at preſent entitled Scotland. Having for ſome time reigned together in peace and happineſs, Humber, the king of the Huns, at laſt interrupted their tranquillity and killed Albanact in battle, forcing his people to join thoſe of Locrin's for protection.

When the news of Albanact's fall had reached the ears of the ſurviving brothers, they united their whole ſtrength, and reſolved to meet the king of the Huns. The battle commenced near the river which is now called Humber, towards which the king, being put to flight, made for ſafety; but falling therein, was drowned, on which occaſion the river took his name. Locrin, being now triumphant, ſhares among his men all the enemy's ſpoils, reſerving only for himſelf the gold and ſilver, which he found in the ſhips, together with three young damſels, whoſe beauty was remarkably great. One of them was the daughter of a king in Germany, that was made captive with the other two, by king Humber, who ſeized them by force, after he had deſtroyed their country. Her name was Eſtrildis, and her charms beyond all compariſon. Locrin being exceedingly captivated with her ſuperior beauty, would gladly and happily have married her; but Corineus diſcovering his intention (to whoſe daughter he had been for ſome time contracted) was provoked with extreme indignation, and ſeeking the king, went to him, before whom ſhaking a battle-ax which he held with his right-hand, he thus gave vent to his overflowing rage:

“ And is it poſſible, king Locrin, that you thus reward me? thus repay me for the many wounds I have ſuffered under the command of your father; for all the perils I have undergone in wars with ſtrange nations;—is it poſſible, I ſay, that by thee my daughter is ſlighted, and that thou canſt debaſe thyſelf ſo much by offering marriage to a barbarian? But mark me, young fooliſh man, while yet there remains any ſtrength in this right hand; this hand which has been deſtructive to ſo many giants, upon the Tyrrhenian coaſts, I will never, never put up with this palpable affront.”

Theſe words repeating again and again, with a tremendous voice, he ſhook his battle-ax, as if inclined to ſtrike him. But the friends of both now mutually interpoſed, and when by ſoft perſuaſions they had moderated the anger of Corineus, they likewiſe obliged Locrin to fulfil his engagement with his daughter, named Guendolœna; whom, according to their earneſt entreaties, he immediately married, but ſtill retained his affection for Eſtrildis, for whom there were ſecret apartments made under ground, where he took every opportunity of entertaining her, and always cauſed her to be honourably attended; reſolving, in this private manner to carry on an amour with her, ſince for fear of Corineus he could not live with her publicly. Thus did he conceal her for ſeven years, during which time he frequently viſited her, unknown to any, except his moſt intimate domeſtics, in whom he could with ſafety confide. He impoſed upon the credulity of others, by pretending, during the time of his abſence, that he was performing ſome ſecret ſacrifices to the gods. In the mean time his beloved miſtreſs, Eſtrildis, became pregnant, and was delivered of a daughter, who promiſed to equal her mother in charms, whom ſhe named Sabre. Guendolœna proved alſo with child, at the ſame time, and brought forth a ſon. He was named Maddan, and was committed to the care of his grandfather, Corineus, who undertook the child's education.

Now, after a ſeries of a few years, when Corineus was dead, Locrin divorced Guendolœna, and ſubſtituted in her place Eſtrildis, as queen. This enraged his former wife beyond meaſure, who, retiring into Cornwall, aſſembled together all the forces of that kingdom, and created much diſturbances againſt her late huſband. It was reſolved at laſt, that both armies ſhould join battle, near the river Sture, where, after a warm conteſt, Locrin receiving the ſhot of an arrow, died. Guendolœna, after his death, now undertook the government of the whole kingdom, being poſſeſſed of all the furious ſpirit of her father Corineus. She commanded the beautiful Eſtrildis and her daughter to be thrown into a river; which done, ſhe alſo publiſhed an edict throughout Britain, that the river ſhould be called after the damſel's name, being deſirous to perpetuate her own memory, and, in ſo doing, hand down to poſterity the infamy of her huſband. Accordingly, the river is called in the Britiſh tongue, Sabren, which has been ſince corrupted to Sabrina.

Locrin had reigned ten years, and Guendolœna about fifteen after his death; at the expiration of which time ſhe advanced her ſon, Maddan, who was now arrived at the years of manhood, to the throne; ſolacing herſelf with an habitation in Cornwall, for the remainder of her life. Samuel the prophet at this time governed in Judea. Sylvius Æneas alſo was living; and Homer, who was eſteemed a famous orator and poet. While Maddan was in poſſeſſion of his crown, he had by his wife two ſons, Menpricius and Malim. His reign continued for forty years, during which time he enjoyed uninterrupted peace and tranquillity. Upon his death his two ſons contended for the kingdom, being equally anxious for the ſovereignty of the whole iſland. Menpricius, impatient to attain his ambitious views, artfully enters into a pretended agreement with Malim, under pretence of making a compoſition with him, but by a formed conſpiracy murdered him in the aſſembly, where their ambaſſadors were met. By this treachery he obtained ſole dominion over the whole iſland, and began to exerciſe ſuch tyranny, that there was ſcarce a nobleman left alive; for, either by violence or treachery, he oppreſſed every one that he apprehended might be likely to ſucceed him, and thus purſued his hatred even to his whole race. He alſo deſerted his own wife, by whom he had a noble youth, called Ebraucus; and, in abandoning her, became himſelf ſo abandoned that he was guilty of even the worſt of crimes, and unnatural luſt was preferred to the virtuous pleaſures of the conjugal ſtate. At laſt, in the twentieth year of his reign, while he was hunting in the valley, happening to retire awhile from his company, he was ſurrounded by a vaſt multitude of ravenous wolves, who, in a moſt ſhocking manner, lacerated and devoured him. It was about this time Saul reigned in Judea, and Euriſtheus in Lacedemonia.

After the death of Menpricius, the government of Britain was held by his ſon Ebraucus, a man of great ſtature and uncommon ſtrength. He was the firſt after Brutus who invaded Gaul with a fleet, and diſtreſſed its provinces, by deſtroying their inhabitants, and laying waſte their cities. Thus, having enriched himſelf with a prodigious heap of gold and ſilver, he returned home victoriouſly. After this, he founded a city on the other ſide of Humber, which he called after his own name, Kaerebrauc, ſignifying the city of Ebraucus. (This was the time when David reigned in Judea, and Sylvius Latinus in Italy; alſo when Gad, Nathan, and Aſaph propheſied in Iſrael.) He alſo built the city of Alclud, towards Albania; and the town of Mount Agned, which bears the name to this day, of the Caſtle of Maidens, or the Mountain of Sorrow.

This prince had twenty wives, by whom he had twenty ſons and thirty daughters; he reigned for ſixty years, during which time he diſplayed great valour and ability. The names of his twenty ſons are, Brutus (ſurnamed Greenſhield) Margadud, Siſillius, Regin, Morivid, Bladud, Lagon, Bodloan, Kincar, Spaden, Gaul, Darden, Eldad, Ivor, Gangu, Hector, Kerin, Rud, Aſſarach, and Buel. The names of his thirty daughters were, Gloigni, Ignogni, Oudas, Guenliam, Gaudid, Angarad, Guendoloe, Tanguſtel, Gorgon, Medlan, Methahel, Ourar, Malure, Kambreda, Ragan, Gael, Ecub, Neſt, Cheun, Stadud, Gladud, Ebren, Blagan, Aballac, Angaes, Galaes, Edra, Anaor, Stadial, and Egron. Galaes far excelled all her other ſiſters in beauty, her charms being univerſally allowed to be far ſuperior to any in Britain. The father ſent all his daughters to Italy to Sylvius Alba, who ſucceeded Sylvius Latinus, where they were married among the Trojan nobility, as both the Latin and Sabine women refuſed to match with them.

But the ſons, except the eldeſt, departed in a fleet to Germany, having previouſly choſen their brother, Aſſarach, as their leader; and, by the aſſiſtance of Sylvius Alba, having ſubdued the people of that place, they obtained the kingdom, and therein fixed their reſidence. Brutus, the eldeſt ſon, remained at home with his father, whom he ſucceeded to the crown, which he held for twelve years.

He was ſucceeded by Leil, his ſon, a man of great piety and courteſy, who, enjoying a happy and proſperous reign, built in the northern part of Britain, a city called Kaerleil, after his own name. This was the time when Solomon began to build the Temple of Jeruſalem, and was viſited by the queen of Sheba, who, hearing of the king's wiſdom, came afar to ſee him; alſo Sylvius Epitus about this time ſucceeded his father Alba in Italy.

The reign of Leil continued upwards of twenty-five years, at the cloſe of which, becoming weak and feeble, he grew ſo remiſs in his government, that his indifference to buſineſs was the occaſion of a civil diſſention in the kingdom.

His ſon Hudibraſs ſucceeded him, who reigned for thirty-nine years, and quelled thoſe interruptions and civil diſſentions, which happened on account of his father's neglect. He built Kaerlem or Canterbury, Kaerguen or Wincheſter, and the town of Mount Paladar, now called Shafteſbury. It was reported that an eagle ſpoke at this place, while the wall of the town was erecting; but the hiſtorian, Geofrey, has very wiſely declined giving the ſuppoſed ſpeech, as he himſelf doubted the veracity of it. About this time Capys, the ſon of Epitus, reigned; alſo Haggai, Amos, Joel, and Azariah were prophets in Iſrael.

Bladud, the ſon of Hudibraſs, now ſucceeded, and reigned twenty years. He built Kaerbadus, (now Bath), and made hot-baths therein, for the benefit of the public, which were dedicated to the goddeſs Minerva, in whoſe temple he inſtituted fires that were ſaid never to decay nor conſume to aſhes, for, as ſoon as they were upon the decline, they were ſuppoſed to turn into balls of ſtone. —It was about this time when the prophet Elias prayed it might not rain upon earth, and it did not rain for three years and ſix months. Prince Bladud was a very ingenious man, and taught necromancy in the kingdom; nor did he forbear his magical operations till after a vain attempt to aſcend to heaven, with wings which he had both contrived and prepared, he fell down upon the temple of Apollo, in the city of Trinovantum, and deſervedly, for his daring preſumption, was daſhed to pieces.

His ſon Leir ſucceeded his father, and reigned ſixty years, during which time his political conduct met with univerſal approbation. He built a city called in the Britiſh language, Kaerleir (in the Saxon, Leirceſtre) upon the river Soar. He had no ſons, but three daughters, whoſe names were Gonorilla, Regau, and Cordeilla; he was a partial father, being exceedingly fond of all, but more particularly his youngeſt daughter, Cordeilla.

Becoming now old and feeble, he entertained thoughts of dividing his kingdom among them, and giving to each ſuch huſbands as were moſt likely to promote the general welfare, and advance the government, during their poſſeſſion. But in order to try who was the moſt worthy of the beſt part of the kingdom, he went to each of them to enquire, which loved him beſt? This queſtion being firſt propoſed to the eldeſt, Gonorilla called heaven to witneſs, "That ſhe loved him more than her own ſoul." The delighted father, upon this, replied:

"Since then you have preferred my declining age before your own life, you ſhall have, my deareſt child, a huſband of your own chooſing, and your dowry ſhall be the third part of my kingdom."

The ſecond daughter, Regau, being tried in the ſame manner, and not willing to be outdone in ſeeming duty and affection, by the eldeſt born, with equal ardour and apparent tenderneſs, followed the example of her ſiſter, and, invoking heaven to witneſs her ſincerity, impoſed upon her aged father's credulity and weakneſs: ſhe wept, and taking advantage of thoſe tears, declared, "That ſhe could in no other manner expreſs her thoughts, which baffled all utterance, for that ſhe indeed idolized him above all her relations!"—Hereupon the deceived father made her the ſame promiſe that he did her ſiſter, both in reſpect to a huſband and a ſhare of his kingdom. But the youngeſt, Cordeilla, being informed of her poor deluded father's credulity, and how much the flattery of her ſiſters had courted his favour, was reſolved to adopt a new mode, and at the ſame time make trial of his affection towards her. Accordingly, when it came to her turn to anſwer his queſtion, ſhe, in the following manner, addreſſed the king, her father:

"Oh, my dread ſire, is there any daughter that can love a parent more than duty can require? in my opinion, whoever promiſes greater love, not only arrogates that which is impoſſible, but falſely diſguiſes her real ſentiments under the unworthy maſk of flattery. I have always honoured you as a king, and loved you as a father; and in this my truth and candour, I hope, both my love and reſpect are ſufficiently apparent; for, according to the dictates of duty and honour, I will always ſpeak my mind. But if you inſiſt on my adding more, and will extort every ſecret ſentiment of my heart, I will then prove the greatneſs of my affection, which has been always conſtant—always ſincere—by this my honeſt declaration, which pray take for a brief anſwer to every queſtion; examine yourſelf; as much as you have, ſo much is your value, and according to that value, ſo much will I always eſteem you."

The miſtaken father, imagining theſe words proceeded from the ſelfiſh views of intereſt, and not real pure affection, was greatly enraged, and, in the height of his indignation, thus replied:

"Since you have thus deſpiſed my old age, as not to think me worthy the love your ſiſters have expreſſed for me, you ſhall experience from me, in return, equal diſregard; for know, this moment I exclude you from any ſhare with your ſiſters in my kingdom, from any ſhare of affection in my heart. I confeſs that you are my daughter; and being ſo, I will marry you to ſome foreigner or other, if fortune be favourable enough to put ſuch a huſband in your way; but never, never, I aſſure you, ſhall I make it my buſineſs to procure ſuch an honourable match for you as I ſhall for either of your ſiſters; for though I have hitherto fondly, and indeed blindly, loved you more than I have them; yet you have now, as a requital, thought me leſs worthy of affection than they."

Thus the enraged father, without farther delay, after a ſhort conſultation with his nobles, gave in marriage his two daughters, Gonorilla and Regau, to the Dukes of Cornwal and Albania, with half the iſland for the preſent, and after his death, the inheritance of the whole monarchy of Britain.

Some time after this, Aganippus, king of the Franks, having heard the fame and ſuperiority of Cordeilla's beauty, ſent his ambaſſadors to the king, to requeſt her hand in marriage. The royal parent ſtill retaining his indignation, ſent the following uncouth reply:

"That he was very willing to give him his daughter, but it ſhould be without either money or dominions, minions, becauſe he had already divided his whole kingdom, with all his treaſure, among his elder daughters, Gonorilla and Regau."

This reply did by no means abate the anxious deſire of Aganippus, who was ſtill eager for the union, and more attached to beauty than intereſt; accordingly, he ſent again to king Leir, informing him, "That he had ſufficient money and dominions of his own, being in poſſeſſion of the third part of Gaul, and therefore deſired no more than his daughter, that he might have heirs by her." An agreement was accordingly made, and Cordeilla forthwith ſent to Gaul, and married to king Aganippus.

Some years after this, when Leir became exceedingly infirm through old age, the two dukes of Cornwal and Albania, to whom he had married his elder daughters, and whom he had therewith put in poſſeſſion of Britain, now roſe up againſt him, and deprived him of his whole kingdom, and all that royal authority which he had hitherto exerciſed with great power and honour. Matters were at length reconciled, and Maglaunus, duke of Albania, the huſband of Gonorilla, conſented to allow him and his attendants (who were to conſiſt of ſixty men) a ſubſiſtence at his own houſe. Here he remained two years, but his daughter, Gonorilla, muttered exceedingly at the number of his men; for the ſoldiers, it ſeems, had upbraided the miniſters of the court, for the ſcanty allowances which were made them: having, therefore, conſulted with her huſband, ſhe gave orders that her father's attendants ſhould be reduced to thirty, and the remainder immediately diſcharged; but the old injured man, reſenting this unkind treatment, left Maglaunus, and repaired to Henuinus, the duke of Cornwal, to whom he had married his other daughter, Regau. He was received here with every due reſpect, but ſcarcely had one year elapſed, when a contention took place between the two families, which ſo rouſed the indignation of Regau, that ſhe inſtantly commanded her father to diſcharge all his attendants, except five, with whoſe ſervices he ſhould be content. This was double affliction! it was almoſt inſupportable! ſo that the grieved father returned again to his former daughter, hoping that his preſent anguiſh might excite ſome commiſeration in her, and create ſuch ſeeds of filial piety and affection, that he and his ſmall retinue might be ſettled for the remainder of his few days. But mindful of his former departure, and the conſequences thereof, ſhe ſwore by all the gods, he ſhould not remain with her, unleſs he would diſmiſs every attendant, except one; and then, with bitter reproaches, added, that his deſire of vain-glorious pomp, but ill correſponded with his poverty and old age. When he found all means impracticable to ſooth her in his favour, much againſt his inclination, he complied; and diſmiſſing his attendants, endeavoured to content himſelf with the ſervice of only one.

Reflection now brought to mind the grandeur from which he had fallen, and thinking upon the miſerable ſtate to which he was reduced, it occurred at laſt to go beyond the ſea, and viſit his youngeſt daughter; but then doubting whether he ſhould be able to move her to compaſſion, ſeeing he had dealt ſo unkindly to her, his mind became exceedingly agitated. Diſdaining, however, to bear any longer ſuch baſe uſage, he took ſhipping to Gaul. During the paſſage, he obſerved he had only the third place given among the princes who accompanied him, at which being exceedingly moved, he could not forbear his tears and ſighs, and burſt forth in the following exclamation:

"O irreverſible decrees of the Fates, who never ſwerve from your ſtated courſe, why did I ever know the bleſſings of an unſhaken felicity, ſince now the puniſhment of loſt happineſs is far greater than the ſenſe of preſent miſery? The recollection of that time, when, obſequiouſly followed by a number of attendants, I was crowned with ſucceſs in taking cities and waſting the enemies countries, more forcibly pierces my heart than all the knowledge of theſe ſufferings, which have expoſed me to the deriſion of thoſe who formerly kneeled at my feet! O rage of fortune! Shall I ever be able to ſee the day when I may have it in my power to reward thoſe, according to their deſerts, who have forſaken me in this my calamity? Alas! how true, Cordeilla, was your obſervation, when I enquired your love for me, As much as you have, ſo much is your value. While I had any thing to give, I was indeed regarded, not becauſe they were friends to me, but friends to my donations. Yes, they loved me then indeed, not for myſelf, but for my poſſeſſions; for they loved my favours more than my perſon; and when the ability of giving ceaſed, alas! my friends departed! How ſhall I now preſume to ſee that deareſt child whom, in the bitterneſs of my undeſerved rage, I have married upon worſe terms than any of her ſiſters;—ſiſters, who, after all the favours they have received from their aged father, now ſuffer him to remain in baniſhment and poverty."

Thus the forſaken king bewailed his hard condition, till he arrived at Caritia, where his daughter was, and waiting ſubmiſſively before the city, diſpatched a meſſenger to inform her of the great miſery he had fallen into, the miſery of hunger and nakedneſs, humbly ſoliciting her relief! Cordeilla was greatly alarmed at this information, and weeping bitterly, enquired how many attendants her father had with him. The reply was, "That he had none but one poor follower, who had been his armour-bearer, and was ſtaying with him without the town." Accordingly, ſhe took as much money as ſhe deemed ſufficient, and giving it to the meſſenger, enjoined him to carry her father to another city, reporting that he was ill, and there provide for him bathing, clothes, and every other neceſſary. She alſo commanded that he ſhould take into his ſervice forty men of genteel appearance; and when all theſe things were prepared, that he ſhould then announce his arrival to king Aganippus, and his daughter. The meſſenger quickly returning to the old man, conveyed him to another town, where he kept him concealed, and every thing the kind Cordeilla commanded, was now faithfully performed.

Being provided with royal apparel, ornaments, and attendants, in obedience to his daughter's requeſt, he ſends word to king Aganippus, declaring himſelf an exile, through the unkind ſeverity of his ſons-in-law, and was therefore come to him and his daughter, for their protection and future aſſiſtance. On receiving this meſſage, the king and queen, attended with all their nobles and miniſters of ſtate, went out to meet him; and receiving him with every kind of reſpect, ſubmitted to his management the whole power of Gaul, until ſuch time as he ſhould be reſtored to his former dignity.

In the interim, king Aganippus diſpatched officers all over Gaul, to raiſe an army in order to reinſtate his father-in-law, and revenge his injuries. This being done, Leir returned to Britain, accompanied with Aganippus and Cordeilla, and the forces which were raiſed; where, having fought with his ſons-in-law, the two dukes were ſoon defeated. And being now once more in quiet poſſeſſion of his own kingdom, he died the third year after; king Aganippus ſoon followed; ſo that Cordeilla, obtaining the government of her father's kingdom, had given orders that king Leir ſhould be buried in a certain vault, which was, by her command, made for him under the river Soar, in Leiceſter. The ſubterraneous place, where he was interred, had been erected in honour of the god Janus; and here all the workmen of that city uſed to commence their annual labours upon the anniverſary ſolemnity of that feſtival.

Cordeilla, after enjoying a reign of peace and tranquillity for five years, now began to meet with diſturbances from the two ſons of her deceaſed ſiſters, Margan, who was born of Gonorilla, and Cunedagius, who was born of Regau. Theſe men were endued with great ſpirit, and having ſucceeded their fathers in their dukedoms, were provoked that Britain ſhould be now under the government of a woman; accordingly they raiſed hoſtilities againſt the queen, nor deſiſted from their inſurrection till, after many battles, they had totally laid waſte her countries, and having at laſt made Cordeilla captive, confined her in priſon: here, grieved for the loſs of her kingdom, ſhe put an end to her exiſtence. After this the conquerors divided the iſland between them: Margan taking poſſeſſion of that part which reaches from the north ſide of the Humber to Cathneſs, and the other part from the ſame river weſtward falling to the ſhare of Cunedagius.

Two years being elapſed, ſome envious ſpirits, that delighted in the troubles of the nation, now found acceſs to Margan, and inſpired him with falſe ambition, by declaring it to be a downright diſgrace that he was not an entire governor, it being his due by right and birth, with theſe and ſimilar inſinuations, he was at laſt ſtimulated to march with an army through Cunedagius's country, and began to ſet fire thereto. A war being now commenced, Cunedagius and all his forces met him, and attacking him with great ſpirit and intrepidity, deſtroyed no ſmall number of his men, and put Margan to flight. Cunedagius purſued him from one province to another, till at laſt detecting him in a town of Cambria, he there killed him; on this account the place is ſince called by country people Margan to this day. The victor Cunedagius took ſole poſſeſſion of the kingdom, which he governed for thirty-three years with great honour and felicity. The prophets Iſaiah and Hoſea flouriſhed at this time; Rome was alſo built on the eleventh of the calenders of May, by the two brothers Romulus and Remus.

Cunedagius was ſucceeded by his ſon Rivallo, who was a fortunate youth, and punctually adhered to the performance of his duties. It is ſaid to have rained blood for three days together during his reign, and that there was alſo a plague of flies which was the deſtruction of many.

Gurguſtius reigned after his father Rivallo; after him, Siſillius, who was ſucceeded by Jago, the nephew of Gurguſtius; after him Kinmarcus, the ſon of Siſillius, who was alſo ſucceeded by Gorboguda, who had two ſons, Ferrex and Porrox.

Theſe ſons when their father grew old began to quarrel about the ſucceſſion; but Porrox ſtimulated by ambition treacherouſly formed a deſign to kill his brother, which being happily diſcovered by Ferrex, he made his eſcape and paſſed over into Gaul; here he procured aſſiſtance from Suard, king of the Franks, whereby he was enabled to return and wage war with his brother; but during the engagement Ferrex and all the forces which attended him were deſtroyed. As ſoon as Widen, their mother, was informed of her ſon's death, her indignation was greatly provoked and continued during her life againſt the other; for Ferrex had been always her favourite, ſo that nothing leſs could atone for the death of this dear ſon but revenge on the one that ſurvived. She ſeized, therefore, an opportunity when he was aſleep, and by the aſſiſtance of her women, fell upon him and tore him to pieces. Upon this the people were a long time oppreſſed by a tedious civil war, and the iſland became ſubject to the ſway of five kings, who, by alternate diſagreements, continually embarraſſed each other.

But Dunwallo Molmutius, a youth of great ſpirit, who was the ſon of Cloten, king of Cornwal, and who excelled all the kings of Britain in valour and elegance, upon the death of his father, being poſſeſſed of the government of that country, now roſe up, and making war againſt Ymner, king of Loegria, killed him in battle. Upon this a meeting was appointed between Rudaucus, king of Cambria, and Staterius, king of Albania, who forming an alliance together, marched from thence with their united armies into Dunwallo's country, with an intention of putting all to the ſword. They were met by the king, accompanied with thirty thouſand men, who gave them battle. The day being almoſt ſpent in a dreadful ſlaughter, while victory ſtill remained doubtful, Dunwallo drew off ſix hundred of his braveſt men, and now throwing aſide his own and attiring himſelf in the enemies armour (who were ſlain) commanded the reſt to follow the example. Thus accoutred he marched up haſtily to the enemies ranks, as if one of their party, and approaching the very place where Rudaucus and Staterius were, ordered his diſguiſed men to fall upon them. Thus were the two kings deſtroyed, and many others with them; but Dunwallo ſuſpecting, on account of his diſguiſe, that his own men might fall upon him, through miſtake, returned with his companions to lay aſide the enemies armour and reſume their own; and while they were performing this, he encouraged them to renew the aſſault, which was ſo vigorouſly done by diſperſing and putting the enemy to flight, that victory ſoon was his. Thus triumphant he marched into the enemies territories, and having deſtroyed their provinces, now reduced all the inhabitants ſubſervient to his power.

Now the whole iſland being reduced, he prepares a crown of gold for himſelf, and reſtores the kingdom to its antient ſtate. Thoſe laws which the Britons call the Molmutine, and which are now in practice, were eſtabliſhed by this prince. He alſo ordained that the temples of the deities, and alſo the cities, ſhould be privileged to give ſanctuary and protection to all fugitives and criminals who ſhould ſeek an aſylum from their purſuers; alſo that the ways leading to thoſe temples and cities, and likewiſe the huſbandmen's ploughs ſhould have the ſame privilege; ſo that in thoſe days all cruelties and murders, which were common before, were now prevented, and every perſon paſſed ſecure without any violence offered them.

After a reign of forty years, ſpent in theſe and ſimilar acts of juſtice, Dunwallo died, and was buried in the city of Trinovantum, adjoining the temple of Concord, which was erected by himſelf on the eſtabliſhment of his laws.

It now happened that Belinus and Brennius, the two ſons of the deceaſed king, being both ambitious of ſucceeding, quarrelled on that account: each vied for the honour of the crown, and in conſequence thereof a warm diſpute enſued; at laſt, through the interpoſition of friends, they conſented to a diviſion of the kingdom upon the following conditions:

“ That Belinus, being the firſt born, ſhould therefore enjoy the crown of the iſland, with the dominions of Loegria, Cambria, and Cornwal (as agreeable to the Trojan conſtitution the rights of inheritance was his); Brennius, being the younger, ſhould therefore be ſubject to the other; but have for his ſhare Northumberland, which extended from the river Humber to Cathneſs.”

Theſe conditions being mutually accepted, and the covenants confirmed, they reigned peaceably and happily together for five years, but faction ſoon found the means of interrupting their proſperity, for now ſome bold incendiaries, having gained admittance to Brennius, thus provoked him to contention and ſtrife:

“ How is it poſſible you can, with ſluggiſh ſpirit, remain in this obſcurity, and bear ſubjection to a brother, to whom, by parentage and blood, you are equal; conſider your ſuperior ſkill in military affairs, which you have acquired by the experience of ſeveral engagements, particularly when you repulſed ſo often Cheulphus, general of the Morines, upon his invading our country, and drove him out of your kingdom. Rouſe, therefore, from this mean ſubjection, and be no longer bound by a diſgraceful treaty, but marry the daughter of Elſingius, king of the Norwegians, that by his aſſiſtance you may recover your loſt dignity.”

Inflamed with theſe and ſimilar expreſſions, Brennius went to Norway, where, according to the advice of this ſycophantic tribe, he married the king's daughter. But the elder brother, Belinus, being provoked at theſe proceedings, which had been carried on without either his knowledge or permiſſion, marched into Northumberland, and took poſſeſſion of all that country, which he garriſoned with his own men. When Brennius received information of this, he prepared a fleet to return to Britain, with a great army of Norwegians. But while under ſail, with a propitious wind, he was overtaken by Guichthlac, king of the Dacians, who being deeply oppreſſed with love for the young lady that Brennius had married, with vexation and grief, purſued his rival, who had deprived him of her; for this purpoſe he had prepared a fleet with all expedition. During the ſea-fight which happened on this occaſion, the Dacian king had the good fortune to ſeize the very ſhip which contained the young lady, whom accordingly he brought in among his companions. But in the midſt of the engagement, contrary winds riſing, a ſtorm took place, which diſperſing the ſhips, drove them upon different ſhores. Being now toſſed to and fro, Guichthlac, under dreadful apprehenſions, not knowing upon what place this unforeſeen caſualty might throw him, was at length driven to Northumberland. The country-people hereupon aſſembled, and hearing their ſtory, carried them to Belinus, who was upon the ſea-coaſts, expecting the arrival of his brother. The Dacian king had three ſhips with his own, one of which had belonged to Brennius's fleet. When Belinus was informed of this accident, he rejoiced greatly at the misfortunes of his brother, feeding himſelf up with hopes of being ſpeedily revenged.

In the mean time Brennius, having re-united his fleet, appeared a few days after, and arrived in Albania. Here receiving information of the taking of his wife and others, and alſo of his brother's having ſeized the kingdom of Northumberland in his abſence, he ſent ambaſſadors to demand a reſtoration of his wife and kingdom; with a declaration, that in caſe of refuſal he would deſtroy the whole iſland, from ſea to ſea, and alſo his brother, whenever an opportunity arrived. But the unintimidated Belinus abſolutely refuſed a compliance, and aſſembling together the whole power of the iſland, repaired to Albania, for the ſake of an engagement.

When Brennius was informed of this repulſe, and with his brother's intention of marching againſt him, he haſtened to a wood called Calaterium, with a deſign of there meeting and attacking him.

The parties ſoon appeared in the field of battle, when each of them divided his men into ſeveral bodies, and then advancing towards the other, a warm engagement commenced. Much time was ſpent in a doubtful conteſt, for the braveſt men were engaged together, and on account of their mutual fury, much blood was ſhed on both ſides.

The Britons at laſt becoming victorious, the Norwegians fled, with their ſcattered troops, to their veſſels; but being purſued by Belinus, were deſtroyed without any mercy. In this battle fifteen thouſand men periſhed, nor were there a thouſand of the reſt that were not wounded. Brennius having with much difficulty procured a veſſel, went, as fortune drove him, to the coaſts of Gaul; but the reſt who attended, were compelled to ſtray about, and take ſhelter wherever they could find it.

Belinus, after this victory, now called a council of nobles, in order to conſult what he ſhould do reſpecting the king of the Dacians, who had ſent him a meſſage from priſon, promiſing to ſubmit both himſelf and kingdom to him, and alſo allow an annual tribute, if permitted to depart with his miſtreſs. This covenant he likewiſe offered to confirm with a ſacred oath, and the delivery of hoſtages.

The council unanimouſly approved of this propoſal, and agreed that Belinus ſhould grant the king his petition, upon thoſe terms which he had voluntarily offered; whereupon Guichthlac was reſtored to liberty, and returned with his miſtreſs to Dacia.

Now Belinus ſeeing there was no perſon in the kingdom capable of depreſſing him, and being in ſole poſſeſſion of the whole iſland, confirmed thoſe laws his father had made, and exacted that juſtice ſhould all throughout the kingdom be fully and duly executed; he likewiſe ordered that the cities and all the paſſages ſhould enjoy the ſame privileges of peace that Dunwallo had previouſly eſtabliſhed. But a controverſy took place concerning the ways leading to the cities, as the limits determining them were unknown; willing, therefore, to remove all ambiguities, and prevent future altercations, the king ſummoned all the workmen of the iſland together, and commanded them to pave a cauſeway of ſtone and mortar, which ſhould run the whole length of the iſland, from the ſea of Cornwal to the ſhore of Cathneſs, and lead directly to the cities that lay along that extent; alſo another to be made over the breadth of the kingdom, leading from Menevia, which was ſituated upon the Demetian ſea, to Hamo's Port, and to paſs through the interjacent cities; two others he had alſo made obliquely through the iſland, for a paſſage to the reſt of the cities. To theſe he confirmed all honours and privileges, and preſcribed a law for the puniſhment of any injury which might be committed upon them.

While peace and tranquillity attended the preſent reign of Belinus, agony and deſpair were torturing the mind of Brennius, whom we had left upon the coaſts of Gaul. He was extremely afflicted at being baniſhed from his country, and deprived of the power of returning to retrieve his loſs. Not knowing where to proceed, or how to act, he went among the princes of Gaul, accompanied only with twelve men; to theſe he related his misfortunes, but unable to procure any aſſiſtance, went at laſt to Seginus, duke of the Allobroges, by whom he was courteouſly received.

During his ſtay here he contracted ſuch an intimacy with the duke, that he became the greateſt favourite at court. In all affairs, both of peace and war, he diſplayed ſo much ſkill and capacity, that he was beloved by the prince as if he was his own ſon; add to this, the dignity of his countenance, the elegance of his ſtature, his agility in hunting and fowling, and more eſpecially his honourable birth. In ſhort, the duke reſolved to make him his ſon, by giving him his only daughter ter in marriage, and appointed him and his daughter to ſucceed him in his kingdom, provided he ſhould die without any male iſſue; but, notwithſtanding, if he ſhould have a ſon, he promiſed his aſſiſtance to advance him to the kingdom of Britain. Nor was this the deſire of the duke only, it being the wiſh of all the nobles, into whoſe good graces, Brennius had happily ingratiated himſelf.

The marriage was, therefore, ſoon ſolemnized, and the princes of that country paid their homage to him as the ſucceſſor to the throne. Scarcely had one year elapſed when the duke died. Brennius, therefore, ſeized this opportunity of engaging the attention of all the princes, having courted them over to his intereſt, by many inſtances of former friendſhip; for he frequently made them preſents from the duke's treaſures, which his father-in-law had been hoarding up; but what moſt of all gained him eſteem, and won the affection of the Allobroges, were the ſumptuous entertainments he was accuſtomed to give, as he continually kept an open houſe for all.

Thus having ſecured himſelf in the friendſhip of the Allobroges, he began to conſult within himſelf how he ſhould be revenged upon his brother Belinus; and no ſooner did he reveal his ſecret intentions to his ſubjects, but they all unanimouſly approved of his meaſures, and expreſſed their readineſs to follow wherever he was pleaſed to lead. Accordingly, he raiſed a great army, and entered into a treaty with the Gauls, for a free paſſage through their country into Britain. Having therefore fitted out a fleet upon the coaſt of Neuſtria, he ſet ſail, and with a fair wind arrived at that iſland.

Belinus, upon hearing of his approach, accompanied with the whole ſtrength of the kingdom, marched in order to engage him. But when both armies were drawn in array, and the onſet juſt beginning, their mother, Conwenna, who was ſtill living, impatient to behold her ſon, whom ſhe had not ſeen this long time, ruſhed through their ranks with great rapidity. And when with trembling ſteps ſhe had approached the place, where Brennius ſtood, ſhe threw her arms about his neck, and kiſſed him with extatic joy; then uncovering her boſom (as well as her ſighs would permit her utterance) ſhe addreſſed him thus:

"Ah, my ſon, remember—I pray remember theſe breaſts which have nouriſhed you, and the womb wherein, by the Creator of all things, you were formed, and from whence he introduced you to the world, while your mother's ſufferings were inexpreſſible. Oh! then, by the pains which I have endured on your account, I entreat you, ſon, to hear me. Forgive your brother, and moderate your reſentment. You ought not to revenge yourſelf upon him who has done you no wrong. For your complaint (wherein you urge your baniſhment from your country) if you will duly conſider the event thereof, cannot in truth be called injuſtice, ſeeing he did not baniſh you to render your condition worſe, but forced you to quit a meaner, that you might attain a higher dignity. You firſt enjoyed a part of a kingdom, which was in ſubjection to your brother; as ſoon as you loſt it, you became his equal, by gaining the whole kingdom of the Allobroges. What has he then done but promoted you from a viceroy to be a great king? Conſider further, that the difference between you did not originate with him, but yourſelf, who with the aſſiſtance of the king of Norway, made inſurrections againſt him."

Moved by his mother's language and affliction, with due compoſure he prepared for obedience, and voluntarily taking off his helmet, went ſtraightway with her to his brother.

Belinus perceiving his approach, and obſerving his countenance to wear a ſerene and peaceable aſpect, threw aſide his arms and ran to embrace him, ſo that without any difficulties being ſtarted, or dangers incurred, their friendſhip was again renewed, and by that renewal rendered permanent. Diſarming then their forces, they marched happily together to Trinovantum. And now a conſultation being held, to ſee what meaſures were adviſeable, it was reſolved that they ſhould conduct their confederate army into the provinces of Gaul, and reduce that whole country under their ſubjection.

Accordingly, the year after they paſſed over into Gaul, and began to lay it waſte. This news being carried through all their ſeveral nations, the petty kings of the Franks entered into a confederacy, and went out to meet them. But Belinus and Brennius becoming conquerors, the Franks betook themſelves to flight, with their broken forces, while the Britons and Allobroges, elevated with their ſucceſs, ceaſed not their purſuit, till they had made captives of their kings; then fortifying the cities which they had taken, they reduced the kingdom under their obedience in leſs than a year's time. Afterwards they marched with their whole army towards Rome, and deſtroyed the cities and villages as they paſſed through Italy.

Gabius and Porſenna were then conſuls of Rome, to whoſe care the government of the country was committed; when theſe men perceived that no power was able to withſtand Belinus and Brennius, by the conſent of the ſenate, they made propoſals for amity and peace. They offered large preſents of gold and ſilver, and promiſed likewiſe an annual tribute, provided they acquieſced.

The two kings, therefore, taking hoſtages of them, yielded to their requeſt, and removed their forces to Germany. But while they were employing themſelves in diſtreſſing theſe people, the Romans repented of the conceſſions they had made, and reſuming their courage, went to aſſiſt the Germans. Theſe unwarrantable meaſures ſo incenſed the kings, that they conſulted together how they ſhould carry on a war againſt both nations. It was therefore reſolved that Belinus, with the Britons, ſhould ſtay and engage the enemy in Germany, while Brennius and his party ſhould march to Rome, and revenge the Roman inſult.

As ſoon as the Italians perceived their drift, they left the Germans, and endeavoured to get before Brennius into Rome. Belinus received intelligence of this, ſpeedily marched back with his army the ſame night, and availing himſelf of a valley through which the enemy were to paſs, lay there concealed, in expectation of their coming. The Italians arrived the next day to this place, but perceiving at a diſtance the valley glittering with the enemy's armour, they were ſtruck with confuſion, imagining Brennius and the Galli Senones were there. While this opportunity offered, Belinus ruſhed ſuddenly forth, and fell upon them with great fury, while the ſurpriſed Romans took to flight, being neither armed nor in any order for the attack. But Belinus gave them no quarter, and was only prevented by the darkneſs of the approaching night from making a general ſlaughter.

Thus victorious, he repaired ſtraightway to Brennius, who had now beſieged Rome three days. Uniting then their armies they aſſault the city on every ſide, and endeavour to level the walls. They alſo erected gallows before the gates of the city, in order to ſtrike a greater terror into the minds of the beſieged, by menaces that they would hang up their hoſtages, unleſs they would ſurrender. But the Romans, regardleſs of the ſufferings of their ſons and relations, continued ſtill inflexible and reſolute to defend themſelves, and therefore frequently broke the force of the enemy's engines by other engines of their own, and ſometimes with ſhowers of darts drove them from the walls.

This ſo incenſed Belinus and Brennius, that they forthwith commanded four and twenty of their nobleſt hoſtages to be hanged up in the ſight of their parents; but this horrid ſpectacle ſerved only to harden the Romans the more, who had now a meſſage from Gabius and Perſenna, their conſuls, that they would come the next day to their aſſiſtance. Encouraged with theſe tidings, they therefore determined to march out of the city, and give the enemy battle.

While now they were ranging their troops in order, behold, the conſuls appeared with their re-aſſembled forces marching up to begin the attack; theſe advancing in a cloſe body fell on the Britons and Allobroges to their very great ſurpriſe, and being alſo joined by the citizens who ſallied forth, they deſtroyed no ſmall number of their enemies.

The brothers ſorely afflicted with this ſad reverſe of fortune, began to encourage the men, and then breaking in upon the Romans ſeveral times, frequently obliged them to retire; at laſt they became victorious after the loſs of many thouſands of brave men on both ſides; and having taken the city killed Gabius, and made Porſenna priſoner: this being done, they divided among their troops all the hidden treaſure of the city.

The victory being thus gained Brennius remained in Italy, where he exerciſed unheard of tyranny among the people, while Belinus returned to Britain, where he ſpent the remainder of his days in peace and quietneſs. He repaired ſeveral cities which were falling to ruin, and built many new ones; particularly one upon the river Uſke near the Severn Sea, which was for a long time called Caeroſc, and was the metropolis of Demetia; but after the coming in of the Romans it loſt its firſt title, and was then named the City of Legions, from the Roman legions, which uſed to take up their winter quarters therein. He alſo made a gate of wonderful ſtructure in Trinovantum, upon the bank of the Thames, which the citizens call after his name Billingſgate to this day. Over this he built a prodigious large tower, and under a haven or quay for ſhips. He was a ſtrict obſerver of juſtice, and re-eſtabliſhed his father's laws throughout the kingdom. There was in his days ſo great an abundance of wealth in the city, that no age before or after is ſaid to have poſſeſſed ſo much. At laſt when he died his body was burnt, and the aſhes reſerved in a golden urn, which they placed at Trinovantum with great ingenuity on the top of the abovementioned tower.

His ſon Gurgiunt Brabtruc ſucceeded him, a prince remarkable for his ſobriety and prudence; who being a lover of peace and juſtice, followed the ſteps of his father, and when ſome neighbouring provinces rebelled againſt him, he alſo demonſtrated the ſame bravery, by repreſſing their inſolence in many hot battles, and reducing them to perfect ſervitude.

Among other occurrences, the Dacian king, who paid tribute in his father's time, not only refuſed it now, but even all manner of homage; this he reſented ſo violently that he paſſed over in a fleet to Dacia, and harraſſing the people with a dreadful war, at laſt reduced the country under its ancient yoke.

While now returning home from his conqueſt through the Orkney Iſlands, he found thirty ſhips laden with men and women; on his enquiring the occaſion of their coming thither, their leader, whoſe name was Partholoim, approached him with every apparent mark of reſpect and ſubmiſſion, deſiring pardon and peace; he then ſaid that he had been driven out of Spain, and was ſailing round thoſe ſeas in queſt of an habitation: he wiſhed for a ſmall part of Britain to reſide in, that they might put an end to their tedious wandering; for it was about a year and a half ſince he was an exile, during which time he and his company had been out at ſea.

When Gurgiunt Brabtruc was aſſured that they were from Spain, and were called Barclenſes, he immediately granted their requeſt, and ſent men with them to Ireland, which being then wholly uninhabited, was totally aſſigned to them. Here they grew up, increaſing in number, and have kept poſſeſſion of that iſland to this day. Gurgiunt Brabtruc having concluded his days in peace and happineſs, was buried in the city of Legions, which he himſelf had beautified with buildings and walls, after his father's death.

He was ſucceeded by Guithelin to the crown, which he enjoyed during his lifetime with uninterrupted beatitude, being eſteemed by all his ſubjects. Martia his wife, a noble lady, was remarkable for all her literary accompliſhments. She was the author of many eſteemed productions, particularly that which the Britons call the Martian Law.

Upon the death of Guithelin, his queen and her ſon Siſilius, kept the government of the kingdom in their own hands. The child was but ſeven years old, and conſequently unfit to reign alone. On his account the queen undertook the ſole management of affairs, which were committed to her, but upon her death Siſilius reigned by himſelf.

His ſon Kimarus reigned after him, who was ſucceeded by Danius his brother. Upon his death the crown deſcended to his baſtard, Morvidus, whom he had by his concubine, Tanguſtela. This would have been a prince of great merit, had not his abilities been eclipſed by his immoderate cruelty; for when enraged he allowed quarter to nobody. Notwithſtanding which he was extremely liberal, and poſſeſſed greater ſtrength than any of his ſubjects.

During his reign a certain king of the Morines arrived with a great army in Northumberland, which he began to lay waſte; but Morvidus uniting his forces, marched out againſt him and commenced battle: herein the king himſelf performed more than the majority of his men, and being victorious, ſuffered not one to eſcape alive. By his command the priſoners were brought to him, one by one, that he might ſatiate his cruelty with their blood, and when he became weary of ſhedding it, he then ordered that they ſhould be flayed alive and burnt. Amidſt theſe and many other enormous acts of equal cruelty, an affair happened which put an end to his rage; there appeared from the coaſts of the Iriſh Sea, a moſt voracious monſter that was continually devouring the people upon the coaſts. Soon as this news arrived the king ventured to go and encounter it alone, but having ſpent all his darts upon him in vain, the monſter haſtened towards him and with open jaws ſwallowed him up like a ſmall fiſh.

He had left behind five ſons, whereof the eldeſt Gorbonian aſcended the throne; there was not during his time a greater admirer of equity and juſtice. His continual employment was performing the ſacred rites of worſhip to the gods, and doing juſtice to the common people. Throughout all the cities of Britain he repaired the temples of the deities, and erected many others. In his days the iſland boaſted of all kinds of treaſure more than any of its neighbouring countries, for he encouraged induſtry by protecting the poor huſbandmen from their oppreſſors and rewarding their labours; his ſoldiers too received ſuch ample pay, that no one had any occaſion to injure another. In ſhort, he died a moſt illuſtrious example of amiability and integrity, and was interred at Trinovantum.

He was ſucceeded by Arthgallo, his brother, who was the very reverſe of the former king; his delight was to debaſe the noble, and exalt the vile. By plundering the rich, he acquired for himſelf vaſt ſums of ill-gotten treaſure. But the nobles being able to bear his tyranny no longer, ſuddenly rebelled, and dethroned him; ſubſtituting in his place Elidure, his younger brother, who was afterwards ſurnamed Pious, on account of his great compaſſion for Arthgallo's diſtreſs; for, after five years of his reign, while he happened to be hunting in the wood Calaterium, he met with his depoſed brother, who had travelled over ſeveral kingdoms, in hopes to procure aſſiſtance for the recovery of his loſt dominions, but in vain; and now being no longer able to bear the poverty to which he was reduced, he returned to Britain, with only ten men, deſigning to try the commiſeration of thoſe who had been formerly his friends. Elidure, upon this unexpected meeting, forgetting all injuries ran haſtily up, and affectionately embraced him. Having long lamented his brother's abſence, he forthwith conveyed him ſecretly to the city Alclud, where he concealed him in his bed-chamber; then feigning himſelf ill, ſent meſſengers all over the kingdom, to ſolicit the immediate preſence of all the firſt nobility.

As ſoon as they were aſſembled at the city where he lay, he requeſted that they would come ſeparately into his chamber, without making any noiſe, under pretence that their talk, eſpecially together, would diſturb his head. In obedience to theſe commands, and without any ſuſpicion, they entered the chamber one after another. But Elidure had previouſly enjoined his ſervants to ſtand prepared for their deſtruction, as they entered, unleſs they would receive again into favour, Arthgallo his brother, and pay him all due ſubmiſſion. In this manner he acted with every one of them apart, and by putting them to fear, obliged them to be reconciled to his brother. Thus an agreement being ratified, Elidure conducted Arthgallo to York, and there taking the crown from off his own head, he placed it upon his brother's. For this tranſaction, wherein he demonſtrated more than common generoſity, he was ſurnamed (as before mentioned) the Pious.

After this, Arthgallo reigned ten years, and made ample amends for his former mal-adminiſtration, by practiſing meaſures quite contrary to thoſe he before exerciſed; for now he depreſſed only thoſe that were mean and baſe, and promoted thoſe that were noble and meritorious. He alſo ſuffered every one to enjoy their own unmoleſted, and deal around to all ſtrict juſtice. At laſt, being ſeized with a ſevere illneſs, he died, and was buried in the city Kaerlier.

Upon this Elidure was re-advanced to the throne, and reſtored to his former dignity. During his government he followed the example of his eldeſt brother, Gorbonian, in performing all acts of grace. But the two remaining brothers, Vigenius and Peredure, raiſed an army, and waged war againſt him, in which they came off victorious. Having now made him priſoner, they confined him in the Tower at Trinovantum, where they placed a guard over him. They next divided the kingdom between themſelves. Vigenius taking for his ſhare the part that is from the river Humber weſtward, and Peredure the remainder, with all Albania.

Vigenius, after ſeven years enjoyment of his ſhare, died, and Peredure became maſter of the whole kingdom. Being now honoured with the ſole poſſeſſion of the crown, he extended mercy to all, and manifeſted during his reign ſo much generoſity and mildneſs, that he even excelled all the other brothers that preceded him. There was no thought nor mention of Elidure now, till Peredure having died ſuddenly, the confined brother was immediately liberated, and for the third time advanced to the throne.

Elidure now finiſhed a reign remarkable for virtue and juſtice, and after his death left an example of piety, worthy the imitation of all his ſucceſſors.

The ſon of Gorbonian ſucceeded his uncle, and imitated his prudent and wiſe government, for he abhorred tyranny, and practiſed juſtice and mildneſs towards his people, never deviating from the rules of equity and ſtrict honour. Margan, the ſon of Arthgallo, reigned after him; who taking inſtructions from the examples of his late predeceſſors, continued on the throne in peace and happineſs.

He was ſucceeded by Enniaunus his brother, who governed in a quite contrary manner, and while preferring a tyrannical before a juſt and legal adminiſtration, he was depoſed in the ſixth year of his deſpotic reign.

A kinſman, Idwallo, the ſon of Vigenius, was ſubſtituted in his ſtead. This man being admoniſhed by Enniaunus's ill ſucceſs, became a ſtrict obſerver of juſtice and equity. He was ſucceeded by Runno, the ſon of Peredure, whoſe ſucceſſor was Geruntius, the ſon of Elidure. Catellus, his ſon, reigned after him. Coillus after Catellus; Porrex after Coillus; and Cherin after Porrex. This prince had three ſons, Fulgratius, Eldadus, and Andragius, who all reigned one after another.

Uranius next ſucceeded the ſon of Andragius, and after him, in reſpective order, Eluid, Cledaucus, Cletonus, Gurgintius, Merianus, Bleduno, Cap, Œnus, Siſilius, and Blegabred. This laſt prince was ſo famous for his ſongs, and ſkill in all muſical inſtruments, that he far excelled any muſician that had been before him.

Arthmail, his brother, ſucceeded him; after whom reigned Eldod; and likewiſe, in due order, Redion, Rederchius, Samuil-Peniſſel, Per, Capoir, and Cliqueillus, the ſon of Capoir, a man who was remarkably prudent and mild in all his actions, and who made it his chief and conſtant buſineſs to exerciſe true juſtice among his people.

Heli, his ſon, ſucceeded and reigned forty years. He had three ſons, Lud, Caſſibellaun, and Nennius. Lud, being the eldeſt, ſucceeded his father in the kingdom.

He became famous for the building of cities, and rebuilding the walls of Trinovantum, which he alſo ſurrounded with innumerable towers. He commanded the citizens alſo to erect houſes and other kind of ſtructures therein, ſo that there was no city in any foreign country, far or near, that could boaſt of more beautiful edifices.

This man was remarkably warlike, and very magnificent in his feaſts and public entertainments; and though poſſeſſed of many other cities, yet he was ſo partial to this, that he reſided in it the greater part of the year; for which reaſon it was afterwards called Kaerlud, and ſince, the word having been corrupted, Kaer-London; and again, in proceſs of time, by change of languages, London; likewiſe Londres, by foreigners who arrived there, under whoſe ſubjection the country became afterwards reduced. When he died, his body was interred by the gate which to this time is, in the Britiſh tongue, called after his name, Parthlud, and in the Saxon, Ludeſgate.

His two ſons, Androgeus and Tenuantius, were incapable of ſucceeding him on account of their tender ages; therefore their uncle, Caſſibellaun, was appointed to govern in their ſtead.

This man, as ſoon as he was crowned, began to diſplay ſo much magnificence, and withal ſo great generoſity, that his fame reached to diſtant kingdoms. This was the reaſon that the monarchy of the whole kingdom was now ſecured to him, and did not deſcend, according to the right of inheritance, to his young nephews. Yet Caſſibellaun, from an impulſe of piety, would not conſent to their being deprived of their right entirely, and therefore aſſigned to them a large part of the kingdom as their ſhare. On Androgeus, the elder, he ſettled the city of Trinovantum, with the dukedom of Kent; and on Tenuantius, the younger, the dukedom of Cornwal; but he himſelf, as chief poſſeſſor of the crown, maintained due ſovereignty over them and all the princes of the iſland.

Such have been the riſe and progreſs of Britain, as recorded by Geofrey of Monmouth. It is neceſſary now to give, in due order, the ſeveral occurrences which have happened ſince the invaſion of Julius Cæſar, making, previouſly, a few neceſſary obſervations upon the ſtate and affairs of the country, at the time when this invaſion took place.

CHAPTER III.

GENERAL REMARKS on the ORIGIN of BRITISH HISTORY.

ABOUT the time of Auguſtus the emperor, Great Britain was diſcovered by the Romans, when the Roman empire had attained its full and meridian glory. It was then eſteemed the largeſt iſland in the univerſe, but inhabited by people of unpoliſhed and wild behaviour, mere barbarians; who were ſeemingly, " a race of men from all the world disjoined," ſtrangers to hoſpitality and learning.

Yet modern diſcoveries have proved, that though the leaſt extenſive, in many reſpects it is the moſt conſiderable. Its inhabitants, who were remarkable for their invention and induſtry, have explored and penetrated regions, the exiſtence of which were unknown to the Romans. They have traverſed an immenſity of ocean, upon which their aſpiring conquerors never dared to venture, and by the peculiarity of their ſituation, the fertility of their ſoil, their innate bravery, ingenuity, naval ſtrength, and beneficial commerce, they have acquired extenſive tracts of territory, extended their conqueſts further than their conquerors, and riſen to a ſummit of ſuch unequalled glory and ſplendor, that they have been always held in the firſt rank of reputation and reſpect in the eye of European ſtates.

Gildas Sapiens, who was himſelf a Briton, and lived about the latter end of the ſixth century, has declared himſelf doubtful whether the antient Britons had any records or writings at all, wherein they had tranſmitted their hiſtory and original to poſterity. He has alſo aſſerted that no antient monuments of this kingdom were to be found in his time; and therefore he candidly confeſſes, " That he took all out of foreign writers, and not out of any writings or records left by his own countrymen. For if there ever had been any ſuch, they were in his time quite loſt, having been either burnt or deſtroyed by the enemy at home, or carried away by the exiles into foreign parts."

Ninius alſo, diſciple of Eluodogus, who ſucceeded Gildas as hiſtorian, in the preface to his Chronicle, ſets forth, " That the greateſt ſcholars among the Britons had but little learning, and that they had left no memorials." And he adds, " That whatſoever he had written was collected out of the Annals and Chronicles of the Holy Fathers." By theſe writers we alſo learn that their predeceſſors, Bede, William of Malmſbury, and others, are of their opinion.

On account of the circumſtances related in the preceding chapter, many have derived the name of Britain from that of Brutus, who, as related, was the grandſon of Æneas, a prince of Troy. A certain Count Palatine was very earneſt to have Brutus called Brotus, which he would fain prove the original word, as Brotus, in Greek, ſignifies mortal, by which he implies that his birth was fatal to his mother.

We have already obſerved, in our introduction, how various have been the ſuppoſed derivations of Britain. It is Camden's opinion, through the information of Moſes in Sacred Hiſtory, that, when after the flood, the three ſons of Noah, after their iſſue were multiplied to a great number, left the mountains of Armenia, where the ark had reſted, ſeparating themſelves into the ſeveral quarters of the earth, the whole world was accordingly peopled by them; accordingly, by the authority of Theophilus Antiochenus, he ſeems to think that when their families came to be diſperſed abroad by degrees, that ſome of their poſterity at laſt arrived in this our iſland, " for (ſays Theophilus) in old time there were but few men in Arabia and Chaldea; after the diviſion of tongues they more and more encreaſed. Hereupon ſome took their way toward the eaſt; ſome to other parts of the great and wide continent; others travelling towards the north in ſearch of a reſting-place, ſtill marched on, taking poſſeſſion of all that lay before them, until they came at laſt even to Britain, ſeated in the northern climates."

" Moſes (continues Camden) doth expreſsly aſſert the ſame, when he ſays, " the iſlands of the Gentiles were divided in the lands, by the poſterity of Japhet." Now as divines interpret the iſlands of the Gentiles were thoſe which lay fartheſt off; and that the nations and families which deſcended from Japhet, were the firſt poſſeſſors of the European iſlands, England, Sicily, &c. &c. the opinion is firmly ſupported, not only by the learned Wolphgangus Muſculus, but likewiſe Joſephus and other authors. One of whom, as cited by Iſidore, writes to the following purpoſe:

" The nations which ſprang from Japhet poſſeſs from the mountain Taurus to the north, all the middle part of Aſia, and all Europe, as far as the Britiſh ocean, and gave their names both to the places and the people; a great many whereof have been ſince changed, but the reſt remain the ſame."

" The prophetical benediction of Noah (Geneſis, chap. ix.) is thereby fulfilled in the Europeans. " God ſhall enlarge Japhet, and he ſhall dwell in the tents of Shem, and Canaan ſhall be his ſervant." And as Pliny writes, " it was Europe which produced that people, who were the conquerors of all other nations, and who have more than once triumphed over the other parts, which were the allotted ſhares of Shem and Chem, and this was peopled by Japhet and his poſterity." Thus Camden, though modeſtly, has boldly ſupported this opinion.

Annius of Viterbo, in his Beroſus, has alſo inſerted a ſucceſſion of Cellic kings, derived from Samothus, one of the ſons of Japhet, whom he ſuppoſed to have planted colonies in Gaul, and afterwards in Britain.

Whether true or falſe, the accounts delivered in our preceding chapter, it muſt be acknowledged that the term of Britain is by no means a fair derivation from the word Brutus.

Thus much we muſt venture to aſcertain as fact, that the Romans termed this iſland Britannia, before the deſcent of Julius Cæſar, from whence originated, without doubt, the modern appellative, Britain. Since that period, on account of its moſt amazing maritime power and encreaſing opulence, it has obtained the glorious diſtinction of GREAT! which to-be-envied title, God, of his great mercy, grant, that in ſpite of all the attacks of ſurrounding foes, it may maintain and preſerve until time itſelf ſhall be no more!!!

Thus far we have been able to proceed upon the ground of probability. But let it be remembered (a truth which muſt be obvious to every impartial reader) that the riſe of nations, and the names peculiar to them, from the uncertain conveyance of oral tradition, and the want of written records, have been generally involved in obſcurity, or dreſſed in the fallacious garb of legendary fiction.

Indeed, to ſpeak the real truth, very little can be ſaid to aſcertain by whom, or from whence the iſland of Great Britain, with its appendages, was firſt peopled. The origin of the gigantic inhabitants (as mentioned by Geofrey of Monmouth) is hid from the moſt diſcerning eye, by that thick cloud of ignorance, which has always obſcured and enveloped the tranſactions of former times; nor can the æra of even the Britons' firſt ſettlement be explored, but in the paths of conjectural reaſon.

Camden himſelf doth not venture to contradict the Hiſtory that is delivered by Geofrey, but, on the contrary, declares, that the probability thereof may in a great meaſure be maintained, and that altogether, whether true or falſe, or partly fabulous, it is of ſervice to mankind.

"I am not ignorant (he writes) that in old time nations had recourſe to Hercules, and in latter ages, to the Trojans, for their originals. And let antiquity herein be pardoned if ſhe ſometimes diſguiſe the truth with the mixture of a fable, and bring in the gods themſelves to act a part, when ſhe deſigns thereby to render the beginnings either of a city or a nation more noble and majeſtic. For Pliny well obſerves, that even falſely to pretend to a deſcent from illuſtrious perſons, argues ſome reſpect for virtue. And, for my part, I readily agree with Varro (the moſt learned of the Romans) that theſe originals fetched from the gods, though partly fabulous, are at leaſt thus far uſeful, that men, preſuming upon a divine extraction, may be thereby excited to generous enterprizes, and purſue them with a more than ordinary eagerneſs, which makes them ſeldom fail of extraordinary ſucceſs. By this declaration of that renowned and accompliſhed writer, St. Auſtin imagines that he did not credit the whole, though he might a part; but, at any rate, if he diſbelieved all, he thought it adviſeable not openly and expreſsly to ſay ſo."

He ſeems to diſapprove of the opinion of Cæſar, Diodorus, and other writers, who inſiſt that the Britons were Αυτοχϑονας and Aborigines, ſignifying home-bred, and never tranſported from any other place; for then, he facetiouſly remarks, "we muſt ſuppoſe mankind ſprung out of the earth like ſo many muſhrooms."

CHAPTER IV.

An Account of the Iſland—Inhabitants and Principalities—National Character of the ancient Britons—Their Agriculture—Deſcription of their Perſons—Manner of Living—Their Cuſtoms, Religion, Habitations, Arms, and Implements of War—Mode of Fighting and Marine—Commerce, Trade, Barter, and Money—Civil Policy and Idolatry.

THE iſland of Great Britain approaches neareſt to a triangle in its form. Its circumference, following the windings of the coaſt, is reckoned one thouſand eight hundred and thirty miles; its aſtronomical length, from north to ſouth, is five hundred and forty miles, accounting ſixty miles one degree; its breadth, taken from the Land's-End in Cornwal to the South Foreland, is two hundred and eighty-five miles: bounded on the north by the North Sea, on the ſouth by the Britiſh Channel, on the weſt by the Iriſh Sea, and on the eaſt by the German Ocean; extending in longitude from nine degrees forty-five minutes to ſeventeen degrees fifteen minutes; and in latitude from fifty to fifty-nine degrees north.

Here let us take a tranſient view of this little fertile ſpot, this happy land of luxurious plenty! this highly-favoured, and, in many reſpects, matchleſs iſland! Let us conſider attentively its peculiar ſituation, and we ſhall ſee it ſurrounded by ſome of the fineſt ſeas in the univerſe, which adminiſter not only ſecurity, but the moſt delicious dainties, to its inhabitants: let us behold its ſlow-aſcending hills, and we ſhall find them covered with the moſt beautiful verdure; then let us caſt our eyes upon the long-extending vales, and we ſhall meet with numerous herds, feeding in the richeſt paſtures! In ſhort, we ſhall ſee ſpacious plains, lofty woods, meandering rivers, interſecting ſtreams, which, yielding a perpetual plenty, afford all the neceſſaries that nature can crave, or luxury can wiſh! Though we travel to its uttermoſt boundaries, we are in no danger of obnoxious animals, prowling beaſts, or poiſonous inſects! Here are no tornadoes, thunder, lightning, plague, or earthquakes, ſo terrible in their effects throughout the reſt of Europe: but, on the contrary the moſt inviting ſcene of pleaſure, while chearful plenty pours out, annually, her choiceſt bleſſings, and every object, every place, excites unſatiated delight!

It is not to be wondered that neighbouring tribes, ſo much addicted to commerce and agriculture as the Gauls were, ſhould effect ſettlements on a land abounding in advantages, unknown to any country in the ſame parallel of latitude. As therefore they could diſcern the coaſts of Britain from their own hills, they, accordingly, from natural ſuggeſtions, meditated an excurſion there; and having arrived, and finding themſelves among an hoſpitable people, whoſe language, religion, form of government, cuſtoms, and manners ſo nearly correſponded with their own, it was indeed very reaſonably concluded that they would cultivate the lands with great ſucceſs; conſequently they entered into an engagement of mutual traffic in ſeveral articles, particularly that of tin.

The firſt emigration, from the moſt authentic accounts, founded on hiſtorical evidence, happened in the reign of Tuetat, king of the Celtes, about 1860 years before the birth of Chriſt, who ſucceeded in planting a colony in Britain, with a view of encreaſing the commerce of his ſubjects.

This infant ſettlement, by their quick progreſs and rapid proſperity, induced others to follow their example; ſo that, in proceſs of time, not only the ſea-coaſts, but the interior parts of the iſland became inhabited; for they, who by genius and connections were inclined to commerce, fixed their reſidence in the maritime provinces; while others, from a deſire of eaſe or unreſtrained freedom, penetrated into the woody receſſes, and there ſought, in the heart of the iſland, that ſatisfaction which ſolitude, not buſtle, can afford to ſuch diſpoſitions.

Their Belgic neighbours, being impoveriſhed by their population, and having probably heard the advantageous ſituation of the firſt ſettlers, determined to emigrate, and were received kindly by their deſcendants, who ſuffered them to take poſſeſſion of Cornwal, Devonſhire, Kent, and Suſſex, and with whom they ſhortly incorporated by intermarriages.

It is neceſſary to obſerve, that the Phœnicians alſo carried on a commercial intercourſe with the inhabitants of Britain, long before they were known to the Romans. This appears evident from the names of many places in Cornwal, which are, without diſpute, derived from the language of the Phœnicians, who called this country Bartanac, that is, the Land of Tin; great quantities of which commodity (as before hinted) being by them annually imported, and which were ſold to the Greeks and other eaſtern nations; for which reaſon the Iſles of Scilly, where they uſually landed, obtained the name of Caſſiterides.

By ſucceſſive emigrations of the Belgæ, their numbers were ſo greatly augmented, as to create a jealouſy in the old inhabitants, of courſe there were continual diſputes and animoſities, which at length terminated in jarring diſcord, ſo that every tribe became at laſt a ſeparate government.

During theſe unhappy contentions and diviſions, Divitiacus, king of the Sueſſones, landed upon the iſland a large body of forces, collected from the Attrebates and other Belgic nations, with which he eſtabliſhed a ſettlement in Hampſhire, Wiltſhire, and other parts bordering on Hampſhire and Suſſex. Mutual ſafety, at this period, compelled the ſmaller tribes to join others, in order to prevent the inroads of future adventurers, who were now looked upon as a common enemy, and hence, in a ſhort time, aroſe the diſtinctions of petty ſtates or principalities, which, previous to the Roman invaſion, were ſeventeen in number. The names of whoſe inhabitants, and the diſtricts they included, are correctly given in the following liſt:

Tacitus, in ſpeaking of the antient Britons, expatiates greatly on the remarkable vigour of their bodies, the amazing faculties of their mind, and their almoſt incredible perſeverance under uncommon hardſhips. In like manner, Diodorus writes, who alſo affirms, that in their integrity they ſurpaſſed even the Romans. Plutarch repreſents them as poſſeſſed of good conſtitutions, frequently attaining the age of a hundred and twenty years. Their longevity is accounted for by the ſobriety and regularity of their lives, added to the temperature of the air.

It was deemed a moſt unpardonable offence in theſe days, to eat either a hen, a hare, or a gooſe; notwithſtanding which, we may ſee by Cæſar's Commentaries (Book IV. chap. 10.) that they were bred up for their pleaſure.

As they were perfectly honeſt and ſincere, they deſpiſed every ſpecies of deceit, and alſo deteſted effeminacy and inactive indolence, Nature having beſtowed upon them valour to a degree of ferocity. As they were generous, though unpoliſhed, they extended the moſt benevolent acts of kindneſs to ſtrangers, eſteeming it an indiſpenſable duty to perform every kind office in their power, neceſſary for their protection and defence. Thus originated that hoſpitality, by which this nation has long been diſtinguiſhed from others, through many ſucceeding generations. As they were tenacious of liberty (their darling object) to the greateſt degree, they endured the inclemencies of the weather, ſubmitted to unwearied fatigue, and fought numerous battles, not deeming the loſs of life too great a ſacrifice in the defence thereof.

The men were in general tall, well proportioned and robuſt; they were remarkable for their agility, which quality certainly accounts for their intrepidity and want of fear.

The women, according to the preſent times, were captivating and fair, beautiful in ſymmetry both of features and ſhape; the hair of each ſex was either red or cheſnut coloured, flowing looſely, with an eaſy elegance, over their ſhoulders.

In reſpect to dreſs, there was little uſe of apparel; for being by habit remarkably hardy in conſtitution, tion, they knew not the conveniency, nor ſcarcely felt they neceſſity of any. Some, therefore, of both ſexes went entirely naked; others wore no other covering than the ſkins of wild beaſts, which, in a negligent manner, they threw about them. This was the practice on the ſouthern coaſts, where paying more regard to delicacy they adopted this manner, not to defend themſelves from the inclemency of the weather, but to avoid giving any offence to thoſe foreigners who came ſo often to trade with them. Thus clad, the ornaments of modern luxury muſt have been uſeleſs; and yet it ſeems they were not deſtitute of vanity, for they practiſed a finery peculiar to themſelves, a little pride of diſtinction, inſeparable from human nature, which chiefly conſiſted in firſt pricking their bodies, and then ſtaining them with an azure colour, extracted from woad, with the juice of which they imprinted on themſelves various figures; ſo that altering the incomparable work of nature, by changing their ſkin with humble paint, was as common among the women then, as in other reſpects it is now. Nor was this cuſtom confined to the women alone, it being equally common with the men, who mutually adopted this expedient, whereby, according to their own conceptions, they uſed to render themſelves either agreeable or tremendous; the one in order to captivate their lovers and miſtreſſes, and the other to intimidate their enemies. They never ſhaved their upper lip, but ſuffered the hair to grow thereupon to a great length. This is aſſerted by Cæſar, and Strabo obſerves, that the Gauls took a pride in long hair. It ſeems that the antient Britons very much imitated the Gauls, both in their manner and dreſs: the latter were very weak and credulous, ſo that it was a proverb, "To be a Gaul is fond credulity;" and indeed like them the Britons attended to every idle ſtory, and either through ſuperſtitious fear or hope, gave credence to any of the ſillieſt predictions.

The Gauls (Cæſar informs us) according to their diſtinction from the reſt, either in birth or riches, had in proportion ſo many more ſervants and dependents in their retinue. Them they called Ambacli, and this was the only piece of ſtate among them. From them it is therefore ſuppoſed the Engliſh learned to carry with them ſuch troops of attendants.

The old inhabitants, who are called the antient Britons, lived in huts, placed at a ſmall diſtance from each other; there was little or no regularity obſerved in erecting them, they being chiefly placed in the middle of a wood, in imitation of the Gauls, and were acceſſible only by winding paths, over which they cut ditches or laid felled trees. Theſe occaſional dwellings were formed of boughs reſembling arbours, or of clay covered with turf. They were deſerted at times by their owners, who frequently went in ſearch of more convenient ſituations, where they could find wood, water, and paſture ground for their cattle: the poſſeſſion of theſe bleſſings made them contented and happy. In ſummer their reſidence was generally in the vallies; but in winter they removed to the hills, being a more dry, healthy, and commodious ſituation.

The firſt emigrants, on their arrival, retired into the inland parts of the iſland, where they lived in a kind of ruſtic ſimplicity; their employ, tending their flocks, or hunting, to which they were much addicted. By the firſt they were ſupplied with milk, by the latter with animal food; which, with water, were all the dainties that compoſed their frugal meals.

According to the principles of their religion, which was the reaſon of their not eating fowls, hares, geeſe, or fiſh, they were exceedingly ſuperſtitious, and often went ſo far as to ſacrifice human creatures. They paid uncommon veneration to Andate, the goddeſs of victory, as well as to other idols (of which hereafter mention is made): to her they erected temples, the walls of which were ſo immenſe that they occupied a conſiderable ſpace of ground. According to the obſervations of Tacitus, they were remarkably fond of examining the entrails of beaſts, and alſo inſpecting thoſe of men: the ſame writer likewiſe adds, that the altars of their moſt adored idol, Andate, were honoured with the ſacrifice and blood of thoſe that were made captives in war, as a token, no doubt, of their victory, which was conſequently imputed to this goddeſs.

The Britons being in this manner led aſtray by ſuperſtition, were equally addicted to magic; which, by the account of that celebrated hiſtorian Pliny, we find they reſpected, with ſo much idle pomp and ceremony, that one might naturally ſuppoſe the Perſians had followed their example.

Upon the arrival of the Belgæ, who applied themſelves to agriculture, the Britons from their example began to indulge themſelves with a ſuperior kind of nutriment, for then a mixture of rye and barley, made into bread, became common; and of a fermented liquor extracted from honey, barley, and apples, at their convivial feaſts and public meetings they would commonly drink to an exceſs of intoxication. Theſe people, with all thoſe who lived near the ſea coaſts, were more civilized, by their intercourſe with ſtrangers, than the inhabitants of the interior parts of the iſland. They either ſubſiſted by commerce, or cultivated their lands with great ſucceſs; whereby they exported great quantities of hides, with tin, and became famous for their wheat, which was eagerly purchaſed by merchants on the continent.

There was now one remarkable cuſtom among the Britons, which ſeems to have originated and concluded with them, as there is no mention of the ſame made among any other nation. They uſed to have a ſociety of wives among ſelected numbers. Thus, according to the information of Cæſar, even brothers, and fathers with their ſons, uſed to have ten or a dozen women in common; but whenever any of theſe females became pregnant, the fruits of their conception were deemed the offspring of thoſe who were firſt in the connection; and the children who were thus begotten, according to the further accounts and confirmation of Dion, were brought up in common among them. That ſeveral Britons together kept one wife, who was common to all, is likewiſe aſſerted by Euſebius. This unaccountable habit was moſt ſeverely reprobated at Rome; but it is ſaid to have been defended by one of the Britiſh ladies themſelves, who, when introduced to the empreſs of Severus, Julia, in order to receive her cenſure, on account of this unheard-of cuſtom, very pertinently made anſwer:

"Ye Roman matrons, we Britiſh women do that publicly and happily with the beſt of our men, which you are obliged to do, in ſecret, with the worſt of yours."

Before the expedition of Divitiacus, the Britons were entire ſtrangers to all military diſcipline. For how could unſkilled peaſants know either the art or inſtruments of war? Their defiles, mountains, ſwamps, and foreſts, were to them ſufficient fortifications. The arms of their moſt renowned men were a broad ſword without a point, a ſhort dagger, a javelin, and arrows; while the common people had only a ſharp ſtick, pointed at both ends, and long poles edged with flint or copper, at one extremity whereof was fixed a braſs bell, with the noiſe of which they attempted to terrify their enemies in the day of battle. They defended themſelves with a light round target, made of wood or of twigs interwoven, covered with ſkins, and ſtudded with nails. But the continual deſcents of foreign invaders, ſoon taught them the neceſſity and uſe of more defenſive weapons. To the Belgæ they were indebted for the firſt knowledge of theſe, which, by their own ingenuity, they improved. They became then courageous, fierce and warlike; having frequent diſſentions and quarrels with each other. Indeed, as Tacitus obſerves, it was their want of unanimity and domeſtic harmony, that not only encouraged the Romans to attack them; but in a great meaſure contributed to their ſucceſs againſt the iſland. They fought much in the ſame manner of the antient Greeks and Trojans.

The war-chariots, the utility of which they alſo learned from the Belgæ, were greatly improved by the Britons. Theſe were decorated with rude embelliſhments, and ſo ingeniouſly conſtructed, that they could be turned or ſtopped, even on the declivity of a ſteep hill; what rendered them very deſtructive was, their having ſharp inſtruments reſembling ſcythes, affixed to their axles. They were drawn by two horſes, ſmall, but exceedingly ſwift; they contained a ſingle warrior, or a charioteer, who drove them furiouſly, with aſtoniſhing rapidity, among the thickeſt ranks of the enemy. Such was his dexterity, that he could ſtop them inſtantaneouſly, though in full ſpeed; even in deſcending a ſteep hill, he would leap from the chariot, run along the pole, and regain his ſeat without checking the impetuoſity of the horſes; when in the center of the enemy, where they made generally a terrible ſlaughter, the combatants, after having diſcharged their javelins, leaping from their chariots, fought on foot, and when overcome with fatigue, vaulted into their ſeats, retreating as they had advanced, with the utmoſt celerity. Cæſar in his Commentary of his war in Gaul, has given a circumſtantial account of their method of fighting in theſe war-chariots, of which, for the ſatisfaction of our readers, we ſhall give the following quotation:

"Their manner of fighting from chariots is thus; they firſt ride to all parts and throw their darts, and frequently break the ranks by the prancing of the ſteeds, and the noiſe of the wheels; and when they have gained admittance to the troops of horſe, they alight from their chariots, and fight on foot: the charioteers in the mean while draw off a little from the engagement, and place themſelves in ſuch condition, that if theſe are overpowered by the numbers of the enemy, they may have an eaſy retreat to them. In this manner they carry on their battles, aſſiſted by the agility of the horſe, and the firmneſs of the foot; and ſo expert are they by frequent uſe and exerciſe, that they can ſtop their horſes in the midſt of a full gallop down a precipice, and alſo check and turn them in a ſmall compaſs, run upon the pole, riſe upon the harneſs, and from thence quickly recover the chariots."

Their horſes, as we are further informed by Dion, were remarkably ſmall and ſwift, of their own accord they would run at a moſt extraordinary rate; he alſo adds, that they were reſolute and immoveable whenever they came to an engagement.

Their manner of fighting was agreeable to the cuſtoms of a people uncivilized, and to whom the refinements of military operations were unknown. While approaching the enemy they claſhed their arms together, raiſed dreadful ſhouts, ſinging at the ſame time the warlike actions of their renowned anceſtors. Their chariots advanced generally towards the enemy's cavalry, marking each track with bloody ſlaughter. Their infantry charged in the moſt furious manner, with an impetuoſity hardly to be reſiſted by troops not covered with armour; but if once broken or repulſed, confuſion was the inevitable conſequence, and it very ſeldom happened, being thereby ſo much diſcouraged, that they could never be prevailed upon, either by rallery or perſuaſion to renew the attack.

Their ſhields were ſmall, without helmets; but their ſwords exceedingly large. By making uſe of ſuch inſtruments, it is a natural conjecture indeed, that their chief deſign or ambition was to deſtroy their enemies, inſtead of defending themſelves. Their ſpears and daggers were alſo ſhort, and their common mode of attacking was by ſhaking theſe daggers and ſpears, whereby it is ſuppoſed they intended to alarm and intimidate their enemies.

No people were more remarkable than the antient Britons for their hard living. They were enabled by nature to endure, with moſt uncommon patience, the greateſt fatigues, attended with cold and hunger. They have frequently lived many days, without any nouriſhment, in bogs up to their chins, and ſpend the remainder of their time in woods, ſupported only by the barks of trees and roots. In ſhort, they were moſt remarkably robuſt, ſtrong, and healthy; ſtrangers to all luxuries and pomp, till ſubject to the Romans, when they conſequently became acquainted with their manners.

The Britons found it exceedingly diſadvantageous (as will appear in the courſe of this hiſtory, as it already has in the preceding chapter) to be divided into ſo many ſeparate tribes under the command of different chieftains; for by reaſon of this they were ſo conſtantly engaged in ſmall bodies, and drawn up at ſuch conſiderable diſtance from each other, that the enemy had, in many inſtances, an advantage over them, which could not be eaſily ſurmounted on their part.

To remove, in ſome meaſure, this defect in their conſtitution, and obviate all thoſe many evils to which they were expoſed in time of war, or when their darling liberty was in danger, through the wanton attacks of bold invaders, a commander in chief was choſen by an aſſembly of the ſtates, who, as ſoon as any threatening alarm ceaſed, reſigned his delegated authority with all due ſubmiſſion. This general, having no equal in command, exerciſed the power of a dictator, and led the combined forces, at the time of action, againſt the enemy. The election of ſuch an officer, was, it muſt be confeſſed, exceeding good policy, being founded on public expediency, and the more to be admired when we conſider his conduct was amenable to the cenſure of the general aſſembly, by whom he was choſen, and who raiſed only thoſe to ſuch a pre-eminence, as were ranked among the wiſeſt, braveſt, and ſtrongeſt of their nation; for it was always their view to unite together valour, ability, and penetration.

Having thus far deſcribed with all poſſible exactneſs the military of the antient Britons, we are led, by natural tranſitions, to ſpeak of their marine, though it muſt be acknowledged that herein they were remarkably deficient; for not underſtanding the art of ſhip-building, and being obligated, by religious principles, to take no ſuſtenance upon the water, it is no wonder that they were deſtitute of veſſels of burden, and conſequently incapable of making long voyages. It ſeems, indeed, as their excurſions were never of any great length, that they were rather inattentive to the building of ſhips, and careleſs of improving the art of navigation; conſequently ſuch veſſels as they did erect were neither ſubſtantial nor of any conſiderable ſize, ſo that their whole fleet conſiſted of a few ill-conſtructed boats, which being mere temporary vehicles, were therefore formed of wickers, over which was laid a covering of pitched hides. Such ſlender canoes as theſe it is not to be ſuppoſed could navigate the open ſeas, ſo that the continent tinent of Gaul was probably the boundary of their ſea-excurſions, which they undertook only in the ſummer months, when the weather was calm and ſerene. Let us here reflect a little, and offer the juſt tribute to Providence, that from the ſmalleſt beginnings, can produce the moſt aſtoniſhing events. Human wiſdom or foreſight could never have conjectured, that navigation, accompanied with the moſt conſummate knowledge in the art of ſhip-building, ſhould have ſucceeded ſuch rude inventions of more rude iſlanders; eſpecially that a ſtupendous navy of England ſhould ride triumphant upon the ſeas, bidding defiance, which it has done to the combined maritime forces of Europe, in many periods of time.

But although the Britons could boaſt neither of a board of admiralty, nor of a grand fleet to diſturb the repoſe of their neighbours, they reaped conſiderable advantages from their trade and commerce. The Phœnicians, as we have before obſerved, near a thouſand years before Chriſt, carried on an extenſive commerce with the weſtern parts of the iſland, bringing pearls, ivory, gold and ſilver, which they bartered for tin and other valuable commodities. The Britons at firſt converted their imports into ornaments to decorate their perſons; but natural ingenuity ſoon taught them how they might be applied to more important uſes; we find them, therefore, in a ſhort time afterwards manufacturing theſe valuables into chains, bits, bracelets, collars, &c. which they re-exported, and by this means gained an annual balance of trade in their favour. Before the deſcent of the Belgæ, the inhabitants of the inland parts were ſtrangers to agriculture; they ſowed no corn, ſubſiſting entirely on milk and game, with which their country abounded. But after the arrival of theſe foreigners, they applied themſelves to cultivate the ſoil. Agriculture yielded that increaſe which always follows the hand of induſtry. The Britons taſted the ſweets, and were not remiſs in improving the attainments of their more intelligent neighbours, ſo that bread in the courſe of a few years became the ordinary food of the natives; at the ſame time their wheat, wool, and hides, were purchaſed with avidity by the merchants on the continent. This traffic was carried on by barter, they having no other coin than iron or braſs rings, which paſſed among them as current, as they were made to a certain weight.

With regard to the civil policy of the Britons, it was much the ſame as that of the Gauls, being divided into tribes or independent ſtates, each under the juriſdiction of a petty chief; but whether the authority of their chief warriors was hereditary, or elective, cannot be determined. Thus much is known, that their old men of eſtabliſhed reputation for wiſdom or valour, generally took the lead in their public meetings; and, upon remarkable emergencies, delegates were ſent from every ſtate to a general aſſembly of the nation, in order to chooſe a generaliſſimo, to whom was committed the command of their collective body of forces. But this cuſtom prevailed only in times of imminent danger; for in times of peace no other government ſubſiſted than a kind of patriarchal one, wherein the intire control was veſted in the head of each family, and the prieſt.

Notwithſtanding the ſavage ferocity of theſe people was ſoftened by the ſimplicity of their lives, we may ſuppoſe it received a much ſtronger check from the principles of their religion, which was founded ſolely on ſlaviſh fear. Hence ſprung the cuſtoms, common among other idolaters, of making their idols hideouſly ugly, and offering human ſacrifices as oblations, to appeaſe the wrath of their ſupreme dæmon. They paid divine honours to Jupiter, Mars, Apollo, and Mercury, under the titles of Taramis, Heſus, Belenus, and Tentares, to which they added, after the invaſion of the Romans, Diana, Minerva, and Hercules. Their external ceremonials conſiſted of ſtrange geſtures, violent diſtortions of the features, invocations, oblations, expiatory ſacrifices, and thankſgivings. But it is unneceſſary to dwell longer on this head, which will be more fully exemplified in the enſuing chapter, wherein we propoſe to lay before the reader a particular account of the druidical ſyſtem, including the maxims and tenets of the Druids, the ancient Britiſh prieſts, both in a religious and political point of view.

CHAPTER V.

The ENGLISH DRUIDS deſcribed.

Derivation of their name, and of whom compoſed—Their habits, ornaments, and place of reſidence, where they held their annual aſſembly—Of the three orders, or claſſes—The authority, power, and offices of the Druids, and the policy of their government, uſed for the nobleſt purpoſes—Almoſt adored by the people—Their external rites, religious ceremonies, devotional exerciſes, and where performed—Remarkable veneration for the oak—Literary precepts, lectures, tenets, and maxims, both religious and political—General character of them.

IT is univerſally agreed that the Druids derived their name from that ſuperſtitious reverence they paid to oaks, Deru, in the Britiſh language, ſignifying an oak. They were compoſed of the higheſt orders of the people, the commonalty, for obvious reaſons, being excluded from the arcana of their political ſyſtem, whereby a ſtrict alliance was formed between the church and ſtate; and this union rendered them awful to the people, and neceſſary to thoſe who were placed in elevated ſtations of life, by birth, education, or employment.

Their hair they wore ſhort, but their beards very long. In their hands they carried a wand; and an enchaſed ornament, called the Druid's egg, was hung about the neck. Their garments, a kind of looſe gowns, reached down to the ground; but when employed in religious ceremonies, they always wore a ſurplice. The Iſle of Angleſey was their chief ſeat of reſidence, where they had their principal ſeminary, and held an annual meeting of the ſtates. Such was the reputation of this ſeat of the Muſes, that the children of the Gauls were ſent for education hither.

The Druids have been diſtinguiſhed by hiſtorians into three orders or claſſes, namely, 1. Druids, properly ſo called; 2. Bards; and 3. Vates, or Eubates.

Thoſe which ranked under the firſt claſs united a ſecular with an eccleſiaſtical authority, by regulating all public affairs, preſiding over the myſteries of religion, offering all grand expiatory ſacrifices, adjuſting religious ceremonies; nay, their power extended to life and effects, reſpecting which their deciſions were final. Yet, they were all in ſubordination to one Arch-Druid, elected from their body by a majority. This primate, or pope, enjoyed his ſupremacy during life; his perſon was held ſacred; and the power of excommunication and depoſing kings at his pleaſure, depended upon his will, which was abſolute.

The Druids of the ſecond order, ſtyled Bards, were not only prieſts, but national preceptors, heralds, poets, and muſicians. To them was committed the important truſt of educating children of all ranks. Their memory was the repoſitory, containing the noble exploits of their heroes. Theſe, on public occaſions, they ſung in verſes of their own compoſing, accompanied with harps, or a chorus of youths; but at their ſolemn religious ceremonies they alſo ſung hymns.

Thoſe of the third claſs were the Vates, who devoted themſelves to the ſtudy of phyſic, natural philoſophy, aſtronomy, magic, divination, and augury; in the knowledge of which they were ſkilled to a degree, that ſeemed above the pitch of mental knowledge, in the eyes of an ignorant people.

If we conſider attentively the authority, learning, power, offices, and policy of the Druids, we ſhall not be ſurpriſed that the nobility ſhould court their favour, and that the vulgar ſhould regard them with an awful veneration, almoſt equal to that with which they worſhipped their deities. All the important affairs of ſtate paſſed under their conſideration, nor did they ever give a ſentence which was not executed. An individual, who from inconſideration, temerity, or paſſion, preſumed to call in queſtion their infallibility, was ſubject to a puniſhment worſe than death itſelf, being, from that moment, excluded from the ſociety of his equals; ſhunned as a perſon abandoned by God and men; none would have the leaſt intercourſe with him; a forlorn fugitive; a deſpicable vagabond; devoted to all the horrors, without the pity or relief, of a dreadful excommunication.

Hence it is evident that the Druids acted both in a civil and eccleſiaſtical capacity. Arbitrators in civil matters, judges in criminal cauſes, public oracles of the community, exempted from taxes, excuſed from military ſervices, poſſeſſed of the principal archives, enjoying the higheſt poſts of honour and truſt in the nation, intruſted ſolely with the education of youth, from theſe ſources a pre-eminence muſt take its riſe, which of courſe would end, as it in fact did, in an uncontroled power over the minds and perſons of the laity, without exception.

Religion has, in every ſtate, been regarded as the main bulwark of political ſecurity. Now the Druids were the ſole guardians of religion, upon which were founded all the principles of political government. This they divided into two kinds, conſiſting of their own moral philoſophy, with the myſteries peculiar to their order, and thoſe external, fallacious deceptions, by which they kept the common people in a ſlaviſh ſubjection. Theſe have been termed the arts of prieſtcraft; but whoever ſearches the records of hiſtory will find, they have generally compoſed the eſtabliſhed religion, in every nation and period of time. From hence aroſe that refined policy of performing their ceremonies, and delivering their inſtructions by rote, never ſuffering either their ſciences or maxims to be committed to writing. A practice adopted undoubtedly from an intention of preventing the vulgar from becoming acquainted with the myſteries of their inſtitution, by means of any manuſcripts they might become poſſeſſed of.

The Druidical ſyſtem was calculated, in every part, to throw a veil of ignorance over the eyes of a ſuperſtitious people; who believed their prayers were ſufficient to draw down upon them, or avert, the vengeance of their gods. Verſed in every art that had a tendency to excite admiration, or inflame the paſſions, and engroſſing all the learning of their country, it is no wonder their power was abſolute.

It muſt, however, be mentioned to their honour, that, notwithſtanding the unlimited influence of the Druids over the minds of a rude multitude, who revered them as beings more than mortal, they exerciſed the power which they maintained by deception, for the nobleſt purpoſes, reconciling private differences, and, by their mediation, compoſing civil diſcords. Their preſence was ſufficient to ſtill the fury of exaſperated armies, between whom they would frequently ruſh at the riſk of their lives, exhorting them by all the powerful arts of perſuaſion, to ſubmit the cauſe of their quarrel to their deciſions. The embattled warriors, awed by their ſacred character, dropped the uplifted javelins, and, through the mediation of their venerable ſages, embraced each other with the warmeſt impulſes of returning friendſhip and reconciliation.

Writers of antiquity have mentioned the ſublime notions which the Druids entertained of the ſupreme Being. Tacitus, in particular, obſerves, "it was an opinion among them, univerſally eſtabliſhed, that to ſuppoſe the preſence of the Deity confined, or to repreſent him in human ſhape, or by any material image, was derogatory to his honour, and incompatible with his divine attributes." Conſiſtent with theſe exalted ſentiments were the fundamentals of their faith; for they believed in one infinite, eternal, omnipotent principle, from whom all things derived their origin. The immortality of the ſoul, and a future ſtate of retribution, were alſo among the articles of their faith. We cannot therefore but conclude, that the external rites of their religious worſhip were invented, and performed, in conformity to the prejudices of the ignorant multitude. Thus we find them from their knowledge in aſtronomy, taking advantage of eclipſes, particularly of the ſun. When this phœnomenon happened, the people were ſummoned to the ſacred grove, where the Arch-Druid preſided in perſon. They conſidered the darkneſs occaſioned by the eclipſe as ſupernatural. No ſooner therefore was this begun, than victims of unfortunate captives were ſlain upon the altar. The prieſts, with an extraordinary enthuſiaſtic fury, and hands reeking with human gore, invoked the gods, continuing their frantic devotions until the darkneſs was over; at which time the Arch-Druid, declaring divine wrath to be viſibly appeaſed, diſmiſſed the deluded worſhippers with his benediction.

It may not be improper, in this place, to take notice, that all the places ſet apart for religious ceremonies, were conſecrated groves; theſe were compoſed of, and incloſed with capacious oak trees. Such was their veneration for the oak, which they held ſacred, that their victims were adorned with its branches, and the head of every one who offered ſacrifices, was encircled with garlands made from its leaves. Nor was the tree itſelf the ſole object of their ſuperſtitious regard, a large ſhare of which they beſtowed upon its production, the miſletoe. This they deemed a peculiar gift from heaven, and adored it as a panacea, or univerſal medicine. In the ſpring, on the firſt day of a new moon, it was annually ſought for. The ſearch was made amidſt a great concourſe of people, with all the ceremonies of prieſtly parade; the diſcovery was hailed with moſt exceſſive raptures of joy: it being thought the omen of a proſperous year. A proper branch having been ſelected, a principal Druid cut it from the tree, with a conſecrated golden knife, or pruning hook. The acclamations of the multitude on obtaining this precious acquiſition are not to be deſcribed; nor can their devotional extaſies be conceived, when the arch-impoſtor, clad in his pontifical robe, offered two white bulls to the gods, invoking particularly thoſe, while the flame from the ſacrifices aſcended, who preſided over the healing art.

Though it is certain, that in theſe and other inſtances of groſs ſuperſtition, they deluded the people, indulging them with oblations of human ſacrifices, permitting them even inceſtuous concubinage, and blinding their minds with all the execrable practices of idolatry; yet their own religious tenets, maxims, and moral philoſophy, have been the admiration of all ſucceeding ages. We here preſent our readers with a few of them, collected from various writers, that have happily eſcaped the all-conſuming whirlpool of oblivion, and the ravages of time.

TENETS and MAXIMS of the DRUIDS.

1. ONE ſupreme God governs the univerſe, from whoſe omnipotence all things derive their origin.

2. The ſoul is immortal, it can never die, and ſhall either be rewarded or puniſhed in a future life.

3. The world ſhall be deſtroyed by fire or water, and the ſoul of man purged from ſin by the former.

4. There is another world, a future ſtate of exiſtence, and a certain day of retribution.

5. Maſters of families are ſupreme lords in their families; having in their hands the power of life and death: and it is their indiſpenſable duty to beſtow their utmoſt care in training the youthful minds of their offspring.

6. Children are not to be removed from their parents, nor to be admitted publicly into their company, till the age of fourteen years.

7. Upon emergences of ſtate, an individual may be ſacrificed for the good of his country.

8. The diſloyal, or diſobedient to the decrees of the ſtate, ſhall be interdicted. Theſe ſhall roam, ſecluded from ſociety, deprived of the benefit of the law, incapable of public employment, without atoning ſacrifices, unprotected, and not to be truſted in the moſt trifling matters.

9. He who ſhall come laſt to the aſſembly of the ſtates, merits death.

10. They who lend money to the poor in this world, ſhall have it repaid to them in the next.

11. Letters or notes given to dying perſons, or thrown upon their funeral piles, will be delivered to whom they are addreſſed in the other world.

12. Priſoners of war, malefactors, or innocent perſons, are to be ſacrificed upon the altar, or burnt alive in a wicker coloſſus, at particular ſolemnities and times, in honour of, or to appeaſe the wrath of the gods.

13. Arts and ſciences are to be taught, and children to be inſtructed only in the ſacred groves.

14. Theſe muſt not be committed to writing, but to memory, from whence all inſtructions are to be delivered.

15. The moon has an abſolute influence over the human body, and cures all diſeaſes.

16. Self devoted victims, who kill themſelves, to accompany their friends to the other world, will there live with them in perpetual reſt and bliſs.

17. Future events may be foretold from human victims, by obſerving the manner in which the body falls, by its motions when fallen, by the flowing of the blood, by the appearance of the wound, and, more eſpecially, by inſpecting attentively the vital parts.

18. Commerce with ſtrangers is ſtrictly prohibited.

19. The miſletoe, revered for its medicinal virtues, and as a gift from heaven, muſt be gathered with reverential awe; if poſſible, on the ſixth day of the month, with a golden bill or pruning-hook.

20. The powder of miſletoe promotes fertility in women, removes the cauſes of barrenneſs, and, when properly adminiſtered, is a ſovereign remedy for all diſeaſes.

The above tenets and maxims of the Druids, we have collected from the moſt authentic accounts. It is pity they ſhould ever have been tarniſhed with an intermixture of idolatrous notions, and the moſt execrable ſuperſtitious practices; yet hence we may diſcover plainly the dignity, importance, power and utility of this famous ſect. Their tempers, manners, and cuſtoms, in general, were conformable to the pure dictates of human reaſon. In public and private life, they were honeſt, abſtemious, induſtrious, and hoſpitable. They lived in hollow trees, woods, and caves; their drink, the pure ſtream; their food, acorns and berries. Their opinions had the firſt effect on public aſſemblies, and their influence obtained for them the firſt choice of whatever was taken in war. They engroſſed all the learning of their country, nor was ſcarce any puniſhment inflicted without their concurrence.

The Druids were celebrated for many virtues of the higheſt order, particularly fortitude, integrity, benevolence, and true patriotiſm. From whence alone ſprung the ardent inclination of the principal people to get their children admitted into ſome of their claſſes, and that profound veneration of the vulgar, who placed them almoſt upon an equal footing with their deities. But what heightened this regard was, their being the arbitrators in differences among jarring parties, and their maintaining inviolable concord among their own orders. This was never known to be infringed, except on the death of an Arch-Druid, when the freedom of election was ſometimes interrupted by appeals to the ſword; upon all other occaſions, they conducted themſelves with juſtice, temperance, moderation, and diſintereſtedneſs, the ſound baſis of their public character, and the permanent ſecurity of that reſpect which was invariably entertained for them by the people.

The ancient inhabitants of Great Britain, and their prieſts, were ſuch as we have now deſcribed them, about forty years before the invaſion of the Romans, under Julius Cæſar, which our next book will treat of at large.

In the mean time, reader, you and I may perhaps require a little reſt; and ſhould nature, neceſſity, inclination, buſineſs or duty, draw off our attention, the cloſe of a book offers a fair opportunity to obey their dictates. However, before you go, permit the writer of this hiſtory, to thank you for your obliging condeſcenſion in giving him your company thus far, and to hope, that in the way, you may have found ſome ſketches of unpoliſhed nature, both pleaſing and profitable. We do not mean to make any pompous profeſſions, nor beſpeak your favour by a diſplay of our integrity, impartiality, and great abilities; theſe belong to the meaneſt adventurers. A bill of fare has been laid before you, from which you may form ſome judgment of what your future hiſtorical entertainment will be. Of this reſt aſſured, our endeavours ſhall not be wanting to provide a rich variety of entertaining information, and to lay the whole before you with ſuch an arrangement as may cauſe you to acknowledge that you are content and ſatiſfied. For the preſent, in the old Britiſh ſtyle, we bid you—farewel.

However, we would here juſt obſerve, that (unlike other works of this kind hitherto publiſhed and now publiſhing, which have in general been mere copies of each other) we have drawn our information from the moſt reſpectable ſources of genuine authority, namely, original records, valuable ancient, and modern manuſcripts, &c. &c. depoſited in the Britiſh Muſeum, and other libraries, public and private, to which we have been admitted by the kind aſſiſtance of many eminent gentlemen in different parts of England, Wales, Scotland and Ireland; ſo as to render this performance worthy the attention of every lover of Britiſh hiſtory.

BOOK II.

FROM THE INVASION OF BRITAIN BY THE ROMANS, UNDER JULIUS CÆSAR, TO THEIR FINAL DEPARTURE, WHEN THEY ENTIRELY ABANDONED THE KINGDOM.

CHAPTER I.

Deſcribes the ſtate of the Britons at the time of the Roman invaſion—Cæſar's firſt expedition, in the year of the world 3947, and fifty five years before the Chriſtian epocha—Arrives off Dover with his ſhips—Weighs anchor and makes good his landing near Deal—The difficulties attending this in Cæſar's own words—The Britons are defeated, and ſue for peace, which is granted them—They revolt upon the Roman fleet having ſuffered conſiderable damages from a ſtorm—Hoſtilities are re-commenced on the ſide of the Britons, who attack the ſeventh legion of the Romans ſent out to forage—Cæſar by his timely preſence prevents their deſtruction—His camp is attacked by the Britons, whom he puts to flight—They ſue a ſecond time for peace, which is granted them; and Cæſar, with few advantages from this his firſt expedition, returns to Gaul on the twentieth of September, after about three weeks abſence.

WHAT a deſtructive paſſion is ambition! and what havock does it occaſion among the works of God! Yet, under the influence of unerring wiſdom, how frequently is it made ſubſervient to the nobleſt purpoſes! Well may it be ſtiled lawleſs, ſeeing it will adopt the moſt unjuſt means, nay, the moſt flimſy pretences to attain its ends. Well may it be ſaid to be boundleſs, ſeeing it terminates only with life itſelf. It was this inſatiable luſt of conqueſt which turned the attention of Cæſar to the iſland of Great Britain; that invincible victor, who when no other country remained to feel the force of his arms, turned them from the ſame reſtleſs impulſe, to ſubdue that of his own. And yet we may plainly diſcern the hand of an almighty agent, employing this buſtling conqueror, as an inſtrument to anſwer the grand deſigns, and determined plan of his providence; for the conqueſt of aſpiring Romans, laid the foundation, on which was gradually raiſed the glory of Britons. From hence ſprung, amidſt the wilds of barbariſm, a civilized nation, over whom Chriſtianity has ſpread her healing wings, and wherein the arts and ſciences have obtained a degree of perfection almoſt unparalleled.

When Cæſar meditated an invaſion of England, the natives were divided into petty ſovereignties, governed by their own particular chieftains, who could not be compelled to act againſt a common enemy. The ſouthern parts of the iſland were inhabited by thoſe whom they had received as friends, but who ſoon made war upon them as enemies. The Silures and Ordovice dwelt in the middle of the iſland; conſequently not being affected with the diſtreſs of their neighbours, they would not always be diſpoſed to ſend them aſſiſtance. The people in general were undiſciplined, nor were they ſupplied with warlike ſtores, ſuch as might put them upon a level with the Romans. Add to this, their country was open, without towns or fortifications, their only places of defence and retreat being foreſts, ſwamps, and mountains. They had neither riches nor poſſeſſions that might tempt the avarice of a conqueror.

Cæſar, however, animated with the thought of extending his conqueſts to the very extremity of the ocean, was determined to pay the Britons a viſit with his victorious legions. After the conqueſt of Gaul, the mighty conqueror could not reſt ſatiſfied, without adding the ſubjection of Britain to the number of his triumphs. This thirſt of dominion was a general paſſion, prevalent among the Romans, to gratify which numerous battles had been fought, a never-ceaſing effuſion of blood had been ſhed, Gaul had been ſubdued, a vaſt continent laid waſte, and diſtant regions traverſed, to enlarge only the territories of the republic of Rome.

It is an inconteſtable truth, that when the ſtronger power is determined to plunder or ſubjugate the weaker, pretences are never wanting. Cæſar, in his commentaries, tells us himſelf, "He reſolved to make a voyage to Britain, becauſe he had been informed, in all the wars of Gaul, the enemy had received conſiderable ſupplies from thence." Whether this was the real reaſon, or not, of Cæſar's firſt enterpriſe, whatever might be his motives, we find, like an able general, he took every precaution, and uſed every neceſſary expedient to inſure ſucceſs. With this view he ſummoned a council of merchants from all parts, who were known to be beſt acquainted with the country; but theſe people, who carried on a lucrative trade with the Britons, under a plea of ignorance, endeavoured to deter Cæſar from his intended invaſion, yet at the ſame time took care to appriſe them thereof, that they might have time to make preparations for their defence againſt ſo powerful an enemy.

Cæſar's aſpiring genius, which had often aſſiſted him to conquer inſurmountable difficulties, was not to be diſcouraged for want of information; to gain which, he ſent in a galley C. Voluſenus, a tribune of his army, to reconnoitre the Britiſh coaſts, and Comius of Arras, a Briton by birth, as his ambaſſador; neither of whom ſucceeded in their attempts; for Voluſenus, not having been permitted to land, was unable to gain any intelligence; and Comius being conſidered in the capacity of a ſpy, as well as a traitor to his country, was impriſoned and loaded with chains. A very unwarrantable act this of the Britons, whoſe ambaſſadors were then juſt arrived with this very Comius, from Gaul, where they had been received with apparent cordiality by Cæſar, and to whom they had offered ſubmiſſion to the Roman ſtate, and to give hoſtages for their fidelity and attachment.

Having now made every neceſſary preparation for an invaſion, Cæſar began to put in execution his firſt intended expedition. To this end he drew together his fleet, conſiſting of eighty tranſports, wherein he embarked two legions, while his queſtor, and other principal officers went on board his gallies. He diſpoſed of his horſe in eighteen other tranſports, and ordered them to follow the infantry with the utmoſt expedition. His orders in this particular could not be complied with agreeable to his wiſhes, for the embarkation of his cavalry required more time than he imagined, and this delay occaſioned difficulties in making good a landing, which his own genius alone could probably have ſurmounted. Notwithſtanding an obſtacle ſo unpromiſing, which might have delayed a leſs able general, this brave veteran ſet ſail with his infantry alone from Morini, or Picardy, on the twenty-ſixth day of Auguſt, in the year of the world 3947, and fifty-five years before the birth of Chriſt.

A. C. 51. It was at the ſtill ſolemn hour of midnight, when Cæſar ſailed from the coaſt of Gaul, and about ten of the ſame morning his ſhips arrived off Dover, at which place the Britons had taken poſſeſſion of the heights, and ſtationed a conſiderable force to oppoſe his landing. A ſufficient proof that the Britons were acquainted with the deſigns of the Roman general, and therefore, jealous of their much-loved liberty, had not been idle in making preparations for the defence of their country againſt a foreign invader.

Cæſar, finding it impoſſible, from the poſition of the enemy, to effect a deſcent at this place, after having ſummoned a council of war, weighed anchor, in order to find a level open ſhore; and falling down the tide about eight miles farther, arrived at a more convenient ſpot for debarking his troops, near the place where now ſtands the town of Deal. Here he found the Britons in force, ranged in order of battle, with a ſeeming determination to oppoſe reſolutely his landing; an account of which we preſent to our readers in Cæſar's own words.

"On many accounts we found it very difficult to land, ſays he, becauſe our ſhips being tall, required a conſiderable depth of water, and our ſoldiers, while their hands were employed and loaded with heavy armour, were at the ſame time to encounter the waves and the enemy in a place they were not acquainted with; whereas the Britons, either ſtanding upon dry land, or ſallying a little way into the water in thoſe places they knew to be ſhallow, having the free uſe of their limbs, could boldly caſt their darts, and ſpur their horſes forward, which were trained to that kind of combat; which diſadvantage ſo diſcouraged the Romans, who were ſtrangers to this way of fighting, that they did not appear ſo cheerful and eager to engage the enemy, as in their former conflicts upon dry land; which Cæſar perceiving, gave orders that the gallies (a nimble kind of ſhipping the enemy had never ſeen) ſhould advance a little before the reſt of the fleet, and row along with their broad-ſides towards the ſhore, that they might more conveniently force the Britons to retire from the water ſide, by their ſlings, engines, and arrows, which did the Romans conſiderable ſervice; for the Britons, being ſurpriſed at the form of our gallies, with the motion of our oars and engines, began to give ground. But the ſtandard-bearer of the tenth legion perceiving our men were unwilling to enter into the ſea, having firſt invoked the gods for ſucceſs, cried out aloud, My fellow-ſoldiers, unleſs you will forſake your eagle, and ſuffer it to fall into the hands of the enemy, advance: for my part, I am reſolved to perform my duty to the commonwealth, and my general. Having ſaid this, he immediately leaped overboard, and advanced the eagle towards the Britons: whereupon the ſoldiers, encouraging each other to prevent ſo ſignal a diſgrace, followed his example; which thoſe in the next ſhips perceiving, did the like, and preſſed forward toward the enemy. The conflict was ſharply maintained on both ſides, though the Romans, not being able to keep their ranks, obtain firm footing, or follow their particular ſtandards, leaping out of ſeveral ſhips, and joining the firſt enſign they met with, were in great confuſion. But the Britons, who were well acquainted with the ſhallows, where they ſaw us deſcend in ſmall numbers from our ſhips, ſpurred their horſes into the water, ſet upon our men, incumbered and unprepared to receive them, and ſome ſurrounded us with their numbers in one place, whilſt others flanked us where we lay moſt open in another; which Cæſar obſerving, he cauſed the long boats and ſmaller veſſels to be manned, and where occaſion required, ſent them to aſſiſt their fellows. Thus our foremoſt ranks, having gained dry footing, were followed by the reſt of the army, and charging the enemy briſkly put them to flight, but were not able to purſue or take the iſland at that time, becauſe we had no cavalry, which was the only thing wanting to complete Cæſar's uſual ſucceſs.

"The enemy being defeated, ſo ſoon as they had eſcaped beyond the reach of danger, ſent ambaſſadors to Cæſar to deſire a peace, promiſing to deliver hoſtages for their intire ſubmiſſion; and with theſe ambaſſadors came Comius of Arras, whom Cæſar had ſent into Britain, where he was impriſoned ſo ſoon as he had landed with his general's commands, but ſet at liberty again after the battle. They endeavoured to excuſe what they had done by laying the blame upon the populace, and intreating him to forgive a fault of ignorance, but not of malice. Cæſar at firſt reprimanded them for their breach of faith, that after they had voluntarily ſent ambaſſadors to him into Gaul to requeſt a peace, and delivered hoſtages of their own accord, they ſhould, without any reaſon, make war upon him; he imputed it, he ſaid, to their ignorance, and forgave them; then demanded hoſtages for their future carriage, part whereof they delivered immediately, and with the reſt, who lived at ſome diſtance, they promiſed to return in a few days. And now, having diſbanded their men, ſending them into their ſeveral counties, the princes from all parts came to deliver up themſelves and their eſtates to Cæſar's diſpoſal."

We have in this account, written by the victor's own pen, to whoſe character of a conſummate general appertaineth that of a faithful hiſtorian, a ſtrong teſtimony given to the bravery of our primogenial anceſtors. Cæſar acknowledges frankly, that he had many difficulties to contend with, that the conflict was ſharp, that the Romans were diſcouraged, and prevailed upon to attempt a landing only by one of thoſe military accidental expedients which are known frequently to decide the fate of battles. That after following the example of their ſtandard-bearer they were in great confuſion, being unable to keep their ranks, from which they were extricated only by the ſtrange figure of the gallies, or rather by the large ſtones and other deſtructive miſſiles thrown by their engines. Nor, if we attend to the conſequences of this firſt engagement, do we find the conqueror had reaſon to boaſt of any great advantages, being incapable either of improving his victory by purſuing the foe, or of taking the iſland, or, in a word, of doing any thing equal to his wonted ſucceſſes. The ſequel will alſo prove, that the Britons, though intimidated and defeated, for which ſufficient reaſons are aſſigned by Cæſar, yet the panic was of ſhort duration. They were forced, it is true, into a temporary peace, but they continued in this amicable diſpoſition but a very ſhort time.

About four days after Cæſar's landing, when the terms were ſcarcely ratified, he received intelligence that the ſhips he left to bring over his cavalry having ſet ſail, were overtaken at ſea by a violent ſtorm, which ſeparating them, had driven a part back to the coaſt of Gaul, and the reſt to the weſtern coaſt of Britain; at the ſame time the veſſels and gallies belonging to Cæſar's army ſuffered greatly in this tempeſtuous night. Some were much ſhattered; twelve of them were totally loſt; the remainder could not for ſome time be put in a condition fit for ſervice. The ſituation of the Roman army was now truly diſtreſſing, being without ſhips, in a country unknown, wherein they were like to be ſurpriſed every moment, or ſurrounded by a vigilant enemy. But an event that ſpread conſternation and diſmay among the Romans, rouſed the warlike ſpirit of the Britons; for the evident diſtreſs of the enemy animated them to a revolt, whereby they hoped, by this favourable opportunity, to regain their liberty. An aſſembly of the ſtates gave new vigour, by their exhortations, to this reſolution of the people; while their Druids exclaimed, that as the gods had appeared ſo propitious to them, it would be impious not to join the elements in the noble ſtruggle for freedom, by which their deliverance would in all probability be effected.

The Roman general foreſaw the conſequences that would attend this adverſe turn of fortune. He knew the ſtorm at ſea would be productive of another as outrageous on land. He therefore took every prudent precaution to raiſe the drooping courage of his ſoldiers, and to fruſtrate the probable deſigns of the enemy, by collecting within the fortifications of his camp a magazine of corn from the neighbouring fields, and by ſending one of his gallies to Gaul for materials to refit the reſt. He alſo applied the fragments of thoſe veſſels that were irreparable, to various purpoſes, with great ſucceſs. Such was the aſſiduity of this brave commander, that the remainder of his ſhattered fleet was completely repaired in ten days. The Britons, in the mean time, made every poſſible effort to re-aſſemble their ſcattered troops. Their hoſtages withdrew ſecretly from the Roman camp, which they had attentively ſurveyed. Several aſſemblies of the people were held, to conſult the moſt proper means to diſtreſs their bold invaders: this they concluded might be beſt effected by cutting off their detachments, and intercepting their convoys; by which mode of carrying on the war they hoped to protract it, till the inclemency of approaching winter ſhould complete what had been left unfiniſhed by the furious attack of the elements.

The ſeventh legion was the firſt foraging party that had nearly fallen a ſacrifice to Britiſh policy: this was ſent out by Cæſar to reap a diſtant field of corn; who, when leaſt ſuſpecting or prepared for an attack, were ſurrounded by the Britons, they having concealed themſelves in a wood for the purpoſe of a ſurpriſe. The deſtruction of this detachment muſt have been inevitable, their retreat being rendered impoſſible by the Britons having ſurrounded the field with their war chariots, had not Cæſar, whoſe advanced guard perceived an unuſual cloud of duſt, gueſſed the cauſe. He immediately marched at their head to the aſſiſtance of his diſtreſſed legion, whom he found in a compact body, hard preſſed by the enemy, they having quitted their chariots, and were charging them on foot with the utmoſt vigour. Cæſar's preſence inſpired his ſoldiers with freſh courage. The aſſailants were now attacked in their turn. Their impetuoſity being checked, they opened their ranks, and retired to ſome diſtance. Cæſar drew up his forces in order of battle. The combatants ſtood gazing on each other, expecting a renewed charge, but neither ſide advancing, the Britons retreated unmoleſted to their woods, and Cæſar, without having been able to pour his uſual vengeance on the foe, to his camp. From which laſt circumſtance we may fairly conclude, upon an impartial view of this bloody conteſt, that the conqueror of Gaul retired, without carrying with him the palm of victory, as on other occaſions.

This conjecture appears corroborated by a raſh ſubſequent enterpriſe of the Britons, which they imprudently undertook. Fluſhed with their late ſucceſs, and from thence concluding that the Romans, though formidable, were not invincible, they formed the haſty reſolution of aſſaulting them in their camp. Inſpired with the effuſions of a warm imagination, and the advantages that would reſult from this daring attempt, they diſpatched meſſengers to every ſtate, who exhorted their countrymen by incentives calculated for inſpiring revenge, not to neglect ſo fair an opportunity of driving the enemy from their coaſts, and by one deciſive blow, of preventing the miſeries of future invaſions. Their remonſtrance had the deſired effect. A numerous army was in a ſhort time drawn together, and marched immediately to attack the Roman entrenchments. Cæſar drew out his forces before the principal gate of his camp, waiting the furious onſet of the Britons with his uſual tranquillity. Their impetuoſity was ſoon checked by the reſiſtleſs intrepidity of diſciplined veterans, who, charging with their accuſtomed fury, put them into confuſion, and compelled them to ſeek their ſafety in a precipitate flight. The Roman general, for want of cavalry, found it again impoſſible to purſue his advantages; nor could he follow the flying foe into their gloomy foreſts, in the receſſes whereof they found a ſecure retreat. This engagement was far from being deciſive. They were indeed repulſed; but the ardent flame of liberty was not extinguiſhed in their boſoms, nor was their national ſpirit broken by the diſaſter.

The Britons, in their preſent ſituation, thought it moſt politic to apply again for peace to the invader of their country. The penetrating eye of Cæſar at once perceived their motives, and his own intereſt. He knew they aimed only at delay, and at the ſame time he was ſenſible how abſolutely neceſſary it was for him to return to Gaul. They were repulſed with conſiderable loſs, their baggage had been taken, and the circumjacent parts of the country laid waſte, yet they were not brought under the galling yoke of ſlavery. Proviſions began to grow ſcarce in his camp; winter approached; his army, though victorious, had ſuffered greatly; nor could they ſafely continue in the face of an enterpriſing enemy, on an iſland wholly unknown. Cæſar therefore readily admitting the ambaſſadors, reprimanded them, and then granted their deſires, only he inſiſted on having the number of hoſtages doubled, and ſent after him into Gaul. Upon which he embarked his troops, ſet ſail about midnight, and landed there ſafely on the 20th of September, after a ſhort paſſage.

Thus terminated Cæſar's firſt expedition, being productive neither of glory to the general, nor advantage to the ſtate; yet the ſenate, ſenſible of his great merit, and conſidering the conqueſt of Great Britain an object of the firſt magnitude, decreed him a triumph of twenty days for his important ſervices. A triumph of ambition over virtue, honour, and juſtice; a triumph, for having trampled on the laws of nations, and deluged, with the blood of its innocent inhabitants, a country to which he had not even a pretended claim.

CHAPTER II.

The ſecond expedition of Julius Cæſar.—He makes preparations for invading Great Britain in the ſpring with a more formidable armament—The Britons likewiſe exert their utmoſt force for the defence of their country—Caſſivellaunus is proclaimed generaliſſimo—Embarkation of Cæſar's forces, conſiſting of five legions of foot, and two thouſand horſe, in the beginning of June, fifty-four years before the birth of Chriſt—Sails from Calais, and lands near Deal, without oppoſition—Engages the Britons, near the river Stour, who are routed with great ſlaughter—Is deterred from from purſuing the enemy by having received an expreſs, informing him, that a dreadful ſtorm had, the preceding night, deſtroyed the greater part of his fleet—Marches back to the ſea-coaſt, and by an extraordinary expedient, ſecures his fleet from ſimilar danger—The Romans are greatly harraſſed, and in one action defeated by the Britons, who in their turn are completely routed by the Romans—Conſequences of this victory—Cæſar marches with his army to Verulum, the capital of Caſſivellaunus, and takes it by ſtorm—The Britiſh chief ſends orders to the princes of Kent, requeſting them to attack the intrenchments of the enemy, and deſtroy their fleet. The attempt is made, but without ſucceſs—Finding all farther oppoſition vain, he propoſes terms of peace to the conqueror—A general pacification takes place, and Cæſar, about the middle of September, ſets ſail for the coaſt of Gaul, where he arrives after a quick and ſafe paſſage, 51 years before Chriſt.

NO ſooner were the Britons delivered from the invaders of their country, than they determined not to ſend the ſtipulated hoſtages. This infringement of the treaty furniſhed Cæſar with a plauſible pretence for undertaking a ſecond expedition. To effect which, warlike preparations were made in Gaul, with amazing diſpatch. Such ſhips as had been damaged were repaired, others were built on a new conſtruction, calculated for ſhallow water. Military ſtores were collected in the ports of Spain, and by the ſpring of the following year, twenty-eight gallies, ſix hundred tranſports, with a great number of flat bottomed boats, were ready for the intended invaſion of Britain.

On their part, the Britons were not inactive. Alarmed at Cæſar's preparations, of which they had received ſufficient intelligence, they convened a general aſſembly of the ſtates, and elected from among their generals, the moſt diſtinguiſhed for military accompliſhments, a commander in chief over all their forces. The choice fell to Caſſivellaunus; but during the election a ſharp conflict was excited between the princes of Caſſi and the Trinobantes, the former party in favour of Caſſivellaunus, the latter of Imanuentius. The conteſt was exceeding warm; the ſuffrages were divided: but the death of Imanuentius, who loſt his life in the ſtruggle, put an end to the debate. His ſon Mandubratius, to avoid the fate of his father, fled to Cæſar for protection, and meanly ſacrificed the good of his country to a reſentment equally unreaſonable and unjuſt.

The forces of Cæſar being now ready for embarkation, and his numerous fleet riding ſafely in the port of Itium, now Calais, he embarked five legions of foot, and two thouſand horſe, in the beginning of June, fifty-four years before the birth of Chriſt. A. C. 54. Setting ſail about ſun-ſet, he drew near the Britiſh coaſt next morning, and caſt anchor near Deal, the place where he had landed in his former expedition.

There now preſented itſelf a ſcene very different from what the Romans ſaw at their prior invaſion; for the Britons, diſconcerted at the appearance of ſo formidable a fleet, had retired from the ſhore, and ſuffered the Romans to land without oppoſition. This having been effected, Cæſar fixed upon a convenient ſpot of ground on Barham Downs, where he marked out a camp, and, leaving a ſufficient force to fortify and defend it, at the head of which was Quintus Atrius, he ſet out at midnight with the main body of his army in queſt of the enemy. After a march of twelve miles, he diſcovered the Britiſh army encamped upon an eminence, having the river Stour in their front, and a thick wood in their rear. As the Romans advanced, the Britons diſcovered a reſolution of diſputing their paſſage over the river with their war chariots, which they had drawn up in great order along its banks. But the Roman cavalry attacked them with ſuch vigour, that they ſoon forced the paſſage, and compelled them to retreat with precipitation into the wood behind them.

In order to render this gloomy aſylum more ſecure, it was fortified with ramparts, formed of large trees laid acroſs each other to a conſiderable height, and in its center was a ſtrong fortreſs. Both nature and art had conſpired to render it a ſtrong, though barbarous fortification. Here the Britons for ſome time withſtood all the efforts of the Roman cavalry, who were at laſt obliged to abandon their unſucceſsful attempts to the infantry; but at laſt, after a bloody conteſt, the ſeventh legion drove the Britons from their poſt, with great ſlaughter, and obliged them to ſeek ſhelter in the inmoſt parts of the woods.

Being now determined to purſue the advantage already gained, Cæſar diſpatched three bodies of his troops in ſearch of the flying enemy; but they were almoſt inſtantly recalled, intelligence having been received from Atrius, the ſubſtance of which was, that during the preceding night a violent ſtorm had deſtroyed the greater part of his fleet. On this information, Cæſar countermanded the march of his troops, and returned to the ſea-coaſt, where he was an eye witneſs of the havock occaſioned by the tempeſt. Forty of his veſſels were entirely loſt, and the reſt ſo much damaged, as to be unfit for the ſea till thoroughly repaired. He immediately therefore gave orders, to repair ſome ſhips that were moſt damaged, with the wrecks of others; wrote to Gaul for more, and then reſolved upon executing a project, which it is a queſtion if any one but a Cæſar could have conceived, and accompliſhed; this was no other than hauling up his whole fleet upon dry land, and ſurrounding it with a fortification; which truly great undertaking he completed in ten days, and then returned to the former ſtation with his army.

The Britons, during this interval, had made the beſt uſe of their time, having formed a very numerous army under the command of Caſſivellaunus, who occupied the ſame poſt in the wood, from whence his countrymen had been before diſlodged.

The Britiſh general Caſſivellaunus, convinced that his forces were not a match for the Romans in the open field, avoiding a general engagement, took the prudent precaution of harraſſing their flying parties, and cutting off their proviſions. By which mode of fighting, Cæſar was continually attacked by ſmall parties, who iſſued ſuddenly forth, charged, and then ſuddenly retreated. Though repulſed, they returned with the ſame vigour, and the ſame undaunted firmneſs, as at firſt. On the other hand, Cæſar, perceiving the conſequences that would reſult from his troops being thus perpetually harraſſed, reſolved to fortify his camp, and to bring, if poſſible, the Britons to a general engagement.

While the Romans were buſily employed in their works, Caſſivellaunus, who watched circumſpectly all their motions, thought it moſt prudent to attack them before their ramparts were finiſhed. Accordingly he ruſhed upon them unexpectedly with the utmoſt fury. The advanced guard of the Romans, unable to ſuſtain the ſhock, gave way. Cæſar, ſeeing what dreadful ſlaughter was made among them, ſent two cohorts to their ſupport; but theſe, intimidated by the furious impetuoſity of the conquering Britons, halted, inſtead of joining their companions; which being perceived by Caſſivellaunus, he attacked them inſtantly, and routed them with conſiderable loſs. Numbers were ſlain both of ſoldiers and officers; among the laſt were ſome of diſtinction, particularly Quintus Laberius Durus, a tribune.

When the Romans expected a ſecond engagement, they were ſurpriſed the following day, at ſeeing the enemy in ſmall ſcattered parties, on the adjacent hills, who ſeemed not to diſcover the leaſt intimation of coming to action. Cæſar, unacquainted with the deſertion that had happened in the Britiſh army the preceding night, among whom jealouſy had infuſed a fatal poiſon, extracted from the juſtly acquired glory of Caſſivellaunus, detached three legions, and all his horſe, amounting to about twenty thouſand men, commanded by his lieutenant Trebonius, on a foraging party, in order to clear up this, in his eye, myſterious conduct of the enemy. This powerful detachment was ſoon oppoſed by the Britons, who fell upon the Roman cavalry with a fury that obliged them to fall back upon their foot.

This ſmall advantage was productive of a general engagement; for the Roman infantry ſupporting their horſe, charged the Britons in a compact body, with their uſual bravery, whereby a complete victory ſo fully deciſive was obtained, that the Belgæ, deſerted by their auxiliaries, never after engaged the Romans in a pitched battle. Thus a general deſertion compleated what jealouſy had begun; the confederacy was diſſolved; and the Trinobantes, abandoning the cauſe of their country, their liberty, and their gods, put themſelves under the protection of Cæſar. Upon this ſtrange reverſe of fortune, the Britiſh chief, finding it in vain to oppoſe any longer the Romans, retired towards his own country, reſolving there to make a ſtand in its defence againſt the common enemy.

Cæſar, having received intelligence of the ſeparation, turned his whole force in purſuit of the unfortunate Caſſivellaunus, whoſe country was now marked out for deſtruction. With this view he advanced with his army to the banks of the Thames, which he intented to croſs where it might be fordable. Here he found, on his arrival, a great number of ſtakes drove into the bed of the river, that were ſharpened at top, and concealed under the ſurface of the water; at the ſame time he beheld the enemy poſted to advantage near the oppoſite banks, which they had fortified with entrenchments and palliſadoes, but theſe artful diſpoſitions, whereof Cæſar had been informed by deſerters, were of little avail againſt this hardy veteran, whom no obſtacles could ſtop, no difficulties intimidate; for the Roman horſe going at a ſmall diſtance from the fords, plunged into the ſtream, and were followed by the foot with aſtoniſhing intrepidity, though incumbered with their heavy armour, and the water up to their chins. This paſſage was effected at a place called Coway Stakes, oppoſite Oatlands, and near Kingſton in Surry, according to ſome writers.

The Britons, aſtoniſhed at this hazardous undertaking of the Romans, abandoned their intrenchments, and ſought for ſafety in their woods. And Caſſivellaunus, now ſenſible that all further reſiſtance would be preſumption, diſmiſſed his forces, retaining only four thouſand chariots. With theſe he watched the motions of the enemy's main body, cut off their ſtraggling parties, and in order to prevent their ſubſiſting by ravaging the country, ordered his people to drive their cattle from thoſe parts, through which he knew they muſt paſs.

This prudent meaſure was very alarming to Cæſar, as he was hereby convinced that the military conduct of Caſſivellaunus was equal to his valour. But it was rendered abortive by a defection of the Regnimagni, inhabitants of Surry, who, perceiving the Trinobantes were freed from the calamities of war, by an alliance with Cæſar, followed their example, and ſent offers of ſubmiſſion, which were accepted, upon the ſervile conditions that they ſhould furniſh proviſion ſufficient for the whole army. A ready compliance with theſe ignoble terms, enabled the Roman general to purſue his march to Verulum, now St. Albans, the capital of the unfortunate, though brave Caſſivellaunus, marking his route with devaſtation and bloodſhed.

The town of Verulum, which conſiſted of a number of huts, ſituated in the center of a wood, was fortified, after the Britiſh cuſtom, with ramparts of earth, ditches, and felled trees. Theſe fortifications, though formed in the rudeſt manner, the Romans had before experienced the difficulty of ſtorming; but the towering ambition of a Cæſar was not to be diſcouraged by obſtacles of this kind; he therefore ordered an attack to be made at two different places, and carried the town by ſtorm, in which, after having put a number of Britons to the ſword, he found large quantities of corn and cattle. Caſſivellaunus however eſcaped; and though deſerted by his friends, overpowered by his enemies, his capital taken, and his territories waſted, yet, ſupported by his own greatneſs of ſoul, in the midſt of his diſtreſsful calamities, he planned a project, which had it in the execution ſucceeded, muſt have greatly diſtreſſed, if not ruined, the invaders of his country.

At this time Cæſar was, with the main body of his army, more than eighty miles diſtant from his camp, from which the Britiſh chief concluded, a fair opportunity preſented itſelf of deſtroying the whole of the Roman fleet; impreſſed with the thought of this bold deſign, he ſent orders to Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagalus, and Segonax, four Kentiſh princes, who ſtill remained faithful, to collect their forces and ſtorm the naval intrenchments of the enemy. Theſe orders were obeyed with the utmoſt expedition: they aſſaulted the Roman camp, but the fortifications of the Romans reſiſted all their efforts, who not content with acting upon the defenſive, ſallied forth, put the Britons to flight, and took priſoner Cingetorix, their general.

A. C. 51. Caſſivellaunus, thus reduced to the laſt extremity, reſolved to make the beſt terms he could with the conqueror. Accordingly he ſent ambaſſadors to Cæſar, who liſtened readily to his propoſals, and concluded a peace with him upon the following conditions, That he ſhould ſubmit to the Roman ſtate, pay an annual tribute, and deliver hoſtages, as a ſecurity for the performance of the treaty. Theſe matters being adjuſted, a general pacification with the Britons took place; which was no ſooner ratified, than Cæſar returned to his camp, and prepared for his departure. His ſhips were repaired and launched with all poſſible diſpatch; upon which, about the middle of September, fifty-one years before the birth of Chriſt, he ſailed for the coaſt of Gaul, where he arrived after a quick and ſafe paſſage. When he returned to Rome, he preſented an offering of Britiſh pearls at the ſhrine of his ſuppoſed anceſtrix, Venus Genetrix; and employed his priſoners in adjuſting the tapeſtry ſcenes of the theatre, on which the victories gained over Britons were repreſented; while others of a more robuſt conſtitution, were allotted to the ſervile employ of carrying the ſedans of the principal nobility.

The eye of candour muſt certainly be at a loſs to diſtinguiſh the utility of this ſecond expedition of Cæſar, and to determine whether he retired as a diſappointed general, or a conqueror? Did he retain one foot of ground in the iſland, or, from his victories, procure any ſolid advantages to his country? Did he take any meaſures to ſecure that temporary ſubmiſſion his devaſtations had obtained? May he not be ſaid, to have rather viſited than conquered the country? what can be alledged in juſtification, what can be advanced in defence of his having diſtreſſed a free people, full as brave and much more innocent than himſelf? Shameful ſuperiority of knowledge, deteſted poliſh of civilization, that can produce no other evidence of genuine worth, than a ſuperlative degree of refined barbarity! All that can be ſaid in favour of Cæſar's boaſted conqueſt, all the honour due to him as a great general may be compriſed in this ſingle remark, that he, as Addiſon's Cato obſerves, "who conquered more than half the globe, without being able to ſubdue himſelf, had carried the Roman arms beyond the boundaries of the ocean, and extended his military exploits a little further than his predeceſſors, for the ſake only of gratifying an ambition equally falſe and fruitleſs."

CHAPTER III.

Death of Cæſar and Caſſivellaunus—The laſt is ſucceeded by Tenuantius, and at his death by Cunobeline, a prince of great talents—His ſon Adminius having been baniſhed for fomenting a rebellion, repairs to Rome, and perſuades Caligula, the reigning emperor, to undertake the conqueſt of Britain. An account of that tyrant's pretended invaſion—Cunobeline is ſucceeded by his two ſons Togodumnus and Caractacus—Theſe brave chieftains refuſe paying the tribute due to the Romans; and their ambaſſadors having been treated with ignominious contempt, they prohibit all intercourſe with them—This conduct of the Britons furniſhes Auguſtus with a plauſible pretence for recommencing hoſtilities againſt them—Accordingly he orders Plautius, one of his generals, to invade their country with a numerous army—Plautius lands with his army on the coaſt of Kent, without oppoſition—Purſues the two brothers, and defeats them ſeveral times—In one action Togodumnus is ſlain—Claudius, the Roman emperor, at the requeſt of his general, takes ſhipping at Bologne for the iſland of Britain, and arrives ſafe off Sandwich with a large body of forces—After a campaign of ſixteen days, in which, making a rapid progreſs in his conqueſts, he returns to Rome; is decreed a triumph, and obtains the ſurname of Britannicus—Plautius and Veſpaſian, on the depanture of Claudius, jointly command the army—Having reduced ſeveral of the Britiſh principalities to the Roman power, and oppoſed the brave Caractacus, head of the Caſſivellauni, with great ſucceſs; they return to Rome, where they receive triumphal honours—Oſtorius Scapula ſucceeds them—Puts the Britons to flight; diſarms the diſaffected among them; and draws a line of forts between the rivers Avon and Severn—A general confederacy of the Britons is formed, the Iceni having firſt taken up arms—They are attacked in their camp, and the Roman general gains a complete victory, after an obſtinate reſiſtance.

THE career of the mighty conqueror of Gaul being finiſhed by the irreſiſtible hand of death, diſcord fixed her ſeat at Rome, and, by the diſtractions ſhe raiſed, the affairs of Britain were almoſt loſt in the gloomy ſhades of oblivion. For a ſucceſſion of years after this period, very few tranſactions were inſerted in the page of hiſtory. We ſhall notice in their proper order both of time and place, ſuch, and ſuch only, as have been tranſmitted by the faithful hand of impartiality.

We are informed that Caſſivellaunus died ſeven years after the departure of Julius Cæſar; but not before he had ſeverely chaſtized the Trinobantes, whom one of his ſucceſſors reduced to his ſubjection. He was ſucceeded by Tenuantius, brother of Adrogeus, on whoſe demiſe, Cunobeline his ſon aſcended the throne of power. This prince was remarkable for poſſeſſing great talents, cultivated and improved by an excellent education at Rome. He kept up a friendly correſpondence with the Romans; he ſubdued the Trinobantes and Dobuni, for having joined the invaders of his country; and he coined money to pay the duties impoſed by the Romans on merchandize imported into Gaul by Britiſh merchants; for about this time the Britons opened an extenſive commerce with Gaul. They became more poliſhed, and their intercourſe with Rome, to which they ſent their children to be educated, afforded them an inſight into it's power and policy.

Auguſtus beheld theſe growing improvements with an eye of jealouſy, and as preſages of future independency; beſides, they paid no other tribute than a ſmall duty on merchandize; in all other reſpects A. C. 1. they were a free people. The Roman emperor, therefore, reſolved to compel the Britons to obſerve the treaty they had made with Julius Cæſar; and to pay the ſtipulated tribute, which had not been demanded for at leaſt twenty years. Accordingly, with a view of carrying his deſign into execution, he advanced into Gaul; but new diſturbances ſpringing up in the empire, particularly in the diſtrict of Pannonia, rendered his return neceſſary, and ſuſpended his expedition, However, after theſe commotions had ſubſided, Auguſtus marched again into Gaul, where he was met by ambaſſadors from Britain, with whom a peace was immediately concluded. This great emperor, it is well known, thought the Roman empire ſufficiently extenſive; and, on his death-bed, conſidered Britain of ſo little importance, that it was not included within the bounds he had given to the Roman empire, in a paper he left with his ſucceſſor Tiberius, who conſidered it as his political teſtament, admitting of not the leaſt variation to be made therein.

A. D. 8. The emperor Tiberius, treading in the ſteps of his predeceſſor, with a ſcrupulous exactneſs cultivated a friendſhip with the Britons, nor did he attempt to interrupt their tranquillity by any hoſtile preparations. This favourable diſpoſition toward them received additional ſtrength, by their humane conduct to ſome Roman ſoldiers under Germanicus, who, having been ſhipwrecked on the coaſt of Britain, were entertained by the natives with the moſt cordial hoſpitality, and conveyed ſafely to their country in ſhips provided by Cunobeline, who, during the reigns of Auguſtus and Tiberius, endeared himſelf to his ſubjects by his wiſdom and humanity.

The long ſeries of proſperity, which that great prince had enjoyed, was, however, in the evening of life, overcaſt with clouds of domeſtic diſtreſs, by the unnatural conduct of his eldeſt ſon Adminius, who, being of a tyrannical temper, fomented a rebellion againſt his father, for which, after a hard ſtruggle between parental fondneſs and juſtice in the boſom of Cunobeline, he was baniſhed the kingdom. Adminius, with a few attendants, fled to Caligula, who then filled the imperial throne, and perſuaded him A. D. 16. to undertake the conqueſt of his native country. This proud, cruel, daſtardly tyrant, received the information of an ungrateful traitor with the greateſt marks of ſatisfaction. His avarice tempted him to undertake an enterprize, which, from the artful repreſentations of Adminius, he concluded would be attended with neither fatigue or danger. Whereupon he aſſembled an army of two hundred thouſand men, and marched to Bologne on the coaſt of Gaul, where, though there was no appearance of an enemy, he addreſſed his ſoldiers as if he was about to lead them on to certain conqueſt; but having received advice that the Britons were ready to receive him in order of battle, cowardice prevailed over his vanity, and this man monſter determined to enjoy a triumph without endangering his perſon in the paths of honour. Accordingly he ventured out to ſea in his galley, within ſight of the Britiſh coaſt, which having ſeen, he returned with all the parade of a conqueror; and ſome of the ſoldiers, by his orders, having filled their helmets with ſhells, he ſent theſe ſpoils of the ocean, as he called them, to Rome, as trophies of his imaginary victory. A venal ſenate readily decreed the tyrant a triumph, while the army looked upon their cockle-ſhell hero with that contempt, his ridiculous conduct juſtly merited. But determined that his folly ſhould be tranſmitted to poſterity, he cauſed a light-houſe, which he named Turris Ardens, to be erected on the Belgic coaſt, oppoſite that of Norfolk, the remains whereof may ſtill be ſeen, at low water, on the ſands near Bologne.

During the inactive reigns of Auguſtus, Tiberius, and Caligula, the Britons incautiouſly loſt a favourable opportunity of ſecuring their liberty and independence againſt any future attacks of hoſtile invaders. Unhappily for them, with the uſeful commodities and arts of the Romans, they imported their luxuries; theſe, with the long intercourſe they had carried on with them, lulled aſleep a ſenſe of danger, and they ſunk down, inattentive and careleſs, in the ſoft lap of ſecurity and indolence.

Their prince Cunobeline, who ſurvived Caligula a ſhort time, was ſucceeded by his two ſons Togodumnus and Caractacus. Theſe brave chiefs withheld the tribute due to the Romans, becauſe they had refuſed to deliver up ſeveral traitors who had fled to Rome for refuge. One of theſe was named Beric, a ſuppoſed chief of the Dobuni, who, by the moſt flattering repreſentations, excited Claudius to make a conqueſt of Britain. But while this traiterous miſcreant was ſoliciting the deſtruction of his country, ambaſſadors arrived at Rome to demand the fugitives. Their petition was rejected, and inſult added to a denial. They were given to underſtand at the ſame time, that if the arrears of the tribute long due were not immediately paid, they would be demanded at the head of a Roman army. Confounded at ſo ungracious a reception, the ambaſſadors, without offering a reply, repaired with the utmoſt expedition to their country. The two princes, exaſperated at the ignominious treatment of their ambaſſadors, prohibited all intercourſe with the Romans, and they even refuſed to pay the impoſts and duties laid on commodities exported to Gaul from Britain.

A. D. 43. The Roman emperor Claudius, who ſucceeded Caligula, forty-three years after the birth of our Saviour, made this refuſal of the Britons a plauſible pretence for commencing hoſtilities againſt them. He therefore, without delay, gave the command of his army in Gaul to Aulius Plautius, a citizen of great reputation, not leſs eminent in the ſenate than the field. In obedience to the imperial orders, Plautius led a numerous body of forces to the coaſt of Gaul. For a time, a ſpirit of mutiny entered into them, and they refuſed obeying their general's orders, alledging, in their juſtification, that they would not paſs the boundaries of the ocean, nor plant the Roman eagles in what they called a new world. By this unexpected diſobedience the embarkation was delayed; but the eloquence and virtues of Plautius ſo effectually wrought upon the generoſity of his ſoldiers, that they returned to their duty; on which he divided them into three bodies, and embarked them at as many different ports. Having ſet ſail, they were driven back by a violent gale of wind, which had no ſooner ſubſided than they put to ſea again, and landed, without oppoſition, on the coaſt of Kent.

It is not eaſy to determine upon what ground of policy, or from what motives the Britons had broken up their camp near the ſea-coaſt, and had retired up the country, juſt before the Roman legions appeared. The principal body of their forces was commanded by the two brothers Togodumnus and Caractacus, both celebrated for their military abilities and virtue. Plautius loſt no time in purſuing them; and entering the country of the Dobuni, now Oxfordſhire, fell upon the Caſſivellauni, under the command of Caractacus, and put them to flight. Togodumnus, inſtead of retreating before an enemy fluſhed with victory, determined to give them battle, and was alſo defeated. The Roman general, in order to ſecure a retreat, leaving garriſons in thoſe places he had conquered, purſued his route to the Thames, then called Iſis. He found the two brothers, who had effected a junction, and to whoſe ſtandard the Britons had repaired from all parts, encamped on the oppoſite ſide of the river, at a place too deep to be forded even by cavalry. But having in his army a large body of German ſoldiers, who had been accuſtomed to ſwim acroſs rapid rivers in their armour, they plunged with undaunted intrepidity into the ſtream, and were ſupported by the Roman forces, who boldly followed their example. The Britons, aſtoniſhed at a tranſaction ſo daring and extraordinary, abandoned their camp, and retired in confuſion. As ſoon as the Germans, with a body of infantry under the command of Flavius Veſpatian, and his brother Sabinus, had reached the oppoſite bank of the river, they formed, and continued their purſuit in ſearch of the enemy, who were retreating to their ſtrong holds, the neighbouring woods. A ſlight ſkirmiſh enſued, in which the Britons were worſted; but night coming on, it was not thought prudent to purſue the advantage.

Theſe defeats did not depreſs the ſpirits of the Britons, who, rouſed to a ſenſe of danger, on the following day attacked the Roman army with an impetuoſity, that even their veterans, trained in the ſchool of diſcipline, could not reſiſt. With a fury, bordering on madneſs, they broke through their ranks, and thinned their ſquadrons. Victory for a time was doubtful which ſide to take, till Sidius Geta turned the ſcale in favour of the Romans. He was ſuppoſed to have been taken priſoner; but havving forced his way through ſurrounding foes, he ſuddenly, wheeling about, fell upon the Britons in their rear. The unfortunate Britons now found themſelves attacked on every quarter; and though for a ſhort ſpace they ſtood firm, yet in the end Roman courage prevailed; and they were put to flight. However, ſuch was the obſtinacy of this well-maintained action, that Veſpatian himſelf muſt have been numbered among the ſlain, had not his ſon reſcued him when ſurrounded by the enemy, at the hazard of his own life. This victory was dearly purchaſed by the Romans; for, in all probability, another battle, fought with equal bravery, would have rendered all future attempts againſt the Britons ineffectual. Triumphal honours were decreed to Geta by the ſenate for his important ſervices, though ſeldom, if ever before, had an officer of his rank been honoured with ſuch high marks of diſtinction.

The Romans having thus defeated, but not ſubdued, Caractacus, he retreated along the banks of the Thames, which he croſſed near Greenwich, the loweſt place where it was fordable, and encamped in the marſhes on the north ſide. Plautius, with his army, followed the Britons, and having reached the banks of the Thames, his German troops ſwam over, while the reſt paſſed on a bridge erected at ſome diſtance above the ford, and ſurrounded the camp of the enemy, when they thought themſelves ſecure in a ſafe retreat. A ſecond engagement now enſued, in which they were again routed with great ſlaughter, and in the utmoſt confuſion repaſſed the Thames.

In this action Togodumnus, revered for his military talents, was ſlain; which raiſed ſuch a ſpirit of reſentment in the Britons, that Caractacus, collecting and re-inforcing the ſcattered remains of his army, encamped in face of the Romans, near the coaſt oppoſite to Gaul. Plautius, ſeeing the gathering ſtorm, thought it moſt prudent not to oppoſe, at preſent, the efforts of a deſperate enemy, driven to deſpair. He therefore declined an engagement, fortified his camp, and waited the arrival of the emperor, to whom he had diſpatched letters, requeſting him to repair to Britain, and finiſh in perſon the conqueſt of the iſland.

On receiving the letters from his general, Claudius intruſted the civil government in the hands of Vitilius, whom he had aſſociated with himſelf in the conſulſhip, and embarked at Actium for Marſeilles, from whence he proceeded by land to Bologne, at which port he took ſhipping for Britain, and landed at Sandwich, with a large army, after a ſafe paſſage.

A junction of the Roman forces under Plautius having been effected without oppoſition, Claudius now took upon him the command, and, advancing to Camelodunum, the capital of Cunobeline, now Malden in Eſſex, he inveſted that place, which he took with little difficulty. From hence he marched into Middleſex, where his preſence and ſucceſs ſtruck ſuch a terror, that the Belgic, and many other neighbouring provinces, made ready offers of ſubmiſſion: yet the natives in general retained their ancient love of liberty; the brave Caractacus ſtill kept in the field, at the head of the Caſſivellauni; truſting that the Romans, on the approach of winter, would retire to the continent.

The emperor, after an abſence of ſix months from his capital, and, as hiſtorians ſay, a campaign of ſixteen days only in Britain, quitted the iſland; where his moderation and liberality in the conquered provinces, had made ſuch an impreſſion on the Britons, that they erected a temple to his fame, and paid him honours next to divine. Nor were the Roman ſenators leſs ſenſible of his important ſervices, to which they thought no honours in their power adequate. They therefore decreed him a ſplendid triumph, and, what muſt be more flattering to his vanity, they beſtowed upon him the ſurname of Britannicus. Before his departure from Britain he left the management of the war to Plautius, who divided his army into two bodies; one of which he headed in perſon, and gave the command of the other to Flavius Veſpatian. The latter was ſent againſt the Belgic colonies, while the former oppoſed the original natives, who inhabited the inland parts of Britain.

A. D. 49. Soon afterwards Veſpatian made a rapid progreſs. The Belgic colonies followed the example of their countrymen, and ſubmitted as readily to Veſpatian as they had done before to Claudius. He penetrated, having paſſed almoſt inacceſſible hills and extenſive moraſſes, into Wilts, Dorſet, and Somerſetſhire. Theſe he reduced to Roman provinces, which he governed with ſuch wiſe regulation, that they ever after remained firm to his intereſt, and even furniſhed his army with ſoldiers to ſubdue the northern inhabitants. Having fixed garriſons in thoſe places he had conquered, he returned to Rome, where he was honoured with a triumph, by a decree of the ſenate.

On the other hand, Plautius had many more difficulties to encounter with than Veſpatian. He had to contend with Caractacus, that ſteady patriot and faithful undaunted friend to his country. This prince, nurſed in the lap of adverſity, had acquired by long experience, a large fund of military knowledge. He was rigorous without haughtineſs, brave without raſhneſs, judicious without oſtentation. He never engaged his enemies without ſecuring ſome advantages, and ſo fruitful in expedients, that he was generally ready for a ſecond engagement the day after he had ſuffered a defeat. Convinced of Roman ſuperiority in military diſcipline, he endeavoured, as much as poſſible, to avoid a general engagement; at the ſame time he watched every motion of the Romans with the greateſt attention, and ſeldom miſſed any opportunities that offered of ſurprizing their detachments. He reſiſted at the head of the Caſſivellauni alone, the whole power of the Romans in Britain. Plautius, however, notwithſtanding continually harraſſed by this vigilant chief, who cut off his convoys and ſtraggling parties, ſubdued the counties of Glouceſter, Oxford, Middleſex, Eſſex, and Hertfordſhire. He alſo reduced the Iſle of Wight to obedience, and diſcovered the Orkneys. Satisfied with theſe acquiſitions, and finding ſtill greater obſtacles to be ſurmounted, the Roman general having been recalled, repaired to Rome, and there received the reward due to his great merit. An ovation was decreed him; at which the emperor himſelf rode at his left hand, amidſt the loud acclamations of rejoicing citizens, both to and from the Capitol.

A. D. 50. Plautius was ſucceeded by Oſtorius Scapula, who, on his arrival in Britain, found Caractacus had made frequent inroads into thoſe diſtricts which had ſubmitted to the Roman power, and recovered great part of his territories. He therefore without delay collected thoſe troops that lay neareſt the places harraſſed by the Britons. This done, advancing by forced marches, he put them to flight; but knowing, from experience, that an enemy like the Britons could be kept no longer in ſubjection than while deprived of the means of reſiſtance, he diſarmed all the diſaffected, and placed a line of forts in advantageous ſituations, between the rivers Avon and Severn. Camelodunum he made a place of arms; and, about this period, London was made a trading colony; and all that part of Britain, between the ſea and the Thames, was thrown into the form of a Roman province, to which the name of Britannia prima was given.

From theſe repeated ſucceſſes of their invaders, the Britons apprehending the moſt terrible conſequences, began in general to be alarmed. The Iceni, inhabitants of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridge, who had formerly lived in friendſhip with the Romans, though as yet unſubdued by them, firſt took up thoſe arms which they diſdained to ſurrender. The confederacy becoming general, a place was appointed for a rendezvous, and a commodious ſpot marked out for a camp. This was environed with a rampart of earth, and acceſſible only by one narrow path which would not admit the approach of cavalry. The Roman general, without waiting for the flower of his legions, advanced againſt thoſe fortifications, and making a diſpoſition he thought moſt proper, attacked the Britons in their camp, who, after a moſt valiant reſiſtance, were forced to abandon the unequal conqueſt, and the Romans obtained a complete victory. This determined the fate of the Iceni, and their ſubjection fixed the fidelity of thoſe provinces, which began to fluctuate between the fear of Roman power, and the hopes of recovering that liberty which they had before enjoyed.

CHAPTER V.

Oſtorius, the Roman general, turns his arms againſt the Cangi and Brigantes, whom, after a brave oppoſition, he totally routs with great ſlaughter—The Brigantes, having joined the Silures, are determined, under the command of Caractacus, to make another ſtand againſt the invaders of their country. The battle between them and the Romans particularly deſcribed—The latter ſtorm their camp, and obtain, after a moſt obſtinate engagement, a complete victory—The ſpeech of Caractacus, when exhibited a public ſpectacle at Rome, before the emperor Claudius and Agrippina—The Britons become more formidable, and in ſeveral ſkirmiſhes defeat the Romans—Oſtorius dies with grief, and is ſucceeded by Didius—A civil conteſt breaks forth in Britain, occaſioned by the infamous conduct of Cartiſmandua, which produces an engagement between the Britons and Romans, to whom ſhe had fled for protection, and paves the way for a general revolt—Didius dying, Paulinus Suetonius, a celebrated general, is appointed by by Nero to ſupply his place. Suetonius adopts the moſt prudent meaſures to ſurmount the difficulties he had to encounter with—He lays waſte the iſle of Mona, now called Angleſey, the ancient ſeat of the Druids, and deſtroys every place dedicated to their religious worſhip—A general inſurrection of the Britons, cauſed by the infamous conduct of Catus Decianus towards the Britons in general, and particularly to Boadicea, widow of Praſatugus, king of the Iceni—She inſpires the Britons with ſentiments of revenge, and is appointed by them to the chief command—Camelodunum and Verulum are taken by ſtorm—The ninth legion, under Petilius Cerealis, are defeated with great ſlaughter—She enters London with her army, and deſtroys both the town and inhabitants with fire and ſword—Suetonius, in order to ſtop the further ravages of the Britons, determines to hazard a battle; an engagement enſues; the Romans obtain a complete victory; and Boadicea, diſappointed in her revenge, puts an end to her life—The Roman general ſullies his victory with wanton cruelties; on which account he is recalled, and Petronius Turpilianus ſucceeds him—The new governor, with his two ſucceſſors, tread in the paths of peace; and under the reigns of Vitellius, Galba, and Otho, Britain enjoys uninterrupted repoſe—Veſpatian confers the government of Britain on Julius Agricola. He conciliates the affections of the Britons; and by his prudent meaſures more than force, ſubdues the whole iſland—This effected, he makes an incurſion into Caledonia; penetrates far into the northern parts; and erects a chain of forts to ſecure his conqueſts—The emperor Titus confirms him in his government, and he makes a farther progreſs in Scotland—A battle between the Roman army and the Caledonians, under their intrepid and ſkilful general Galgacus; in which the latter, though much ſuperior in number and ſituation, was entirely routed with great ſlaughter—The emperor Adrian arrives in Britain, and for the ſecurity of the ſouthern provinces, raiſes a rampart of earth and wood from the mouth of the Tyne to Solway Frith—Antoninus Pius ſucceeds him, and builds another wall from the Frith of Dunbritton to that of Edinburgh—Severus arrives in the iſland. He marches through the country almoſt to the extremity of North Britain. Concludes a peace with the Caledonians. Dies at York, and aſſumes the title of Britannicus Maximus—Conſtantius by his prudent adminiſtration conciliates the affection of the Britons—His ſon Conſtantine the Great, who ſucceeded him, by treading in his father's ſteps, makes them a happy people. He openly declares himſelf a Chriſtian, and puts a final period to Pagan ſuperſtition. His diſtinguiſhed character—The Britons being harraſſed by the Saxons and Franks, Valentinian ſends Theodoſius into Britain, to ſtop their ravages. He reſtores tranquillity in the iſland—They are ſtill more diſtreſſed during the reign of Gratian, but are relieved by the arrival of Chryſanthus—The death of Theodoſius puts a period to their repoſe; about which time the Roman empire drew near to its diſſolution—Aleric the Goth, having ſacked Rome, occaſioned a recal of the legions from Britain—Valentinian III. after repeated ſolicitations from the Britons, ſends a ſingle legion to their aſſiſtance, which is recalled and another ſubſtituted in its room, under the command of Gallio; who quits the iſland, with whom departed alſo the power and dominion of the Romans in Britain—Concluſion of this chapter and the ſecond book, with a few remarks reſpecting the ſtate of the Britons under the Romans, the progreſs of literature, and the introduction of Chriſtianity into the iſland of Britain.

THIS important victory being obtained by Oſtorius over the Iceni, he erected a chain of forts to prevent the future incurſions of the Britons, and made Cogidunus, chief of the Dobuni, a denizen of Rome, by which prudent meaſure he ſecured in his intereſt a powerful and faithful ally. After which the Roman general marched againſt the Cangi, who had determined to defend their liberty to the laſt extremity. His endeavours to reduce them proved ſucceſsful; but he had hardly accompliſhed this hazardous undertaking, when, in the midſt of his devaſtations, a more formidable enemy required his preſence in another quarter. The Brigantes having revolted, had made a dreadful inroad into the Roman territories. He therefore advanced againſt them with haſty marches; but paſſing by Hatfield foreſt, the Britiſh forces, who there lay concealed, ruſhed out, and attacked the Roman army with their uſual fury. This firſt aſſault inſpired them with hope of certain victory. The Roman legions were thrown by it into diſorder. But thoſe brave veterans having recovered their ranks, ſoon checked the preſumption of the Brigantes, who, by neglecting to ſecure a retreat, were totally routed with great ſlaughter. However, though defeated, their martial ſpirit remained unconquered; for the ſcattered remains of their army were no ſooner collected, than they joined the Silures, and determined, under the command of Caractacus, to make another ſtand againſt the invaders of their country. The Romans revered the talents of this able commander, while the Britons, looking up to him as their deliverer, prepared to encounter Oſtorius with redoubled ardour and courage.

As Caractacus well knew how unequal a conteſt his countrymen maintained with the enemy, in the open field, he therefore endeavoured to gain poſſeſſion of inacceſſible poſts. With this view he politically transferred the ſeat of war from the county of the Silures, or South Wales, to that of the Ordovices, or North Wales, this abounding with craggy rocks and high mountains; which natural fortifications would enable him either to attack or annoy the enemy to the greateſt advantage. He therefore formed a camp on the ſummit of a mountain, waſhed by a river deep and rapid; and by way of adding to the natural ſtrength of this poſt, he fortified the bank of the river with ramparts of ſharp edged flints; and in this poſition he determined to wait the approach of the Roman army. As they drew near, Caractacus, addreſſing his troops with all the power of natural eloquence, conjured them to act like men in the approaching hour of combat. He told them the impending engagement would ſecure their independence and their valuable liberty, or reduce them to perpetual ſervitude. He reminded them of former injuries, and ſucceſsful efforts to redreſs them; of the bright examples of their intrepid anceſtors, who had driven the renowned Cæſar from Britain, and preferred death to a life of infamy, under the loſs of freedom. He invoked the ſhades of their valuable predeceſſors, imploring ſolemnly their preſence as ſpectators in this important day of trial, not omitting to enumerate the noble ſtruggles they have endured, to deliver them, their poſterity, from the griping hand of violence and oppreſſion.

A ſhout of general applauſe, at the concluſion of this ſpeech, pervaded the Britiſh camp, nor ſtopped till it reached the ear of Oſtorius. But though alarmed at theſe acclamations, they had no other effect than to make him adopt the moſt prudent meaſures for the event. He ſurveyed attentively the ſtrong poſition of the enemy. He ſaw at one view the difficulties to be ſurmounted were many; but notwithſtanding the nature of the country, and the reſolute behaviour of the Britons, which rendered the proſpect more gloomy, he relied with pleaſing hope on the tried valour of his legions, whoſe ardour to engage was ſcarcely to be repreſſed. Dangers, when the prize of victory is diſplayed, tend only to inflame a deſire of glory, and to augment courage in the boſoms of the brave. Oſtorius marked the eagerneſs of his troops, but would not ſuffer them to engage, till he had diſcovered a ford where, with the leaſt obſtruction, they might paſs the river.

Having

CARACTACUS, before the Emperor CLAUDIUS
at ROME.

Having given the ſignal for an attack, the Romans croſſed the ſtream, and aſſaulted the ramparts of the enemy with unſhaken firmneſs; which the Britons defended with equal bravery. The conteſt was long and bloody; and fortune ſeemed at firſt to ſide with the Britons; but Roman diſcipline prevailed; the ramparts were forced, and both armies came to a cloſe engagement. Victory was for a time at a loſs on which of the contending hoſts to beſtow her palm, till the Roman veterans removed her uncertainty. Covered with their heavy armour, the weapons of the Britons made little impreſſion, while death followed every blow they ſtruck. Caractacus, unable longer to ſupport the uneqal conflict, retreated to his camp on the ſummit of the mountain. The aſcent was ſteep, and the Britons diſputed every foot of ground like men regardleſs of deſtruction. But their efforts, though vigorous, were in vain. Death preſented himſelf to them on every ſide. The Romans had gained the ſummit. Slaughter enſued. Blood and devaſtation filled the Britiſh camp. Victory rode triumphant among the Roman legions, and delivered the ſtandard of Britiſh liberty into their hands.

This was indeed a day of carnage and deſolation: the ſlain were innumerable. Many perſons of diſtinction were taken priſoners, to decorate the vain ſhew of a Roman triumph; and among theſe, the compaſſionate eye of a feeling hiſtorian cannot but drop a tear while he numbers, the wife, daughter, and brothers, of the truly heroic Caractacus. Abaſhed, confounded, and diſtracted at this fatal overthrow, as a generous lion, terrified by his purſuers is driven into the toils, ſo did Caractacus inconſiderately fly for ſhelter to the ſtrumpet Cartiſmandua, queen of the Brigantes. She had a long time been a friend to the Romans, and at variance with her huſband Venutius, for the active part he had frequently taken in the defence of his country. Delighted therefore with the favourable opportunity of gratifying her revenge and obliging the Romans, ſhe baſely loaded Caractacus with chains, and delivered him into their hands. An action, which it is hoped, in all the records of future hiſtory, will be branded with the ſtrongeſt marks of infamy.

The military reputarion of this illuſtrious hero was well known at Rome. He had for many years ſupported that formidable confederacy, begun by Caſſivellaunus, and was eſteemed the moſt experienced among the Britiſh chiefs. We may reaſonably ſuppoſe then, that the capture of ſuch a priſoner would be received with univerſal joy, and that the Romans would wiſh to ſee exhibited as a public ſpectacle, a man whoſe military talents had frequently checked the flight of the Roman eagles. All the captives therefore were ſent to Rome, in order to gratify the general curioſity of the people. On the day appointed for this purpoſe the whole city attended; the prætorian guards were under arms, the emperor and empreſs, each being ſeated on a magnificent throne, adorned with the trophies of war. All eyes were intent on the proceſſion, which moved ſlowly on in the following order. The vaſſals and dependents of Caractacus walked firſt; after theſe proceeded the warlike ſpoils; which were followed by the general's family, whoſe flowing tears ſufficiently ſhewed, that their ſpirits were equally depreſſed with their fortunes. Very different was the manly deportment of the prave Caractacus. His ſteady countenance demonſtrated that his ſoul ſoared far above his preſent condition. His behaviour was collected and firm.

When he drew near the imperial throne, he boldly addreſſed Claudius in the following words, recorded by Tacitus, the Roman hiſtorian: "Had my moderation kept equal pace with my birth and fortune, I had entered this capital not as a captive but a friend. Nor wouldſt even thou, O Cæſar! have diſdained to rank in the number of thy friends, a prince deſcended from a long race of royal and illuſtrious anceſtors, and the commander of many nations. My preſent condition adds luſtre to your glory, though it reflects diſhonour upon me. I was once maſter of men and arms, of horſes and chariots of war, of riches and power. Can you wonder that I ſought to preſerve, and that I loſt them with regret? If the Romans are deſirous of univerſal empire, does it follow that all mankind ſhould tamely ſubmit to the yoke? Had the hand of perfidy ſooner betrayed me, I ſhould have been leſs diſtinguiſhed by misfortunes, and you by glory. Had I fallen in battle, both my name and fortune had been conſigned to oblivion. Puniſh me with death, and I ſhall ſoon be forgotten; ſuffer me to live, and the generous action will remain an eternal monument of your clemency." This ſpeech, delivered by ſo noble a captive, affected the whole audience. The mind of Claudius, naturally humane, melted into ſympathiſing pity; and felt the ſtrong impulſe of glowing generoſity. He ordered the chains of Caractacus and his family to be taken off in his preſence, while at the ſame time the famous Agrippina, congratulating them on the enjoyment of their liberty, received them with the tendereſt marks of kindneſs, and afterwards loaded them with favours. Such was the conduct of the generous Roman and the ſpirited Briton, both of whom may be ſaid juſtly to have a claim to the admiration of poſterity.

This victory was placed by the ſenate among the brighteſt periods of Roman glory, and they honoured Oſtorius, though abſent, with a triumph.

But the proſperity of the Roman general had now paſſed it's meridian ſplendour, while that of the Britons appeared to riſe with new luſture. The Romans, lulled into ſecurity by ſucceſs, grew indolent and careleſs. The Britons, taught by fatal experience the value of military diſcipline, became more formidable than ever. They fell upon the præfect and his legionary cohorts, who were left to erect forts in the country of the Silures, and would have cut them to pieces, had not a reinforcement arrived in time from the neighbouring garriſons. The præfect himſelf, with eight centurions, and a great number of privates, were among the ſlain. Soon after they routed a foraging party, with ſome ſquadrons ſent to it's ſupport. They were purſuing their advantages, when Oſtorius ſent out his cohorts to ſtop their progreſs. Their endeavours proving unſucceſsful, he was obliged to draw forth the whole of his legions. Even theſe were no longer invincible. The Britons attacked them fiercely, and maintained the battle till night, when they retired with very little loſs on their ſide.

After theſe ſucceſſes, innumerable ſkirmiſhes took place, which now became frequent all over the face of the country, in woodlands, in fens, as chance or choice, temerity or precaution, reſentment or avarice, directed; ſometimes with, ſometimes without the orders of their reſpective leaders. Two cohorts of auxiliaries, ſent out by rapacious officers, not taking neceſſary precautions, were cut to pieces while ravaging the country, whoſe ſpoils the Britons diſtributed among the inhabitants of the neighbouring ſtates; and this generous conduct paved the way for a general revolt. So many unfavourable and ſucceſſive occurrences could not fail affecting Oſtorius Scapula, now doubly depreſſed by a weight of years and a load of afflictions. To the laſt he fell a martyr: and died with grief, for not being able to terminate a war he had begun ſucceſsfully.

A. D. 53.

This able general's demiſe was conſidered by the Britons as a happy preſage of returning independence. They diſplayed again the ſtandard of liberty, and were determined to hazard a battle with the invaders of their country. Manlius Valens took the command of the Roman forces till the arrival of Aulus Didius, who was appointed by the emperor to ſucceed Oſtorius. But before he could reach his government, an engagement had taken place between the two armies, in which the Romans were defeated; and the Britons, fluſhed with ſucceſs, had penetrated into Britannia prima; whereby their legionary troops were diſpirited, and their auxiliaries thrown into great conſternation. Didius, on his arrival, found ſufficient reaſons to reprehend Manlius, and exerted his utmoſt endeavours to recover the loſſes ſuſtained by the imprudent conduct of that general. By his abilities and application, though unequal to the taſk he was ſent to perform, this Roman proprætor put a ſtop to the victories of the Silures, or people of South Wales.

Claudius, dying about this time, was ſucceeded in the imperial throne by Nero, a prince whoſe luſt, avarice, and cowardice, rendered him averſe to military exploits; but the people conſidered Britain as one of the faireſt jewels in the Roman diadem; and Nero thought it prudent to tread in the ſteps of Claudius, whoſe memory he highly reſpected. A kind of civil war alſo broke out in Britain, occaſioned by Cartiſmandua, queen in a province of the Brigantes, that infamous betrayer of Caractacus, having taken to her polluted bed Volocatus, one of her menial ſervants. She likewiſe put to death the brother and kinſman of her huſband. Exaſperated at ſuch ſhocking injuries, Venutius excited the reſentment of the neighbouring ſtates againſt her. They received his pointed repreſentations with all the marks of horror; and determined to puniſh the baſe Cartiſmandua in an exemplary manner. The Silures and Brigantes joined the confederacy, and bound themſelves by the moſt ſolemn acts of their religion, either to take ample vengeance on the betrayer of their country, or periſh.

Cartiſmandua now experienced ſome of thoſe conſequences that ever attend a gratification of lawleſs paſſions. Deſerted by her friends, hated by her ſubjects, expoſed to the fury of an enraged people, ſhe had no choice left but that of flying for ſuccour to the enemies of her country, who readily received her with much more kindneſs and reſpect than her licentious character merited. The Britons immediately purſued her to this friendly aſylum, and the Romans marched out to meet them. An obſtinate engagement enſued, the field of battle was covered with ſlain, and Cartiſmandua was with difficulty preſerved from falling into the hands of an incenſed people.

We may juſtly conclude, that this battle not a little tarniſhed the military honours of the Romans; for we find Venutius ſeized upon all the dominions of Cartiſmandua; and the confederates, exaſperated at the protection given her by the Romans, reſolved unanimouſly to exterminate or expel thoſe bold intruders. Didius, who was very old and infirm, intruſted the command of the army, whom he could not head in perſon, to generals much inferior in merit. He ſaw with extreme grief the ſudden reverſe of his fortune, and fell a victim to the complicated attacks of diſeaſe and vexation. When an account of his death reached Rome, Paulinns Suetonius, a celebrated general, was appointed to ſupply his place. A leader of his abilities was much wanted in Britain, and the Romans cheriſhed the moſt flattering expectations from his military talents. Nor were they deceived by a falſe hope, for this great commander took the moſt prudent meaſures to ſurmount the difficulties he knew he had to encounter with.

A. D. 61.

The greater part of the Roman army was encamped in the country of the Ordovices, near the ſtreight which ſeparates the iſland of Mona, now called Angleſey, from the coaſt of North Wales. This iſland was well peopled, and the place where the Druids had fixed their reſidence. Suetonius determined to deſtroy their ſeat of ſuperſtition, conceiving that while the Britons were under the influence of their inſtructions, it was in vain to think of reducing them by force to obedience. Mona therefore muſt be laid waſte, and the Druids extirpated, in order to pave a way for Roman ambition to triumph over Britiſh liberty. Suetonius perceiving that the arm of the ſea, which divides Mona from the adjacent coaſt, could not be forded by his infantry, collected a ſufficient number of boats for tranſporting the legions, while the horſe croſſed the ſtreight. As he drew near, he found the ſhore lined with the natives to oppoſe him; but being drawn up at ſome diſtance, he landed with very little oppoſition.

A ſcene now preſented itſelf which ſtruck the Romans with a ſuperſtitious horror; as the Britons advanced, they beheld their women running up and down their ranks with diſhevelled hair, like ſo many furies, having flaming torches in their hands, and making diſmal lamentations; while at the ſame time the Druids, who were intermixed with them, invoked heaven, pouring forth the moſt horrid execrations, and calling down the vengeance of the gods upon the enemies of their religion. This unuſual ſight, with the horrid yellings with which it was accompanied, transfixed for a time the Roman legions motionleſs. Suetonius ſeeing their conſternation and how much they were expoſed to the arrows of the Britons, flew from rank to rank, and endeavoured to rouſe his ſoldiers to action. At length animated by exhortations of their general, they attacked and ſoon routed the confuſed multitude that had made a ſhew of oppoſition, driving them, their prieſts and women into their woods, with a terrible ſlaughter.

Being by this defeat maſter of the iſland, Suetonius deſtroyed every place dedicated to ſuperſtitious worſhip. He overturned their altars that had often been ſtained with human blood, cut down their magical woods, demoliſhed their myſterious groves, burnt their prieſts in thoſe fires that had been lighted for the ſacrifice of Roman priſoners, and by theſe acts of cruel ſeverity put an effectual ſtop to Druidiſm. He then ordered forts to be erected, and left a garriſon ſufficient to ſecure this new conqueſt. But while thus employed, his attention was required to the interior provinces, where a general revolt ſeemed impending; excited by oppreſſive taxes laid on the Britons, and the avarice, injuſtice, and brutality of the Roman procurator Catus Decianus.

The king of the Iceni, Praſatugus, having no ſon to inherit his immenſe treaſures, bequeathed them to the emperor, making Nero co-heir with his two daughters, hoping by that means to procure a powerful protector for his children. But he was fatally deceived, for the abominable vices of Nero had long made him a ſtranger to juſtice, gratitude, and humanity; and his officers copying too cloſely his example, were guilty of the moſt ſhocking acts of brutality, that luſt could dictate, or avarice perpetrate. Catus Decianus, a man of infamous character was ſent into Britain as procurator, or ſuperintendant of the finances. Claudius had remitted the confiſcation of the eſtates of thoſe Britons who had withſtood his power, but Decianus eſtabliſhed a court of reſumption, by which he adjudged ſuch eſtates as had been forfeited to the imperial treaſury.

In vain the oppreſſed Britons remonſtrated; the procurator, a ſecond Nero, not only diſregarded their complaints and diſtreſſes, but, under pretence of acting as guardian to the daughters of the deceaſed Praſatugus, rapaciouſly ſeized the whole of his kingdom, pillaged his palace, ordered his widow, upon exclaiming againſt his iniquitous proceedings, to be publicly ſcourged, and even commanded ſome of his licentious centurions to violate the chaſtity of her two daughters. Fired by ſuch inhuman barbarity, and ſuch vile indignity offered to the widow and daughters of their king, the Iceni, already ripe for a revolt, had recourſe to arms, and were joined by the Trinobantes, under the command of Venutius.

Other neighbouring ſtates alſo united with them, who could not behold ſuch glaring inſtances of Roman cruelty without deteſtation. Determined therefore to pour vengeance on their oppreſſors, they bound themſelves in the moſt ſolemn manner to revenge their country's wrongs, or to periſh in the glorious attempt. Boadicea having been appointed head of her allies, and who inherited the ſpirit of her anceſtors, inſpired them with ſentiments of revenge, by painting in the moſt ſtriking colours the unjuſt injuries received by herſelf and family. The Britons felt the force of her eloquence, and waited with impatient deſire of pouring on the heads of her inhuman enemies the deſtruction they deſerved.

Camelodunum was the firſt place that felt their vengeance. This place was taken by ſtorm. Blood and ſlaughter enſued, and the inhabitants experienced every torture an exaſperated enemy could deviſe.

Boadicea retaliated on the Roman women the ſame kind of injuries done to herſelf and daughters. The garriſon retired to the temple of Claudius, vainly imagining, that a ſtructure devoted to religious purpoſes would have been a ſufficient defence againſt the ſwords of the victors; but they ſhould have conſidered Mona was then laid waſte and her ſacred groves deſtroyed; ſo that religious fury, in the breaſt of the Britons, being added to a ſenſe of civil wrongs, not pity herſelf could reſtrain their rage; they forced the temple, laid the edifice in aſhes, which its ſanctity could not protect, and put every Roman in it to the ſword. Elated with this ſucceſs, they continued marking their footſteps with devaſtation wherever they came. Petilius Cerealis marched with the ninth legion to ſtop their ravages. The Britons advanced to meet them, and, after an obſtinate conflict, all the infantry were cut to pieces, and the horſe only eſcaped, with whom Cerealis fled to his fortified camp for refuge.

No ſooner was Suetonius informed of theſe events, than he made the greateſt expedition to reach London; but finding it impoſſible to defend it with his little army againſt the numerous army of the Britons, he withdrew to the Surry ſide, upon which Boadicea, entering London, deſtroyed both town and inhabitants with fire and ſword. The city of Verulum ſhared the ſame fate, and it is ſaid the Britons, both places included, put to death more than eighty thouſand perſons, ſparing neither age, ſex, nor rank among them.

The Roman general, in order to put a ſtop to theſe depredations, determined to hazard a battle. This being reſolved on, he choſe an advantageous poſt, where his forces, amounting only to ten thouſand, would have it in their power to ſuſtain the fury of the firſt attack. Accordingly, having reconnoitred the country, he fixed upon a ſpot of ground, acceſſible only by a narrow defile, having an open plain in front, and a large wood in his rear. He now placed his legionary troops in the centre, the light armed on each ſide, and his cavalry on the wings. In this poſition and order of battle, he waited the approach of an incenſed heroine, and prepared to receive the aſſault of the enraged Britons, or to attack them, as circumſtances might render expedient.

Suetonius did not wait long for the enemy. The Britons, hoping by one deciſive blow to exterminate the whole power of the Romans, haſtened to the attack. Boadicea led them into the plain, in the front of the Roman army. In this inſtance preſumption effected what military pudence might have prevented. Relying upon the number of their forces, no leſs than two hundred and thirty thouſand men, they did not entertain a doubt of obtaining a complete victory; and deluded by this vain confidence, they brought their wives and children with them into the field, that they might be ſpectators of the battle, and aſſiſt them in plundering the invadors of their country. Theſe being placed in waggons poſted in their rear, rendered a retreat extremely difficult.

The appearance of the Britons in ſuch numbers aſtoniſhed the Romans. At their head ſtood Boadicea in her chariot with her two daughters. She was dreſſed in a looſe-bodied gown, with a ſpear in her hand, and a hare in her boſom, which, at the end of her harangue, ſhe let ſlip as an omen of ſucceſs. In her perſon ſhe was tall and robuſt. Her face comely and full of dignity. Her complexion was fair, and her yellow treſſes flowed below her waiſt. Addreſſing herſelf to the army, ſhe repreſented with the moſt powerful eloquence, and in the moſt pathetic manner, the inhuman inſults which, without provocation, ſhe had received; "But, added ſhe, the deſire of revenging mine own injuries, how great ſoever, is the leaſt motive that induced me to attack thoſe tyrants of the world. It is the univerſal ſlavery that is preparing, the chains that are forging for my brave and numerous people, that have rouſed me to vengeance. I have taken the field to defend the liberties of my country; but if there be any here who prefer the yoke of ſlavery to freedom; who can tamely behold their wives and daughters raviſhed, and ſtoop ſo low as to kiſs the feet of an inſolent maſter, they will do well to depart. For myſelf, I am abſolutely determined to conquer or periſh." A general ſhout of applauſe reſounded through the ranks of the Britiſh army. The ſignal for engaging was diſplayed, and the army ruſhed to the charge with their accuſtomed fury.

On the firſt onſet the Britons ſeemed rather to court than decline deſtruction, but their moſt vigorous exertions could not diſorder or break the Roman ranks. The legionary ſoldiers now ſallied out into the open plain upon the enemy, and were followed by their auxiliaries. They charged the Britons with irreſiſtible intrepidity, and bore down all oppoſition. Yet victory was doubtful, till the field of battle was covered with the ſlain. At length the Roman diſcipline prevailed, and the Britons were routed with incredible ſlaughter. Eighty thouſand of them were killed, whereas of the Romans not more than four hundred were ſlain, and as many wounded. The unfortunate Boadicea, ſeeing her revenge diſappointed, and her hopes fruſtrated, by the defeat of her army, put an end to her life by poiſon. Some writers are of opinion that the place where this battle was fought, was Saliſbury plain, and that Stonehenge was erected a monument to commemorate the heroiſm of Boadicea; others think the important conteſt was decided in a large open ſpace, which are now the fields between Hamſtead, Highgate, and London, near the center of which, about a mile and a half north of Clerkenwell, is a ſmall projecting bank, which is yet called Boadicea's camp, by ſome writers.

Without we conſider the complexion of the times, and what an inhuman man-monſter was then reigning emperor, Suetonius might be ſaid to have purſued his conqueſts with a cruelty unaccountable in ſo great a man. Not a Briton received quarter. Even defenceleſs women and children were put to death; whole diſtricts were laid waſte with fire and ſword; towns and villages were reduced to aſhes; and the Britons having neglected to raiſe corn for themſelves, by imagining the Roman magazines certain plunder, a famine cloſed theſe ſcenes of diſtreſs, and almoſt depopulated thoſe parts of the iſland the ſword had ſpared. Yet notwithſtanding theſe accumulated miſeries, though deprived of cattle, bread, habitations, and friends, they refuſed to ſue for peace, reſolving rather to periſh than make the leaſt ſubmiſſion. This inflexible obſtinacy, Julius Claſſicanus, who ſucceeded Decianus in the office of procurator, attributed to its true cauſe, namely, the haughtineſs and ſeverity of Suetonius; in conſequence of which he wrote to the emperor of Rome, informing him, that an end could not be expected to Britiſh reſentment, unleſs Suetonius was recalled. His letter had its proper weight at Rome, to which he was ordered to repair, and Petronius Turpilianus was ſent to ſucced him in the command.

A. D. 62. This new governor purſued a way very different from that of his predeceſſor. He was humane, gentle, and, during the whole time of his command, permitted the Britons to enjoy unmoleſted repoſe, ſo that he accompliſhed eaſily, by moderation, what military ſeverities could not effect. The Iceni, and other revolted provinces, re-acknowledged the Roman juriſdiction. The Britons, in general, forgot their wrongs. Their rage abated, plentiful harveſts adorned their fields, and peace once more extended her olive-branch over a deſolated country. After having reſided in Britain three years, he returned to Rome. Triumphal honours were decreed him; experience having taught the Romans, that lenity and mildneſs were more likely to ſubdue the Britons, than tyranny and military executions.

A. D. 65. He was ſucceeded by Trebellius Maximus, whoſe inactive diſpoſition, avarice, and want of experience, cauſed an inſurrection among his ſoldiers, which broke out into tumults, and being encouraged by Roſcius Cælius, they deſerted, and compelled him to ſeek his ſafety by flight.

The emperor, with whoſe name it is ſufficient to have ſullied one page of our hiſtory, about this time put an end to his life with his own deteſted hands; and during the ſucceeding ſhort reigns of Vitellius, Galba, and Otho, Britain enjoyed an uninterrupted calm of tranquillity. Vitellius appointed Vectius Bolanus to the government of Britain; and on the demiſe of Vitellius, his ſucceſſor Veſpatian gave the command to Petilius Cerealis. This brave general conquered the Brigantes, whoſe country extended from Solway-Frith to Cheſhire, and from the Tyne to the Humber; and Julius Frontinus who ſucceeded him ſubdued the Silures, who inhabited Wales.

A. D. 78. At length, to Julius Agricola was reſerved the honour of ſubjugating the Britons. The tranſactions of this great general and conſummate ſtateſman, are ſuccinctly related by Tacitus, his ſon-in-law, one of the moſt elegant writers, and without exception, the beſt hiſtorian that any age or nation ever produced. His authority, therefore, we propoſe to follow, as being, in our opinion, ſuperior to all others. Agricola had ſerved under Suetonius with great reputation. Previous to his arrival in Britain, the Ordovices, inhabitants of North Wales, had cut off a body of Roman horſe ſtationed on their frontiers. Agricola, though the ſummer was far advanced, reſolved to check this inſurrection in its infancy, which portended dangerous conſequences. He accordingly aſſembled the legions and auxiliaries, though diſperſed in different parts of the country, and with the utmoſt expedition marched againſt the Ordovices. Their rocks and mountains were no effectual bars againſt ſuch an experienced commander. He routed them on plains, drove them from precipices, and purſued through places deemed inacceſſible. Harraſſed in every part, and unable to remain in any place of ſafety, they ſubmitted to the Roman governor, and embraced the conditions his clemency held out to them.

The winter being over, Agricola began the operations which he had planned for completely reducing the iſle of Angleſey; an undertaking which Suetonius, when recalled, had left unfiniſhed. This he effected with great reputation to himſelf; and then returning to the ſouthern provinces, he made it his chief ſtudy, during winter, to gain a perfect knowledge of the tempers and diſpoſitions of the Britons, whereby he might put in practice the moſt likely means to conciliate their affections. His endeavours to this end were crowned with ſucceſs. He began his civil adminiſtration with acts of clemency, without relaxing in the diſtribution of juſtice. He was particularly careful to reform thoſe abuſes that had crept into the army, and to reſtrain the licentiouſneſs of his troops, that no freſh cauſe of diſpute might ariſe from their inſolence and oppreſſion. He was an enemy to every ſpecies of corruption. Severe, but not cruel; affable, without receding from his dignity. No griping extortion or rigour were employed in collecting the tribute; no iniquitous impoſitions were ſuffered; and in all his public acts, he endeavoured to give the leaſt diſſatisfaction poſſible to the people in general. By thus holding the reigns of government with an equal hand, he made himſelf beloved by all parties, both of Britons and Romans. The latter cheriſhed a real attachment to his perſon, and the firſt revered him as a parent and a friend.

Finding ſome of the provinces ſtill refuſing obedience to the Roman power, particularly the Medini, inhabitants of Northumberland, Agricola took the field the enſuing ſpring, and compelled them to ſubmiſſion. By the ſword in one hand, and the olive-branch in the other, he prevailed upon ſeveral capital cities to receive Roman garriſons; and by degrees, with the lenient art of perſuaſion more than force, he ſubdued the whole iſland to obedience.

At the end of the campaign, returning to his head-quarters in the ſouth, he purſued throughout the winter his former ſyſtem of politics. He erected temples, courts of judicature, and other public ſtructures. He endouraged the building of private houſes, and eſtabliſhed ſchools and ſeminaries. The Britons, in time, became fond of the arts and manners of the Romans. They cultivated the Roman language; put on the Roman habit, and imbibed greedily Roman luxuries: till at length their natural ſimplicity, together with the very remembrance of their former independence, was buried with their freedom, in the grave of diſſipation, the bane of every virtue.

Agricola, in the following ſummer, made an incurſion into Scotland, then called Caledonia, wherein he penetrated to the Frith of the river Tay. Here he erected a chain of forts to ſecure his conqueſt. Theſe were well ſupplied with proviſions, and a brave intrepid garriſon. It is ſaid, they were conſtructed with ſo much art, and ſo advantageouſly ſituated, that not one of them was either forced, ſurrendered, or quitted as untenable, during his reſidence among the Britons.

A. D. 81. Titus, having ſucceeded Veſpatian as emperor, confirmed Agricola in his government; who early in the ſpring proceeded in his operations, and led his army northward of the forts he had erected, having in his route ſubdued ſeveral of the ſmaller tribes. In the year following he coaſted along the country, ſaw the coaſt of Ireland, and formed a plan for it's invaſion; but this deſign, by the death of Titus, was never executed. He ſpent the concluſion of this campaign in ſecuring his conqueſts, by building a chain of forts acroſs the neck of land lying between the Friths of Clyde and Forth, by which all communication was cut off between the Britons and Romans.

A. D. 83. The brave and politic Roman general, in this year of his command, marched beyond Badotria, or the Frith of Forth. During his march, which extended through Perthſhire and Fife, his fleet coaſted the ſhore, which appeared alarming beyond expreſſion to the inhabitants living near the ſea. At this time Galgacus was king of the Caledonian Britons, a prince admired for his military talents. He had been educated in the ſouthern part of Britain, ſerved under the Romans, and was well acquainted with their manner of fighting. Knowing the ſuperior advantages that attend acting upon the offenſive, he reſolved to attack the Roman forts erected between the Forth and Clyde, without waiting till the enemy ſhould carry fire and ſword into the heart of his country. This ſudden movement of Galgacus, with exaggerated accounts of the number of his forces, having been reported to the Roman officers, they adviſed their general to retreat; but Agricola, ſenſible of the effect ſuch a ſtep muſt produce, reſolved to face the enemy, but adopted every prudent precaution his preſent critical ſituation required. He ſaw the danger of keeping his troops in one body, to oppoſe a numerous, active enemy, who might ſurround him, and cut off his proviſions. In order, therefore, to avoid the fate of periſhing by famine, he divided his forces into three bodies.

Galgacus no ſooner perceived this, than he fell ſuddenly upon the weakeſt diviſion of the Romans, and, having cut to pieces the advanced guard, poured like a deluge into their camp. The ſuddenneſs of this attack filled the legionary ſoldiers with aſtoniſhment, which was greatly heightened by its having been made in a dark and tempeſtuous night. Fortunately for them, Agricola having been informed by ſpies of the enemies deſign, diſpatched a reinforcement of light armed infantry to their aſſiſtance; who when they reached the camp gave a general ſhout, which intimidated the enemy, and animated with returning vigour the deſpairing legion. Thus timely ſupported, the whole body fell with fury upon the Caledonians, who, unable to reſiſt the charge, betook themſelves to flight, and retreated to their ſtrong holds, whither the Romans did not think it prudent to purſue them. This defeat, inſtead of quelling, rouſed in their boſoms the ſpirit of liberty, which diffuſed itſelf through the whole country. A general aſſociation was entered into, and an army far more numerous was raiſed; but before they were ready to take the field, the ſeaſon was too far advanced to attempt a deciſion of the great conteſt depending.

A. D. 84. The Britons having, early in the ſpring, collected their forces, and ſecured their wives and children in places of ſafety, they waited for the Romans at the foot of the Grampian hills. The Romans were impatient to appear in the field of action. They called on their general to lead them into Caledonia, aſſuring him of their readineſs to undergo every fatigue, and face every danger. Agricola, pleaſed with their martial ardour, ſent his fleet before him, with orders to alarm and harraſs the enemy; while he himſelf advanced againſt the Caledonian army, which conſiſted of thirty thouſand men, headed by Galgacus.

Upon the approach of the Romans, this intrepid chief harangued his troops in theſe words: "When I conſider the cauſe of this war, and the preſent criſis, I have reaſon to preſume, that the future happineſs and freedom of the whole iſland will date their birth from this important day. For we are the moſt valiant remains of the Britons, ſeated in the remoteſt regions, beyond the ken of thoſe nations enſlaved by the enemy; ſo that our eyes are yet unpolluted, and free from the contagion of foreign tyranny; and this ſecret receſs, unknown to fame, has hitherto preſerved us in all the bleſſings of liberty. Beyond us is no nation, nothing but waves and rocks; and on that ſide, nothing but bondage and ſlavery, which is to be expected from the Romans, a people inſatiable in their luſts, and unbounded in their ambition. Thoſe robbers of the world, and ravagers of the univerſe, now the exhauſted continent can no more furniſh their rapines, endeavour to rifle the wide ſeas and ocean. Where they meet with opulent enemies, their cruelty proceeds from avarice; when with poor, it riſes from ambition. The eaſt and weſt, vaſt as they are, cannot ſatiate their voracious minds. They, and they alone, with equal greedineſs, graſp at the riches and poverty of all nations. Devaſtations, murders, and extirpations, paſs with them under the falſe names of empire and government; and they boaſt of eſtabliſhing peace in thoſe provinces they have rendered deſolate. Our goods are their tribute; our corn their proviſions; and our bodies their tools for all kinds of drudgery: and if the modeſty of our wives and daughters has preſerved them from open violence when they were enemies, it cannot ſecure them from their laſcivious friendſhips now they are gueſts.

"Other ſlaves, whom nature and fortune have deſtined to ſervitude, are nouriſhed by their maſters; but the Britons alone purchaſe their own bondage, and maintain and ſupport their oppreſſors. Were our enemies' courage in war equal to their debaucheries in peace, we might juſtly dread their arms; but their glory is all owing to our diſſentions. Our union will diſperſe their forces, that are gathered out of many nations, ſo that one miſcarriage of theirs will diſſolve their whole power. In fine, there you ſee tribute and ſlavery, here death or liberty. Therefore, let the glory of our anceſtors, and the fate of our poſterity be well conſidered by us."

Had this animated ſpeech been delivered to any other than undiſciplined troops, it might have had the deſired effect, that of ſecuring a victory. But in thoſe to whom it was addreſſed, it only excited a ſhort-lived tranſitory fury, which was productive of a hideous ſhouting, cuſtomary with all barbarous nations before they begin an engagement. It was alſo a cuſtom among the Romans for their generals to harangue them, previous to a battle; nor did Agricola omit this neceſſary formality, but endeavoured, with all the powers of Roman eloquence, to inſpire his ſoldiers with courage.

The forces of Galgacus were drawn up on the declivity of a mountain, by which their whole number was to be ſeen at one view, and exhibited a very formidable appearance. Agricola formed his army in two lines. The firſt conſiſted of eight thouſand auxiliary foot, and three thouſand horſe forming the wings. The ſecond was wholly formed of Roman legions. Both armies waited for the ſignal to engage with great impatience. It being given, a flight of arrows was diſcharged on both ſides, and the battle began with inexpreſſible fury. The conteſt was obſtinately maintained, with dubious ſucceſs. For ſome time the god of war ſeemed to favour Galgacus, and the Caledonians appeared to have the advantage; which Agricola perceiving, he quitted his horſe, and at the head of three Batavian, and two Tungrian cohorts, advanced to a cloſe engagement.

This attack turned the ſcale of victory; for by cloſing with the enemy, and engaging them ſword in hand, their javelins, which they could dart with great dexterity, were rendered uſeleſs. But what contributed chiefly to the rout that immediately enſued, was the ready ſupport which the whole Roman army afforded their general, who, following his intrepid example, forced the Caledonian cavalry to fall back on their foot, by which a confuſed intermixture of forces followed: and the ranks being too thick, and the ground too uneven for them to do much execution, numbers were borne down by the weight of their own horſes, and many of their chariots being without drivers, contributed, with other unfortunate circumſtances, to put the whole army into irreparable diſorder. In the mean time, the Caledonian foot that had been poſted at the top of the hill, wheeled round during the heat of the action, in order to flank the Romans, and attack them in their rear. But they were oppoſed by four ſquadrons of horſe, which Agricola had reſerved to fruſtrate any attempt of that kind. Thus diſappointed, and unable to ſtand the furious aſſault of the legionary forces, the Caledonians gave way on every ſide.

Galgacus in vain attempted to rally his forces, and lead them once more againſt their enemies; it was impoſſible to be effected; they fled towards the woods, and were followed by the Romans in ſome diſorder; which Agricola ſeeing, he ordered a ſtrong body of light armed infantry to ſcour the woods. This entirely diſconcerted all the meaſures of the Caledonians, who hoped the enemy would have purſued them in ſtraggling parties, whereby they might have had ſome favourable opportunities of cutting them off. But Agricola's forces advancing in compact bodies, drove them from the woods, and compelled them to ſeek for ſhelter in the inacceſſible parts of the mountains. The carnage was very great. Ten thouſand Caledonians fell in this fatal battle, when not more than three hundred and fifty of the Roman army were ſlain. The ſcene of ſavage brutality that followed, is almoſt too ſhocking for humanity to relate or read. Driven to deſpair, and dreading captivity more than death, the Caledonians ſet fire to their huts, and even maſſacred their wives and children, that they might not fall into the hands of, in their opinion, more ſavage Romans. Oh, can the tears of melting pity refrain from flowing, over ſuch bleeding ſacrifices to unfeeling ambition, and the inſatiable deſire of conqueſt and dominion!

A. D. 85. It appears, this victory was not leſs fatal to Agricola, than to the Caledonians; for the infamous Domitian became jealous of the reputation of his general, and his ſucceſſes were the cauſe of his diſgrace. He was recalled, under pretence of being promoted to the government of Syria. On his arrival at Rome, triumphal honours, and a ſtatue crowned with laurel, were decreed him by the ſenate. But he lived a very ſhort time to enjoy the juſt reward of his merit; for corroding envy had gained admiſſion into the breaſt of the ſordid emperor, nor would the military fame of Agricola ſuffer him to reſt, till he had found means to diſpatch him by poiſon. Thus fell this celebrated governor of Britain, deſerving of the higheſt honours conſidered as a general, a civil magiſtrate, or a proprætor. His talents were great, his judgment ſound, his memory tenacious. He was fruitful in reſources, and intrepid in danger; a friend to merit, and an implacable enemy to extortion. A. D. 87. He was ſucceeded by Salluſtius Lucullus, who likewiſe fell a victim to the emperor's jealouſy.

About this time the Caledonians, having collected their ſcattered forces, attacked the Romans with ſome ſucceſs. They even took ſeveral of the forts erected on the iſthmus, between the Forth and Clyde. A. D. 111. Julius Severus was ſent to quell an inſurrection of the northern people; but was recalled before he could lead his forces againſt the enemy. In his abſence, the Caledonians continued their inroads, and in a battle between them and Lucius Antoninus the Romans were defeated, and Lucius himſelf was wounded in a dangerous manner.

A. D. 120. At this time, an irruption, attended with great ſucceſs, required the immediate preſence of an able general. Priſcus Luſcinus was therefore ſent into Britain, and ſoon after followed by the emperor Adrian in perſon. On his arrival he marched into Scotland, and having proceeded to the forts erected by Agricola, he found no enemy to encounter with; for the Caledonians had retired upon his approach, to their faſtneſſes in the mountainous part of the country. He therefore ſet about providing for the future ſecurity of the Roman provinces. To this end, and to prevent futute incurſions of the enemy, he raiſed a rampart of wood and earth, covered with turf, above eighty miles acroſs the country from eaſt to weſt, from the mouth of the Tyne to Solway Frith; and for ſtill greater ſecurity to the ſouthern provinces, he placed garriſons at proper diſtances, along the whole line. Having thus provided for their ſafety, and alſo reformed ſeveral abuſes that had crept into the government under the command of Agricola, he returned to Rome, where he was complimented by his ſycophants with the title of reſtorer of Britain; which was added to his other honorary diſtinctions, and ſtamped upon his coins.

A. D. 138. On the death of Adrian, Antoninus Pius ſucceeded to the empire, and the year following the northern inſurgents demoliſhed ſeveral parts of their boundary; but they were interrupted in their progreſs by his lieutenant Lollius Urbicus, who compelled them to retire; and to prevent, if poſſible, future incurſions, he built another wall of ſtone, covered with turf, from the Frith of Dunbritton to that of Edinburgh. From this period to the death of Marcus Aurelius, nothing material occurred. To Britain it was an interval of peace; nor did the northern people renew their depredation, the garriſons having been every where well ſupplied with proviſions, and the ſoldiers relieved at proper ſeaſons.

A. D. 180. Commodus, on the death of his father Aurelius, aſſumed the purple; which he had no ſooner done, than his criminal exceſſes rendered him an object of deteſtation at Rome, and contemptible in Britain. The Caledonians judged this a favourable opportunity for expelling their invaders from the bounds of their territories. They aſſembled a ſtrong body of forces who made a breach in the wall of Antoninus, ſtormed an adjacent fort, and put the garriſon to the ſword. Intelligence of this event having been received at Rome, Ulpius Marcellus, a commander of great military experience, was ſent to ſuppreſs the inſurrection in North Britain, where he began his operations with ſucceſs, and finiſhed them with judgment, by reviving the diſcipline of his army, puniſhing the revolters, and reducing affairs to their former channel; for which important ſervices to the ſtate, he was treated in a moſt ignominious manner by a puſillanimous emperor, who, when he could not proceed to greater extremes, deprived him of his government and command.

After the drparture of Marcellus, a mutiny broke out in the Roman army, who renounced openly their allegiance to Commodus. To quell this commotion, the emperor ſent Perennes, his favourite, into Britain; who by his imprudent adminiſtration in removing veteran officers, and treating the ſoldiers with rigorous ſeverity, increaſed the general diſcontent, inſomuch that they deputed fifteen hundred from the army to accuſe Perennes of high treaſon. Commodus pretended to believe their allegations; and in order to divert the ſtorm from himſelf, delivered his favourite up to the enraged ſoldiery, who immediately ſeized upon the victim, whom they ſacrificed to their reſentment.

Pertinax (aftewards emperor) being appointed to the government of Britain, he brought, after having ſurmounted many difficulties, the mutineers to ſubjection, and reſtored tranquillity to the province. However, the neceſſary ſeverities he was obliged to have recourſe to in this attempt, excited ſuch an averſion in the ſoldiers, that he was recalled at his own requeſt, and Clodius Albinus ſucceeded him.

A. D. 193. The tyrant Commodus having been poiſoned about this time by his concubine Martia, the Roman empire was, on his death, diſtracted with inteſtine convulſions, and the affairs of Britain were diſregarded in the bloody contentions for empire. Different pretenders for the imperial diadem ſtarted up, and anarchy erected her throne in the capital of the world. At laſt Severus, having defeated all his competitors, and being ſeated ſecurely on the throne, determined to divide the government of Britain into two parts. The ſouthern department he committed to Heraclitus, and the northern to Virius Lupus. The latter was ſo harraſſed by the Caledonians, that he endeavoured to prevent their frequent viſits, and to purchaſe repoſe with money; which proved only an incentive, inſtead of a reſtraint to the Caledonians; for finding they could be well paid, they took from hence a reſolution of being more troubleſome than ever, that they might be the oftener bribed. The emperor being informed of their repeated inſurrections, and the impolitic conduct of his general, reſolved on an expedition into Britain, though at that time ſixty years of age, and much afflicted with the gout.

A. D. 208. Accordingly, Severus arrived in the iſland, attended by his two ſons Caracalla and Geta. Though old and infirm, he proſecuted this difficult enterprize with equal alacrity and perſeverance. The Scots and Picts, appriſed of his intentions, and knowing he had no equal as a general, endeavoured to diſſipate the gathering ſtorm, by ſuing ſubmiſſively for peace; but the emperor was not to be diverted from his main deſign. He therefore diſmiſſed their ambaſſadors with an equivocal anſwer; and, having made all neceſſary preparations, marched into the enemies' country. Leaving his ſon Geta in the ſouth, he proceeded northwards, accompanied by Caracalla. At length, after incredible fatigue, he advanced almoſt to the fartheſt bounds of North Britain. His army was too powerful to be oppoſed by the natives, who every-where ſubmitted to his unconquerable perſeverance; but he met with obſtacles more difficult to ſurmount, than whole legions of embattled troops.

The vaſt tract of country he paſſed through was covered with woods, and interſected with bogs and marſhes. Sometimes a frightful precipice oppoſed his progreſs, at others a broad and rapid river obſtructed his march. By impediments of this kind, that continually lay in his route, his forces were deſtroyed without fighting, and diſcouraged without facing an enemy. The Caledonians ſaw his diſtreſs, and renewed their applicatinns for peace. He accepted of their propoſals, having loſt in his march through Scotland above fifteen thouſand men, and a peace was accordingly concluded. But knowing that their obedience would be ſecured, and the conditions of treaty obſerved no longer than they were over-awed by a military force, he repaired the old wall built by Adrian, facing it with ſtone, and making it twelve feet high and eight feet thick. This wall the North Britons called Murſever, that is, Severus's wall; and the South Britons, the Picts wall. The legionary ſoldiers of the Romans were employed in erecting this aſtoniſhing piece of architecture, the remains of which may at this day be traced for near ſeventy miles, and will probably long continue a monument of the conſummate ſkill, and indefatigable induſtry of the Romans. Having finiſhed his expedition, leaving the command of the army to Caracalla, Severus retired to Eboricum, or York, and took the title of Britannicus Maximus, which was afterwards ſtamped upon his own coins, and thoſe of his ſons who ſucceeded him.

The imprudent conduct of Caracalla, in not controlling the inſolence, tyranny, and cruelty of his ſoldiers, who made excurſions beyond the wall, and committed the moſt wanton outrages, exaſperated the Scots and Picts to ſuch a degree, that, regardleſs of the peace lately concluded, they had again recourſe to arms, and retaliated ſeverely upon the Romans the unprovoked injuries they had received from their hands. A. D. 218. The emperor, when informed of this inſurrection, but not of the cauſe, was ſo highly incenſed, that he meditated nothing leſs than a general maſſacre of the devoted Caledonians; and with a determination of gratifying his ill-founded revenge, he iſſued orders to his army in the moſt rigorous terms; but lived not to ſee his cruel mandate executed; for before the neceſſary preparations were completed, being depreſſed by infirmities and age, he died at York, in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age. His ſoldiers, by whom he was greatly beloved, performed his funeral rites with a magnificence ſuitable to the dignity and diſtinguiſhed merit of ſo great a prince.

Caracalla and Geta, the two ſons of Severus, to whom he had jointly bequeathed the empire, having in their eyes the luxuries of Rome, as beſt adapted to their vicious inclinations, made a peace with the Scots and Picts, and ſoon after quitted the iſland, taking with them their father's aſhes, which they depoſited in the tomb of Adrian. But Caracalla, whoſe ambition would not ſuffer a compeer with him on the throne, conſidering Geta as an enemy, rather than a brother, cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated. The wretch had made many fruitleſs attempts on his father's life; but unhappily ſucceeded in this baſe act of fratricide.

Nothing remarkable occurred in the hiſtory of England after theſe tranſactions, till the reign of the emperor Diocleſian. A. D. 284. On his aſcending the throne, he commiſſioned Carauſius, a perſon of mean extraction, but famous for his courage, to ſcour the Britiſh ſeas, with a powerful fleet, of the piratical Franks and Saxons. Carauſius executed his orders with great ſucceſs; but refuſing to account with the emperor's officers for the treaſure he had amaſſed, Maximinian, who was a ſharer with Diocleſian in the government of the empire, diſpatched an emiſſary with private inſtructions to put him to death. Being appriſed of this, he ſailed to Britain, where he was received with the greateſt acclamations of joy by the inhabitants. The Roman army immediately proclaimed him emperor, and inveſted him with the purple robe. Carauſius now augmented his navy, and performed a coaſting voyage by Gaul, Spain, and Italy; and ſo ſucceſsful were his depredations, by frequent deſcents upon the coaſt, that Maximinian was at length compelled to yield him the ſole government of Britain. His power, thus indirectly obtained, was well employed; for he fortified the wall of Severus, and embraced every prudent meaſure for the ſecurity of the people.

A. D. 293. About this time, Conſtantius was joined with Maximinian and Diocleſian, in the government of the Roman empire; and Carauſius being at Bologne, he marched with a large army to inveſt that place. Conſtantius blocked up the port with a ſtone bank. Carauſius deſpiſing this obſtruction, fought his way through the Roman camp in a dark night, and going on board a ſmall veſſel provided for the occaſion, landed ſafely in Britain. He now omitted no means of putting the iſland in a ſtate of defence; but while thus employed, he was ſlain by Alectus, a boſom friend, and one of his officers, who aſſumed the government, and made preparations for waging war againſt Conſtantius. The emperor was not remiſs on his ſide. Having landed his forces, with a determined bravery, he ordered that his ſhips ſhould be ſet on fire, that his troops might have no reſource but in death or conqueſt: which ſingular proof of valour drew the Britons from all quarters to his ſtandard. A battle enſued, in which Alectus was ſlain, and Conſtantius was hailed as their deliverer from oppreſſion and tyranny.

A. D. 296. The reſignation of the empire by Diocleſian and Maximinianus now taking place, in favour of Galerius and Conſtantius, the latter took charge of the affairs of Britain. He thought the iſland worthy of his reſidence, and applied himſelf with unremitted labour to make thoſe a happy people, who conſidered him as their father. During his adminiſtration the arts and ſciences thrived by his munificence, and he permitted the free exerciſe of the chriſtian religion, which had for ſome time before been planted in the iſland. The city of London was ornamented with elegant ſtructures; it was become conſiderable for its extent, beauty, and riches; it was the center of commerce, and the reſidence of many wealthy merchants. But the Caledonians having again invaded the Roman provinces, Conſtantius was on his march to quell the inſurgents, when he died at York in the twelfth year of his reign, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Conſtantine, to whom was given the honorary diſtinction of Conſtantine the Great, on account of his virtues and ſingular talents.

A. D. 311. Conſtantine arrived in Britain a ſhort time before the death of his father who nominated him his ſucceſſor. Soon after this event, he repulſed the Scots and Picts. He openly declared himſelf a Chriſtian; and by his zeal for the doctrines of the Goſpel, put a final period to the deceptions of Paganiſm. His genius was piercing; his memory tenacious; his learning uncommon; his liberality unbounded. Affable, polite, equitable, and humane, he won the hearts of all his ſubjects. No perſon ever retired diſſatisfied from his preſence; no perſon ever implored his aſſiſtance in vain. His laurels of conqueſt were never ſtained with the blood of the vanquiſhed. The ſword of rapacity never followed his victories. Deeply affected with every ſpecies of diſtreſs in others, he often repaid from his own coffers the loſs which the needy had juſtly ſuſtained by his ſentence. To be unfortunate was a ſufficient recommendation to his protection, and the ſufferer was always ſure of finding relief. No diſturbance, no inſurrection happened during his whole reign, though extended to an uncommon length. He divided the iſland into four governments, namely, Britannia Prima, comprehending the country between the Thames and the Engliſh Channel; Britannia Secunda, including that part of the iſland that lies between the Severn and the Iriſh Sea; Flavia Cæſarienſis, containing Cornwall, Somerſetſhire, and part of the counties of Wilts and Glouceſter; and Maxima Cæſarienſis, including the northern counties, together with Nottinghamſhire, Derbyſhire, Staffordſhire, and Lincolnſhire. After this adjuſtment, Britain was ſubject to a præfect of Gaul, under whom a deputy tranſacted the public buſineſs.

A. D. 337. A melancholy incident fell out this year, by the death of Conſtantine the Great, who left the Britons to lament their loſs on the twenty-ſecond of May, after a proſperous reign of thirty-one years. From this time to the reign of Valentinian, we cannot find any tranſactions or events relative to Britain, worth recording. But a ſcene now opened which more than repaid the inactivity of many years. The Franks and Saxons committed the moſt horrid ravages on the ſea-coaſts, while the Scots and Picts invaded the interior parts, laying waſte the country wherever they came. The Britons, thus harraſſed both from abroad and at home, were in a ſituation truly deplorable. Valentinian, convinced that only a general of abilities and experience could relieve them from the cruelty of the barbarians, ſent Theodoſius, (father of the firſt emperor of that name) to Britain, with a ſelect body of troops. His preſence ſoon changed the face of affairs, and reſtored tranquillity in the iſland. He defeated the invaders, recovered the ſpoils they had taken, and by degrees drove them into their own country beyond the Firths. This done, he formed the country between the walls of Adrian and Antoninus into a ſeparate province, which he called Valentia, in honour of the emperor. He alſo added new works, and placed ſtrong garriſons, at proper diſtances, that a ſufficient force might always be ready to oppoſe any future inroads of the Caledonians.

Theodoſius now turned his attention wholly to the pirates, and having ſent out a ſtrong fleet, the Franks and Saxons were totally defeated. Having repaired to London, where he was received with every demonſtration of heart-felt joy, he called that city Auguſta, which name it ſtill retains in poetical compoſitions. Every object of his expedition being now attained, he applied himſelf to regulate the internal police of the ſtate, which he fully effected by the moſt mild and prudent meaſures, ſo that he became the idol of the people; inſomuch, that when he left the iſland, he was followed to the ſhip by a vaſt multitude of all ranks, teſtifying, in the warmeſt manner, their regret and ſorrow for his departure. When he arrived at Rome, the emperor received him with the ſtrongeſt marks of ſincere affection; and the ſenate, having decreed him a ſtatue, ordered that it ſhould be placed among their moſt beloved and celebrated anceſtors.

Theodoſius, on quitting Britain, inveſted Maximus, a ſoldier of great experience, who had ſerved under him, with the chief command. He was of a noble family in Spain, and by treading in the ſteps of his illuſtrious predeceſſor, gained equal reputation and eſteem among the people; in conſequence of which a profound peace ſtill continued in the iſland, and the northern inhabitants remained quiet in their own country for ſome time.

A. D. 364. Valentinian, the emperor, dying, his ſon Gratian ſucceeded him, and choſe Flavius Magnus Theodoſius, ſon of the great general of that name, to be his aſſociate in the empire. This exaltation of young Theodoſius exaſperated Maximus, who thought it an indignity to ſerve under a perſon he uſed to command. By his complaints of the injuſtice done him, he prevailed on his ſoldiers to proclaim him emperor, and accompany him to the continent. Elated with this dawn of ſucceſs, he took with him the flower of the Britiſh youth, and paſſed over into Gaul, where his army received additional ſtrength by a reinforcement of German auxiliaries. Having firſt defeated Gratian, who fled to Lyons, where he was murdered by the hand of Andragathius, one of his officers, Maximus advanced againſt Theodoſius, by whom he was routed and ſlain.

A. D. 388. The condition of the Britons was, at this time, very diſtreſſful. Their iſland left defenceleſs by Maximus, without troops, without a fleet to guard their coaſts, they became an eaſy prey to the enemy. The Scots and Picts renewing their depredations, entered the Roman provinces with fire and ſword, and committed in their rout the moſt horrid barbarities. The Britons tranſmitted to Rome repeated ſupplications for aſſiſtance. Theodoſius liſtened to their ſolicitations, and appointed Chryſanthus to the government of Britain, who ſuppreſſed the northern inſurrections. He likewiſe defeated the pirates who had for ſome time infeſted the coaſt; by which means the Britons once more enjoyed a ſhort reſpite from the incurſions of their ſavage invaders and plunderers.

A. D. 395. But the death of Theodoſius put an end to their repoſe. From this period the Roman empire drew near its diſſolution. The utmoſt exertion of her remaining ſtrength became neceſſary to oppoſe a deluge of barbarians from the north, which continually increaſing, rolled on, and overflowed the plains of France and Italy, &c.

A. D. 403. During the reign of Arcadius and Honorius, ſons of Theodoſius, Alaric the Goth ſacked the city of Rome, which event occaſioned a recall of the legions from Britain. This country was of courſe neglected, whereby the ſouthern parts lay expoſed to the ſudden inroads and deſcents of their northern neighbours. The Saxons, Picts, and Iriſh landed in ſeveral parts of the iſland. In vain the Britons oppoſed their incurſions. Their effeminacy was not an equal match for ſuch hardy adventurers. Driven almoſt to deſpair, they implored in the moſt pathetic terms the protection of the emperor. But Honorius was not in a condition to grant them relief.

A. D. 423. Affairs now became deſperate; but at length, in the reign of Valentinian III. a legion was ſent to the aſſiſtance of the Britons, who drove the Picts and Scots from their borders. But this aid was ſoon withdrawn, when the northern ſavages renewed hoſtilities; ſo that the Britons, A. D. 477. unable to repel their attacks, again renewed their applications to the Romans for ſuccour.

The emperor, commiſerating their depreſſed ſtate, ordered another legion for their protection, under Gallio. But the interior parts of the Roman empire being now invaded, rendered their recall alſo neceſſary. Gallio therefore, after informing the Britons that they were to expect no farther aſſiſtance from Rome, gave them all neceſſary inſtructions for their defence. He rebuilt the wall of Severus, exhorted them to practiſe the Roman diſcipline, taught them the methods of making implements of war, and pointed out the natural advantages they poſſeſſed from their ſituation. Having performed theſe friendly offices, he took a final farewel, and embarked with his legion for the continent. Thus ended the dominion of the Romans in Britain, four hundred and ſixty years after Julius Cæſar's firſt invaſion; three hundred and ſixty-ſeven after they got poſſeſſion under Claudius; and about three hundred and thirty after they extended their conqueſts under Agricola and Titus his ſon.

We have already taken notice that, during the abode of the Romans in Britain, they introduced into it all the luxuries of Italy; and it is certain, that under them the South Britons were reduced to a ſtate of great vaſſalage, and that the genius of liberty retreated northwards, where the natives had made a brave reſiſtance againſt the tyrants of the world: for though the Britons were unqueſtionably brave, when incorporated with the Roman legions abroad, yet we know of no ſtruggle they made in later times, to preſerve their independency at home, notwithſtanding the many favourable opportunities that preſented themſelves.

Several of the following particulars reſpecting the ſtate of Britain under the Romans, are extracted from the Notitia of the Roman empire, publiſhed about the year 410 after Chriſt.

The iſland of Britain, appertaining to the diſtrict of the Præfectus Prætoria of Gaul, was under the juriſdiction of a governor or vicar. According to the number of provinces, he had five magiſtrates under his command, two being conſulars and three preſidents. The conſulars, as officers ſubordinate to the governor, or vicar general, ruled Valentia and Maxima Cæſarienſis, and the preſidents preſided over Britannia prima, Britannia ſecunda, and Flavia Cæſarienſis. Under theſe five officers were many of inferior rank, to aſſiſt them in the adminiſtration of the civil government. That of the military was committed to the ſuperintendence of three principal officers, the Comes Britanniarum, Comes Littoris Saxonici, and the Dux Britanniarum.

The firſt commanded the troops and garriſons in the interior parts of the iſland, and the two latter thoſe of the eaſtern and northern coaſts. The chief of the three was the Comes, or Count of Britain, who had under his command three thouſand foot, and ſix hundred horſe. The Comes, or Count of the Saxon ſhore, acted as admiral of the coaſt, and had nine garriſons under his command, which together formed a body of two thouſand two hundred foot, and two hundred horſe. The Dux, or Duke of Britain, was ſtationed in the north, having fourteen garriſons to ſuperintend, which contained a body of ſix thouſand foot, three hundred horſe, and twenty-three military poſts on the Picts wall, defended by eight thouſand foot, and ſix hundred horſe; ſo that the eſtabliſhed military force in Britain amounted to nineteen thouſand two hundred infantry, and, of cavalry, one thouſand ſeven hundred.

In order to facilitate the communication of the troops in the different parts of the kingdom, and a free intercourſe among the people, the ſoldiers, in peaceable times, were employed on the public highways. Theſe were extenſive, grand, and uſeful. Their remains are ſtill the ſubject of admiration to the curious. By the Romans they were called, conſular, prætorian, regal, and military ways, and afterwards by the Saxons, ſtradas, from whence comes the modern appellation of ſtreets. There were many in number, but the four principal ones had the names given them of Via Vetelingiana, or Watling ſtreet; Via Icenorium, or Ikenield ſtreet; Erming ſtreet, and Foſs way. Two of theſe extended the whole length of the kingdom, and the other two the breadth, from ſea to ſea. To theſe works of labour the Romans added twenty-eight cities, beſides a great number of caſtles, forts, towers, walls, locks, and other public buildings, for the repoſe of the weary, and the reception and entertainment of travellers.

Chriſtianity was introduced into Britain by the Romans, and many churches were erected. But the exact time is uncertain. All we know is, that the Chriſtian religion had been propagated in the iſland before the end of the ſecond century; for in the general perſecution under Diocleſian, about the year 303, many of the Britiſh Chriſtians ſuffered martyrdom for their faith, among whom was St. Alban and ſeveral others. In 314, three Britiſh biſhops attended the council of Arles in France; in 325, the ſame number attended the council of Nice; and in 359, three more attended the council of Ariminium. From whence it is juſtly concluded, that the Chriſtian church in Britain was originally independent of the church of Rome, ſince called the papacy.

It is uncertain what progreſs the Britons made in literature during theſe periods; no traces of their learning, not a ſingle book having been handed down to us. Architecture and ſculpture flouriſhed during the reign of Carauſius, and further improvements were made in other polite arts, during the reign of Conſtantine the Great; but the names of the artiſts, with their works, have ſunk together in the vortex of oblivion.

Thus, like a young phœnix, did Britain riſe into exiſtence from the aſhes of its mother. If a finite mind may be allowed to explore the intricate ways of infinite wiſdom, it ſhould ſeem, the Roman empire was demoliſhed, that the magnificent ſtructure of Britiſh glory might be raiſed upon it's ruins; that a nation might flouriſh, who ſhould not only improve the Roman arts, but enjoy the beſt form of government, and the pureſt religion ever revealed to mankind in general.

CHAPTER I.

Calamities of the Britons, who become an eaſy prey to the Picts and Scots—They apply in vain to the Romans for aſſiſtance—Elect Vortigern generaliſſimo, who adviſes them to have recourſe to the Saxons for protection—One thouſand five hundred of thoſe people arrive in England, under the command of Hengiſt and Horſa—Having been reinforced at different times, they avow their intentions, ſubdue that part of Britain now called England, which they divide into ſeven kingdoms, namely, Kent—Suſſex, or South Saxons—Weſſex, or Weſt Saxons—Eſſex, or Eaſt Saxons—Northumberland—Eaſt Anglea—Mercia—which have been diſtinguiſhed by the general appellation of the Saxon Heptarchy—The hiſtory of the ſeveral kingdoms in order; by whom founded; when eſtabliſhed; and their final diſſolution by Egbert the Great, firſt king of all England—The religion of the Anglo-Saxons; their converſion to Chriſtianity, and eccleſiaſtical hiſtory ſince that time.

THE inhabitants of Britain, deprived of aſſiſtance from the Romans, unacquainted with the art of civil government, unaccuſtomed to the toils of war, their martial ſpirit enervated on the lap of indolence, found their ramparts but a weak defence, and deſerting their ſtation, became an eaſy prey to the Picts and Scots. Theſe inſurgents having made ſeveral breaches in the wall of Severus, entered their territories, ſpreading deſolation through the country, marking their footſteps with blood, and leaving behind them as they went, the veſtiges of their cruel devaſtations. Thus harraſſed, the Britons were compelled to ſue for peace, which they obtained on the hard condition of ſurrendering all the country north of the Humber to their ferocious enemy, who ſoon broke the treaty, and renewed their former deſtructive inroads. To theſe were added the greateſt of all national calamities, that of a dreadful famine; ſo that the horrors of hunger kept equal pace with the deſolations of war. The former extended even to the Caledonians, who found it impoſſible to ſubſiſt in a country they themſelves had laid waſte.

A. D. 448.

From theſe ſources of calamity ſprung domeſtic broils, religious contentions, and a dreadful peſtilence, which raged ſo furiouſly, that the living were ſcarce ſufficient to bury the dead. In this deplorable ſituation, the ſword in their borders, peſtilence in the heart of their country, famine at their doors, they applied by letter, inſcribed "The Groans of the Britons," to Ætius, Valentinian's general, for aſſiſtance. "The barbarians, ſay they, drive us toward the ſea, the ſea throws us back upon the barbarians; and we have only the wretched alternative left us, of periſhing by the ſword or the waves." But the ravages on the continent, by the Goths and Vandals, being equal to thoſe committed in Britain, their requeſt could not be granted.

The Picts and Scots, however, having retired into their own country, with the ſpoils they had taken, afforded the miſerable Britons a ſhort interval of peace, in which their ſpirits, though not their ancient courage, revived. Returning to their former habitations, they applied themſelves to agriculture, and in a little ſpace of time reſtored the bleſſings of plenty to their impoveriſhed country. To render theſe permanent, and to cement a union among themſelves, they elected Vortigern, king of Devonſhire and Cornwall, generaliſſimo; who inſtead of animating this degenerate people to defend themſelves, made a propoſal in a convention of the ſtates, to employ an army of Saxon troops for their protection. The motion was approved unanimouſly, and ambaſſadors were immediately diſpatched, to treat for a ſtipulated number of thoſe foreign auxiliaries. To ſuch kind of wretched expedients will that nation generally have recourſe, who are accuſtomed to the yoke of ſlavery, enervated by effeminacy.

At this time, the Saxons were a branch of thoſe Gothic nations, who, pouring down from the north, gave laws, manners, and liberty to the reſt of Europe. Their name is derived from the word Seax, ſignifying a ſhort hooked ſword, which was their principal weapon. Valour and a love of liberty formed their diſtinguiſhed character. Their chiefs were ſubject to the regulations of the ſtate, and to the voice of the people, who always came armed into their public aſſemblies. Their attachment to their leaders was very remarkable, and military ardour was the firſt principle in their government.

The Saxons had by this ſpread themſelves through the northern parts of Germany, and were in poſſeſſion of all the ſea coaſt from the mouth of the Rhine to Jutland. For a time they limited their piracies to the ſea-coaſts of Germany, between the Rhine and the Elbe, but at length extended them to the northern parts of Gaul and the weſtern ſhores of Britain. The appearance therefore of the Britiſh deputies muſt be very pleaſing to a people whoſe country was overſtocked with inhabitants. Their invitation was gladly accepted; and Witigiſil, their commander in chief, having ſummoned an aſſembly, it was reſolved to ſend a ſufficient force into Britain, under the command of his two ſons, Hengiſt and Horſa.

A. D. 449.

The two brothers, Hengiſt and Horſa, were accordingly appointed to conduct this firſt expedition. Nor did they find any difficulty in perſuading their countrymen to follow their ſtandards. About one thouſand five hundred having been ſelected by lot, they embarked in three ſhips, and arrived in the iſle of Thanet, in Kent, which had been aſſigned them by Vortigern for the place of their reſidence. This was the firſt piece of land poſſeſſed in Britain by the Saxons, who ſoon had an opportunity of convincing the Britons, that they had not applied to a people incapable of defending them from their northern invaders. The Scots and Picts, having been defeated in ſeveral engagements with the Saxons, dreaded their very name. A complete victory was obtained near Stamford in Lincolnſhire, over the barbarians, from whom the ſpoils they had taken were recovered, and they themſelves entirely expelled from South Britain. Theſe ſucceſſes gained in ſo eaſy a manner, together with the fertility of the country, which they beheld, with longing eyes, in their various marches through it, awakened in them an ambition of ruling thoſe they came to protect, and ſubduing the whole iſland they had been invited to defend. However, for the preſent, they concluded an agreement with Vortigern, whereby they were to receive both pay and ſubſiſtence; with which terms they ſeemed for a while ſatisfied, and remained quiet. But at the ſame time they ſent over to their countrymen ſuch repreſentations of the Britons and the iſland, as inſpired them with longing deſires of becoming ſharers of their good fortune. Hengiſt and Horſa alſo artfully urged Vortigern, to ſend for an additional number of Saxons, pretending that they would be of ſervice in cultivating a country, adapted to the purpoſes of agriculture. Vortigern conſented, and upon a ſecond invitation from this weak prince, a fleet of ſeventeen ſail brought over five thouſand men, Saxons, Jutes, and Angles; with whom came Rowena, a lady of incomparable beauty, related to Hengiſt, who was afterwards eſſentially ſerviceable to the Saxons in their political deſigns; for her charms made quickly an impreſſion on the heart of Vortigern, who was ſo faſcinated that he divorced his former wife, and after his marriage with Rowena, he aſſigned the fertile kingdom of Kent to Hengiſt and Horſa, for the reſidence of the Saxons. The Britons ſaw this increaſe of their auxiliaries with anxiety. They perceived the folly of the ſtep they had taken, and were deſirous of retrieving it. But it was now too late.

A. D. 452. The Saxons were landed, and their forces continually augmenting. A third embarkation took place, and the northern countries began to ſwarm with theſe adventurers, as the ſouthern parts had for ſome time already done. Reaſons are never wanting when the ſtrong are determined to oppreſs the weak. Thoſe alledged by Hengiſt and Horſa were, that their troops had not been paid for their ſervices. The plea was denied by Vortigern, but without effect; for Hengiſt, without his permiſſion, ſent for more troops from the continent, who arrived under the command of his brother Octa, who with his ſon Ebuſa ſettled in the north of the iſland.

Having thus ſtrengthened the Saxon intereſt, the two brothers threw off the maſk, and avowed their intentions, pretending to pay themſelves, and take by force what they affirmed had been unjuſtly withheld from them. Under this pretext, they formed an alliance with the Picts and Scots, ravaged the adjacent country, committed horrid depredations in the county of Kent, and laid waſte with fire and ſword the territories of thoſe who paid them for their defence. Fired with indignation againſt their perfidious auxiliaries, the Britons had recourſe to arms; and having depoſed Vortigern, placed his ſon Vortimer on the throne. This active prince revived the courage of the Britons. He fought ſeveral battles with the Saxons. In one near Ailsford, he gained a complete victory, and in this conflict Horſa was killed.

A. D. 457. This change of fortune alarmed the Saxons; nor would they venture a ſecond engagement; but retreating to their camp, waited the arrival of freſh ſuccours. Hengiſt now took upon himſelf the title of king of Kent; and, having received the expected reinforcement of troops, he ſallied from his camp, marking his way with blood and deſtruction. Neither age nor ſex were ſpared. The prieſts were burnt upon their altars; the churches were levelled in the duſt; and the whole country through which they paſſed exhibited one ſcene of horrid deſolation and carnage.

A. D. 465. The utmoſt efforts were uſed by Vortimer to ſtop theſe barbarous ravages of the Saxons; but before he could accompliſh this deſirable end, death put a period to his deſigns, and the Britons were left without a leader. At this dangerous criſis, they choſe Ambroſius, of Roman deſcent, his ſucceſſor. Aſſiſted by Arthur, whoſe exploits have given riſe to many fables, he defeated ſeveral detachments of the Saxons, who being curbed by his humane, prudent, and intrepid conduct, were rendered incapable of undertaking any capital enterprize; and ſeveral years elapſed before they could make ſettlements in any part of the country.

A. D. 477. A Saxon chief, named Ella, invaded Suſſex, and having effected a ſettlement, took the title of king of the South Saxons. About eighteen years after, Cerdic and his ſon Kenrick landed in the weſtern parts of England. He was oppoſed by the celebrated Arthur; but, conquering all oppoſition, he laid the foundation of the kingdom of Weſſex. About this time no leſs than three armies of Saxons made a deſcent on the weſtern parts of the iſland. The firſt conſiſted chiefly of Angles, headed by Uffa, who founded the kingdom of Eaſt Anglia. Cridda eſtabliſhed the kingdom of Mercia; and Erkenwin that of Eſſex. After theſe came Ida, who drove the Britons from their poſſeſſions, and was crowned king of Bernicia, including the counties of Northumberland and Durham. Ella, another Saxon prince, ſubdued Lancaſhire and moſt part of Yorkſhire. Theſe counties were afterwards united by a marriage between the grandſon of Ida and the daughter of Ella, under the title of the kingdom of Northumberland. Hence it will appear, that the Saxons, Jutes, and Angles, under the general name of Anglo-Saxons, were ſettled in Britain, after a contention between them and the Britons, which had continued more than one hundred and thirty years.

The Saxons having now eſtabliſhed ſeven kingdoms, gave the name of England to the whole. But it may be proper to obſerve, that the iſland of Britain was now in poſſeſſion of four kinds of people, very diſſimilar in their manners. Firſt, the ancient Britons, now called the Welſh, were ſettled in Cambria, and in the weſtern diviſions of Danmonium, or Cornwall. Secondly, the Picts, who dwelt on the eaſtern ſide of that part of the kingdom which now bears the name of Scotland. Thirdly, the Scots, who inhabited the weſtern diſtrict of that country. Fourthly, the Saxons, Jutes, and Angles, who now bore the general name of Engliſh, and reſided in the ſouthern and eaſtern parts of Britain, ſtretching from the wall of Severus to the channel. Theſe though divided into ſeparate governments, each of which had its own aſſembly, governor and laws, yet in time of national danger they united, and choſe by mutual conſent one common dictator, or chieftain, as the guardian of the united ſtates. He was commander in chief, and was placed at the head of their political confederacy, but without any juriſdiction in the dominion of others. He led the combined forces againſt the enemy in time of war, and in times of peace preſided in the grand council.

We meet with few inſtances in hiſtory, of revolutions more rapid, univerſal, and complete, than the eſtabliſhment of the ſeven Saxon kingdoms in Britain. The whole ſouthern parts having changed their inhabitants, manners, language, and government; the Britons being driven up into Wales and Cornwall, or compelled to ſubmit to the conquerors. Nor were the victors ſatisfied with their poſſeſſions: they ſtained their conqueſts with the lives of the innocent, and founded their power on the maſſacre of its inhabitants. In ſhort, the hiſtory of the Saxon Heptarchy is little more than that of crimes, treaſons and murders, committed by the inſtigation of popiſh prieſts and monks: even their criminal law admitted of a pecuniary compenſation for murder, and regicide itſelf.

The following table will ſhew the ſeveral kingdoms of the Saxon Heptarchy, by whom and when founded, and what counties were included in them.

Previous to our entering upon the hiſtory of theſe kingdoms in the order here laid down, it may not be unacceptable to the diſcerning part of our readers, if we offer a few remarks on the nature of the Saxon government, and the evidence upon which it's events and occurrences are founded.

In many particulars the Saxon heptarchy reſembled the preſent government of the united colonies in America. Their national council was a congreſs, which regulated the general affairs of the united ſtates. At the ſame time each kingdom had a general aſſembly, under whoſe juriſdiction came all matters that related to its own interior police and government. Beſides which inſtitutions, they had, when emergencies required, an aſſembly of wiſe men, called a Wittenagemat, from whence our modern parliaments are ſaid to derive their origin.

They elected the ſovereign from among the royal family; but under the direction and control, in every meaſure, of the grand council, over whom he preſided. When any important affairs were to be agitated, all the warriors of the nation met in arms, and the people expreſſed their approbation by rattling their armour, or their diſſent by a confuſed murmur. The meaſures choſen by general agreement were executed with alacrity; and proſecuted with vigour. The warriors of each tribe attached themſelves to their leaders, with the utmoſt unſhaken conſtancy. They attended him as his ornaments in peace, as his defence in war, as his council in the adminiſtration of juſtice. To die for the honour of the band was their chief ambition: to ſurvive its diſgrace, or the death of their leader was infamous. They even carried into the field their wives and children, that they might be witneſſes of their valour, and, in ſome reſpects, incentives to it.

Unhappily the Saxons were ignorant of all the refined arts of life; tillage itſelf was almoſt wholly neglected: they ſeem to have been anxious even to prevent any improvement of that nature; and their leaders, by annually diſtributing anew all the adjacent lands among the inhabitants of each village, prevented them from attaching themſelves to any particular profeſſions, or making any ſuch progreſs in agriculture, as might divert their attention from military expeditions, which compoſed the firſt leading principle of their political conſtitution and purſuits.

A cloud of obſcurity has involved the hiſtory of the Saxon heptarchy; nor can a regular ſeries of facts be found properly authenticated to ſwell the page of hiſtory. After the moſt laborious inveſtigation of celebrated writers, the ſame doubts, the ſame uncertainties ſtill remain. Theſe took their riſe from the ignorance and ſuperſtition of monkiſh writers, who in all their accounts military and civil, have directed their attention ſolely to eccleſiaſtical matters, ſo that their writings are little more than records of the wonderful ſufferings of monaſteries, and the deliverances of the church from the perſecutions of Paganiſm. Theſe bigotted monks, guided by the ſpirit of enthuſiaſtic credulity, have adopted the moſt abſurd fictions, and given as hiſtorical torical facts, relations that ſhock the ear of reaſon. At the ſame time they have often either omitted, or blended with improbable, and ſometimes contradictory circumſtances, ſuch civil tranſactions, as are neceſſary for continuing the thread of hiſtorical narration. All therefore that can be accompliſhed with ſucceſs, in this obſcure period, is, to collect the ſcattered particles which form the outlines of the Saxon heptarchy, and theſe, in conformity to our declarations, we ſhall endeavour to trace with all poſſible fidelity and exactneſs.

A compendious account of the ſucceſſion of the kings, and the revolutions of each particular kingdom of which the Saxon heptarchy was compoſed.

I. KENT.

A. D. 457. IN a deciſive engagement at Crecanford, Hengiſt, having defeated the Britons, who loſt four thouſand men, founded the kingdom of Kent, and by his valour rendered it the moſt formidable of the Saxon heptarchy. This event took place eight years after his arrival in the iſland, and he ſwayed the ſceptre of regal authority thirty-one years. After his death the kingdom declined under his three immediate ſucceſſors, who poſſeſſed but a ſmall ſhare of their anceſtor's martial ſpirit.

Eccus, his ſucceſſor, was content to poſſeſs his throne in tranquillity; which at his death he left to his ſon Octa, during whoſe reign the Eaſt Saxons diſmembered the provinces of Eſſex and Middleſex from that of Kent. Having ſat upon the throne twenty-two years, he died, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Hermenric, who performed nothing memorable during a long and peaceful reign of thirty-two years; and Ethelbert, his ſon, aſcended the throne, when the peace of the heptarchy was diſturbed by Ceaulin, king of Weſſex.

While the Britons were in a capacity to maintain a conteſt for their liberty, an union of council and intereſt ſubſiſted among their invaders; but after the Britons were expelled to the barren mountains of Wales and Cornwall, the Saxons, repining at an unequal ſhare of proſperity, turned their arms againſt one another. Ceaulin, ambitious of power, made no ſcruple of ſacrificing the laws of equity to the thirſt of empire. He ſeized, without a plea of juſtice, the kingdom of Suſſex, on the death of Ciſſa; and, not content with this acquiſition, he formed a ſcheme of becoming maſter of the whole heptarchy. He had for ſome time obſerved the indolence of the Kentiſh princes, and thought this a proper time for carrying his plan into execution.

Theſe political deſigns of Ceaulin were evident to the penetration of Ethelbert, and he took without delay the moſt prudent meaſures to render them abortive. To this end, he ſummoned the other princes of the heptarchy to a general council, and convinced them of the neceſſity of arming in their own defence. They felt the force of his reaſoning, and appointed him commander in chief of their combined forces. Ceaulin gave them battle. He was totally defeated, and ſurvived but a ſhort time his overthrow. Deprived of their leader, and the greateſt part of their army, the Mercians were in no condition of oppoſing their conquerors. They ſubmitted therefore to Ethelbert, who reſtored the kingdom to the lawful heir, but under ſuch limitations as greatly augmented the power he had before exerciſed.

The moſt remarkable event in the reign of Ethelbert was his converſion from the idolatry of Paganiſm, and the introduction of the chriſtian religion among the Saxons, of which we ſhall treat hereafter. This wiſe prince was the firſt Engliſh king who framed a regular code of laws. He alſo built the old cathedral church of St. Paul, London, on a ſpot where a temple dedicated to Diana once ſtood; and Melitus was its firſt biſhop. After a proſperous reign of fifty-two years, he fell aſleep in the boſom of peace and calm tranquillity. He was ſucceeded by Eadbald, his ſon, to whom the crown devolved.

A. D. 616. This prince, blinded with a paſſion for his mother-in-law, abandoned his religion, that he might indulge his criminal paſſion without reſtraint. Laurentius, the ſucceſſor of Auſtin, laboured with the utmoſt aſſiduity to make Eadbald ſenſible of the enormity of his vices, and at laſt ſucceeded. Convinced by the arguments of Laurentius, he renounced the Pagan religion, divorced his inceſtuous conſort, and became a remarkable penitent for his crimes. He deſtroyed the idolatrous temples, broke the ſtatues of the gods in pieces, and firmly eſtabliſhed the Chriſtian religion in his kingdom. He contributed by the force of his arguments, but much more by his exemplary piety, to the converſion of Edwin, king of Mercia. After a reign of twenty-four years he departed this life, with the character of an excellent and pious prince, beloved by his ſubjects, and revered for his virtues, even by the pagan monarchs of the heptarchy. This kingdom continued in the royal line of the founder, till the year 794. But after the death of Eadbald, no events that deſerve the notice of hiſtorians, have been recorded. On the extinction of the Hengiſt family, of whom Aldric was the laſt, the kingdom was rent by factions, and became the ſport of fortune; till at length it was tributary to the kings of Mercia, and ſo remained till Egbert the Great obtained it by conqueſt.

II. SUSSEX, OR SOUTH SAXONS.

A. D. 491. THE kingdom of Suſſex, which is the ſmalleſt in the heptarchy, was founded by Ella: its whole extent was inconſiderable, containing only the county of Suſſex, and part of Surry, which, being covered with woods, and thinly inhabited, made it incapable of repelling the attacks of a powerful enemy. Ella was poſſeſſed of great military talents, and on the death of Hengiſt was placed at the head of the Saxon heptarchy. Having reigned twenty-three years, he died, and was ſucceeded by

A. D. 514. Ciſſa, his ſon, who, not poſſeſſing the abilities of his father, purchaſed a peace of Cerdic, king of the Weſt Saxons, upon conditions of paying him an annual proportion of money and troops. By this means he kept the ravages of war at a diſtance from his own territories, and at the ſame time enabled Cerdic to repel and ſubdue the Britons. He built the city of Chicheſter, the capital of the county at this day. His age and the length of his reign were extended to an uncommon duration. He died without iſſue, after a peaceful reign of ſeventy-ſix years, in the year 590, at the great age of one hundred and ſeventeen years.

On his demiſe, this kingdom was ſeized by Ceaulin, king of the Weſt Saxons; however, the inhabitants ſtruggled hard for the recovery of their liberties, and ſometimes with promiſing ſucceſs; but about the year 760 it was ſubjected to the obedience of Weſſex, and became a province of the Weſt Saxons from this period.

III. WESSEX, OR WEST SAXONS.

A. D. 519. THIS monarchy was founded by Cerdic, a very able warrior. He fought many battles with various ſucceſs; but he ſurmounted all oppoſition, and the martial ſpirit of the Saxons was carried to its greateſt height among this tribe. He reigned after the eſtabliſhment of his kingdom in great tranquillity fifteen years, and dying in 534, was ſucceeded by his ſon Kenric, who died, after a ſhort reign of only four years.

A. D. 560. Ceaulin, ſon of Kenric, invaded thoſe eſtates that were in his neighbourhood, adding great part of the counties of Devon and Somerſet to his dominions. His ſucceſſors excited ſuch a jealouſy throughout the whole heptarchy, that occaſioned a general confederacy to be formed againſt him, at the head of which was placed Ethelbert, king of Kent. A battle enſued, Ceaulin was completely defeated by the allied forces; and this misfortune rendering him contemptible in the eyes of his ſubjects, they expelled him from his throne. He died in a miſerable exile.

A. D. 583. Cealric, nephew of Ceaulin, was raiſed to the throne by the conqueror. He died after a reign of ſeven years, and was ſucceeded A. D. 598. by Ceolwulph, his couſin, who ſupported his dignity with great glory, till his death. This happened when he was engaged in A. D. 611. reducing the South Saxons. Kengils, his nephew, ſucceeded him, and, in the third year of his reign, aſſociated with him in the government his brother Quinchelm. Theſe two princes fought a deciſive battle with the Britons at Banton, above two thouſand of whom were left dead on the field.

A. D. 628. At this time Penda, king of Mercia, made an attempt upon Cirenceſter; in conſequence of which a battle was fought near that town, which was maintained with invincible reſolution on both ſides, till night put an end to the conflict. The next morning preſented a diſmal ſcene of ſlaughter; and cooler thoughts ſuggeſted, that a renewal of the engagement would end in the deſtruction of both armies. Each party therefore relaxed in demands, and a peace was happily concluded. Quinchelm died ſeven years before his brother Kengils, who in the year 643 was ſucceeded by his ſon Kenwal, a prince unſteady in his temper, and exceedingly vicious. After having been expelled his kingdom, and again reſtored to it by the king of A. D. 672. Mercia, he paid the debt of nature, and left his crown to his wife Saxeburga. This lady, after a ſhort reign of only twelve months, was ſucceeded in the throne by

Eſcwin, who was a deſcendant of the great Cerdic. In the ſecond year of his reign he was attacked by Wulphur, king of Mercia, and a general action took place between them at Bedwin in Wiltſhire. The battle was long, the ſlaughter great; but at laſt victory turned her ſcale in favour of the king of Mercia. Two years after this battle, Eſcwin died, in 676, and left the throne of Weſſex to Kentwin, ſon of Kengils, who was ſucceeded by

A. D. 685. Ceadwalla. This enterpriſing tyrant defeated the South Saxons, plundered the kingdom of Kent, and conquered the iſle of Angleſey, wherein his cruelties exceeded the bounds of ſavage barbarity. He dying, his nephew

A. D. 689. Ina aſcended the throne. This prince, formed to ſhine either in the council or the field, was declared in the third year of his reign head of the Saxon heptarchy. In the firſt year, the kingdom of the Eaſt Angles becoming vacant, thoſe people ſolicited him to rule over them; an inconteſtable proof of the general eſteem in which his character was held. He made war upon the Britons, who inhabited the weſtern parts of England, and, having ſubdued great part of their territories, he treated the vanquiſhed with humanity unknown to Saxon conquerors. He allowed them to retain the poſſeſſion of their lands, encouraged marriages and alliances with his ſubjects, and gave them the privilege of free denizens. Being firmly eſtabliſhed in his extenſive dominions, he applied his whole attention to form a code of ſalutary laws, which appear as ſupplementary to thoſe of Ethelbert, and the ground-work of thoſe afterwards inſtituted by Alfred the Great. After a long, glorious, and proſperous reign, he quitted his crown for a cloiſter, by turning monk, in 727, and his royal conſort retired to the monaſtery of Barking, where ſhe ended her days. Ina having thus abdicated the throne, his crown was placed on the head of his kinſman Ethelhard, who, after ſwaying the ſceptre thirteen years, died, and Cuthred, his ſucceſſor, was inveſted with regal authority.

A. D. 743. The whole reign of this prince was a continued ſeries of tumult and war. His ſon was ſlain in a mutiny, and this misfortune was followed by a rebellion in the weſtern parts of his kingdom. He turned his arms againſt the Britons in Cornwall, and united part of that county to his own kingdom. Dying at Benford, he left his crown to Sigebert his nephew, who aſcended the throne.

A. D. 755. This prince was young, very headſtrong, and violent. Haughty without dignity, and cruel without provocation; he treated his nobles with inſolence, and his people with inhumanity. Kenewulf, who ſucceeded him, drove the tyrant into the foreſt of Andreſwald, where he was killed by the hand of a ſwineherd.

Kenewulf was ſucceſsful in the beginning of his reign: but in the latter part, the victorious Offa took from him all his dominions north of the Thames. He was aſſaſſinated by Keneherd, brother of Sigebert, who, with his adherents, were all cut to pieces, after an obſtinate defence, by a ſelect body of noblemen. On the death of Kenewulf,

A. D. 754. Brithric, deſcended from Cerdic, mounted the throne of Weſſex. About this time the famous Egbert began to diſplay thoſe qualities which raiſed him to the ſovereign command of the Saxon heptarchy. His great merit, added to the affections of the people, which he had acquired, excited jealouſy in the breaſt of Brithric. Egbert, ſenſible of his danger, withdrew ſecretly into France, where he was kindly received by Charlemagne. By reſiding in this court, he acquired thoſe accompliſhments which enabled him afterwards to conquer the Saxons, and poliſh their barbarity; ſo that the misfortunes of his youth were of great advantage to his future conduct and fortune. Brithric reigned in peace till the year 789, when he was poiſoned by his infamous conſort Edburga, who fled to France, whither the avenging hand of heaven purſued her ſteps; for ſhe wandered about a forlorn vagabond, and through extreme want, periſhed miſerably.

The Danes, at this period, made their firſt deſcent on the Engliſh coaſts, landing a body of men from three ſhips at Portland; but they were defeated with great ſlaughter, and retreated with the utmoſt precipitation to their veſſels.

IV. EAST SAXONS, OR ESSEX.

THIS kingdom is ſaid to have been founded by Erkenwin in 527; though at what period it became an independent monarchy, is very uncertain. His immediate ſucceſſors were Sibert, Saxred, Seward, Sigebert, Sigebert the Little, Sigebert the Good, with a few other ſucceeding princes, whoſe names only, and the time they filled the throne, have been noticed by hiſtorians; and if any actions were performed by them worthy of being recorded, they are now buried in oblivion. The laſt of their kings was Swithred. After an interval of about one hundred and ninety years, the great Egbert reduced Eſſex, with the reſt of the heptarchy, by his ſuperior valour and conduct.

V. NORTHUMBERLAND.

THIS diviſion of the heptarchy comprehended the counties of Northumberland, York, Durham, Lancaſter, Cumberland, and Weſtmoreland. Its firſt monarch was Ida, whoſe reign commenced A. D. 547. He divided it into two provinces, Deïra and Bernicia; the former containing the ſouthern part of Northumberland between the Humber and the wall of Severus; and the latter the country ſituated to the northward of the wall, and bounded by Scotland. Ida was a juſt, generous, and brave prince. He fought many battles with the Britons, and was in one of them ſlain by Owen, prince of the Cumbrians.

For a long time the Saxons were oppoſed by the famous Arthur, who has been celebrated by ſo many fabulous writers, that his true hiſtory can hardly be known. He was born about the year 496, and in the year 516 he was appointed to the command of an army, raiſed to oppoſe the Saxons. In order to procure him more reſpect from the ſoldiers, he was crowned king of Gwent, a name given to the country lying between the Whye and the Severn. His perſonal bravery, generoſity, and affectionate care of his ſoldiers, procured him large reinforcements; and his ſucceſs againſt the invaders of his country, anſwered the moſt ſanguine expectations of his ſubjects.

Arthur was often victorious, but not always; nor was it in the power of any hero, how great ſoever, to drive the Saxons out of Britain. He ſometimes ſtopped their progreſs, and frequently defeated their army, when commanded by moſt able generals. During one of his expeditions againſt the Saxons of Northumberland, Madred, his nephew, whom he had left guardian, in his abſence uſurped the throne. Arthur returned, fought ſeveral battles with him, and at laſt, in a deciſive one, near Camlen, ſlew him with his own hand; but he himſelf received a wound which occaſioned his death, after a reign of twenty-ſix years, and was by his ſubjects univerſally lamented.

A. D. 586. Ethelfrid, one of the deſcendents of Ida, married Acca, daughter of Ella; and on the death of that prince, Ethelfrid ſeized the province of Deïra, and united it to Bernicia, forming by this means the kingdom of Northumberland. Acca dying two years after the nuptials, left an infant ſon named Edwin. Thoſe who were appointed his guardians, apprehending his life to be in danger, fled with him into North Wales, where, in the court of prince Cadwin, he received his education.

Prompted by his active diſpoſition, Ethelfrid turned his arms firſt againſt the Britons, whoſe country he laid waſte even to the gates of Cheſter. The Britons, alarmed at the progreſs of his victorious army, marched out with all their forces to engage him. They were attended with a body of one thouſand two hundred and fifty monks from the monaſtery of Bangor. Ethelfrid, ſurpriſed at ſo unuſual a ſight, enquired into the cauſe of their preſence. He was told they were prieſts, who came thus unarmed to pray for the deſtruction of his army. "Then, ſaid he, they are as much our enemies, as thoſe who employ their ſwords for the ſame purpoſe." He immediately ſent a detachment, who fell upon the defenceleſs monks, fifty only of whom eſcaped from the ſwords of their cruel aſſailants. Intimidated by this event, the Britons made a precipate flight; Cheſter was taken; and the monaſtery of Bangor levelled to its foundation. This ſtructure, according to Bede, covered ſo large an extent of ground, that its gates were a mile aſunder, and was inhabited by 2100 monks, who maintained themſelves by their own labour and induſtry.

A. D. 616. As young Edwin approached to manhood, his growing abilities began to diſplay themſelves. Ethelfrid had noticed them, when in their dawn, with an eye of jealouſy. He now dreaded their effects. The young prince, conſcious that his right of ſucceſſion would be conſidered by an uſurper as an unpardonable crime, endeavoured, as much as poſſible, to keep beyond the reach of his power. He wandered, therefore, through the neighbouring kingdoms for ſome years, wherein his engaging behaviour gained him univerſal eſteem. At laſt he found an aſylum in the court of Redwald, king of the Eaſt Angles. The uſurper, alarmed with the thought of innocence having found ſo powerful a protector, ſolicited Redwald to deliver up, or deſtroy his gueſt. Rich preſents were promiſed if he would comply, and war threatened in caſe of refuſal. Redwald, after rejecting ſeveral offers of this kind, ſeemed inclined to ſacrifice to intereſt the rights of hoſpitality, and detained the laſt ambaſſador, in order to take a final reſolution.

Edwin, having been informed of theſe tranſactions, came to a determination of remaining in Eaſt Anglia; thinking it would be better to die, in caſe the protection of that court failed him, than to prolong a life expoſed to the perſecutions of his powerful rival. This confidence in Redwald's honour, together with his other accompliſhments, engaged the queen in his favour, who perſuaded her huſband to embrace more generous ſentiments. Influenced by her ſtrong pleas in behalf of diſtreſſed innocence, Redwald knowing well the cruel diſpoſition of Ethelfrid, thought it ſafeſt to attack him before he was prepared for a defence. Accordingly, having raiſed a powerful army, he marched into the territories of Northumberland, where, in a pitched battle, Ethelfrid was defeated; and ruſhing furiouſly into the midſt of his enemies, was ſlain, after having killed Regner, a ſon of Redwald, with his own hand. His two ſons Oſwald and Oſwy fled to Scotland, and Edwin was ſeated on the throne of Northumberland.

A. D. 618. Being diſtinguiſhed for his impartial adminiſtration of juſtice, Edwin bent his whole attention, in the beginning of his reign, to civilize the manners of his ſubjects. He reclaimed them from a licentious practice of rapine, to which they had long been accuſtomed, and with the courage to attempt, had the happineſs to effect their reformation. The troops of robbers that infeſted the country, were diſperſed. His people were happy under his equal government, and were ready to ſacrifice their lives in his ſervice. A remarkable inſtance of this has been recorded by hiſtorians. Quinchelm, king of Weſſex, attempted to deſtroy by treachery this gallant prince, whom he could not defeat in the open field. The inſtrument he employed in this baſe buſineſs, was one Eumer, who, having obtained admiſſion to the preſence of Edwin, drew a dagger to execute his deteſtable intention; but Lilla, one of Edwin's officers, interpoſing his body between the aſſaſſin and his royal maſter, received the blow, and died with the glory of having ſaved the life of his beloved ſovereign.

A. D. 633. It is not ſurpriſing, that the proſperity of Edwin excited the jealouſy of his neighbours. Ceadwalla, king of the Britons, and Penda, king of Mercia, uniting their forces, advanced as far as Hatfield Foreſt in Yorkſhire, before Edwin was informed of their having entered his kingdom. Deſirous of freeing as ſoon as poſſible his ſubjects from the depredations of a ferocious enemy, he gave them battle with an army much inferior in number. Victory for ſome time ſeemed inclined to beſtow her palm on Edwin, when Offrid, his eldeſt ſon, being ſhot with an arrow, fell dead at his father's feet. This ſudden ſtroke determined the fate of the day; for Edwin, now exaſperated, loſt his uſual coolneſs and preſence of mind. Mad with parental fury at this fatal event, he ruſhed into the midſt of the enemy and ſoon found the death he ſought for. The Northumbrians, no longer headed by their darling king, fell into confuſion, and fled from the field of battle. Penda and Ceadwalla now tried who ſhould excel in acts of barbarity. Neither age nor ſex had power to move their pity. The ſword of deſtruction deluged the fields with the blood of their owners. Paulinus, with Ethelburga the queen dowager, fled into Kent, their native country, taking with them the jewels of the crown, and the conſecrated plate.

A. D. 635. A horrid ſcene of ravage and bloodſhed continued in Northumberland, till Oſwald, the ſecond ſon of Ethelred, roſe the deliverer of his country. He had retired to Scotland on the death of his father, where he had made great proficiencies in his ſtudies, particularly that of the military art. He was a Chriſtian; of ſtrict religion and virtue; endued with every talent neceſſary to adorn a throne. Touched with the calamities of his country, he quitted his retreat with a very ſmall force, and, entering Northumberland, took poſſeſſion of an advantageous poſt near the wall of Severus. Here he waited the approach of Ceadwalla, who, fluſhed with the effuſion of human blood, conſidered Oſwald and his ſmall party as his prey, rather than an enemy; but Oſwald's little band withſtood the firſt furious aſſault of the Britiſh army, who attempted to force their entrenchments.

Ceadwalla, enraged at this unexpected diſappointment, encouraged his men, and, leading them up to make a ſecond attack, he was pierced through the heart with an arrow. The Britons now, by the loſs of their general, fell into diſorder, which Oſwald took care to improve, and iſſuing from his intrenchments at the head of his little troop, he put the enemy to flight, obtained a complete victory, and in a ſhort time drove the Britons out of the kingdom with great ſlaughter. Upon which, having aſcended the throne of his anceſtors, he applied himſelf to cultivate the arts of peace. His great merit rendered him conſpicuous among the princes of the heptarchy, who choſe him chief of their political confederacy. This elevation rouſed the ambition of Penda, who could not behold, without envy, a rival in fame; for, as the inimitable Shakeſpeare obſerves, a man's virtues ſometimes prove his greateſt foes.

A. D. 642. This tyrant, without any provocation, without any reaſon aſſigned, without the leaſt complaint of injuries received, entered the territories of Northumberland, carrying fire and ſword among a people who had not injured him, and endeavouring to cruſh a prince, in contempt of the laws of nations, only becauſe his amiable qualities eclipſed his own. Oſwald advanced to meet the tyrant with what forces he could haſtily collect; but the number of his troops was too ſmall to contend with thoſe of Mercia, who were long uſed to conqueſt, and very numerous. The two armies met at Maſerfelt, where a furious battle enſued; in which Oſwald was ſlain, and his kingdom expoſed to the implacable malevolence of Penda; but making an attempt to take Banbury caſtle, he was baffled in his deſign, and directed his march towards Eaſt Anglia.

After the death of Oſwald, few remarkable tranſactions happened in Northumberland; the principal part of its hiſtory conſiſting of aſſaſſinations, with the murder and depoſition of weak princes.

VI. EAST ANGLIA.

THE Angles were a people from Jutland, who landed at different times in independent bodies on the eaſtern coaſt of England: having eſtabliſhed themſelves in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeſhire, and the iſle of Ely, at length formed a diſtinct kingdom. A. D. 575.

The firſt who took upon him the regal title and authority, was Uffa; but we have no account of him after his aſcending the throne, till his death, when he was ſucceeded by his ſon Titel, who reigned twenty one years in obſcurity.

A. D. 599. On the death of his father Titel, Redwald aſcended the throne. His merits rendered him ſo conſpicuous, that he was choſen head of the Saxon heptarchy, which high poſt of honour he filled with juſt applauſe. After a glorious reign of twenty years, he died, and his ſon Eorpwald, a very weak prince, was placed in the ſeat of royalty. Here he appeared to great diſadvantage after his illuſtrious father; indeed he was better qualified for a convent than a kingdom. Richbert, one of his generals, was ſo exaſperated at his ſupine inactivity, that he aſſaſſinated him with his own hand. After the death of Eorpwald, a ſucceſſion of obſcure princes filled the throne of Eaſt Anglia, of whoſe names that of Sigebert alone is worthy of notice. He began his reign in 636, and eſtabliſhed the firſt literary ſeminary we read of in the Engliſh hiſtory, which he furniſhed with maſters qualified to teach the ſciences. He reſigned his crown with great humility to Egric his kinſman, preferring the habit of a monk to the robes of royalty; but Penda, king of the Mercians, having entered the kingdom of Eaſt Anglia with his army, Sigebert was earneſtly requeſted to emerge from the convent, and take the field againſt the invader. Yielding to the preſſing ſolicitations of his ſubjects, he put himſelf at the head of the army, and engaged the Mercians; but, after an obſtinate conteſt, victory decided in favour of Penda, both Sigebert and his kinſman Egric being ſlain in battle.

A. D. 749. The laſt of the Eaſt Anglian princes was Ethelbert, who gained the love of his ſubjects by his learning, piety, and juſtice. A treaty of marriage was concluded between him and Althrida, daughter to Offa, king of Mercia, to whoſe court the unſuſpecting Ethelbert repaired, in order to conſummate his nuptials, from whence his ſubjects promiſed themſelves a long ſeries of happineſs, under the government of their beloved prince. But Offa, with whom ambition had more charms than virtue, violating the ſacred rights of hoſpitality, deſpiſing every thing held dear and ſacred by mankind, trampling upon the laws of honour, cauſed the innocent Ethelbert to be aſſaſſinated, and ſeized upon his kingdom, which after this event became a province to Mercia.

VII. MERCIA.

THE kingdom of Mercia, by much the largeſt and moſt opulent of the Saxon heptarchy, was founded by Crida, a deſcendent from Woden. A. D. 582. He ſwayed the ſceptre only two years; and on his death Ethelbert, king of Kent, ſeized upon the Mercian territories, but perceiving his uſurpation raiſed diſcontents, which might terminate in his own deſtruction, three years after he reſigned the throne to Webba, the ſon of Crida. Throughout a reign of nineteen years he performed nothing memorable. At his death he left the kingdom to Penda, his ſon. But Ethelbert, fearing the turbulent temper of Penda would involve the whole heptarchy in confuſion, conferred the crown on Cheorl, a nephew of the late king. He reigned eight years, but the traces of his government with his actions, are conſigned to oblivion, like thoſe of his predeceſſors.

A. D. 624. Though Penda was fifty years old when he aſcended the throne, he glowed with all the fire of youth, and had the advantage of having great experience united with a daring martial ſpirit. A love of conqueſt was his ruling paſſion, which blazed forth in ſuch horrid exceſſes, as have juſtly branded him with the appellation of a ſanguinary tyrant. The ſword of deſtruction ever attended his rout, and his whole reign was a continued ſeries of blood. It reflects an honour to Chriſtianity, that he always refuſed to embrace its tenets. Time could not quench the flame of his ambition, nor ſtop the progreſs of his inhuman devaſtations.

In the eightieth year of his age, when others are tottering on the brink of the grave, he marched at the head of his army into Northumberland, fully determined to depopulate the country; but victory now forſook his ſtandard, he attacked the Northumbrian army, and was ſlain by the ſword of Oſwy. He A. D. 655. placed Peada, the ſon of Penda, on the throne, but reſerved the greater part of the kingdom to himſelf, and on the death of Peada, took poſſeſſion of the whole: which he held till the Mercians, headed by three popular noblemen, recovered their independence, by driving Oſwy out of their dominions.

A. D. 660. Penda's ſecond ſon, Wulpher, who had been concealed by his ſubjects, was now placed on the throne of Mercia. This prince inherited the reſtleſs ambition of his father. War was his favourite purſuit, yet after his baptiſm, he was a remarkable friend to the church. Having conquered the Iſle of Wight, he next attacked the Britons, and drove them from their poſſeſſions between the Severn and the Wye. After theſe the kingdoms of Eaſt Anglia and Eſſex felt the power of his arms, which he reduced to a ſtate of vaſſalage, in which they continued to the end of the heptarchy. At length, after a reign of fifteen years, he was defeated by Egfrid, and dying, left his crown to A. D. 675. Kenrid his ſon; who being an infant, his uncle Ethelred, celebrated for his military talents, aſcended the throne.

His firſt expedition was againſt the kingdom of Kent, great part whereof he laid waſte. He next turned his arms againſt Egfrid, king of Northumberland, from whom he recovered Linſey. Soon after which, being infected with the gloomy ſuperſtition of the times, he reſtored the throne to Kenrid, his nephew, from whom he had unjuſtly withheld it, and retired into the monaſtery of Bardney, which he himſelf had founded, and died in obſcurity. Kenrid, after having reigned four years, followed his uncle's example, and, in the gloomy cell of a convent, ſequeſtered himſelf from the world.

A. D. 709. His ſucceſſor, Ceolrid, was a more active prince. He ſupported a war with Ina, king of the Weſt Saxons, and fought a bloody battle with him at Woodenſburg in Wiltſhire, when neither party could claim the victory. He attempted a dangerous taſk in thoſe times, to leſſen the power of the monks, which brought down upon him the reſentment of the whole fraternity; who, not ſatiſfied by taking away his life by poiſon, of which he died in the greateſt agonies, have aſperſed his memory, after devoting his ſoul to eternal perdition. So dangerous was it, in thoſe times of ignorance, to moleſt a body of men who, like the drones, lived upon the labours of others, and became a real burden to the ſtate.

A. D. 716. This unfortunate monarch was ſucceeded by Ethelbald, grandſon of Eoppa, brother of Penda. Inſtigated by a reſtleſs ambition, he invaded the territories of his neighbours. Had his abilities been confined to proper objects, his reign might have been glorious; but his manners were depraved, and his ambition unbounded. Yet in acts of benevolence to the church he was profuſely liberal. The monaſtery of Croyland was founded by him; and he exempted the clergy from all taxes and ſecular ſervices. He made inroads into Northumberland, from whence he returned loaded with ſpoils. His dominions having been attacked during his abſence by the king of Weſſex, he marched againſt the Weſt Saxons, drove them back into their own country, and demoliſhed Somerton one of the frontier garriſons. A peace having been concluded, the two kings joined their forces, and totally routed the Britons, who had drawn together a prodigious army. Ethelbald now applied himſelf to the affairs of his own kingdom, in which a rebellion broke out, and Ethelbald fell in a battle with the inſurgents. Beornred, who headed the rebels, took poſſeſſion of the throne, but the uſurper was driven from his ſeat of royalty by a band of nobles, who placed on the Mercian throne Offa, brother of Penda.

He was one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed of all the Mercian princes; and yet in A. D. 755. his character appears ſuch a ſtrange mixture of virtues and vices, that it is a difficult matter to determine which were predominant. Impelled by an inſatiable thirſt of power, he invaded Kent, and overran that kingdom, after killing the prince, who then filled the throne, with his own hand, in a battle at Otford. He next directed his courſe to Northumberland, where he loaded his army with ſpoils; and then, reducing Nottinghamſhire, annexed it to his own dominions. The king of the Weſt Saxons endeavoured to oppoſe the rapid progreſs of his arms; but he was defeated by Offa, and obliged to purchaſe a peace at the expence of all his territories on the north ſide of the Thames.

Having concluded a peace with the Britons, to prevent their future incurſions he threw up a ſtrong intrenchment, which began near the mouth of the river Dee in Flintſhire, and extending along the mountains, ended at the influx of the Wye into the Severn. The Britons, who had given not the leaſt diſturbance to the work while it was carrying on, were induced by the arguments of their king Marmodius, to attempt its deſtruction. With this view, under pretence of celebrating Chriſtmas, they aſſembled a body of forces, with which making a ſudden eruption into Mercia, they threw down the bank, and filled up the ditch in ſeveral places. Exaſperated at the treacherous violation of a truce they themſelves had requeſted, Offa condemned their hoſtages to ſlavery, and, entering Wales at the head of a powerful army, defeated the Britons in a very obſtinate battle.

Offa now made his ſon Egfrid coadjutor with him in the government, gave his daughter Ethburga in marriage to Brithric, and repulſed the Danes with great ſlaughter. But notwithſtanding theſe and other ſplendid actions, notwithſtanding the merit of ſome good qualities, notwithſtanding a ſeries of ſucceſs had raiſed his reputation to a great height, yet the murder of Ethelbert, king of the Eaſt Angles, will ever remain an indelible blot on his character; it ſullied the glory of his reign, and at this moment brands the name of Offa with infamy. To wipe off this ſtain, and perhaps to appeaſe the remorſes of his conſcience, he paid great court to the clergy, practiſing all the auſterities of the monks, ſo much eſteemed in thoſe times of groſs ſuperſtition. He even made a pilgrimage to Rome, where his riches could not fail of procuring him papal abſolution. Here he engaged to pay the pope an annual donation for ſupport of the Engliſh college at Rome. This ſum was raiſed by the tax of a penny, called Peter's penny, on each houſe poſſeſſed of thirty pence a-year. This donation he changed to a tribute or annual ſubſidy of three hundred and ſixty-five maricuſes, or rather a tax of a maricuſe per diem, which amounted to one hundred and thirty-ſix pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and ſixpence; the maricuſe being valued at thirty-ſeven Saxon pence, or three half crowns of our preſent money. Returning home, he founded the church and monaſtery of St. A. D. 796. Alban, which when near completed, he died at Offy, having reigned forty-ſix years. Egfrid, his ſon, after a ſhort reign of five months, was ſucceeded by Kenulf, deſcended by a collateral branch from Penda. He invaded Kent, took the king priſoner, and annexed that kingdom to his dominions, which he governed by a ſubſtitute. At his death he left one ſon and two daughters.

A. D. 819. Kenelm, ſon of Kenulf, being a minor, was murdered by order of his eldeſt ſiſter Quendrida. But ſhe did not reap the expected fruits of her execrable wickedneſs; for the unnatural wretch was depoſed by her uncle Ceolwulf, who alſo, in the ſecond year of his reign, was driven out of his kingdom by Beordrulph. Nor did this uſurper ſit more than two years on his throne, when he was defeated and ſlain by Egbert, king of the Eaſt Angles. His ſucceſſors Ludican and Wiglaff underwent the ſame fate, by the ſame hand, the Saxon kingdoms being unable to withſtand the conquering arms of Egbert, who united into one grand monarchy all the different kingdoms.

We have thus endeavoured to give a faithful account of the Saxon heptarchy. If we eſtimate its duration fom the arrival of Hengiſt, it will be found three hundred and ſeventy-eight years; but if from the eſtabliſhment of the kingdom of Mercia, it will be only two hundred and forty-three. Various cauſes have been aſſigned for its diſſolution; but the principal were, the ambition of the ſeveral monarchs, and the great diſproportion of their reſpective kingdoms. Hence ſprung continual wars, inteſtine broils, civil commotions, and in the end univerſal anarchy; for in Northumberland, Mercia, and all the other kingdoms, Weſſex excepted, the ancient race of kings being extinct, the nobles contended with each other for abſolute ſway; and in the furious ſtruggles, the people at large fell a ſacrifice to the ambition of a few aſpiring deſpots.

This æra of Paganiſm and monkiſh ſuperſtition was ſignaliſed by no diſcoveries in the arts. Literature was little cultivated by the monks, who graſped the ſhadow, inſtead of the ſubſtance; who ſubſtituted the gloomy devotions of a cell, for the benevolent precepts of the goſpel. Nor could the arts and ſciences flouriſh in a country harraſſed with diſſentions and continual wars; where the torch of civil diſcord was lighted by the hand of rapine; and where a deſire of conqueſt produced only a ſucceſſion of uſurpations, and a long train of national miſeries. Even Chriſtianity loſt its force among the Anglo Saxons. Religion, inſtead of enlightening their minds, involved them in the thickeſt clouds of ſuperſtitious bigotry. This will evidently appear in the view we now propoſe to take of their eccleſiaſtical hiſtory; which we ſhall attempt to ſketch out with the ſame impartiality, which has guided our pen in the relation of matters of a civil nature.

Religion of the Saxons; introduction of Chriſtianity among them; and their eccleſiaſtical hiſtory.

THE Saxon religion, previous to the introduction of Chriſtianity, was groſs idolatry, like that of all Pagan nations. They practiſed divination by lots in a peculiar manner, the prieſt preſiding in all public affairs, and the maſters of families in private concerns.

The Saxons had a great variety of idols. On Sunday they worſhipped the ſun. His image was placed in a temple, and ſolemnly adored. Monday was dedicated to the moon. Tuiſco they worſhipped on Tueſday, or Tuiſday. Woden on our Wedneſday, anciently called, Woden's-day. This ſeems to be the ſame with Mercury, and to him they offered human ſacrifices. Thor, the ſon of Woden and Friga, they worſhipped on Thurſday, or as it was then called, Thor's-day. Friday, Friga's-day, or Frigedeag, was devoted to Friga, or Venus. She was the goddeſs of peace, plenty, love, and amity: Saturday, or Seater's-day, was dedicated to Seater, called Saturn among the Romans.

But Hertha, or the earth, was their greateſt favourite and patroneſs. She was drawn in a vehicle covered with a ſacred veſtment, and placed in a holy wood in an iſland of the ocean. This portable temple was carried about by cows, and attended by a prieſt, who was ſuppoſed to know the ſecrets of the goddeſs, nor dared any other mortal to touch it. Whatever place the idol pleaſed to honour with its preſence, the inhabitants were inſtantly filled with joy; all tumult and war ceaſed; the ſword was ſheathed; and harmony proceeded from every tongue, and filled every breaſt. When ſhe returned to the grove, her carriage was waſhed in a lake appropriated to that purpoſe. Such was the idolatry of the Saxons when they ſettled in England. How far their manners were ſoftened, and their religion improved by the introduction of Chiſtianity, will appear in the ſequel.

In the time of Ethelbert, king of Kent, Chriſtianity was firſt introduced. That prince had been married ſome time to Bertha, daughter of Caribert, king of Paris; and it was ſtipulated in the marriage articles that ſhe ſhould enjoy, unmoleſted, the free exerciſe of her own religion. This princeſs being a Chriſtian, was attended by Luidhard, a prelate venerable for his learning and exemplary life. He preached in the church of St. Martin, which had been built in the time of the Romans, near the walls of Canterbury; and by his frequent diſcourſes with the nobility, converted many of them to the Chriſtian faith. The excellent underſtanding, and irreproachable life of the queen, contributed greatly to this end. Adorned with all the charms peculiar to her ſex, and with unaffected piety, which adds luſtre to greatneſs, ſhe inſpired the king and his whole court with favourable ſentiments of the religion ſhe profeſſed.

Promiſing circumſtances like theſe induced pope Gregory the Great to ſend Auguſtine, or Auſtin, with other monks, on a miſſion to the court of Ethelbert; who, on their arrival in France, were ſo intimidated by accounts of the difficulties they had to encounter with from the ferocious manners, conſummate ignorance, and idolatrous practices of the Saxons, that they ſent their ſuperior back, in order to obtain leave for relinquiſhing the undertaking; but Gregory ordered them to proceed on their journey; and to avert the imagined dangers that terrified his miſſionaries, he requeſted at the ſame time by letters, aſſiſtance from the court of France, recommending them in preſſing terms to their protection.

Gregory ſolicited not in vain; for, having been furniſhed with intepreters A. D. 597. from among the Franks, who ſtill ſpoke the language of the Saxons, and recommendatory letters to queen Bertha, Auſtin and his followers entered upon their voyage, and embarking, after a ſhort paſſage, landed in the Iſle of Thanet. Auſtin immediately acquainted Ethelbert with the deſign of his coming, requeſting his permiſſion to preach publicly the doctrine of the goſpel. The king ordered him to continue in the Iſle of Thanet, and followed his meſſage in perſon, attended with queen Bertha and the whole court, then the moſt ſplendid in all the heptarchy. The miſſionaries, having had an audience granted them, were received by Ethelbert in the open air, in order to break the force of their enchantments, ſhould they be employed againſt him. They advanced into the royal preſence with a ſlow pace, bearing a crucifix with their credentials, and chanting their litanies with all the marks of unaffectected devotion. The king ſeemed deeply affected, but did not at that time declare himſelf a proſelyte; however he permitted the miſſionaries to reſide in Canterbury, with a free toleration for preaching their religion whenever they pleaſed.

Auſtin and his brethren, by their auſterities, to which were united purity of manners, endeared themſelves to the people, who concluded that the promulgers of a religion founded upon the principles of ſelf-denial, and who mortified every paſſion, muſt act from conviction. The virtuous queen gave them free admiſſion to her chapel, and Ethelbert himſelf became their convert, and was baptized. The example of kings is always powerful. In this inſtance it was quickly followed by his nobles and people. Auſtin was conſecrated archbiſhop of Canterbury; the Britiſh churches that had fallen to decay were repaired or rebuilt; heathen temples were devoted to the worſhip of the true God; a ſeminary of learning was opened in the capital; and in a ſhort time the Chriſtian religion triumphed over the Saxon paganiſm and idolatry.

A. D. 616. There was however one reaſon to fear that this fair ſtructure would ſoon be demoliſhed, by the inceſtuous paſſion and criminal exceſſes of Eadbald, who abandoned his religion, that he might indulge his vicious inclinations. But Laurentius, the ſucceſſor of Auſtin, ſo effectually reclaimed the king, that, touched with unfeigned contrition for his enormous vices, he deſtroyed the Pagan temples, broke the idols in pieces, and firmly eſtabliſhed the Chriſtian religion in his kingdom. He extended his zeal for the goſpel even beyond the limits of his own territories, having contributed by the force of argument, but more by his exemplary piety, to the converſion of Edwin, king of Mercia.

A. D. 634. In Weſſex the Chriſtian religion was planted among the Weſt Saxons by Berennius, an Italian eccleſiaſtic, who was inveſted with an epiſcopal character, and created biſhop of York. Kinegils declared himſelf a convert; and ſome time after Quinchelm, being ſeized with a violent fever, embraced the faith, and died immediately after his baptiſm. A. D. 661. Kenwal alſo built the cathedral church of St. Peter at Wincheſter, as an atonement for the cruelties he had committed in the early part of his life; a ſpecies of pious fraud, which in ſucceeding ages of ignorance was much practiſed. Ceadwalla, another prince of Weſſex, after his converſion, repaired to Rome, where he was publicly baptized by Sergius II. who then filled the papal chair, but ſurvived the ceremony only a few days. He was buried in St. Peter's church, where his tomb may ſtill be ſeen.

A. D. 686.

A. D. 618. Ethelburga exerted herſelf ſucceſsfully in eſtabliſhing Chriſtianity in Northumberland. Her life was a pattern of conjugal affection, and ſhe poſſeſſed all the virtue and piety of her mother Bertha. Edwin liſtened with great attention to her perſuaſive exhortations; while Paulinus, her prieſt, ſatisfied all his ſcruples. After a conviction, founded upon mature conſideration, Edwin was baptized at York with many of his nobles, by Paulinus, in a church built for the occaſion, and dedicated to St. Peter. Choiſi, the Pagan high-prieſt, followed the king's example, and the Northumbrians flocked in ſuch numbers to be baptized, that the prelate was obliged to perform the ceremony in the rivers Gleni and Swale.

We muſt not here omit recording the firſt inſtance of an oppoſition to the ſee of Rome, by Egfrid, king of Bernicia, when Agatha filled the papal chair. A. D. 670. The popes in his time were believed to be infallible; but Egfrid paid no regard to their aſſumed infallibility. He deprived Wilfrid, biſhop of York, of his biſhopric, and ſeized upon his poſſeſſions. Wilfrid having appealed to the pope, his holineſs ordered that he ſhould be reſtored. The prelate produced an authentic copy of the ſentence; Egfrid, in a full council of his nobility and clergy, treated the papal mandate and juriſdiction not with contempt only, but alſo with reſentment; which fell upon Wilfrid, who, inſtead of being reſtored, or receiving any compenſation, was ſentenced to cloſe impriſonment. An oppoſition like this to the ſee of Rome, in times ſlaviſhly ſuperſtitious, is juſtly entitled to a place in hiſtory, as a memorable event.

Redwald, king of the Eaſt Angles, embraced the Chriſtian faith, but afterwards apoſtatized at the inſtigation of his wife, who was an idolatreſs.

A. D. 624. Eorpwald, influenced by the perſuaſions of Edwin, eſtabliſhed Chriſtianity in his dominions; and ſome of his deſcendents, fired with the religious enthuſiaſm of the times, either became inactive princes, or retired into convents, and relinquiſhed their crowns.

Many of the ſecular clergy among the Anglo-Saxons, were men of exemplary lives, and excellent magiſtrates. The latter depended upon the ſee of Rome, and directed the conſciences of the king and the great men, and were generally ignorant, and often a bloody ſet. A great deal of the Saxon barbariſm was likewiſe owing to the Daniſh invaſion, which left little room for civil, literary, or religious improvements.

Peada, ſon of Penda, having married a daughter of Edwin, through her influence, the Chriſtian religion ſpread over Mercia; for Penda, though not a Chriſtian, gave free liberty to his ſubjects to profeſs whatever religion they pleaſed. About the year 679, we find the kingdom of Mercia was divided into five diſtinct dioceſes, Worceſter, Lithfield, Leiceſter, Lindſey, and Hereford. Offa erected the magnificent monaſtery of St. Alban's, where he died, having reſided in it in the quality of a ſteward for ſeveral years.

When Sigebert aſcended the throne of Eſſex, he was a Pagan. To effect his converſion, and to plant Chriſtianity in that kingdom, Ethelbert ſent Melitus, who applied his abilities in the cauſe of religion with great ſucceſs. Sigebert, having been converted, joined Ethelbert in erecting the cathedral church of St. Paul, which was raiſed upon the foundations of a heathen temple, dedicated by the Romans to Diana. Melitus was the firſt biſhop. Theſe two princes likewiſe rebuilt the church of St. Peter, Weſtminſter, which had been demoliſhed by the Saxons, but remains at this day a noble monument of Gothic architecture. It is ſaid to ſtand upon the foundations of an idol temple dedicated to Apollo. A fatal blow to the idolatry of the Saxons by the founding of theſe two churches.

But notwithſtanding this introduction of Chriſtianity, it ſhould ſeem that they were little benefited by it; or, we ſhould ſay, by thoſe abſurd notions, and extravagant fables, that were ſubſtituted by ignorant, if not deſigning monks, in its ſtead; who involved their converts in the gloomy ſhades of ſuperſtitious bigotry, and by that means at once deprived them of its characteriſtic ſimplicity and genuine effects, ſo admirably calculated for improving and adorning mankind, and rendering them truly and permanently happy.

CHAPTER II.

Hiſtory of Egbert, the firſt founder of the Engliſh monarchy—with that of his ſucceſſors—to Canute the Great, the firſt Daniſh king of England,—including a faithful narrative of the various deſcents and eſtabliſhment of the Danes in this kingdom.

EGBERT,

The firſt Saxon king of all England, and founder of the Engliſh monarchy.

A. D. 800.

THIS accompliſhed ſtateſman and celebrated warrior was the ſole deſcendent of thoſe Saxon adventurers who firſt ſubdued Britain, and paſſed the earlier part of his life, as we have already obſerved, in the court of Charlemagne, king of France, where he reſided about twelve years, till the death of Brithric, king of Weſſex. Immediately upon which event, the Weſt Saxons ſent a deputation, intreating his acceptance of a crown, to which he was lineally intitled. Whereupon, returning to England, he was received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy.

Egbert, on aſcending the throne of his anceſtors, put a final period to the royal families in all the other kingdoms of the heptarchy; at the ſame time their internal diſſentions had rendered ſome very weak, and others almoſt defenceleſs. But inſtead of ſeeming to aſpire to conqueſt, he appeared in the character of a mediator between neighbouring kings, who were ſo well ſatisfied with his deciſions, that they appealed to his award upon all occaſions. In order the better to cover, and at a proper ſeaſon accompliſh his grand deſign, he firſt turned his arms againſt the Corniſh Britons, whom he defeated in ſeveral engagements.

The Welſh made the cauſe of their countrymen their own, ſo that the war became long, doubtful, and bloody. The aſſiſtance they afforded the Corniſh Britons, ſo irritated Egbert, that he entered Wales with fire and ſword; and, after ſubduing one of their provinces, made a law, which enacted, that if a Welſhman paſſed Offa's dyke, the offence ſhould be capital. But before Egbert could reduce this hardy race, though he had often vanquiſhed them, he was recalled to defend his own territories againſt Bernulf, king of Mercia. The Mercians were the only people capable of defending themſelves againſt the power of this young hero, who, before his acceſſion, had nearly attained abſolute ſovereignty in the heptarchy. They had reduced the Eaſt Angles under their ſubjection, and eſtabliſhed tributary princes in the kingdoms of Eſſex and Kent. Northumberland was in a ſtate of anarchy; and no ſtate of any conſequence remained but Weſſex, which being much inferior to that of Mercia in extent, was ſupported wholly by the abilities of the reigning prince.

Againſt theſe invaders of his country Egbert led his forces. A bloody battle enſued at Ellandun in Wiltſhire, where the army of Bernulf was totally defeated. Another complete victory gained ſoon after, finiſhed the conqueſt, by making Egbert maſter of Mercia. Kent made very little oppoſition. Eſſex was conquered with equal facility. The inhabitants of Northumberland, on his approaching their territories, came out to do him homage as their ſovereign. The Eaſt Angles, having declared in favour of the conqueror, implored his protection. Suſſex had been incorporated with his own kingdom.

A. D. 589.

Thus about four hundred years after the arrival of the Saxons in Britain, by the policy and bravery of one man, were all the kingdoms of the heptarchy united under one grand monarchy; which Egbert ordered to be diſtinguiſhed by the name of England. Having now attained the ſummit of his wiſhes, he was, by the unanimous conſent of his people, ſolemnly crowned at Wincheſter. But, though happy in the affections of his ſubjects, and by having reſtored peace throughout the kingdom, yet his tranquillity was ſoon interrupted by the piratical Danes, who made three ſucceſſive deſcents upon England. Theſe ferocious people ſeem to have been a mixture of different nations, but of the ſame original as the Saxons, agreeing with them in language, manners, religion, and cuſtoms. Charlemagne had carried on a war with them for thirty years, in which ſpace of time he drove them out of the more ſouthern provinces of Germany, and obliged them to take ſhelter in Jutland, Sweden, Denmark, and Norway; from whence they uſed to commit depredations on the ſea-coaſts of France as well as of England.

A. D. 832.

The Danes landed on the Iſle of Shepey. Having plundered the country, they retired before it was poſſible to attack them. This ſucceſs encouraged them to make a deſcent the year following at Tinmouth; but receiving a check from the inhabitants, they re-embarked, and cruiſing along the coaſt, landed near fifteen thouſand men at Charmouth in Dorſetſhire. Egbert, on the firſt news of this invaſion, marched againſt them with a body of new raiſed forces, who were unable to reſiſt their too formidable invaders, who gained a complete victory; and Egbert with his routed army were indebted for a ſafe retreat to the darkneſs of the night. But the Danes were convinced by this engagement, that they muſt expect the moſt vigorous reſiſtance from this warlike prince. They therefore retired to their ſhips, having firſt entered into an alliance with the Britons inhabiting Cornwall.

A. D. 835.

A few years afterwards the Danes returned to the Engliſh coaſt, and landed in Cornwall, where their army was augmented by a ſtrong reinforcement from their new allies. But Egbert was not to be intimidated by this formidable junction. He advanced againſt them to Hengſton-hill, where the two armies met. Victory now fought by the ſide of her beloved hero, and the Danes were totally defeated. The very few who had the good fortune to eſcape, fled with the utmoſt precipitation to their ſhips.

A. D. 838.

When advanced in years, Egbert was again obliged to take the field againſt thoſe diſturbers of his repoſe, and was again victorious. The Britons retired to their mountains; the Danes to their ſhips. The laurel had ſcarcely encircled the head of this intrepid, wiſe, and humane monarch, when death put a period to his conqueſts, but not to his fame, which will only terminate with the deſtruction of time and death. His dominions, but not his virtues, he left to be poſſeſſed by his ſon Ethelwolf.

This prince, during the life of an elder brother, was educated in a cloiſter, where he took ſub-deacon's orders in the monaſtery of Wincheſter; but his brother dying, a diſpenſation from pope Leo allowed him to re-aſſume a ſecular life. Upon his return to the world, he aſſiſted his father in ſeveral expeditions, but could never get the better of his preference to an inactive life.

A. D. 839.

The Danes, in the firſt year of Ethelwolf's reign, landed at Southampton, from three and thirty ſhips, and laid the adjacent country waſte. For five years following theſe freebooters inveſted the kingdom, committing every where the moſt dreadful ravages. In one of their deſcents they laid waſte the beſt part of Mercia, and burned the cities of London and Canterbury. They were indeed defeated ſeveral times with great ſlaughter, ſometimes by the gonernors of different counties, twice by Ethelwolf himſelf in perſon, and once by his ſon Athelſtan at ſea. However they commonly attained the ends of their expeditions, which ſeems at firſt to have been no more than to plunder the country. At length they reſolved to effect a ſettlement in England; and with this view fixed their reſidence, in ſpite of oppoſition, firſt in the Iſle of Thanet, and afterwards in that of Shepey, where they continued during the remaining part of this reign.

A. D. 854. Notwithſtanding the unſettled ſtate of his kingdom, Ethelwolf about this time undertook a journey to Rome, accompanied by his favourite ſon Alfred, who was then only ſix years of age. Benedict XIII. received him very courteouſly; but at the ſame time took advantage of his extreme weakneſs, by perſuading him to make a grant of three hundred marks a year to ſupport the lamps of St. Peter and St. Paul, and alſo to ſubject his whole kingdom to the intolerable load of Rome ſcot, or Peter's pence, a tax which continued from this period to the time of the reformation. But he granted a more ſolid proof afterwards of real devotion, by a formal charter, which beſtowed the tythes upon his own clergy. Having conſumed one year at Rome, he ſet off on his return to England.

Paſſing through France, he fell in love with Judith, the beautiful daughter of Charles the Bald, and giving way to his dotage, married her. This unpopular ſtep, added to the diſguſt they had long entertained on account of his impotent adminiſtration, occaſioned a reſolution among ſome of the nobility and prelates of depoſing him: but others more diſpaſſionate effected an accommodation, and reſtored the internal peace of the kingdom. The remaining part of this king's life was employed in acts of devotion and charity, and finiſhed, when it drew near to a cloſe, by an act of prudence, in ſettling the ſucceſſion to prevent diſputes after his death. He bequeathed his own territories to his ſon Ethelbert, on whoſe death they were to deſcend to Ethelred, and for want of male iſſue were entailed upon Alfred. His perſonal eſtate he divided equally among his children, ordering all his ſucceſſors to maintain one poor perſon out of every tenth family. Having thus ſettled his temporal concerns, he died in peace, after a reign of nineteen or twenty years. He was twice married; firſt to Oſburg an Engliſh lady, and afterwards to Judith. By his firſt conſort he had one daughter and five ſons. Theſe were Athelſtan, who died before him, and Ethelbald, Ethelbert, Ethelred, and Alfred, all of whom ſucceeded him in their turns.

ETHELBALD AND ETHELBERT.

A. D. 857. Theſe two princes aſcended jointly the throne of their father. The former was an abandoned, the latter a virtuous prince. The firſt infamous action of Ethelbald's reign, and the only one we ſhall notice, was an inceſtuous marriage with Judith, his father's widow, whom, by the remonſtrance of Swithen, biſhop of Wincheſter, he ſoon after divorced. He reigned only two years, and on his death the government of the whole kingdom devolved to his brother.

Ethelbert was as remarkable for his virtues as Ethelbald had been for his vices; conſequently the one was as much deteſted, as the other was beloved by his ſubjects. Humanity and moderation formed principally the character of Ethelbert. Throughout his reign no complaints of injuſtice were heard, no civil commotions diſturbed the tranquillity of the ſtate. His people would have enjoyed uninterrupted felicity, had it not been for the inroads of the Danes, who while they were lulled aſleep in the arms of peace, landed at Southampton, and extended their moſt ſhocking brutalities to Wincheſter, which they reduced to aſhes. Their progreſs was ſtopped by Offiric and Ethelwolf, two Engliſh generals, who after a bloody engagement, drove the few that had eſcaped the ſword to their ſhips without their plunder. But notwithſtanding this defeat, a ſhort time after another conſiderable body of theſe freebooters, having deceived the Kentiſh men by agreeing to a truce for a ſtipulated ſum, commenced hoſtilities ſuddenly in the night, and committed the moſt horrid maſſacres in the whole eaſtern part of the country. In the midſt of theſe diſtreſſes Ethelbert died univerſally lamented, and was ſucceeded by Ethelred, his younger brother, in conformity to the will of his father, though he left two ſons, Adelhelan and Ethelwould.

ETHELRED.

A. D. 866. This prince enjoyed very little repoſe during his reign, the irruptions of the Danes becoming more frequent and formidable than in that of his predeceſſor. Their firſt deſcent was made in the territories of the Eaſt Angles, who, by concluding a treaty with the invaders of their country, enabled them to enter the province of Northumberland, where they ſeized the city of York, and defended it againſt Oſbert and Ella, who periſhed in the aſſault. They next, under the command of Hingua and Hubba, penetrated into Mercia, and threatened the kingdom with univerſal ſubjection; but Ethelred, in conjunction with his brother Alfred, marched with a powerful army to Nottingham, diſlodged them from the poſts they had taken and obliged them to retire into Northumberland. From hence purſuing their route through Lincolnſhire, they deſtroyed the abbeys of Bardney, Peterborough, Ely, and all the monaſteries that lay in their way. Ebba, the abbeſs of Coldingham, expecting the invaders at her convent, ſummoned her nuns together; after deſcribing in glowing colours the luſt and cruelty of the barbarians, ſhe added, that for her own part ſhe was reſolved to preſerve her chaſtity at the expence of her beauty. Then taking up a razor, ſhe cut off her noſe and upper lip. Her example was immediately followed by the whole ſiſterhood. This bold expedient produced the deſired effect with regard to their honour, but coſt them their lives. For the brutal Danes, incenſed at their diſappointment, ſhut up the nuns in their monaſtery, and reduced to aſhes the whole edifice.

A. D. 870. Not long after, theſe inhuman ſavages entered Eaſt Anglia, and having defeated the governor Edmund, they barbarouſly murdered him by ſhooting at him as a butt or mark with arrows; from the burial of whom the town of St. Edmund's-bury takes its name. Proceeding the year following to Reading, they were oppoſed at Aſhdown by Ethelred and Alfred. When the Danes were drawn up in order of battle, Ethelred was aſſiſting at maſs within his tent, but could not be prevailed upon, though ſeveral meſſengers were ſent by his brother, by any apprehenſion of danger, to leave his devotions unfiniſhed; ſo that Alfred was obliged, to ſtand the ſhock of the whole Daniſh army, who attacked him with great fury; but Ethelred coming to his aſſiſtance, the Danes, after an incredible ſlaughter, were defeated. In this engagement they loſt one of their kings and five earls. Two months after another battle was fought, in which Ethelred was mortally wounded. A. D. 871. He died, leaving to his brother, with his prudence, bravery, and humanity, his cares and misfortunes. He was buried at Wimburn, in Dorſetſhire, not leſs lamented than beloved by his people.[*]

ALFRED THE GREAT.

A. D. 871.

Alfred, to whom the ſurname of Great has been applied with ſtrict juſtice, aſcended the throne when he was only twenty-two years of age; yet at this early period of life his virtues, which in others begin to bud, were in full bloom. He had given convincing proofs of his valour and the genuine goodneſs of his heart; but the time of trial now approached, wherein he was to be expoſed to the moſt imminent danger, over which he was to triumph with uncommon fortitude; and by ſurmounting which, with virtuous perſeverance, he was to reſtore ſtability to the throne, and happineſs to his ſubjects. At this time the proſpect before him was gloomy. The cities and religious ſtructures were levelled with the duſt; agriculture was neglected, and the farms were deſtroyed. He wanted ſubjects to recruit his armies; many of whom had periſhed by the ſword, and others fled to the mountains to eſcape from the cruelties of a barbarous enemy. His treaſures were exhauſted, and the whole country deſolated by the repeated depredations of lawleſs robbers. Such a ſituation would have depreſſed a ſoul leſs intrepid than that of Alfred's; but he alone viewed this ſcene of complicated diſtreſs with unſhaken firmneſs.

This prince applied himſelf with the utmoſt aſſiduity to expel the Danes from his dominions, who, being reinforced with freſh ſupplies under Guthrum, Oſcitel, and Amund, menaced the kingdom with a total ſubjection. In one year he fought eight conſiderable battles with them. But this wiſe monarch ſoon perceived that it would be impoſſible to prevent the inundation of thoſe barbarians, without deſtroying their naval force; he therefore fitted out a fleet of ſhips, which ſailed immediately to block up Exeter. In their paſſage they fell in with a large fleet of the enemy, conſiſting of one hundred and twenty ſail, which after a furious engagement they entirely deſtroyed. A ſhort time after a fleet under the command of the famous Rollo appeared on the Engliſh coaſts. When that of Alfred approached, the Dane thought it moſt prudent not to attempt a landing, therefore ſtood over to the French ſhore, and made himſelf maſter of Normandy in France.

However, notwithſtanding this diſappointment, ſupported by the moſt vigorous exertions on the part of Alfred, the reſtleſs diſturbers of his repoſe daily gained ground. The Daniſh general Haldane invited more of his countrymen over, while he himſelf at the head of a numerous army penetrated into the heart of the country as far as Chippenham. The torrent of bold invaders continually increaſed, rolled on, and bore down all oppoſition. Many of the Engliſh fled to the continent or to Wales; others were barbarouſly murdered; the remainder paid to the conquerors a ſervile obedience. Alfred, to whom ſubmiſſion was worſe than death, deſerted by his terrified ſubjects, unable to raiſe a force ſufficient to check his bloodthirſty enemies, was compelled to exchange his regal habitation for an obſcure receſs. Yet was he not univerſally forſaken. A choſen band, unconſcious of ſervile dependence, was attached to their beloved king, reſerving themſelves for better times; with hope that ſome favourable opportunity might happen for delivering their country. Having diveſted himſelf of all the enſigns of his royalty, he diſmiſſed his ſervants, and placed his family with perſons on whom he could rely.

Alfred, even now truly great, wandered about the ſwampy parts of Somerſetſhire in the habit of a peaſant, and at length took up his abode with a faithful cowherd, who had been entruſted with the care of ſome of his cattle. Here we ſee in our Engliſh hero an example of true greatneſs: regardleſs of indignities for the good of his country; the vigour of whoſe mind was ſtrengthened by misfortunes, while humiliation only gave an edge to his revenge. The wife of the cowherd, ignorant of the condition of her royal gueſt, ordered him one day to mind ſome cakes which ſhe had placed before the fire. Alfred, being employed in trimming his bow and arrows, through neglect ſuffered the cakes to burn, which ſo offended the good woman, that ſhe rated the king very ſeverely, telling him, among other paſſionate expreſſions, that he was ready enough to eat the cakes when baked, though he would not take care of them while baking. Alfred received this reproof with cheerfulneſs, having his mind ſolely engaged in meditating on the means of delivering his country from the ravaging enemy.

The ſearch of the enemy becoming at this time more remiſs, afforded Alfred frequent opportunities of viſiting his ſelect band, who had retired into the center of a bog, formed by the waters of the Thanet and Parret. Here they found about two acres of firm ground, which they ſurrounded with intrenchments. From this retreat, now called the Iſle of Athelney, Alfred at the head of his followers made frequent excurſions, ſo that the Danes often felt the vigour of his arm, without being able to diſcover from which quarter the blow was ſtruck,

The time now drew nigh when this great luminary was to emerge from the ſhade of obſcurity, and to re-appear with increaſed ſplendor. Ivar had returned to Denmark, whereupon the command of the army devolved upon his brother Hubba, who entered Devonſhire, laid ſiege to the caſtle of Kinwith, whither Odun, earl of that county, with a few of his followers, had fled. Odun made a vigorous ſally upon the Danes, routed the whole army, killed Hubba, took the famous ſtandard that had been wove by the three ſiſters of Hubba, with many incantations, and in which the Danes placed a ſuperſtitious confidence. This unexpected blow encouraged Alfred to execute a project he had formed, of viewing in perſon the Daniſh camp under the diſguiſe of a muſician. The harper was well received; and even introduced to the tent of Guthrum their prince. During his ſtay he remarked the ſupine ſecurity of the Danes, and their diſſolute manners; at the ſame time he heard they were to celebrate a grand feſtival, the conſequences of which he knew would be riot and diſſipation.

Alfred, having fully attained the end propoſed by his aſſumed character, returned to his friends, and immediately diſpatched meſſengers to every part of the kingdom, ordering them to aſſemble at a fixed time on the borders of Selwood foreſt. They obeyed with inexpreſſible joy the ſummons of their beloved monarch, who, ſoon finding himſelf at the head of a conſiderable army, led them to Edington, where the Danes lay encamped, and attacking them unawares, routed them with ſuch a terrible ſlaughter, that the ſurvivors were glad to agree to the alternative propoſed by their conqueror, of either abandoning the kingdom, or embracing Chriſtianity, Thoſe who refuſed to part with their religion, embarked for Flanders; but Guthrum, attended by thirty of his officers, repaired to Allez, a ſmall village in Somerſetſhire, where they were all baptized.

Peace now extended her olive branch over the whole iſland; and though in the courſe of twenty years following the Danes made many attempts on different parts of the kingdom, yet in moſt of them they were unſucceſsful, being either driven to their ſhips by the inhabitants, or defeated by Alfred, whoſe very name carried with it ſuch terror, that whereever he appeared they fled. So that after numberleſs deſcents, and committing a continued ſeries of outrages, they were at laſt entirely expelled the kingdom.

We have hitherto viewed Alfred the Great in the light only of an intrepid warrior, having given a detail of his actions chiefly of a military nature; we ſhall therefore now enter a little more fully into his glorious character, by conſidering his civil inſtitutions, and beholding him as the excellent ſcholar, the patron of learning, a wiſe legiſlator, an able politician, a moſt accompliſhed prince, who perhaps has never been equalled by any king of this or any other nation. After having defeated the Danes, he eſtabliſhed civil and military inſtitutions, encouraged induſtry, executed juſtice, and took the wiſeſt methods of providing againſt their future inroads.

He equipped a fleet of three hundred and thirty ſail of ſhips, which were diſtributed at proper ſtations round the iſland, to oppoſe the Danes either before or after they had landed. He raiſed a regular militia for the internal ſecurity of the kingdom. He rebuilt the cities, towns, churches and monaſteries that had been deſtroyed by the hand of ſavage barbarity. He repaired the caſtles on the ſea coaſts, erected new fortifications, and fortified London with walls and ramparts. He divided England into counties, which were ſubdivided into hundreds, and theſe again into tythings, or dwellings of ten houſholders. By this inſtitution every man was obliged by his own intereſt to keep a watchful eye over the conduct of his neighbours, and juſtice was impartially adminiſtered. He laid the foundation of that ineſtimable privilege we now enjoy, of trial by a jury of peers. He revived the Saxon Wittenagemat, which is the origin of our modern parliaments.

The diſpoſal of his revenue was ſingular. This was divided into ſeven parts; one for the ſupport of his houſhold; a ſecond for the payment of his ſervants; a third for the entertainment and relief of ſtrangers; a fourth for the ſupport of religious houſes founded by himſelf; a fifth for the ſupport of public ſeminaries of learning; a ſixth for the rebuilding monaſteries; and the remainder for the relief of the poor in general. He divided his time into three parts, of eight hours each, devoting eight to acts of devotion, eight to affairs of ſtate, and the reſt to ſtudy, ſleep, and neceſſary refreſhment. He made a conſiderable progreſs in learning; for beſides compoſing ſeveral original works, he tranſlated the Paſtoral of Gregory I. Boethius concerning the Conſolation of Philoſophy, and Bede's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory.

To encourage arts and ſciences, he invited learned men from the continent, and paid them liberally for inſtructing his ſubjects. No perſon who was not a ſcholar was allowed to hold any place under him. All freeholders, whoſe eſtates amounted to two hides of land, were obliged to ſend their ſons to ſchool till the age of ſixteen. He ſettled ſeveral ſeminaries, founded or at leaſt repaired the univerſity of Oxford; of which he himſelf was patron. He ſent perſons to ſurvey the Arctic regions, and if poſſible diſcover a north-eaſt paſſage to the Indies. We are informed by himſelf, in his tranſlation of Oroſius, that one Ohter, a Dane, ſurveyed the coaſts of Norway and Lapland by his direction, and preſented him not only with a clear deſcription of thoſe countries, but alſo brought with him ſome teeth of the ſea-horſe, and gave a good account of the whale fiſhery.

Alfred was very comely in his perſon, having a calm but lively aſpect. In his private character he was the moſt amiable perſon of the age. His temper was ſo even, that, after he had aſſumed the crown, he never ſhewed any ſigns either of levity or melancholy. If we conſider his piety, we might conclude he had never been out of a cloiſter; if his wars, that he had always lived in a camp; if his learning and writings, that he had paſſed all his time in an univerſity; if his civil inſtitutions, that he had made the laws the ſtudy of his life. In fine, this celebrated hero, this founder of the Engliſh conſtitution, this accompliſhed prince fought in perſon fifty-ſix battles by ſea and land; and, after having reſtored peace to his happy ſubjects, fell at laſt a victim to death, being the thirtieth year of his reign, and the fifty-third of his age. He left behind him two ſons and three daughters. His eldeſt ſon died before him. His ſecond ſon, Edward, ſucceeded him; and his third, Ethelward, devoted himſelf to literature. His eldeſt daughter was married to the earl of Mercia; his ſecond to the count of Flanders; and the third was abbeſs of a convent.

A. D. 901.

EDWARD THE ELDER.

A. D. 901.

This prince, who equalled his father in military talents, had no ſooner aſcended the throne than he was involved in war, his couſin-german Ethelwald, ſon to king Ethelbert, having laid claim to the crown. In order to ſupport his pretenſions, he put himſelf at the head of a ſtrong body of Norman freebooters, and joined the Danes of Northumberland, who had choſen him their king. Edward immediately collected his forces, and coming up with him in the neighbourhood of Bury, a battle was fought with great obſtinacy, in which Ethelwald, with the greateſt part of his officers, were killed upon the ſpot. But the death of this pretender did not eſtabliſh national tranquillity; for the Danes continued their ravages, notwithſtanding they were frequently purſued and routed with great ſlaughter.

A. D. 911.

The remainder of Edward's reign was filled up with ſucceſsful enterprizes againſt the Northumbrians and foreign invaders. He fought two ſignal battles at Temsford and Malden; he vanquiſhed Thurketill, a great Daniſh chief, and obliged him to leave the kingdom; he ſubdued the Eaſt Angles; he expelled Reginald and Sidroc, two rival princes of Northumberland; he conquered ſeveral tribes of the Britons, and even obliged the Scots to do him homage. Having by his bravery procured an interval of peace, he rebuilt the city of Hereford which the Danes had laid in aſhes; fortified Witham, repaired ſeveral churches; and erected the ſeminary of Cambridge into a univerſity.

A. D. 913.

In his military operations he was aſſiſted by his gallant ſiſter Elfleda, who had devoted herſelf to the exerciſe of arms, and fought many battles with victory by her ſide. She diſdained the occupations of her ſex; yet her prudence and virtue were equal to her courage. The happineſs and peace of her country ſolely engaged her attention, both which ſhe laboured ſucceſsfully to eſtabliſh and promote.

A. D. 921.

Notwithſtanding the Danes had been continually defeated by Edward and his intrepid ſiſter, who never loſt a battle, yet they now menaced the Engliſh with a general inſurrection. But the activity of Edward compelled them to abandon all their deſigns. They were driven from one part of the country to another; their caſtles were taken, and their towns laid in aſhes. They felt the ſame diſtreſs they had ſo often inflicted on others. Submiſſion now became their only reſource. They accordingly laid down their arms, and readily embraced the terms offered by the victor. After having reduced the whole kingdom of England, and principality of Wales to his obedience, death put an end to his glory and life in the twenty-fifth year of his reign.

A. D. 925.

The character of this prince was very reſpectable; but was eclipſed in the eye of his ſubjects by his being the immediate ſucceſſor of Alfred the Great; nevertheleſs, upon the whole, he was a great monarch, and a good man. By his firſt wife he had two ſons, Ethelwald and Edwin: and two by his ſecond wife Edgiva, Edmund and Edred, who afterwards reigned; to whom were added eight daughters. He had alſo by Egwina, the daughter of a ſhepherd, a natural ſon named Athelſtan, who immediately ſucceeded him on the throne, his legitimate children being thought too young to rule a nation expoſed to domeſtic calamities, and foreign invaſions.

ATHELSTAN.

A. D. 925. This prince aſcended the throne in the thirtieth year of his age, by the unanimous conſent of the people, whoſe choice was ſufficiently juſtified, if we conſider the ſplendid accompliſhments he poſſeſſed.

A conſpiracy was formed ſoon after his acceſſion, to wreſt the ſcepter from his hand, by Alfred, a nobleman of conſiderable authority, who was committed to priſon upon ſuſpicion. Alfred denied the charge, and offered to take a ſolemn oath of his innocence before the pope. Upon which he was ſent to Rome, where he had no ſooner taken the oath, moſt probably a ſacramental one, than he was ſeized with a fainting fit, and at the end of three days expired in great agonies. Whatever might be the cauſe of this tragical event, which bears a very ſuſpicious aſpect, Alfred was conſidered as guilty, and his eſtate given to the monaſtery of Malmſbury.

Soon after this event, Athelſtan endeavoured to give ſecurity to his government, by providing againſt the inſurrections of the Danes. To this end he marched into Northumberland, where he conferred on Sithric, a Daniſh nobleman, the title of king, and gave him his ſiſter Editha in marriage; but Sithric dying within a twelvemonth, Anlaf and Godfrid, his two ſons by a former marriage, aſſumed the ſovereignty, without waiting for Athelſtan's conſent. Their preſumption, however, was ſoon puniſhed by that monarch, who expelled them, when the former retired into Ireland, and the latter into Scotland, where he was protected by Conſtantine, who was then on the throne. This Athelſtan reſented; and marching into Scotland reduced the king to ſuch diſtreſs, that, being in danger of loſing his crown, he was at laſt compelled to ſue in the moſt ſubmiſſive terms for peace.

A. D. 943. However, after Athelſtan had returned to Weſſex, Conſtantine joined in a confederacy with Anlaf, a Daniſh prince ſettled in Ireland; and Owen, king of the Cumbrian Britons in Wales. Owen marched to join Conſtantine; and Anlaf ſailed from Ireland with a numerous army, in a fleet of two hundred and ſixteen ſail of large ſhips. Theſe forces were landed on the north ſide of the Humber, and proceeded immediately to form a junction with the allies. Athelſtan was no ſooner appriſed of this powerful confederacy, than he drew together his forces, and appeared unexpectedly before the enemy; when, to uſe Cæſar's words, he came—he ſaw—he conquer'd.

The Engliſh began the attack with uncommon bravery. The allies were driven from the field with prodigious ſlaughter; and the few that eſcaped ſought their ſafety in a precipitate flight. This battle was fought near Bruneford, or Brunſburg, in Northumberland; and the victory was in a great meaſure obtained by Turketul, the Engliſh chancellor, who with a ſelect band of Londoners broke through the ranks of the enemy, unhorſed the king of Scotland, who was dangerouſly wounded, and by his amazing valour decided the fortune of the day. There fell in this remarkable engagement, beſides Conſtantine, who died of his wounds, ſix kings of Ireland and Wales, twelve earls, ſeveral other general officers, and an almoſt incredible number of counts and private ſoldiers.

Athelſtan, after this deciſive action, enjoyed his crown in tranquillity, and died in the ſixteenth year of his reign, and in the forty-ſixth of his age. A. D. 941. This prince, throughout his reign, which conſiſted chiefly of military exploits, acted in every reſpect worthy of his illuſtrious deſcent. He employed men of learning to tranſlate the Bible into the Saxon language. He died without iſſue, and was buried in the abbey of Malmſbury.

EDMUND.

A. D. 941. This prince was the brother of Athelſtan, and at the age of eighteen was crowned with great pomp at Kingſton in Surry. He had ſcarcely aſcended the throne when the Northumbrians, thinking his youth a circumſtance in their favour, revolted. Hereupon Edmund ſuddenly marched into their country; and the rebels were ſo over-awed, that they ſtrove to appeaſe him by the meaneſt ſubmiſſions. He inſiſted upon their embracing the Chriſtian religion as a preliminary to a treaty, with which condition they made not the leaſt difficulty to comply.

A. D. 945. As the Cumbrian Britons had aſſiſted the Northumbrians in their late revolt, Edmund therefore marched into their country, at the head of his army, drove their prince from his throne, and beſtowed his dominions on Malcolm king of Scotland; who undertook the defence of the northern border, and did homage to Edmund as lord paramount of the ſoil.

After theſe exploits, peace took up her reſidence in the dominions of Edmund, and a ſeries of happy days were expected to flow from his mild government, when an event happened which put a period to his life, and the hopes of his ſubjects. While he was celebrating the feaſt of Auguſtine, in commemoration of the converſion of the Saxons, on the twenty-ſixth day of May, 946, at Pucle church in Glouceſterſhire, one Leolf, a notorious robber, whom the king had baniſhed, took his ſeat at one of the tables where he himſelf was at dinner. Provoked at this inſolence, Edmund ordered him to leave the place. On his refuſing, the king leaped from his ſeat, and ſeizing him by the hair dagged him to the ground; when the ruffian, thus puſhed to extremity, drew a dagger, and ſheathed it in the boſom of his prince. Death followed the wound, Edmund fell to the ground, and inſtantly expired. His nobles exaſperated to madneſs, fell upon the regicide, and cut him to pieces with their ſwords. Such was the untimely end of this young prince, after a ſhort but promiſing reign of about ſix years.

He was buried at Glaſtonbury, of which the famous Dunſtan was then abbot. By his queen Elgiva he had two ſons, Edwy and Edgar; but as they were very young, Edred his brother ſucceeded him on the throne. During the reign of Edmund, many new laws were enacted, ſome of which are ſtill exiſting. In his time robbery was puniſhed with hanging. The ſhort time this king ſat upon the throne renders it impoſſible to draw his character with ſtrict juſtice. His victories in the field are undeniable proofs of his valour; and the pains he took to make his people happy, are demonſtrations of his humanity and prudence.

EDRED.

A. D. 946. This prince, brother to the deceaſed king, was crowned at Kingſton in Surry, by Odo, archbiſhop of Canterbury. He had ſcarcely begun his reign, when the Danes of Northumberland land as uſual revolted; but Edred marched without delay into their country and reduced it. Soon after they again renounced their allegiance, and even added treachery to rebellion, by attacking his army on their return home; upon which he ſuddenly marched back into the heart of their country, and after ravaging it with fire and ſword, effectually ſecured it with garriſons of Engliſh forces.

A. D. 953. Having thus reſtored peace, Edred applied himſelf to exerciſes more ſuited to his inclinations than thoſe of war. Superſtition was the ruling paſſion in the breaſt of this prince, and the principal feature in his character. He ſubmitted his conſcience to the guidance of Dunſtan, abbot of Glaſtonbury, who was not only his ſpiritual director, but in reality the ſole governor of the kingdom. Dunſtan was one of thoſe enterpriſing men, whoſe ſtubborn prejudices have frequently interrupted the tranquillity of nations. He had no merits but thoſe of a churchman; as an Engliſhman, his qualities were execrable. The bigoted monarch was however deceived. He ſubmitted even to receive corporal puniſhment from his hand.

This bold eccleſiaſtic, taking advantage of Edred's weakneſs, introduced into England the Benedictines, a new order of monks, who immediately excited the moſt violent commotions, by openly profeſſing, among other rigid monaſtic auſterities, the doctrine of celibacy; and to render their rivals, the ſecular clergy, as odious as poſſible, every inſtance of diſſoluteneſs in that order was now repreſented as a general corruption, and when other ſlanderous topics were wanting, marriage became a general ſubject of invective, and their wives received the name of concubines. On the other hand, the ſecular clergy, provoked at this attack, vigorouſly defended themſelves; inveighing bitterly againſt an innovation, which, however advantageous to the church, is extremely pernicious to civil ſociety.

During theſe diſputes Edred died of a quinſey, on the twenty-third of November, in the year 955, in the ninth year of his reign, highly extolled by the deceitful flatteries of Dunſtan and his monks, who, it muſt be acknowledged, by the death of this weak king, loſt a generous benefactor. He left three children; but they being infants, he was ſucceeded by Edwy, his nephew, his brother Edmund's ſon.

EDWY.

A. D. 955. When this prince mounted the throne, he was not more than ſixteen or ſeventeen years of age; and was ſo remarkable for perſonal accompliſhments, that he obtained the ſurname of the fair. Unhappily for this young prince, he engaged in a controverſity with the monks, who have purſued his memory with the ſame unrelenting fury which they exerciſed againſt his perſon, during his ſhort and unhappy reign. What gave riſe to their malice was Edwy's having married a beautiful princeſs of the blood royal, named Elgiva, who, though only his ſecond or third couſin, was within the degrees of conſanguinity prohibited by the canon law. The monks therefore loudly exclaimed againſt him as guilty of inceſt, and even obliged him to agree to a divorce. Dunſtan, commonly called Saint Dunſtan, was at the head of theſe incenſed bigots. This precious ſaint firſt encouraged the dupes of his hypocriſy to inſult regal authority, and afterwards excited the people to rebel againſt their ſovereign.

Edwy, on the day of his coronation, in order to avoid exceſſive drinking, then univerſally practiſed, and probably attracted by ſofter pleaſures, retired to the queen's apartments, where, in the preſence of his mother, he indulged his fondneſs for his beloved Elgiva. The nobles haſtily concluding the abſence of their king an affront offered to themſelves, complained of the inſult. Dunſtan ſaw their diſguſt with ſecret ſatisfaction, and taking with him Odo, archbiſhop of Canterbury, they both ruſhed without ceremony into the royal preſence, reproached the king in the harſheſt terms, and forcing him from the arms of his wife, puſhed him forward to the company of the nobles. Edwy, though young, was exaſperated at the outrage of the inſolent monk; and to be revenged for the ſame, called him to an account for his adminiſtration of the treaſury during the reign of his predeceſſor. Dunſtan refuſed to comply; upon which he was declared guilty of malverſation in his office, and baniſhed the kingdom. But during Dunſtan's abſence, his cabal poiſoned the minds of the people with the higheſt encomiums on his ſanctity. They repreſented him as a vicegerent of heaven, and his baniſhment as an act of the greateſt impiety. Having by their clamours infuſed into the minds of the vulgar a falſe terror, they proceeded to the moſt outrageous violations of royal prerogative.

Odo, archbiſhop of Canterbury, one of the moſt violent fanatics of that age, ſuſpecting that the reſentment of Elgiva had been the principal cauſe of Dunſtan's baniſhment, ſent into the palace a company of ſoldiers, who with more than brutal violence dragged the fair queen from the arms of her huſband, branded her face with a red hot iron, in order to deſtroy that beauty with which Edwy was enamoured, and then conveyed her by force into Ireland. Edwy, enraged at the barbarity of Odo, turned his reſentment againſt the monks, whom he expelled the kingdom. Had he purſued his blow, and drove Odo alſo out of the iſland, an interval of tranquillity might probably have ſucceeded the outrages of diſappointed bigotry. But the popularity of Odo intimidated Edwy, who, finding it impoſſible to ſtem the torrent of rebellious oppoſition, ſhut himſelf up in the city of Glouceſter.

The lovely Elgiva, having about this time been cured of her wounds, was returning from Ireland, with the pleaſing hopes of once more enjoying the happineſs of her huſband's company, when ſhe unfortunately fell into the hands of a party ſent by Odo to intercept her, who ſteeled againſt the ſoft pleadings of humanity, ſacrificed her to the fury of unrelenting monks. This innocent female victim was hamſtringed, and died a few days after in moſt acute torments.

After this atrocious act of violence, a civil war raged with unremitting violence, which after an effuſion of blood terminated in a peace, by which Edgar, the younger brother, was proclaimed king, and to Edwy was allotted only the kingdom of Weſſex. Odo now having ſeen the accompliſhment of his wicked devices againſt his ſovereign, died; and the turbulent Dunſtan returning to England was made biſhop of Worceſter, then raiſed to the ſee of London, and afterwards to that of Canterbury. The unhappy Edwy, robbed of his amiable Elgiva, deprived of his kingdom, and excommunicated, whereby he was conſidered by his ſubjects as a monſter of impiety, pined in ſecret till he became a prey to melancholy, which brought him to the grave in the fifth year of his reign.

This prince's character has been loaded by monkiſh malevolence with almoſt every vice; but had he tamely ſubmitted to the government of an ambitious prelate and an artful monk, all his faults had been forgotten, and his virtues diſplayed with the ſpecious varniſh of monaſtic eloquence.

EDGAR.

A. D. 959. This prince, who had obtained the ſovereignty before the death of his brother Edwy, aſcended the throne in the ſeventeenth year of his age; and the ſurname given him of the Peaceable, becauſe his reign was undiſturbed by any commotions, foreign or domeſtic. It was principally to his great preparations both by ſea and land that he owed his ſecurity. He quartered a ſtrong body of regulars in the north, to keep the mutinous Northumbrians in ſubjection, and to repel thoſe of the Scots, while a powerful navy guarded the coaſts; which had orders from time to time to make the circuit of his dominions. The foreign Danes did not dare to approach a country that appeared in ſuch a poſture of defence; and the domeſtic Danes ſaw if they engaged in a rebellion, it would be attended with inevitable deſtruction. The kings of Wales, Ireland, Scotland, and the Iſle of Man acknowledged him for their ſovereign; and on a viſit he made to Cheſter, he is ſaid to have been rowed in his barge on the river Dee, by eight tributary kings.

What principally tended to the tranquillity of Edgar's reign, was his patronage of the monks; for the voice of the people was always in their favour, ſo that they could foment inſurrections, or preſerve the public peace almoſt at their pleaſure. His liberality to theſe eccleſiaſtics exceeded all bounds of diſcretion. He is ſaid to have founded more than forty monaſteries, and repaired many others. The recompence of theſe favours was the quiet poſſeſſion of his crown, and the name of Saint was, after his death, conferred upon him.

Edgar changed the tribute of the Welſh into three hundred wolves heads, the kingdom being then infeſted with wolves, and pardoned all crimes committed before a certain period, on condition the criminals ſhould produce a certain number of the tongues of thoſe animals; an expedient that produced ſuch diligence in hunting and deſtroying them, that they have not been ſeen ſince in this iſland. He was alſo ſevere againſt corrupt magiſtrates, inflicting exemplary puniſhment on ſuch as were guilty of mal-practices; and the better to enſure the adminiſtration of juſtice, he made an annual circuit through the different parts of his dominions; yet in his private life he is ſaid to have been very licentious; for though by permiſſion of the pope he ſummoned a general council, in which the ſecular clergy were accuſed of many irregularities, in order to beſtow their benefices on the monks, yet he himſelf at the ſame time carried off a nun from her convent by force, whoſe name was Wilfrid, and even committed violence on her perſon.

The king, being on a viſit at the houſe of a nobleman near Andover, and ſeeing his daughter, he became ſo enflamed with her beauty, that he inſiſted on having his inclination immediately indulged, by ſleeping with her that very night. The mother of the young lady, knowing the impetuoſity of the king's temper, pretended a ready ſubmiſſion to his will, but in order to preſerve the honour of her daughter, prevailed on a waiting woman to ſupply her place. When the return of light diſcovered the deceit, the king appeared not diſſatisfied with what had happened, and transferred his love to the good-natured damſel, who was called Elfleda the Fair. She became his favourite miſtreſs, whom he kept till his marriage with the beautiful Elfrida, of whom moſt writers of credit have related the following particulars.

This lady was the daughter of Olgar, earl of Devonſhire, and univerſally reputed the greateſt beauty in the kingdom. The fame of her charms had even been communicated to Edgar, who reſolved if they ſhould prove anſwerable to report to raiſe her to his throne. In order to inform himſelf of the truth, he ordered Athelwold his favourite upon a viſit to her parents, charging him to be very particular in the account he ſhould bring him of their daughter's accompliſhments. Athelwold in executing his commiſſion was ſeized with a violent paſſion for Elfrida, and inſtantly took a weak reſolution of ſacrificing his fidelity to his love. Upon his return he therefore told the king, that the high quality and riches of Elfrida had been the foundation of public fame, and that her charms would have been overlooked in a woman of an inferior ſtation.

Having thus diverted the king from his deſign, he ſome time after took an opportunity of renewing the ſubject; and obſerved to Edgar, that though her birth and fortune had not produced in him the ſame illuſion as in others with reſpect to her beauty, yet he thought upon the whole ſhe would be an advantageous match for himſelf. Edgar, pleaſed with the means of eſtabliſhing his favourite's fortune, not only perſuaded him to execute his purpoſe, but ſupported his ſucceſs by recommendations to Elfrida's parents, and ſoon after Athelwold was made happy by marrying the lady; but dreading a diſcovery of his mean artifice, he confined her in his caſtle in the country, nor would allow her the uſual ceremony of appearing at court, with the hope of preventing her ever being ſeen by his ſovereign.

Edgar, having by ſome of his courtiers been informed of the truth, paid Athelwold a viſit at his caſtle, when he was ſo enchanted with the beauty of Elfrida, who, notwithſtanding her huſband's entreaties to the contrary, uſed every art to ſet off her charms, that he reſolved to take vengeance on his favourite, who had deluded him by an act of baſeneſs of the moſt flagrant kind. For this purpoſe he took Athelwold under pretence of hunting into a wood, where drawing him aſide from his attendants, he ſtabbed him with his own hand, and was ſoon after publicly married to Elfrida. This lady, to expiate her crime in being the occaſion of her huſband's death, or moſt likely to ingratiate herſelf with the monks, eſtabliſhed on the ſpot where his blood was ſpilt a ſociety of nuns to pray for his ſoul. A very different kind of puniſhment this, than what had been inflicted on the unhappy Edwy and his beloved Elgiva.

In the hiſtory of this king's reign, the monks have given us rather a fulſome panegyric on his character, than a regular ſeries of actions. If the enriching churches and monaſteries may be conſidered as cardinal virtues, Edgar certainly poſſeſſed them in a high degree; and on this baſis alone his ſanctity is founded. However, without employing the pen of adulation, we may with ſtrict truth obſerve, that few princes in thoſe tumultuous times enjoyed ſo long an interval of tranquillity; to obtain which he took the moſt prudent methods. His political conduct particularly, in preventing invaſions, has given a real luſtre to his character. His laws for the preſervation of civil happineſs are equally admirable. His court was admired for its hoſpitality, and was generally filled with a concourſe of foreigners, who were charmed with his elegance, magnificence, and politeneſs. He extended his liberality in a bountiful manner to men of genius and learning. Ever attentive to the trade of his ſubjects, he regulated the coin of the kingdom, and took care that it ſhould be of a proper ſtandard, in order to ſupport the credit of the nation in foreign markets. He alſo reduced the weights and meaſures to one ſtandard. After enjoying a peaceable reign of ſixteen years, and in the thirty-third of his age, he died in 975, and was buried at Glaſtonbury.

Edgar, by his firſt wife, the daughter of earl Ordmer, had a ſon named Edward, who ſucceeded him on the throne; and by his ſecond wife Elfrida, he had a ſon called Ethelred, who ſucceeded to Edward. He had likewiſe a natural daughter by the nun Wilfrid,

Wilfrid, whoſe name was Editha, highly extolled on account of her piety.

EDWARD the MARTYR.

A. D. 975. This monarch, who was only fifteen years of age, aſcended the throne by the influence of Dunſtan, to whoſe power and favour he was indebted for a ſceptre; for a ſtrong party had been formed againſt him by the intrigues of his ſtep-mother, the fair Elfrida, who, under pretence that he was illegitimate, endeavoured to raiſe her own ſon Ethelred to the throne; but Dunſtan, with the principal nobles, declaring in favour of Edward's title, this prince was anointed and crowned at Kingſton in Surry. Dunſtan, having thus carried his point, determined to keep the monks in their benefices, and exerted to this end the king's authority in their favour; thus, in a manner, taking the government into his own hands. But as the declarations of a prince in his minority, and who was wholly at the devotion of Dunſtan, would carry with it the moſt glaring marks of ſuſpicion, recourſe was had to ſome pious frauds, believed by the populace to be real miracles.

At one time Dunſtan declared he had received a real revelation from heaven in favour of the monks; at another, he made a crucifix ſpeak to the ſame purpoſe; and, on a third occaſion, he contrived matters ſo, that the floor of the hall where the aſſembly was met ſunk down, and great numbers were cruſhed to death; but the beam which ſupported Dunſtan ſtood firm, and the prelate remained unhurt in the midſt of the general ſlaughter. Theſe impoſtures were interpreted by a deluded, ignorant people, as indiſputable deciſions in favour of the celibacy of the clergy, and no farther oppoſition was made to the deſign of extending it over the whole kingdom.

Not long after Edward's acceſſion to the throne, Elfrida retired, with her ſon, to Corſe-caſtle, in Dorſetſhire. All animoſities between her and the king, in appearance, ſeemed to have been entirely forgotten. On the part of Edward, this reconciliation was real; but Elfrida nurſed in ſecret the fury of revenge, and waited only for a favourable opportunity to execute her horrid deſign: and Edward, who poſſeſſed the moſt amiable innocence of manners, as his own intentions were pure, harboured not the leaſt ſuſpicion of others. Though his ſtep-mother had oppoſed his acceſſion, he always treated her with reſpect, and on all occaſions expreſſed the moſt tender affection towards his brother.

Returning one day from hunting near the ſeat of his mother-in-law, he embraced that opportunity of paying her a viſit, unattended by any of his retinue. When arrived at the caſtle, he was received with every external mark of affection by Elfrida, who invited him very courteouſly to alight; but finding him in a hurry to be gone, inſiſted upon his drinking a cup of wine as he ſat on horſeback. The young prince complied with her requeſt; but while he was holding the cup to his lips, a ſervant of Elfrida's, whom ſhe had prepared to execute her horrid purpoſe, came behind him and ſtabbed him in the back. The wounded prince clapped ſpurs to his horſe; but ſoon becoming faint with loſs of blood, he fell from the ſaddle, and his foot ſticking in one of the ſtirrups, he was dragged along till he expired. The ſervants of Elfrida followed Edward by the track of blood, and finding the body terribly defaced, they threw it into a well, where it was found by Edward's ſervants, and buried privately at Wareham in Dorſetſhire, whence it was removed to the monaſtery of Shaſteſbury, founded by Alfred the Great, where many miracles were ſaid to have been performed at his tomb; a circumſtance by no means remarkable, when we conſider how great a friend the king had been to the monks, who cauſed him to be canonized and honoured with the title of martyr, though his murder had not the leaſt relation to any ſufferings on account of religion.

The treacherous Elfrida, either ſtung with remorſe, or to prevent the impending ſtorm that threatened to overwhelm her, built ſeveral monaſteries, and ſubmitted to many penances; but notwithſtanding all her outward ſigns of contrition, whether real or affected, ſhe continued till the day of her death in obſcurity, nor could ever retrieve the good opinion of the people.

Edward was murdered in the third year of his reign. It is ſaid, that after this tragical event, Dunſtan offered the ſovereignty to Editha, the natural daughter of Edgar, who was abbeſs at the convent of Wilton; but conſcious of the defect in her own title, and terrified at the deplorable fate of her brother Edward, ſhe refuſed the offer, whereupon Dunſtan crowned Ethelred, who was then in the twelfth year of his age.

ETHELRED II.

This young king was the only ſurviving heir of the regal line. His whole A. D. 978. reign was continually diſturbed by the invaſions of the Danes, who now, after a long interval, renewed their attempts againſt this iſland. Theſe were at length ſo ſudden and frequent, that the people began to be diſpirited, and the troops were harraſſed by marching from place to place to repel them. In the mean time the credit of the monks declined at a rapid rate. The king was no friend to theſe hypocritical impoſtors. Three biſhops, their profeſſed champions, died. Dunſtan departing this life, was deteſted by the very people who, in his life-time, had honoured him as the firſt of ſaints; and it is thought that the public odium contributed to haſten his death.

Before the Danes attempted a general invaſion, they, by way of trial, A. D. 991. landed in ſeven veſſels near Southampton, ravaged the country, and departed with impunity. Six years after they made another attempt in the weſt with like ſucceſs. This year a large body of them, under the command of Juſtin and Guthmund, debarked at Ipſwich in Suffolk, when Brithnock, duke of Eaſt Anglia, marched to oppoſe them, whom they defeated and ſlew, and then carried the terror of their arms through all the circumjacent country. Ethelred, in this extremity, adopted the ill-judged policy of bribing the enemy, and gave them ten thouſand pounds to depart the kingdom. This diſgraceful expedient induced the Danes to appear the next year on the eaſtern coaſt, in hopes, either of obtaining more money, or of ſubduing an indolent people, who had not courage to defend themſelves.

At this time the Engliſh determined to aſſemble a fleet at London, capable of giving battle to the enemy. This prudent meaſure was rendered unſucceſsful by the treachery of Alfric, duke of Mercia. The king's council had formed a plan for ſurrounding and deſtroying the Daniſh fleet in the harbour; on which the traitor privately informed the Danes of their danger, and in the night before the engagement deſerted to them with a ſquadron under his command. Ethelred, enraged at his perfidy, apprehended his ſon Alfgar, and cruelly ordered his eyes to be put out; yet notwithſtanding Alfric's treachery, and the reſentment it might have been ſuppoſed he would harbour at the indignity offered to his ſon, the court had the folly to intruſt him again with the government he had before enjoyed.

Sweyn,

A. D. 993. As Sweyn, king of Denmark, and Olaus, king of Norway, were now well acquainted with the defenceleſs ſtate of England, they made ſeveral deſcents with a formidable armament. They alſo entered Kent, Suſſex, and Hampſhire. They ravaged Durham and Yorkſhire without oppoſition. Banbury was deſtroyed; Lindeſey laid waſte; and the Northumbrians, though deſcended from the Danes, were obliged either to join the invaders, or be plundered. A powerful army was raiſed to put a ſtop to their cruel depredations; but, in a general engagement, the Engliſh were abandoned by Frena, Frithegiſt, and Godwin, their three leaders, all of them deſcended from the Danes; which deſertion occaſioned a ſhameful flight of the reſt.

Theſe invaders, encouraged by this ſucceſs, ſoon after entered the Thames, in ninety-four veſſels, and laid ſiege to London; but the brave citizens made a bold defence, and obliged them, they having loſt a great number of men, to make a haſty retreat. In this national diſtreſs, recourſe was again taken to negociation, in which the Danes agreed to quit the kingdom on receiving ſixteen thouſand pounds. The terms were complied with by Ethelred, and the enemy returned to their own country. Olaus, who had embraced Chriſtianity, obſerved religiouſly the conditions of the treaty, nor ever after attempted to interrupt the tranquillity of the nation.

A. D. 997. We may naturally imagine, the interval of peace, purchaſed by this infamous treaty, was of no long duration. New armies of Daniſh pirates appeared in the Severn, under different leaders. They ravaged Wales, Cornwall, and Devon. Then returning to Briſtol channel, they penetrated into the country by the Avon, carrying fire and ſword into Dorſetſhire. The next year, having changed the ſeat of war, they entered the Thames, and laid ſiege to Rocheſter, near which place they defeated the Kentiſh men in a pitched battle. Theſe, and other ſucceſsful inroads, which were always attended with ſlaughter, fire, and devaſtation, drove Ethelred to his uſual reſource, that of meanly purchaſing a temporary peace with money; but the pirates now raiſing in their demands, required the payment of twenty-four thouſand pounds, to which Ethelred and his council imprudently ſubmitted. This ſum was levied by a general tax, which afterwards was diſtinguiſhed by the name of Danegelt.

A. D. 1000. The departure of the enemy procured the Engliſh another ſhort interval of repoſe, yet they made not the leaſt uſe of it for the purpoſe of ſelf-defence. Ethelred was however at length convinced, that unleſs ſome expedient could be found to check the rapid progreſs of the Danes, the whole kingdom muſt ſubmit to the yoke of ſlavery. He therefore determined to ſtrengthen himſelf, by forming an alliance with ſome foreign power. With this view ambaſſadors were diſpatched to Richard II. duke of Normandy, to demand his ſiſter Emma in marriage for Ethelred. The propoſals were accepted by Richard, and that princeſs, remarkable for her beauty, arrived in England, where the nuptials were celebrated with the utmoſt magnificence.

Many happy conſequences might have reſulted from this alliance, had not Ethelred followed the advice of perſons who had often betrayed him, and who, under the pretext of an inviolable attachment to his perſon, laboured to complete his ruin. But he wanted capacity to perceive the pernicious tendency of their advice, who prompted him to engage in a project that overwhelmed his people with miſery, and entailed eternal infamy on his memory. This was nothing leſs than a general maſſacre of all the Danes in England, except thoſe poſſeſſed of Eaſt Anglia and Northumberland, who were too numerous to be murdered by the few Engliſh reſiding in thoſe counties. The orders given on this dreadful occaſion were circulated with ſuch ſecrecy, that the miſerable victims received not the leaſt intimation of the dreadful ſentence that hung over their heads.

The horrid plot was put in execution on the feſtival of St. Brice, being the thirteenth of November, which fell on a Sunday, a day on which the Danes uſually bathed themſelves. They were maſſacred with ſuch circumſtances of brutality, as are too ſhocking to be related in the ear of ſoft humanity. Neither age nor ſex were ſpared. Chriſtians and Pagans ſuffered the ſame fate. No diſtinction was made between innocence and guilt; all alike indiſcriminately fell victims to Saxon brutality. Even the famous Gunilda was numbered among the ſlain.

This ſiſter of the king of Denmark having long lived in England, had embraced the Chriſtian religion, and was married to Paling, an Engliſh nobleman. When her brother Sweyn withdrew his forces from England, ſhe became an hoſtage for his duly performing the conditions of the treaty. She had always conducted herſelf with the greateſt prudence. Her actions were ſtrictly conformable to her religious profeſſions. But neither amiable manners, goodneſs of heart, nor exemplary virtue had power to ſave her. She was devoted to periſh, with her friends, by the barbarous orders of a timorous monarch. Nor was her death ſufficient to ſatisfy the thirſt for blood in the breaſt of ſuch inhuman ſavages. Cruelty was added to barbarity. Her huſband and children were murdered before her eyes, and then ſhe herſelf ſuffered the ſame fate. This ſweet innocent betrayed, while under the murdering hand of her butchers, neither fear nor timidity; not a feature in her countenance was diſtorted; and, in almoſt the agonies of death, ſhe told her inhuman murderers, that her murder would involve the kingdom in the moſt dreadful calamities. Never were prophetic words more completely fulfilled; and never did a barbarous policy prove more fatal to its authors.

Some of the Danes, inſtead of flying to the churches, ſtained with human blood, took refuge on board a veſſel; and ſailing to Denmark, carried the dreadful news to Sweyn, who, juſtly tranſported with rage, determined to revenge the death of his ſiſter with implacable fury, and devoted the iſland to deſtruction. The whole nation of Denmark was inſpired with the ſame ſpirit of reſentment. He embarked a powerful army on board three hundred ſail of ſhips. A. D. 1003. Cornwall firſt felt the effects of his fury. The city of Exeter next fell into his hands; the place was laid in aſhes, and the inhabitants treated with Gothic barbarity. Ethelred now finding his crown in danger, aſſembled a large army; but duke Alfric, who was intruſted with the command, feigning ſickneſs, refuſed to lead the forces againſt the Danes, till they were diſpirited, and ſoon after diſſipated. Alfric dying, Edric, who was no leſs a traitor, ſucceeded him in the government of Mercia, and the command of the Engliſh army.

The ſoldiers demanded to be led immediately againſt the Danes; but the perfidious Edric ordered a retreat, which was conducted in ſo careleſs a manner, that the enemy fell upon the rear of the Engliſh, and put the whole army to flight. The king ſeeing his territories reduced to the utmoſt deſolation, to which were added the miſeries of famine, ſubmitted in 1007 to purchaſe a peace, by the payment of thirty thouſand pounds. From this period we read of nothing but the treachery of Edric in repeated inſtances; the ſacking of cities; the burning of towns; and ſcenes of the moſt complicated diſtreſs viſible in every part of the kingdom.

kingdom. Treachery among the nobles, diſſention among governors, and deſpondency in the people, prevailed univerſally. At length the only expedient thought moſt eligible, was to purchaſe another precarious and infamous peace for the ſum of forty-eight thouſand pounds. Yet this did not bring them the ſhort repoſe they expected; for the Danes, regardleſs of their engagements, continued their wanton cruelties. They even obliged the county of Kent alone to pay them eight thouſand pounds, and murdered the archbiſhop of Canterbury for refuſing to countenance their demand.

A. D. 1014. Reduced to this ſtate of deplorable miſery, the Engliſh nobility, as their laſt and only reſource, ſubmitted to the conqueror. They ſwore allegiance to Sweyn, and delivered hoſtages for their good behaviour. Ethelred, no leſs afraid of the treachery of his ſubjects, than of the enemy, fled into Normandy, where he had before ſent Emma, his queen, with Alfred and Edward, their two ſons. Richard II. received his unhappy gueſts with marks of affection, that reflect honour on his character. After Ethelred's abdication, the Engliſh ſunk under a heavy load of miſery. They brooded in ſilence over their misfortunes, and gave themſelves up a prey to deſpondency. The Dane was a ſtranger to compaſſion. In his adamantine breaſt humanity pleaded in vain the cauſe of the people. But the triumph of this brutal tyrant Sweyn was of a ſhort date; for he died ſuddenly in leſs than ſix weeks after Ethelred had left the kingdom. The nobles and prelates, hoping their king had learned in the ſchool of adverſity a perfect knowledge of his paſt errors, ſent a deputation, requeſting him to take again poſſeſſion of his throne.

Ethelred, pleaſed with this teſtimony of the affection of his people, promiſed to redreſs all their grievances, and to exert his whole power in defence of his country; but on his return he diſcovered the ſame incapacity, cowardice, and credulity, by which he had been ſo often fatally miſled. He even liſtened to the inſinuations of that traitor Edric, againſt Sigefert and Morcaz, two of his principal nobles and faithful adherents in Mercia. Edric invited them to his houſe, where he cauſed them to be murdered; and Ethelred ſhared the infamy of this action by confiſcating their eſtates, and putting the widow of Sigefert in a convent. Prince Edmund, the king's eldeſt ſon, paying her a viſit there, fell in love with her, and married her ſoon after, without having requeſted the conſent of his father.

A. D. 1015. Canute, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Sweyn, became at this time as terrible to the Engliſh as his father had been. Having terminated the troubles in Denmark, he embarked his army, and landed without oppoſition on the coaſt of Weſſex. He put on ſhore at Sandwich all the Engliſh hoſtages, having barbarouſly cut off their hands and noſes; after which he ranſacked the eaſtern coaſt with mercileſs fury. His next expedition was againſt the counties of Wilts, Dorſet, and Somerſet; where the horrid depredations that were committed, raiſed ſuch a general alarm in the nation, that Edmund, the eldeſt ſon of Ethelred, collected a conſiderable body of troops in the north, while the perfidious Edric levied a number of forces in Mercia. The two generals led the army directly againſt the invaders of their country. Had Edric been faithful, in all probability Canute had been defeated. But ſincerity had nothing to do with this monſter in human ſhape; who formed a deſign of taking away the life of Edmund, or to deliver him into the hands of the enemy. Fortunately for this prince the plot was made known to him, juſt as the troops were making preparations for an engagement. A retreat now became abſolutely neceſſary; and Edric finding his perfidy detected, deſerted to Canute. Edmund now made ſome fruitleſs excurſions in the north, and then returned to London, where he found every thing in confuſion by the death of the king, who after an inglorious reign of near thirty-eight years expired, in the fiftieth year of his age. By his firſt wife Elgiva, he had Edmund, who ſucceeded him; Athelſtan, who died an infant; and Edwy, who was murdered by order of Canute. He had alſo three daughters, Edgiva married to an Engliſh earl; Edgitha to the traitor Edric, duke of Mercia; and the third named Edgina, who was eſpouſed to Uthred, earl of Northumberland. By his ſecond wife Emma, he had two ſons, Alfred and Edward; and a daughter named Goda. The ſons were immediately after their father's death conveyed by their mother into Normandy. The daughter was married firſt to Walter earl of Mantes, and afterwards to Euſtace, earl of Bologne.

This king poſſeſſed few if any of thoſe virtues that add luſtre to a crown. If we conſider his youth, it is not to be wondered at that he ſhould be without learning and without experience; but he had neither genius, capacity, nor courage; and his cruelty in maſſacring the Danes has ſtained his character with indelible infamy. His whole conduct was a ſeries of indolence, irreſolution, timidity, and weakneſs. At the beginning of his reign, his inactivity involved his country in misfortunes, and his attachment to an infamous traitor completed its diſtreſs; and if his abilities in time of peace were unequal to the taſk of governing the kingdom, little could be expected from his lazineſs and inactivity in times of danger, and cruel invaſions of foreign foes.

EDMUND II.

A. D. 1016. This prince was ſurnamed Ironſide, from his great ſtrength of body; and had he not been cut off in the prime of his youth, would probably have equalled the moſt illuſtrious of his predeceſſors. On his acceſſion he had to contend with a formidable rival in the perſon of Canute, who was already in poſſeſſion of the greateſt part of the kingdom, and, upon the death of Ethelred, had beſieged London. But the intrepid citizens defended their city with ſuch obſtinacy, and made ſo many ſucceſsful ſallies, that the king of Denmark was obliged to raiſe the ſiege, after having loſt a conſiderable part of his army. Edmund was at this time in Weſſex, whither Canute marched with a view of gaining a victory by ſurprize. The two armies met at Penne, in Somerſetſhire, where an obſtinate battle was fought, in which Edmund proved victorious.

The two kings ſeemed now determined to end the conteſt by one deciſive engagement. Edmund waited ſome time on the borders of Wiltſhire; and when Canute appeared, both parties began their neceſſary preparations. The ardent deſire of victory which the commanders manifeſted, inſpired their troops with martial enthuſiaſm. The armies engaged, and continued fighting, till night put an end to their furious attacks. Early in the morning the engagement was renewed, when each ſide gave aſtoniſhing proofs of undaunted valour. Edmund having penetrated far into the ranks of the enemy, they began to give way; but the traitor Edric revived their ardour, by ſevering the head of one Oſmer, a ſoldier, whoſe features bore a ſtrong reſemblance to thoſe of Edmund. Having placed this on the point of a ſpear, he expoſed it to the view of the Engliſh, calling upon them to behold the head of their king. Edmund obſerved the conſternation of his troops, but though he took off his helmet, and rode through their ranks, yet this trifling incident obliged him to leave the victory for that day undecided. However Canute, not willing to ſtand the trial of a third aſſault, quitted the field in the night, and embarking his forces on board his veſſels in the Thames, proceeded towards London, intending to renew the ſiege.

Hereupon Edric, apprehending that if Canute ſhould be vanquiſhed, he could expect little favour from the conqueror, repaired to the camp of Edmund, whoſe mercy he implored under the appearance of the moſt ſincere contrition; binding himſelf, by the moſt ſolemn oaths, to the obſervance of every duty of a faithful ſubject towards his king; and by his artful conduct this hypocritical traitor ſo worked upon the liberal mind of his prince, that he granted him an unconditional pardon, expecting that his own party would be ſtrengthened in the acquiſition of a man, whoſe loſs might at the ſame time tend to diſtreſs his enemy.

Edmund having now formed a reſolution of bringing the Danes to a deciſive battle, led his forces to Aſhdown in Eſſex, where a deſperate engagement enſued. The Engliſh forces had every reaſon to expect a complete victory, when the inſidious Edric interrupted the glorious ſucceſs that was juſtly due to the brave Edmund. The traitor obſerving that the Danes were ſtruck with diſmay, made a ſignal for the diviſion under his command to retreat, thus opening a paſſage for the enemy, who threw the Engliſh into ſuch conſternation and diſorder, that the utmoſt efforts of Edmund to rally his forces proved ineffectual; and in a ſhort time his army was entirely defeated. This overthrow was the more fatal by the loſs of Elfric, the courageous Ulfkettle, and a great number of other nobility. However Edmund was ſoon capable of again diſputing the field, having with the utmoſt alacrity recruited his forces at Glouceſter. Canute was aſtoniſhed to ſee this brave prince appearing in the face of his army with undaunted intrepidity, and knowing his laſt triumph was owing chiefly to treachery, he was alarmed for the conſequences. Indeed both armies ſeemed unwilling to engage. The two kings ſtood oppoſite each other, but neither gave the ſignal for battle.

In the interval of this ſolemn and momentous pauſe, the nobility of both parties interpoſed, and obliged their kings to compromiſe the diſpute by agreeing to a partition of the kingdom. A treaty was in conſequence concluded, wherein it was ſtipulated by mutual agreement, that all the country ſouthward of the Thames, with London and part of Eſſex, ſhould continue under the regal authority of Edmund, and that the northern diviſions of Mercia, Eaſt Anglia, and Northumberland, with all thoſe places which he had entirely ſubdued, ſhould be ceded to Canute.

About a month after this remarkable event, another happened, of a nature almoſt too ſhocking for the tender feelings of humanity to hear related. Alas! the tender plant of Engliſh liberty was in a moment blaſted by the malignant breath of treachery. Edmund, the gallant, active, generous and brave Edmund, was murdered by Edric, his brother-in-law. This vile traitor, this infernal villain, corrupted two of the king's chamberlains, and employed them to commit the barbarous, horrid deed; and immediately upon the commiſſion of the fact, carried the news himſelf to the Daniſh monarch, with every expreſſion of joy on his countenance. Canute, though ſhocked exceedingly, thought it prudent to diſſemble his ſentiments; he even promiſed to exalt him above all other lords in the kingdom; a promiſe which the king afterwards punctually and juſtly performed; for he cauſed the head of that infamous ruffian to be publicly cut off, and to be fixed upon one of the higheſt gates of London.

A. D. 1017.

After a reign of leſs than a year, Edmund was aſſaſſinated at Oxford: his death made way for the ſucceſſion of Canute to the government of the whole kingdom. By his wife Algitha he had two ſons, Edwin and Edward; and a natural ſon whoſe name was Edwy.

A. D. 1017.

THAT he might cover his uſurpation with plauſible pretences, Canute ſummoned a general aſſembly of the nobility and clergy, before whom he claimed the ſucceſſion, in violation of the right of the two minors, Edwin and Edward, by virtue of the late treaty, which he pretended to interpret in ſuch a manner as implied, that the ſurvivor ſhould inherit the dominions of the deceaſed, without any regard to the children of either. The nobles looked on each other with evident ſigns of aſtoniſhment, and in reply told him, that they would willingly conſent to his reigning over them as guardian to Edmund's eldeſt ſon. But Canute refuſed the crown upon ſuch a conditional and precarious tenure, inſiſting on a full confirmation of his claim. Sic volo, ſic jubeo, ſit pro ratione voluntas. "his will was law." Nor had any one honeſty or courage enough to oppoſe it. Hereupon all with one voice acknowledged his title, and having ſworn allegiance to him, he was proclaimed ſovereign of the whole kingdom of England, and afterwards crowned with great ſolemnity and pomp.

Notwithſtanding Canute had hitherto ſucceded to his wiſhes, he was perſuaded the Engliſh would embrace the firſt favourable opportunity of placing a deſcendent of Edmund on the throne of his anceſtors. He therefore had the young princes conveyed to the court of Sweden, with private letters intimating his intention of having them aſſaſſinated. But the Swediſh monarch, ſhocked at the thought of committing ſo horrid a crime, and willing to avoid the reſentment of Canute, ſent the young princes ſecretly to Solomon, king of Hungary, who received the intended victims kindly, and gave them an education ſuitable to their birth. Edwin, the eldeſt, died ſoon after; but his brother Edward married Agatha, daughter of the emperor Henry II.

Edmund's two ſons were, it ſeems, not the only perſons Canute thought proper to remove for his own ſecurity; ſeveral among the principal nobility of whom he had entertained a jealouſy, were ſacrificed to his ſafety. With theſe the traitor Edric ſuffered the juſt puniſhment due to his enormous crimes. Having deprived the Engliſh of thoſe leaders who were attached to their ancient kings, he reſolved by the impartiality of his adminiſtration to reconcile them to his government. To this end he ſent back to Denmark all his followers whom he could ſafely ſpare, reſtored the Saxon cuſtoms, and in the diſtribution of juſtice made no diſtinction between Engliſh and Danes.

About this time an obſtacle preſented itſelf which required policy rather than force to remove. Richard duke of Normandy, who had given protection to Alfred and Edward, two ſons of Ethelred, was diſpoſed to ſupport their claim to the crown of England, and fitted out a great armament in order to place them on the throne; but his fleet having been diſperſed by a ſtorm, Canute politically took the opportunity to ſend an embaſſy to Richard, demanding in marriage his ſiſter Emma, widow of Ethelred II. and offering his own ſiſter Heſtritha to the Norman prince. The propoſals were accepted, and the double marriage cemented their friendſhip. Such meaſures conciliated the affections of the Engliſh. Canute was no longer conſidered as an uſurper. The two nations became one people, and tranquil happineſs ſucceeded a long ſeries of calamitous troubles.

A war having broke out betweeen the Danes and Swedes, Canute found it neceſſary to viſit his hereditary dominions that were threatened with deſtruction. A body of Engliſh troops were ſhipped for this expedition under the command of earl Godwin; who performed a ſignal action, by which he gained the friendſhip of his ſovereign, and laid the foundation of the immenſe fortune he afterwards acquired. Being ſtationed near the Swediſh camp, and obſerving a favourable opportunity, he attacked the enemy in the night, threw them into diſorder, and purſuing his advantage, obtained a complete victory. In the morning Canute perceiving one part of the Engliſh camp deſerted, thought thoſe diſaffected troops had gone over to the enemy, but was agreeably ſurpriſed to find they were in purſuit of the Swedes, whom they had defeated. Charmed with this important piece of ſervice, he loaded the Engliſh with favours, and beſtowed his ſiſter in marriage upon earl Godwin, whom he treated with the greateſt regard ever ſince that time.

A. D. 1028. Canute landed in Norway at the head of a powerful army, and, expelling Olaus, kept poſſeſſion of that kingdom. Thus being king of England, Denmark, and Norway, he may be conſidered the greateſt monarch of his time. On his return into England, he was received by the people with every demonſtration of joy; and his courtiers carried their adulation to an extravagant height, of which the following inſtance has been recorded by moſt hiſtorians. One day as he was walking on the ſea ſhore at Southampton, his flatterers took occaſion to compare his power with that of the Deity; upon which he ordered a chair to be placed on the beach near the tide, which was then flowing apace; and ſitting down, with a commanding tone of voice he thus addreſſed the ocean: "Thou, O ſea, art a part of my dominions, and the land whereon I ſit is mine: my orders were never broken with impunity. I therefore command thee not to come any further, nor preſume to wet the feet of thy ſovereign." But regardleſs of the royal mandate, the ſea continued its uſual courſe, and waſhed him with its waves. Upon which he aroſe from his ſeat, and turning to his courtiers, "Behold," ſaid he, "the narrow limits of human power! The ſceptered hand of regal authority exerts its force in vain. The ſea rolls on in contempt of his will; the elements make no diſtinction between the monarch and his ſlaves. Learn then from this example to ſet proper bounds to odious flattery: and remember, that he only deſerves unlimited praiſes, who holds in his hands the powers of nature, and whoſe voice both the winds and the ſea obey."

Canute undertook his laſt military expedition againſt Malcolm, king of Scotland, who refuſed homage for Cumberland, as a fief of England, alledging it was due only to ſuch princes who inherited that kingdom by right of blood. Provoked at this inſult, Canute appeared on the frontiers of Scotland with a formidable army, which ſo alarmed the king, that he agreed, Duncan his heir, who was in poſſeſſion of Cumberland, ſhould make the required ſubmiſſions; and that the heirs of Scotland ſhould ever after acknowledge themſelves vaſſals to England for that province.

Canute met with little oppoſition afterwards from any quarter, and he filled up the few remaining years of his life after his uſual manner, when not at war, in regulating the civil adminiſtration of juſtice, and in founding churches, or endowing monaſteries, which in his days were conſidered as the nobleſt and moſt acceptable acts of piety. He granted a charter to the famous monaſtery of St. Edmund's-bury, whereby all its lands and privileges were confirmed; he gave the profits of the ports of Sandwich to Chriſt's church in Canterbury; he founded a monaſtery of Benedictine monks in the county of Norfolk, but his journey to Rome eſtabliſhed his character as a godly and pious king.

During his abode in Italy he laviſhed away prodigious ſums of money, more acceptable to his holineſs, no doubt, than devotions; for which he obtained ſome conſiderable privileges in favour of the Engliſh ſchools eſtabliſhed in that city; and an exemption for Engliſh pilgrims and merchants from all tolls and duties. On his return, all the laws paſſed by former kings of England, particularly thoſe of Ethelred, were enforced; ſeveral new ones, adapted to the times, were added; and the moſt prudent meaſures adopted to make his people happy. He continued in this laudable diſpoſition to the end of his life; which was cloſed at Shafteſbury, after a reign of eighteen years. A. D. 1035.

By his firſt wife Alfwen, daughter of the earl of Hampſhire, he had two ſons, Sweyn and Harold; and by his ſecond wife Emma of Normandy, ſiſter to Richard, he had a ſon named Hardicanute, and a daughter called Gunilda, who was married to the emperor Henry III. To Sweyn he gave Norway; to Hardicanute Denmark; and Harold ſucceeded him on the throne of England.

In different periods of life, the character of Canute was ſo various, that it is impoſſible almoſt to bring it under one general deſcription. In making his way to the thone of England, he had no ſooner attained the ſummit of his wiſhes, than he ſeemed to have changed his nature, and continued during the beſt part of his reign to govern the kingdom with ſuch juſtice, equity, and prudence, as ſecured him the affection of his own ſubjects, and commanded the eſteem of all other nations. The acts of devotion and ſuperſtition which he practiſed at the cloſe of his reign, could not obliterate his flagrant vices at the beginning; yet they ſhewed he was not unacquainted with the temper of his own heart, and the diſpoſitions of his ſubjects. Upon the whole, we will venture to ſay of this Daniſh monarch, that he was a conſummate ſtateſman, a wiſe legiſlator, and a brave general.

HAROLD.

A. D. 1036. This monarch, ſurnamed Harefoot, on account of his ſwiftneſs in running, ſucceeded to the crown, by the will of Canute in his favour; though by the treaty with Richard, duke of Normandy, Hardicanute, Emma's ſon, had an equal right of pre-eminence. A civil war now ſeemed inevitable. The Engliſh eſpouſed the cauſe of Hardicanute, who was a native; the Danes that of Harold. The latter had the advantage by being on the ſpot. He ſeized the riches his father had treaſured up at Wincheſter, and his party was eſpouſed by earl Godwin, who had the greateſt power of any nobleman in the kingdom. Nevertheleſs diſputes ran high, and might have terminated in fatal diſſentions, had not the two brothers, by the advice of the nobility, agreed to make a diviſion of the kingdom; in conſequence of which London, with all the country on the north ſide of the Thames, were allotted to Harold, and the reſt of the kingdom to Hardicanute: whereupon Emma fixed her reſidence at Wincheſter, and eſtabliſhed her authority over her ſon's ſhare of the partition till that prince ſhould take poſſeſſion of it. The ambition of Harold was however far from being ſatisfied with part of the kingdom; it graſped at the whole.

About this time the two princes, Alfred and Edward, arrived from Normandy on a viſit to their mother Emma, who ſeemed to be placed in a ſtate of great power and ſplendour at Wincheſter. But the face of affairs ſoon wore a more melancholy aſpect. Godwin had been gained by the arts of Harold, that he would eſpouſe his daughter; and while the treaty was yet a ſecret, theſe two tyrants laid a plan for the deſtruction of the Engliſh princes. Harold took an opportunity to invite both the princes to ſpend ſome days at his court. This was a very diſagreeable circumſtance to the queen, who, apprehenſive of ſome evil, never ſuffered both her ſons to leave her at the ſame time. She therefore found an excuſe for keeping Edward with her, and ſent Alfred only, properly attended.

Godwin met the young prince and his train on the road to London, and paid him ſuch reſpect, that the Normans in his ſuite ſeemed highly delighted with the honour ſhewn him; but near Guildford caſtle they were attacked by the vaſſals of Godwin. Six hundred of them were butchered, and Alfred being taken priſoner, had his eyes put out; after which he was carried to the monaſtery of Ely, where he ſoon died, but whether from grief, or additional violence from the hand of barbarity, is unknown. News of this ſhocking murder reaching the ears of Edward and Emma, the former fled back into Normandy, and the latter into Flanders; while the monſter Harold met with no oppoſition in taking poſſeſſion of his brother Hardicanute's dominions. But in order to prevent him from attempting any enterprize to his prejudice, he fitted out a powerful fleet. The taxes levied upon the people to ſupport it occaſioned great uneaſineſs. The Welſh broke out into open rebellion. An Engliſh army reduced the inſurgents, and to prevent like diſturbances, a law was paſſed, by which every Welſhman who croſſed Offa's dyke without permiſſion, was condemned to loſe his right hand.

Notwithſtanding the powerful naval armament of Harold, his brother Hardicanute was at Bruges with a ſtrong ſquadron, under pretence of paying a viſit to his mother; but all hoſtilities were prevented by the death of the king, who departed this life on the fourteenth of April, 1039, in the fourth year of his reign, and was buried at Wincheſter, leaving no favourable impreſſion of his character as a monarch or a man. His violence and cruelties had procured him the hatred of his ſubjects. His virtues, if he poſſeſſed any, are buried in oblivion; but his vices have been painted in moſt odious colours, for he was free from the ſuperſtition of the age,—he built no churches, nor repaired any monaſteries.

HARDICANUTE, or CANUTE THE HARDY.

A. D. 1039. This monarch, who, when abroad, had intended to make a deſcent on England to recover by force of arms his ſhare in the diviſion of the kingdom, receiving intelligence at Bruges of his brother's death, ſailed immediately to London, where he arrived with a fleet of forty Daniſh ſhips, and was crowned without the leaſt oppoſition.

By the firſt material act of his reign he diſcovered a meanneſs of mind, and ſordid deſire of revenge; while, at the ſame time, it held forth to the nation a ſtriking ſpecimen of his future conduct. He cauſed the body of Harold to be taken from its grave, the head to be cut off, and both to be thrown into the Thames. The body having been found by a fiſherman, the king gave orders that it ſhould be thrown a ſecond time into the ſame river; but being again fiſhed up, it was given to the Danes of London, who buried it privately in a church-yard, now known by the name of St. Clement's Danes. The next tranſaction that diſplayed the ill qualities of Canute the Cruel, was a heavy tax on his ſubjects for defraying the expence of his navy which he ſent back to Denmark. This unreaſonable impoſition, at a time too when the kingdom was threatened with a famine, produced univerſal diſcontent. Two collectors were killed in doing their duty, by the inhabitants of Worceſter; which ſo exaſperated the king, that he commanded Godwin and ſome other noblemen to plunder that city and ſet it on fire, which orders their brutal ſoldiers executed in the moſt wanton manner.

Young Edward being now invited to court by the king, he treated him with great hoſpitality. On his arrival from Normandy, Edward accuſed Godwin with being the murderer of his brother Alfred, and demanded juſtice againſt him. Hardicanute was diſpoſed to bring the offender to trial; but earl Godwin, who well knew his avaricious temper, was not at a loſs for means to divert the courſe of juſtice. When cited by the archbiſhop of York, to anſwer the charge, he made the king a preſent of a ſuperb galley, richly carved and gilt, and rowed by eighty men, each of whom wore a golden bracelet on his arm of the weight of ſixteen ounces. This ſplendid bribe anſwered his purpoſe; for the earl was permitted to exculpate himſelf by oath, which he readily took as a proof of his innocence, and was acquitted.

Several writers of repute have obſerved, that Daniſh inſolence was ſo exceſſive throughout this reign, that if an Engliſhman met a Dane in a narrow paſs, the former was obliged to ſtop, in a ſubmiſſive attitude, till the latter had gone by. To which is added, that the cuſtom of pledging each other when we drink had its riſe at this period, becauſe the Danes would frequently ſtab Engliſhmen while drinking; ſo that no one ventured to drink in the preſence of a Dane, without a friendly perſon pledging himſelf for his perſonal ſecurity.

The partiality of Hardicanute to the Danes, his cruelties, and ſevere extortions, rendered him univerſally hated by the Engliſh. But the government of this tyrant was happily of a ſhort duration; for being not leſs addicted to drunkenneſs and gluttony than to other vices, he fell a ſacrifice to his intemperance, dying in conſequence of a ſurfeit, after an inglorious reign of near three years. The Engliſh were ſo little affected with his death, that they made it a ſubject a mirth, and for many years celebrated it by an anniverſary, under the name of Flock-holiday.

Thus terminated, with the death of Hardicanute, the tyranny of the Danes, glutted with an effuſion of human gore, and diſtinguiſhed chiefly by the moſt barbarous cruelties, after it had ſubſiſted about twenty-ſix years, and near two hundred and forty from their firſt deſcent on the iſland of Britain.

CHAPTER IV.

SAXON KINGS, viz.

EDWARD AND HAROLD II.

The Saxon line reſtored—Edward, by the intereſt of Godwin, who obliges him, as a condition, to marry his daughter Edgitha, aſcends the throne, though not the true heir to the crown—Earl Godwin and his ſons are driven into baniſhment, but afterwards reſtored to the king's favour—Edward treats his mother Emma with ſeverity—His military tranſactions, civil adminiſtration, public acts of beneficence, death, and character—Is ſucceeded by Harold, the ſon of earl Godwin, who had not the ſmalleſt pretenſion to the crown—William, duke of Normandy, aſſerts his right, and to ſupport it invades England with a powerful army—The battle of Haſtings between him and Harold particularly deſcribed, in which the latter loſes his life and crown.

EDWARD THE CONFESSOR.

A. D. 1041. SOME authors affirm, that this king acquired his ſurname by his exemplary piety; but his canonization did not take place till two hundred years after his death, when pope Alexander III. affixed the diſtinguiſhed title of Confeſſor to his name.

After the death of Hardicanute, a favourable opportunity preſented itſelf to the Engliſh for ſhaking off the Daniſh yoke. Sweyn, the only ſurviving ſon of Canute the Great, was in Norway; the deſcendents of Edmund Ironſide were at the court of Hungary, and almoſt forgotten by their countrymen; ſo that earl Godwin alone was capable of oppoſing, with any chance of ſucceſs, the acceſſion of Edward to the throne. The intereſt of this enterpriſing nobleman was therefore ſecured by Edward's friends, upon condition that the king ſhould marry Godwin's daughter Edgitha, as a pledge of reconciliation for the ſuppoſed murder of Alfred.

This hard condition being aſſented to on the part of Edward, an aſſembly of the nobles was ſummoned at Gillingham, where the earl, in a long ſpeech, pointed out the advantages that would accrue to the nation by placing Edward on the throne of his anceſtors, and the miſeries that would probably overwhelm their country, ſhould Sweyn be permitted to aſcend the throne. At the concluſion of his harangue, he raiſed Edward in the midſt of the aſſembly, and cried out, "Behold your king." Loud ſhouts of applauſe enſued; Edward was elected by the unanimous reſolutions of the whole aſſembly, and ſome time after crowned at Wincheſter with great demonſtrations of duty and affection from his people. This ceremony was attended with ſome inſults on the Danes: but the king by his lenity ſoon reconciled them to his government, and the diſtinction of Danes and Engliſh was in a ſhort time forgotten.

The reign of Edward began by reſuming all the grants of his immediate predeceſſors. The poverty of the crown convinced the nation that this was abſolutely neceſſary; and as the burden was laid chiefly on the Danes, the nation was pleaſed to ſee them reduced to an equality with their neighbours. His ſeverity to the queen dowager his mother, though it expoſed him to more cenſure, was not univerſally diſapproved; and the nation in general was not diſpleaſed, at ſeeing Emma ſtripped of the treaſures ſhe had amaſſed, and confined in a monaſtery at Wincheſter, during the remainder of her life.

By the acceſſion of Edward, the Engliſh had indulged the flattering hopes, that they ſhould for ever be delivered from the dominion of foreigners; but diſappointment followed their ſanguine expectations; for the king, having been educated among the Normans, had imbibed ſtrong prejudices in favour of their manners. His attachment to them leſſened gradually the affections of his ſubjects, eſpecially when the court became filled with them, and the principal dignities of the church were conferred on thoſe ſtrangers. Their intereſt was ſo great that no favours were to be obtained but by their interpoſition. Their language, cuſtoms, and laws, became faſhionable in England. The people ſtudied the French tongue, while the courtiers imitated that nation in their dreſs, equipage, and entertainments. Their influence gave great offence to the pride of Godwin. He made frequent remonſtrances to the king, but in vain. He complained to the people. They agreed with him in ſentiments; and the earl, perceiving he ſhould be ſupported by his countrymen, determined to take the firſt opportunity of making Edward's foreign favourites feel the weight of his reſentment.

An event ſoon happened which enabled him to put his intentions in execution. Euſtace, count of Bologne, had paid a viſit to the king, and paſſing through Dover, A. D. 1048. on his return, one of his train, ſent before to provide lodgings, behaving in a very inſolent manner, loſt his life in the quarrel he had occaſioned. On which Euſtace and his ſervants, when arrived, renewed the conteſt, and killed the maſter of the houſe, who had been before wounded in the fray. This violence the inhabitants reſented. A tumult followed, in which near twenty perſons were killed on each ſide; and the count being overpowered by numbers, was obliged to eſcape from the fury of the populace by flight. Euſtace returned to Edward, and made moſt grievous complaints. The king, without enquiring into the affair, ordered Godwin, in whoſe government Dover lay, to march immediately with a body of troops, and put the town under military execution. Godwin refuſed peremptorily to obey, obſerving juſtly, that the Engliſh were not uſed to be condemned unheard; that the ſuppoſed guilty ought to have a fair trial by law; and that the riot in Dover was occaſioned by an inſolent foreigner, who ſhould be ſurrendered to juſtice, and ſuffer for the miſchief he had done; and that to inflict puniſhment before the accuſed were convicted, would be an infringement of every law, either human or divine.' The free manner in which theſe ſentiments were delivered, provoked Edward; he conſtrued them as an inſult, and reſolved to make the earl feel the effects of his reſentment. An occaſion for ſo doing very ſoon offered.

The Welſh had made inroads into the territories of the Engliſh. Edward ſummoned a general aſſembly of the kingdom at Glouceſter, to enquire into the cauſes of thoſe diſturbances. The Welſh accuſed Godwin and his ſon, in their abſence, as the aggreſſors. They were therefore cited before the council, and, on refuſing to obey the ſummons, were baniſhed the kingdom. Godwin retired to the court of Baldwin, earl of Flanders, and Harold his ſon to Ireland, where they found ſhelter from the frowns of incenſed majeſty. But the avenging ſpirit of the king was not yet ſatisfied; it fell upon Edgitha, the accompliſhed daughter of Godwin, Edward's conſort. It is ſaid, he had never cohabited with this amiable lady ſince their nuptials; and now, after having confiſcated the eſtates of the father and his ſons, he ſtripped the daughter of every thing valuable, and confined her in a monaſtery at Warewel. To prevent the murmurs of his people, which he imagined this proceeding might excite, he aboliſhed the odious tax of Danegelt. The reaſons which originally rendered it neceſſary had long ceaſed, but the burdenſome impoſt was ſtill continued. This action, exceedingly acceptable to the Engliſh, anſwered the king's intention; it endeared him to his ſubjects, and they became more ſtrongly than ever attached to his perſon.

About this time William, duke of Normandy, arrived in England, and met with a grateful return for the kindneſs he had ſhewn Edward in his exile. This viſit, exceedingly pleaſing to the nobles, was attended with conſequences they could not poſſibly foreſee; for William alledged, as one reaſon for his invaſion, that, during his ſtay, Edward had made a will in his favour, and therein conſtituted him heir of his dominions. The duke was highly ſatisfied with his reception, and returned to Normandy loaded with preſents. Soon after his departure, Emma, the queen dowager, paid the debt of nature, and was brought down with ſorrow to her grave.

A. D. 1052. Godwin had now, with the aſſiſtance of the earl of Flanders, raiſed a powerful ſquadron; and being joined by his ſon Harold from Ireland, he entered every harbour on the ſouthern coaſt, ſeized all the ſhips, and exhorted his adherents, who reſorted to him from all quarters, to aſſiſt him in procuring juſtice againſt the tyranny of inſolent foreigners. He now proceeded without delay to the mouth of the Thames. The city of London was thrown into the utmoſt confuſion, and the king marched at the head of his forces to oppoſe the landing of the inſurgents. But, by the interpoſition of his nobility, Edward was prevailed upon to liſten to propoſals for an accommodation, to which he was induced by Godwin's diſclaiming all intentions of violence againſt the perſon of his ſovereign, and deſiring only to juſtify himſelf by a fair and open trial.

Edward, convinced that it would be ineffectual to oppoſe the powerful interceſſion of his nobles, agreed to pardon Godwin, and a convention was concluded, wherein it was ſtipulated, that the earl ſhould give hoſtages for his good behaviour, and that all the Normans ſhould be expelled the kingdom. To this laſt article the king conſented with great reluctance; and not having power ſufficient to ſecure the hoſtages, he ſent them to the court of Normandy. Soon after this event Godwin was ſtruck with an apoplectic fit while ſitting at the king's table, and died three days after. His power did not end with his death, being transferred to his ſon Harold, who ſucceeded him in the government of Eſſex, Kent, Suſſex, and Weſſex, and in the office of ſteward of the king's houſhold. By his great affability and addreſs, Harold gained the friendſhip of Edward, and both the nobles and people were ſtrongly attached to his intereſt. He ſurpaſſed his father in abilities, and ſo conducted the affairs of the kingdom, that the Engliſh were ſupported againſt the Norman intereſt, and the olive-branch, in the hand of liberty, flouriſhed unaffected by the calamities of war.

A. D. 1054. The moſt remarkable warlike enterprize, undertaken in this reign, was on the borders of the kingdom. Macbeth, a Scottiſh nobleman, having murdered Duncan, his lawful ſovereign, and baniſhed his ſon Malcolm Kenmure, uſurped the throne of that kingdom; upon which Siward, earl of Northumberland, whoſe daughter Duncan had married, marched with an army into Scotland againſt the bloody uſurper, whom he defeated and killed in a pitched battle, and eſtabliſhed Malcolm on the throne of his anceſtors. The Welſh alſo, who had invaded the weſtern borders, were repulſed by Harold, who, purſuing them into their country, at laſt reduced them to ſuch extremity, that they applied to Edward in the moſt ſubmiſſive manner for peace, which was granted them, upon their preſenting him with the head of Griffith their prince.

It has been obſerved, that when earl Godwin was reſtored to the king's favour, he gave hoſtages for his good behaviour, who were ſent to the court of Normandy. Among theſe were Ulnoth the brother, and Hacune the nephew of Harold. They ſtill continued in confinement, though the death of Godwin had releaſed them from their obligations. Harold was uneaſy at ſuch near relations being detained in a foreign country, and alſo afraid leſt William ſhould take part with Edward, and retain them as a check to his ambition. He therefore, by pleading before the king bis entire ſubmiſſion, duty and ſervices, obtained his permiſſion to releaſe them. For this purpoſe he ſet out with a numerous retinue; but a violent ſtorm overtook him in his paſſage, and drove him on the French coaſt, into the territory of Guy, count of Ponthieu, who detained him priſoner at his court, and demanded an exorbitant ſum for his ranſom. Harold acquainted the duke of Normandy with his ſituation, the nature of his commiſſion, and the intent of his journey; who immediately ordered Guy to ſet his priſoner at liberty.

Harold immediately repaired to William's court, where he was received with every demonſtration of reſpect and friendſhip. William, who was no ſtranger to the power of Harold, after having expreſſed his willingneſs to deliver up the hoſtages, took that opportunity of diſcloſing to him the great ſecret of his pretenſions to the crown of England, from the will which he had been aſſured Edward intended to make in his favour; and at the ſame time ſolicited Harold's intereſt, making profeſſions of the utmoſt gratitude, in return for ſo great an obligation; and to attach him more firmly to his ſide, William offered him one of his daughters in marriage, provided he would ſwear ſolemnly to ſupport his pretenſions. Harold was greatly ſurpriſed; but being ſenſible he ſhould never recover his own liberty, nor that of the exiles, if he refuſed the offered terms, he profeſſed his reſolution of ſupporting Edward's pretended will, with all the aſſiſtance in his power. William loaded him with favours; but in order to render the oath more ſacred, he employed an artifice, well adapted to the ſuperſtition of the times, by conveying under the altar the relics of ſome of the moſt diſtinguiſhed martyrs. When Harold had taken the oath, he ſhewed him the relics, and admoniſhed him to obſerve, with the utmoſt reverence, an obligation that had been ratified with ſo tremendous a ſanction.

Harold renewed his profeſſions, while he contemned the ſtratagem of William, and found caſuiſtry ſufficient, in his opinion, to juſtify the violation of an oath, extorted from fear. He returned to England with the hoſtages, and determined to oppoſe the duke of Normandy with his whole power. The eaſier to accompliſh this end, and to further his future deſigns, he continued to practiſe every art of popularity; and by his expedition againſt the Welſh, but more eſpecially his generous treatment of Morcar and Edward, who had expelled Toſti his brother, duke of Northumberland from his government, ſecured to him, againſt all oppoſition, the public favour. Harold not only prevailed on the king to pardon the Northumbrians, and to confirm Morcar in the government, but even married Morcar's ſiſter, thereby breaking all meaſures with William, and procured for Edwin, the younger brother, the government of Mercia; on which Toſti, leaving the kingdom in a rage, repaired to earl Baldwin his father-in-law, in Flanders. Theſe, and other fortunate incidents gained him the affections of his countrymen, and all England was engaged in his intereſt.

A. D. 1065. Oppreſſed under the weight of age and infirmities, Edward ſeems to have been irreſolute, even at this period, with reſpect to ſecuring the ſucceſſion; and in this uncertainty died, on the fifth of January, 1066, in the ſixty-fifth year of his age, and the twenty-fifth of his reign.

He had a fine and noble perſon, but not a genius anſwerable to it. He was moderate in all his appetites; not ſubject to violent paſſions, and equally free from pride and oſtentation. As to his piety, for which the monks have ſo highly extolled him, perhaps the beſt inſtance that can be produced of it was his converting a little monaſtery into a moſt beautiful cathedral, named Weſtminſter Abbey, which he endowed with rich revenues, and dedicated to St. Peter. Here he built his own ſepulchre, which has ſince been the common burying place of our Engliſh monarchs. His continence certainly proceeded not from religious motives, and his treatment of his mother is entirely inexcuſable. However, it is ſaid, he was punctual in the performance of his religious duties, and charitable to the poor.

The moſt commendable and ſhining part of his character, which reflected a luſtre upon the reign of Edward, was his attention to the adminiſtration of juſtice. As a legiſlator, he deſerves the higheſt applauſe. He collected the laws of his predeceſſors, Ethelbert, Ina, and Alfred, and digeſted them into one body, which he called, The common Law of England. This compilation, though now loſt, was long regarded by the people as a moſt precious treaſure. They were probably the foundation of the charters granted by Henry I. Henry III. and, above all, of the Great Charter, or Magna Charta, granted by king John, which is juſtly conſidered as containing the great outlines of the Engliſh conſtitution. To finiſh the picture of Edward's character in few words, he had no atrocious vices, nor any active virtues.

HAROLD II.

A. D. 1066. This prince had taken his meaſures ſo well before Edward's death, that he aſcended the vacant throne without oppoſition. Edgar Atheling, ſon of Edmund Ironſide, the undoubted heir to the crown, was overlooked, and the claim of the duke of Normandy was not even mentioned. The citizens of London, the clergy, and the people in general, were unanimous in their wiſhes. Harold was therefore crowned on the day after Edward's death, by Aldred, archbiſhop of York, and his election was confirmed by the aſſembly of the ſtates. The firſt acts of his reign were exceeding popular; ſuch as ſeemed to juſtify, in the fulleſt manner, the favourable opinion that had been entertained of him. He eaſed his ſubjects of ſeveral taxes, liſtened to their complaints, and diſpenſed juſtice with an impartial hand. He knew that Edgar Atheling was beloved by the people, as being the only remaining heir of their ancient kings; he therefore, to make the friends of that prince eaſy, created him earl of Oxford, gave him a liberal education, and treated him with the utmoſt reſpect. By theſe prudent meaſures the voice of faction was no longer heard.

But though Harold had no competitor at home, he had many difficulties to encounter. The duke of Normandy was making preparations to wreſt the ſceptre from his hand; in the mean time, Toſti, his brother, having been furniſhed with ſhips and troops by the earl of Flanders, plundered the Iſle of Wight, and then ſailed to Sandwich; from thence he proceeded northward, entered the Humber, and made a deſcent on Yorkſhire. Soon after, having been joined by Harfagar, king of Norway, who came attended by three hundred ſail, the united fleets began to ravage the country on all ſides, when Morcar, earl of Northumberland, and Edwin, earl of Mercia, having haſtily collected ſome forces, ventured to give them battle, but were defeated and unfortunately ſlain. Harold was no ſooner informed of this defeat, than he haſted with an army to the protection of his people, who flocked from all quarters to join his ſtandard. Marching with great expedition, he came up with the enemy at Standford-bridge, on the river Derwent. A general and bloody engagement enſued. The armies are ſaid to have conſiſted each of ſixty thouſand men, and the battle continued from ſeven in the morning till three in the afternoon. At laſt victory declared in favour of Harold; Toſti and Harfagar were ſlain; and their fleet fell into the hands of the conqueror; who generouſly gave the ſon of Harfagar his liberty, and allowed him to depart with twenty veſſels.

Harold had ſcarcely received the congratulations of his friends, when news was brought him, that William, duke of Normandy, was landed in the ſouth of England with a great army. A large fleet which Harold had aſſembled, and which had cruiſed all ſummer off the Iſle of Wight, had been diſmiſſed, on a falſe report having been circulated, that William, diſcouraged by contrary winds, had laid aſide his intended expedition. Hence the Norman fleet proceeded without interruption, and arrived at Pevenſey, in Suſſex, where the army quietly diſembarked. The duke, as he leaped on ſhore, happened to ſtumble and fall, but had the preſence of mind to turn the omen to his advantage, by ſaying aloud that he had taken poſſeſſion of England.

The Normans had been for ſome time diſtinguiſhed for their valour; and the proſpect of glory and advantage which preſented themſelves, engaged a vaſt number of volunteers to join in the expedition againſt England. The fame of the intended invaſion ſpread abroad, and multitudes crouded to tender their ſervices, with their vaſſals and retainers. The Norman found leſs difficulty in completing his levies, than in chooſing the moſt hardy veterans, and in rejecting the offers of thoſe who were impatient to acquire fame under ſo renowned a leader. William therefore ſoon found himſelf at the head of a numerous army and a powerful fleet, whereby he was enabled to contend for a crown, which the people had unanimouſly placed on the head of Harold. William could neither plead right of election, nor that of inheritance; not even a party in England was formed in his favour. But impelled by ambition and revenge, he reſolved to purſue the plan he had adopted, and ground on conqueſt a right he could not ſupport by any legal claim. He ſent ambaſſadors to Harold, upbraiding him with breach of faith, and ſummoning him to reſign the poſſeſſion of the crown. Harold was not to be intimidated with threats; he anſwered that he was able to defend his right againſt any one who ſhould dare to diſpute it. By this ſpirited reply William was convinced that he had nothing to expect from negociation. An invaſion was therefore reſolved on.

Many circumſtances concurred to favour an enterprize, which otherwiſe muſt have appeared romantic. William, celebrated for his valour, had triumphed over the joint efforts of France and the neighbouring princes. The Normans mans were a brave and warlike people; all the warriors of Europe were deſirous of ſerving under his ſtandard, and of ſharing in the ſpoils of a flouriſhing nation. The emperor declared in his favour, and iſſued a proclamation, permitting all his vaſſals to ſerve under him. The count of Anjou aſſiſted him with a conſiderable body of forces; the count of Ponthieu followed his example. Euſtace, count of Bologne, joined him in perſon. The count of Bretagne ſent him a body of five thouſand men, under the command of his eldeſt ſon. But what eſpecially tended to render William's expedition ſucceſsful, was the pope's declaration in his favour. He ſent him a conſecrated banner, and by publiſhing a bull, declaring the juſtice of William's cauſe, animated all the Chriſtian powers to aſſiſt him in his enterprize. Harold was declared a perjured uſurper, and every perſon excommunicated, who dared to call in queſtion the validity of William's pretenſions.

The invader's hopes of ſucceſs were moreover increaſed by the ſtate of England at this time. A peace of fifty years had ſoftened the diſpoſitions of the Engliſh. Their love of their country was exchanged for effeminate luxury. And when the armament of William had now ſecured a landing, Harold had loſt many brave men in the late action. He likewiſe found himſelf weakened by the deſertion of his old ſoldiers, who, overpowered with fatigue, ſecretly withdrew from their colours. Happy might it have been, if this brave prince had coolly weighed theſe alarming circumſtances in the ſcale of calm deliberation. Gurth, his brother, beginning to be apprehenſive of the event, adviſed the king to protract the war. He obſerved that it was for the intereſt of the duke of Normandy to attempt a ſpeedy deciſion, and to put his whole fortune upon the iſſue of a ſingle battle; but that the king of England had more certain and leſs dangerous means of enſuring ſucceſs. That the enemy, having no reſources in caſe they were defeated, would fight to the laſt extremity; but if they were harraſſed by ſmall ſkirmiſhes, diſtreſſed by want of proviſions, and drawn into the country, fatigued by the bad weather, deep roads, and the diſtreſsful circumſtances of approaching winter, they muſt of courſe fall an eaſy prey, without the hazard of a battle; that if he acted only upon the defenſive, the Engliſh, feeing their property and liberty in danger, would fly to his army for ſhelter; and that, at leaſt, if he thought it neceſſary to hazard a general engagement, he ought not to expoſe his own valuable life, on which depended the ſafety and independence of the kingdom.

As the martial ſpirit of Harold was not to be controlled by the cautious maxims of deliberate prudence, he rejected this wholeſome advice; and ſo confident was he of ſucceſs, that he offered William a ſum of money, if he would prevent the effuſion of blood and depart the kingdom, the conqueſt of which was a mere romantic attempt; but the duke, in return, required Harold, either to reſign the kingdom, to hold it of him in fealty, to ſubmit to the arbitration of the pope, or to fight him in ſingle combat. To which Harold replied, that the God of battles would ſoon be the arbitrator of their differences. The two armies were now encamped very near each other. Having, in company with his brother Gurth, reconnoitred the enemy, when Harold ſaw them in force, he was convinced that he had been too precipitate in his reſolve; and on his return, propoſed retreating to London, in order to augment his army. Gurth oppoſed the meaſure with ſome warmth, obſerving to the king, that he had now proceeded too far to retreat; that his honour was engaged; and that to retire a ſingle ſtep might be attended with fatal conſequences; that he ſhould have maturely conſidered his advice before he had advanced in the face of the enemy; at preſent he had only the alternative to chooſe, either to conquer, or periſh.

The king's army had taken poſt on the declivity of a hill, and were greatly inferior to the Normans in number. Harold had loſt many of his men in the engagement at Standford-bridge, and others had ſince deſerted from his banner; yet ſtill he entertained ſuch preſumptuous hopes of victory, that he ſuffered his ſoldiers to ſpend the night before the battle in jollity and riot; whereas the Normans paſſed the night in acts of devotion. At break of day the duke himſelf heard maſs in public, and received the communion. While arming, he happened to place his breaſt-plate upſide down, which he conſtrued into a lucky omen, ſaying, ſmiling, it only ſignified that the ſtrength of his dukedom ſhould on that day be converted into the ſtrength of a kingdom. He hung about his neck the relics of ſaints, on which Harold had ſworn to aſſiſt him; and then gave orders for a conſecrated banner, which he had received from the pope, to be carried in front of the army.

William having thus drawn all the aid he could from ſuperſtition to encourage his men, he ſummoned his officers together, and made them a ſpeech ſuitable to the occaſion. He obſerved, that a reſolute courage would be required in the approaching hour of combat, the prize of victory being exceeding valuable, and the deſtruction attending a defeat inevitable; that if their martial ſpirit could conquer a kingdom, they would be juſtly entitled to its poſſeſſions as a reward of their valour; but that if, by a remiſſion of their known courage, they loſt the day, an enraged enemy would hang upon their rear, the ſea would meet them to oppoſe their retreat, and an ignominious death be the certain puniſhment of negligence or timidity; that the enemy was enervated by luxury, and a neglect of military diſcipline, having had a peace of fifty years; that the army of the uſurper had conceived a reſentment againſt him, on account of his having reſerved to himſelf the whole plunder in the late engagement at Standford-bridge: that Harold, conſcious of his own breach of faith, anathematized by the pope, and forſaken of heaven for his crimes, would either dread to face them in the field, or be overtaken there by the fate he juſtly merited; that he doubted not but they would behave conſiſtent with their wonted bravery, maintain their character like men accuſtomed to conquer, and, with him, leave the event to the Lord God of hoſts.

As the awful moment now approached, which was to determine the fate of Harold and England, William drew up his army in three lines. The firſt conſiſted of light armed infantry; the ſecond was compoſed of heavy armed battalions; and the third of cavalry, at whoſe head he placed himſelf; theſe were ſo diſpoſed, that ſtretching beyond the infantry they flanked each wing of the army. Harold, not having cavalry able to cope with that of the enemy, which made five parts in ſix of their whole force, commanded all his horſemen to diſmount, and formed his army into one deep Roman phalanx, defended in their rear by woods, and in front by a deep ditch and a line of hurdles. The ground towards the enemy was the declivity of a hill, on the top of which he placed his men in ſuch a compact body, that their ſhields joined together, not having any opening between them. They were armed only with Daniſh battle axes, javelins or darts, not making uſe of either long or croſs bows, both of which were employed by the Normans with great ſkill and ſucceſs. The Kentiſh men formed the van of the army, a poſt they always claimed as their due; while the brave citizens of London guarded the ſtandard. The king placed himſelf at the head of the infantry, expreſſing in his countenance a determined bravery, and in his addreſs to his ſoldiers, a fixed reſolution to conquer or die.

The Normans began the attack by moving in regular order of battle, and ſinging as they advanced the ſong of Roland, one of their diſtinguiſhed warriors. Their firſt charge was made with the utmoſt fury, which the Engliſh received with equal valour. Liberty inſpired the Engliſh; glory, blended with deſpair, the Normans. The former knew that every thing they held dear depended upon their valour; the latter, that a retreat was impoſſible. The ſword of Harold performed wonders; death followed each fatal blow; the Normans were aſtoniſhed at the power of his arm. William flew from rank to rank, from ſquadron to ſquadron, animating by words, encouraging by example; yet Engliſh valour obliged the Normans to retire in ſome diſorder; they returned to the charge; were again driven back; and victory ſeemed to declare in favour of Harold. But recovering their ranks, they ſurrounded ſome thouſands of the Engliſh who were cut in pieces. William having rallied his left wing which had fled, led his troops to aſſault the main body of the Engliſh which remained on the hill, commanding his archers to ſhoot their arrows high up into the air, and at the ſame time his cavalry preſſing forwards, aſſaulted their front with furious intrepidity; yet ſuch was the impenetrable firmneſs of the order in which they were drawn up, that all attempts to break them were in vain.

The Norman, perceiving how much his forces were diſcouraged by a fruitleſs attempt, had recourſe to artifice. He ordered his troops to make a retreat in a haſty manner, that ſeemed to indicate a flight. The courage of the Engliſh, heated by action, drew them from the hill. They purſued the Normans, whom they conſidered as a flying enemy, into the plain. Whereupon the duke facing about with his troops, repulſed his purſuers with great ſlaughter. Harold and his two brothers, with part of his army remained the whole time upon the ſummit of the hill, aware, probably, of the feint by which his incautious ſoldiers were deceived, and which their ardour rendered it impoſſible for him to prevent. The remainder of his ſcattered forces regained their poſt, and now a ſmall body of brave warriors, animated by the example of their king, who fought on foot the whole day, and ſlew many of the enemy with his own hand, kept their ranks unbroken; nor could William, with all the efforts he cauſed his troops to make, diſſolve this determined phalanx; ſo that the fate of the day remained undecided from nine in the morning till the cloſe of day, when Harold was killed by the random ſhot of an arrow, which entering at the ball of his eye penetrated into his brain. His two brothers were alſo numbered among the ſlain. The courage or rather hopes of the Engliſh fell with theſe undaunted leaders. They immediately gave way in ſeveral places, and fled from the field of battle, leaving their ſtandard and victory with the Norman conqueror.

In this deciſive battle of Haſtings, William had three horſes killed under him, and loſt near fifteen thouſand men; but the loſs of the Engliſh was ſtill more conſiderable: it continued from ſun-riſing to ſun-ſet. The body of king Harold was found beſmeared with blood, which William reſtored to his mother, who buried it in Waltham Abbey. By his firſt wife, whoſe name is unknown, he had three ſons, Godwin, Edmund, and Magnus. By his ſecond, named Algitha, he had one ſon, called Wolf, who was knighted by William Rufus, and two daughters; the firſt of whom ſpent her days in a convent, and the ſecond married Waldemar, king of Ruſſia, by whom ſhe had a daughter, eſpouſed to Waldemar, king of Denmark.

This unfortunate prince, who merited a better fate, was the laſt in the line of Anglo-Saxon kings; and with him fell for a time the ſtandard of Engliſh liberty. His perſon was adorned with gracefulneſs, dignity, and ſtrength. His temper was humane; his manners affable, and exceeding popular. He had reſolution and courage which no dangers could intimidate. In his political and military talents he had no equal among his countrymen. He loved his friends, he loved his ſubjects; he was a champion for freedom, and fell in its defence. His wiſh was that of every true Engliſhman, not to ſurvive the conſtitution, nor be enſlaved by a foreign enemy.

Though the Norman writers have, to their ſhame, traduced the character of this king, with a view to exalt that of the conqueror, it is nevertheleſs certain that the bravery of Harold was only one of many virtues by which he was diſtinguiſhed. Upon the whole he was worthy of that crown, which the free ſuffrages of the people had placed on his head; and upon a comparative view of the two famous heroes, we may give it as our opinion, that Harold loſt his life in defence of that liberty, which William the Conqueror and his ſucceſſors laboured to deſtroy.

THE NORMAN LINE. FROM THE REIGN OF WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR TO THE DEATH OF KING STEPHEN, CONTAINING THE SPACE OF ABOUT EIGHTY-EIGHT YEARS.

CHAPTER I.

WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR.

Deſcent of William—Conſequences of the battle of Haſtings—His dominions diſturbed by foreign invaſions, and domeſtic inſurrections—Rebellion of his ſon Robert—His government of the Engliſh, and its effects—Inſtances of his tyranny—A war with France—A general ſurvey taken of all the lands in England, entered in a book, called Domeſday book—Death of William, his character and family.

A. D. 1066. THIS celebrated king was the natural ſon of Robert, duke of Normandy, by one of his miſtreſſes, named Harlotte, a ſkinner's daughter of Falaiſe; whence he was at firſt diſtinguiſhed by the ſurname of The Baſtard, but this he afterwards changed into that of Conqueror. Robert having no legitimate iſſue, upon ſetting out on a pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, appointed William heir to his dominions, in caſe he ſhould die in his journey; and this event actually happening, William ſucceeded to the dukedom of Normandy, being only nine years of age. During his minority, Henry I. king of France, attacked his dominions, and the barons of Normandy, in their contention for power, raiſed ſeveral diſturbances; but William, having arrived at years of maturity, repulſed the former, reduced the latter, and effectually eſtabliſhed the tranquillity of his dukedom.

A general conſternation pervaded England when the news was circulated of the unfortunate battle of Haſtings, of the death of the king, and the entire defeat of his army. However Morcar and Edwin, two powerful earls, retreated to London, with the remnants of their vanquiſhed forces, and in conjunction with Stigand, archbiſhop of Canterbury, proclaimed Edgar Atheling king.

William, in the mean time, directed his vengeance againſt the inhabitants of Romney, whom he puniſhed with ſeverity, for their cruel treatment of ſome Norman ſeamen and ſoldiers who had landed there; immediately after which he made himſelf maſter of Dover without any oppoſition. Here he placed a ſtrong garriſon, knowing that this fortreſs would ſecure him a retreat in caſe of a repulſe, and be a moſt convenient port for the debarkation of neceſſary ſupplies. Dividing his army now into three bodies, he marched directly to London.

The only one who endeavoured to impede his progreſs was Fretheric, abbot of St. Alban's, who, to this end, cauſed a conſiderable number of trees to be felled and laid acroſs the roads. William ſummoned the abbot to appear before him, promiſing, in caſe of a ready compliance, no harm ſhould happen to his perſon. The abbot obeyed; and being aſked why he had endeavoured to ſtop the paſſage of his army, nobly replied, "I have done no more than my duty; and had others of my rank equally exerted themſelves, you had never penetrated ſo far into this country, nor ſummoned me to give an account of my conduct." Struck with the boldneſs of the abbot, and the juſtneſs of his ſentiment, William diſmiſſed him without paſſing the leaſt cenſure.

The conqueror now drawing nearer towards London, the ſpirits of the people ſunk in proportion as he advanced. A troop of five hundred Norman cavalry having repulſed a body of Londoners, the inhabitants of Kent having ſubmitted to William, and the borough of Southwark having been ſet fire to and deſtroyed, were circumſtances that, in the higheſt degree, contributed to create a general confuſion. The earls Edwin and Morcar obſerving that irreſolution, diſcontent, and timidity prevailed in the Engliſh council, and that every proſpect of maintaining a ſucceſsful oppoſition was diſſipated, marched with their forces to the north; and no ſooner had the conqueror paſſed the Thames at Wallingford, and arrived at Berkhamſtead, than Stigand, the primate, ſubmitted to his authority; and ſhortly afterwards the moſt conſiderable of the nobility, the citizens of London, and even Edgar Atheling, avowed allegiance to the Norman, and put themſelves under his protection.

A. D. 1066. Edgar was received by William with the appearance of great regard and affection; and the latter was ſo far from founding his title to the crown on a ſuppoſed right of conqueſt, that he uſed his utmoſt endeavours to eſtabliſh the notion of his being heir to king Edward, from the appointment of that monarch. William looked upon Stigand with a jealous eye; and urging that he had obtruded himſelf into the ſee under the uſurpation of pope Benedict IX. he refuſed to be crowned by him, and conferred that honour on Aldred, archbiſhop of York. The ceremony of his coronation was performed with great magnificence in Weſtminſter-Abbey, on Chriſtmas-day, in the preſence of the moſt conſiderable of the Engliſh and Norman nobility. Aldred, having adminiſtered the coronation oath to the king, anointed him, and placed the crown upon his head. The ſpectators expreſſed their aſſent by the loudeſt acclamations. Theſe ſo alarmed the Norman ſoldiers without, that they imagined the Engliſh were offering violence to their ſovereign. In revenge for the ſuppoſed affront they aſſaulted the populace, and ſet fire to ſeveral habitations. As ſoon as the king was able to paſs through the croud, he appeared among his ſoldiers, and with difficulty ſuppreſſed the tumult.

In order to ingratiate himſelf with his new ſubjects, William diſſembled his ſentiments, beginning his reign with diſpenſing impartial juſtice, and he conferred many favours upon them; yet thinking it impolitic to repoſe an entire confidence in their profeſſions, he ordered fortreſſes to be erected in different parts of the kingdom, and removing to Barking in Eſſex, where he eſtabliſhed his head-quarters, he received the ſubmiſſion of ſuch of the nobility who had not attended the coronation. Among theſe came Edric, nephew of Edric the traitor, the earls Edwin and Morcar, and other conſiderable noblemen.

Having ſeized the treaſure of his predeceſſor which was depoſited at Wincheſter, and receiving rich preſents from the opulent in all parts of England, he was hereby the better enabled to reward his followers. He therefore diſtributed large ſums among his troops; and to teſtify his gratitude to the monks, who had forwarded his ſucceſs, he built a new monaſtery near Haſtings, called Battle-Abbey, to pray for his own ſoul and that of Harold. But, amidſt the pretended expreſſions of regard for the Engliſh, he took care to place all real power in the hands of his Normans; for, though he confirmed the liberties and immunities of London and other cities, he diſarmed the inhabitants, and quartered upon them Norman ſoldiers, leaving no place of ſtrength any power able to reſiſt him. Thus, while his civil adminiſtration wore the appearance of legal juſtice, his military inſtitutions reſembled thoſe of a tyrant and oppreſſor.

William, having thus, by a mixture of lenity and ſeverity, eſtabliſhed his ſovereignty, determined to gratify his vanity by a viſit to his native country, where, in the congratulations of his ancient ſubjects, he intended to diſplay the marks of his own triumph in his ſignal ſucceſs. Leaving, therefore, the adminiſtration of affairs during his abſence in the hands of Odo, biſhop of Bayeux, and his couſin William Fitzoſborne, whom he had created earl of Hertford, the king ſailed for Normandy, accompanied by his principal nobles. Among theſe were Edgar Atheling, Stigand, the two earls Edwin and Morcar, Waltheof, the ſon of the brave Siward, who, at the ſame time that they ſerved to grace his court, were real hoſtages for the fidelity of the nation. The Engliſh nobility in his train, willing to ingratiate themſelves with their new ſovereign, endeavoured to excel each other in ſumptuous equipages and entertainments. A Norman writer, who was preſent, ſpeaks with admiration of the beauty of their perſons, the workmanſhip of their plate, and the coſtlineſs of their embroideries.

Not long after the king's departure from England, diſcontents multiplied every where, occaſioned by the intolerable oppreſſions of Odo and Fitzoſborne, which provoked a general indignation among the people, and urged them to take up arms in vindication of their violated rights. The inhabitants of Kent were the firſt who attempted to throw off the Norman yoke. They applied for aid to Euſtace, count of Bologne, who landed a body of forces in the neighbourhood of Dover, which effecting a junction with the Kentiſhmen, made an attack upon the garriſon of that place; but the Normans being timely appriſed of the intended aſſault, the fort was put into a ſtate of defence, and the aſſailants were were repulſed with great ſlaughter, the count of Bologne being made a priſoner of war. Hereford-ſhire and Shropſhire exhibited the next ſcenes of confuſion. Edric, the foreſter, was proprietor of great part of theſe counties, into which the Normans made frequent incurſions, committing outrageous acts of violence; on which Edric, by the aſſiſtance of the Welſh, retorted the inſult, and treated thoſe he made priſoners with the utmoſt ſeverity.

The return of the king being haſtened by theſe commotions, he, on his arrival in England, ſoon diſconcerted all the ſchemes of the conſpirators. Thoſe who had been moſt forward in a mutiny, either fled, or concealed themſelves; and the confiſcation of their eſtates enabled the conqueror farther to gratify the rapacity of his Norman captains; and, inſtead of puniſhing the two regents for their enormous exactions, he ſeemed rather to approve what they had done, which became another ſource of diſcontent to the people.

A. D. 1068. As the conqueror now began to loſe all confidence in his people, he determined to reduce them to the moſt abject ſlavery. His armaments having involved him in debt, he revived the odious tax, called formerly Dane-gelt, which Edward the Confeſſor had aboliſhed. The conſequences of this arbitrary meaſure were inſurrections and revolts. The inhabitants of Exeter refuſed to admit a Norman garriſon; and, taking arms, were joined by thoſe of Devonſhire and Cornwall. William haſtened with his forces to chaſtiſe the inſurgents. On his approach, the wiſer citizens prevailed on the people to ſubmit, and deliver hoſtages for their obedience; but the agreement having been broken by a ſudden mutiny of the populace, William ordered the eyes of one of the hoſtages to be put out, intimating hereby to the rebels what they were to expect, if they perſiſted in their revolt. The inhabitants, ſeized with terror, threw themſelves on the king's mercy, and ſurrendered at diſcretion.

Diſturbances of a much more alarming nature now broke out in the north, where a general confederacy was formed by Edwin and Morcar, combined with Sweyn, king of Denmark, Malcolm, king of Scotland, and Blethwin, prince of North Wales, who all concurred to make one vigorous effort for the recovery of Engliſh liberty. William, knowing the neceſſity of expedition, in order to quell an inſurrection of this dangerous nature, advanced by long marches to the north, and reached York before the rebels were prepared to oppoſe him, they not having been joined by any of the ſuccours they expected, except a ſmall reinforcement from Wales. The two earls now found they had no other means of ſafety but ſubmiſſion; and the reſt of the confederates followed their example. Whereupon the people, being thus deſerted by their leaders, were unable to make any farther reſiſtance. The vengeance of the conqueror fell chiefly upon thoſe who were leaſt guilty. They felt ſeverely the rigour of confiſcation, and he beſtowed their lands on his foreign favourites; who being thus diſperſed throughout the whole country, left Edwin and Morcar, whom he pretended to ſpare, deſtitute of all ſupport, and eaſy victims whenever he ſhould demand their ruin.

Theſe proceedings ſpread over the nation a general alarm, which was increaſed by the king's ordering caſtles to be built in different places, which were evidently intended to awe the diſconted into ſubmiſſion. The Engliſh became now ſenſible that they had tamely ſubmitted themſelves to a tyrant. Many of them therefore fled into foreign countries, in order to live free from new forfeitures, attainders, and continual acts of violence. Edgar himſelf, dreading the inſidious careſſes of William, eſcaped with Coſpatric, a powerful Northumbrian, into Scotland, taking with him his two ſiſters, Margaret and Chriſtina. King Malcolm gave them a favourable reception, and married Margaret, the eldeſt ſiſter; and as he gave great countenance to all the Engliſh exiles, many of them ſettled there. Great animoſities now aroſe between the Normans and Engliſh, who mutually inſulted each other; hence murders were frequent, ſcarce a day paſſing but ſome dead bodies were found in the highways and woods.

A. D. 1069. At this time a general inſurrection ſeemed about to take place throughout the whole iſland. Godwin, Edmund, and Magnus, Harold's three ſons, after the battle of Haſtings, having retired to Ireland, projected an invaſion of England, and hoped that all the exiles from Denmark, Scotland, and Wales, aſſiſted by forces from thoſe countries, would join them. Upon which preſumption they landed in Devonſhire, but found Brian, ſon of the count of Britanny, ready to oppoſe them, at the head of ſome foreign troops; and, being defeated in ſeveral actions, they were obliged to retreat to their ſhips, and to return with great loſs to Ireland. The attention of the Normans was now demanded in the north, where the Northumbrians had attacked Robert de Comyn, governor of Durham, and put him to death with ſeven hundred of his followers. This ſucceſs animated the inhabitants of York to revolt, who ſlew Fitz-Richard, their governor, and beſieged the caſtle.

Soon after the Daniſh troops landed from three hundred veſſels. The command of theſe forces was intruſted with Oſborne, brother to king Sweyn, and he was accompanied by Harold and Canute, two ſons of that monarch. Edgar Atheling marched from Scotland, bringing with him Coſpatric, Waltheof, Siward, Adelin, and other noble adherents, who by the hopes they gave of foreign ſuccours, and from their authority, eaſily perſuaded the Northumbrians to join them. Mallet, the Norman governor of York Caſtle, in order to provide for its defence, ſet fire to ſome houſes that were contiguous thereto, and which he imagined might afford a cover to the enemy; when the flames, ſpreading into the neighbouring ſtreets, reduced the whole city to aſhes; which ſo enraged the inhabitants, that, joining the Danes, they attacked the caſtle with the utmoſt fury, took it by ſtorm, and put the whole garriſon, conſiſting of three thouſand men, to the ſword.

Many other parts of England conſidered this ſucceſs as a ſignal to riſe in arms. Hereward, an Eaſt-Anglian nobleman, aſſembled his vaſſals in the iſle of Ely, and made inroads into all the adjacent country. The Engliſh, in the counties of Dorſet and Somerſet, attacked Montacute, the Norman governor, while the inhabitants of Devon and Cornwall inveſted Exeter. Edric, the Foreſter, aſſiſted by the Welſh, laid ſiege to Shrewſbury. The Engliſh every where ſeemed reſolved to make in concert one great effort to recover their liberty, and to expel their tyrannical maſters.

William, amidſt this ſcene of confuſion, appeared undiſmayed; he had got poſſeſſion of a crown by his ſword, nor doubted of being able to defend it by the ſame means. Aſſembling therefore his forces, he marched againſt the rebels in the north, who were the moſt formidable, and whoſe defeat he knew would fill all the other malcontents with terror. Before his approach, he prevailed upon Oſborne and his Danes to retire into Denmark, without committing farther hoſtilities. Coſpatric deſpairing of ſucceſs, made his ſubmiſſion to the king, and, upon paying a ſum of money, was inveſted with the earldom of Northumberland. Waltheof, who had long defended York with great bravery, was won over by the king's ſhew of clemency. Even Edric, now compelled by neceſſity, ſubmitted ſubmittd to the conqueror, and obtained forgiveneſs, which was followed by ſome degree of royal favour. As Malcolm came too late to ſupport the confederates, he was forced to retire, and returned with Edgar Atheling into Scotland, while all the inſurgents in other parts, except Hereward, who lay ſecure in his faſtneſſes, diſperſed, leaving the conqueror undiſputed maſter of the kingdom; who now gave evident proofs that his aſſumed lenity to the leading men, was the effects only of artful policy; for he ſcrupled no meaſures, however marked with cruelty, that had a tendency to excite terror, and to ſupport his plan of arbitrary government.

William deprived the wealthy of their eſtates, and exerciſed the moſt wanton ſeverities upon thoſe who had engaged in conſpiracies or rebellions. He put out the eyes of ſome; cut off the hands and feet of others; and condemned many either to death or to perpetual baniſhment. He ſeized the treaſures belonging to the monaſteries, upon a pretence that the rebels had concealed their valuable effects in thoſe places. He impoſed the tenure of knights ſervice upon all lands held of the crown. He excluded the Engliſh from all places of truſt and profit, depriving them as far as he could of all their ancient privileges, aboliſhing their laws, and ſubſtituting thoſe of Normandy in their room. He introduced the feudal law, by dividing the kingdom into about ſeven hundred baronies and ſixty thouſand two hundred and fifteen knights fees; beſtowing all the former either upon Normans or other foreign adventurers; and ſuch of the Engliſh who retained their poſſeſſions, were only admitted into the ſecond claſs.

He laid waſte the county of Hampſhire, for the extent of thirty miles, and converted it into a habitation for wild beaſts, which he called the New Foreſt. At the ſame time he denounced the moſt ſevere penalties againſt thoſe who ſhould preſume to hunt in any of the royal domains; and while the killing of a man might be atoned for by a moderate fine; the killing of a wild boar or deer was puniſhed with the loſs of the delinquent's eyes. He commanded his ſubjects to uſe the Norman or French tongue, only, and cauſed the law of the land to be tranſlated into that language; but with regard to the corfieu, or obliging the inhabitants to put out their fires and lights on the ſounding of a certain bell, this was a law which William had previouſly eſtabliſhed in Normandy, and the ſame cuſtom prevailed in Scotland; in a word, this mercileſs Norman not only governed England as a conquered country, but equalled, in his devaſtations, the greateſt ſcourge of God that had ever been permitted to enſlave or deſtroy nations. A. D. 1071. Earls Morcar and Edwin, touched with the loſs of their dignity, and knowing they could not remain long in ſafety, reſolved to ſhare the ſame fate with their countrymen, whether it might be maiming, impriſonment, or death.

Edwin retired to his eſtate in the north, in order to form an inſurrection; and Morcar took ſhelter in the Iſle of Ely, with the brave Hereward, who, ſecured by the ſituation of the place, ſtill defended himſelf againſt the Normans; but theſe ſteps only accelerated the ruin of thoſe few Engliſh who had not yet been plundered of their fortunes; for William having ſurrounded the Iſle of Ely with flat-bottomed boats, and made a cauſeway through the moraſſes two miles in length, obliged the revolters to ſurrender at diſcretion. Hereward alone forced his way ſword in hand through the enemy, and afterwards continued his hoſtilities by ſea, till William, charmed with his bravery, reſtored to him his eſtate. Earl Morcar, and Egelwin, biſhop of Durham, were caſt into priſon, in which the latter ſoon after died. Edwin, attempting to eſcape into Scotland, was betrayed by ſome of his followers, and killed by a party of Normans, to the great affliction of the Engliſh; even William is ſaid to have ſhed tears to the memory of that beautiful and gallant youth. The king of Scotland, in hopes of obtaining advantages from theſe convulſions, had attacked the northern counties; but, on the king's entering Scotland, was glad to pay the uſual homage to the Engliſh crown. To complete William's triumph over his ſubjects, Edgar Atheling ſubmitted and humbly implored his pardon, which was granted, and a penſion allowed him for his ſubſiſtence. From this time he remained in England, probably more happy than his aſpiring wiſhes could have made him, if enjoyed.

A. D. 1073.

Many of the inhabitants of the province of Maine in France, diſſatisfied, and inſtigated by the count of Anjou, who had ſome pretenſion to the ſucceſſion, roſe in rebellion, and expelled their magiſtrates. William, to whom this province belonged by the will of Hebert, the laſt count, to puniſh this inſult on his authority, ſailed to the continent with a large army, compoſed chiefly of Engliſh; and was ſo ſucceſsful in his operations, that he overcame all oppoſition, and the revolters were glad to conclude a peace with him. During his ſtay in Normandy, the pope ſent an embaſſy, requiring him to do homage for his kingdom to the ſee of Rome; but William, with a becoming ſpirit, told the nuncio, that he was indebted for his crown to God alone, and under him to his ſword; and on his return to England he publiſhed an edict forbidding his ſubjects to acknowledge the authority of any pope whom he had not previouſly approved; or to receive any commands from Rome without his permiſſion firſt obtained.

The government of England was at the ſame time diſturbed by the Norman barons, who, diſguſted at William's imperious conduct, determined not to ſubmit their civil rights to the will of any man. Wherefore now he was abſent, they concerted a ſcheme for depoſing him. It was at the wedding feaſt of William Guader, earl of Norfolk, that their plan was firſt propoſed to earl Waltheof, when the arbitrary conduct of the king underwent a ſtrict ſcrutiny. Among other particulars were mentioned, the tyranny he exerciſed over the Engliſh whom they affected to pity; his haughty behaviour to his barons, and his plain deſign of reducing both the victors and the vanquiſhed to the ſame ignominious ſubjection; the indignity of ſubmitting to a baſtard was not forgot; nor the certainty of ſucceſs in a revolt by the aſſiſtance of the Danes; and the whole company, heated with liquor, entered by a ſolemn engagement into the deſign of ſhaking off the royal authority; even Waltheof, though he had been pardoned for a former inſurrection, expreſſed his approbation of, and joined in the conſpiracy. But when in the hour of calm reflection he thought ſeriouſly on his engagement, he became extremely uneaſy for the conſequences. He had married the niece of the king, and reſolved to truſt his wife with the important ſecret; but ſhe having an attachment to another man, rejoiced ſecretly at an event that ſeemed to promiſe the deſtruction of her huſband. She therefore loſt no time in ſending to Normandy, and appriſing the king of the part her huſband had taken in the conſpiracy. In the interim Waltheof, finding no reſt from the inward agitations of his mind, made a confident of Lanfranc, archbiſhop of Canterbury, who adviſed him to acquaint the king with the whole affair, which the earl conſented to do.

No ſooner were the conſpirators informed that Waltheof was gone to Normandy, than they concluded the plot they had laid was diſcovered, on which, though their plan was not ripe for execution, they had immediate recourſe to arms; but Odo, the king's brother, headed the royal forces, to whom the inſurgents were compelled to ſubmit; ſo that on William's return to England, he found the inſurrection cruſhed, and nothing remained but to inflict puniſhment, which according to the conqueror's uſual policy, was extended principally to the inferior offenders, with a degree of rigour repugnant to equity and the dictates of humanity. But the unhappy Waltheof experienced now no mercy. William ordered him to be tried, when he was condemned and executed on the twenty-ninth of April, 1075, and his body buried under the ſcaffold on which he was beheaded. His wife, the infamous Judith, falling under the king's diſpleaſure, was abandoned by every one, and the contempt with which ſhe was treated aggravated the compunctions of a guilty conſcience. Waltheof, and another nobleman, named Fitz-Aubert, are ſaid to be the only perſons of diſtinguiſhed rank who were executed during his reign.

A. D. 1077. After a long ſeries of national tumults, which William quelled by his own undaunted bravery, he might reaſonably expect a calm of tranquillity would ſucceed; but he was now to be tried with a calamity, which, ariſing from his own family, muſt greatly affect him. Robert, his eldeſt ſon, inſtigated by the French king, endeavoured to make himſelf maſter of the duchy of Normandy, pretending his father had promiſed it him, in caſe he ſhould ſucceed in his expedition againſt England; but having demanded of his father a performance of his engagement, he peremptorily refuſed to comply with his requeſt, telling him, "he never intended to throw off his cloaths till he went to bed." Upon which Robert for a time openly proclaimed his diſcontent; and then, being in Normandy, had recourſe to arms in ſupport of his imaginary right. William hereupon raiſed an Engliſh army, which after ſeveral ſharp ſkirmiſhes, compelled Robert and his followers to take refuge in the caſtle of Gerberoy, appointed by the French king for their reception in caſe of neceſſity. In this place the king beſieged them, but for ſome time in vain, as the garriſon, being ſtrong, made an obſtinate defence.

Under the walls there paſſed many combats, which reſembled more thoſe of chivalry than the military actions of armies. In one of theſe it happened that Robert engaged the king, who was concealed by his helmet; and this young prince, after wounding his father in the arm, unhorſed him. William called out for aſſiſtance; his ſon knew his voice; and ſtruck with terror inſtantly threw himſelf at his father's feet, begged his pardon, and offered to purchaſe it by any atonement in his power. The king, implacable in his reſentments, paid no regard to this dutiful ſubmiſſion; however, raiſing the ſiege, he marched his army to Normandy, where, by the interceſſion of the queen, he became reconciled with his ſon, whom he took with him to England, and intruſted him with an army againſt Malcolm, king of Scotland. The young prince obliged Malcolm to make his ſubmiſſion. About this time William built the Tower of London, to keep in awe the citizens, of whom he entertained a conſtant jealouſy and ſuſpicion.

A. D. 1081. At length the tumults of war ſubſided, and the whole iſland now enjoyed the ſweets of peace. William had a large revenue, and his avarice induced him to ſtudy every method moſt likely to augment it. For this purpoſe he cauſed a general ſurvey to be taken of all the lands in the kingdom, their extent in each diſtrict, their proprietors, tenures and value; the quantity of meadow, paſture, wood, and arable land which they contained; and in ſome counties the number of tenants, cottagers and ſlaves of all denominations who lived upon them. He appointed commiſſioners, who entered every particular in a regiſter by the verdict of juries; and at the expiration of ſix years they brought him an exact account of all the landed property in the kingdom. This valuable monument of antiquity, called Domeſday book, is ſtill preſerved in the Exchequer. The king was as careful to keep as to accumulate money. He retained fourteen hundred manors in his own poſſeſſion, after gratifying his followers for their ſervices. He had more places to beſtow than any king of England, and his partiality in beſtowing them, cauſed him to be implicitely obeyed by foreigners, but hated by his Engliſh ſubjects. It is ſaid he was the richeſt of any of our monarchs, who reigned before or ſince his time.

A. D. 1083. William's conſort Matilda, whom he tenderly loved, died at this time. Three years after he paſſed into Normandy, taking with him Edgar Atheling, who with his permiſſion ſet out on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. While on the continent he was detained by a miſunderſtanding between him and the king of France, occaſioned by ſome inroads made by French barons on the frontiers of his duchy. The princes in thoſe times were little able to reſtrain their licentious nobility; but William thought they would not have dared to provoke his reſentment, had they not been aſſured of the French monarch's protection. His diſpleaſure was increaſed by hearing of ſome railleries that Philip had thrown out againſt him. William, who was very corpulent, had been confined to his bed by ſickneſs; upon hearing of which, Philip expreſſed his ſurprize that his brother of England ſhould be ſo long in being delivered of his big belly. The king ſent him word, that as ſoon as he was up, he would preſent ſo many lights at Notre Dame as would afford him cauſe for much greater ſurprize, alluding to the uſual practice at that time, of women after lying-in preſenting wax tapers at the altar, upon their being churched.

Immediately on his recovery, William entered France at the head of a numerous army. Having taken Mantes, he firſt plundered it, and then ſet it on fire. Here the progreſs of his arms was ſtopped by an accident which put a period to his life. Entering the town before the flames were extinguiſhed, his horſe happened to tread on ſome hot aſhes, which made him plunge with ſuch violence, that William was thrown forward, and bruiſed upon the ſaddle to ſuch a degree, that he was ſoon after ſeized with a fever. Senſible of his approaching diſſolution, he exhibited a ſtriking example of the vanity of human greatneſs. Struck with remorſe for the horrible cruelties he had committed, he offered rich preſents to churches and monaſteries, in the way of atonement, forgetting that mercy is more acceptable to the Judge of the whole earth than ſacrifice. Upon the ſame falſe principle earl Morcar and other Engliſh priſoners were releaſed. He died on the 9th of September 1087, in the ſixty-firſt year of his age, the twenty-firſt of his reign over England, and the fifty-ſecond over Normandy.

By his wife Matilda, daughter to Baldwin V. earl of Flanders, he had four ſons, namely, Robert, Richard, William, and Henry; and five daughters, namely, Cicely, abbeſs of a monaſtery in Caen; Conſtantia, married to Fergant, duke of Brittany; Alice, who was contracted to Harold, but died in her infancy; Adela, married to Stephen, earl of Blois, whoſe ſon of the ſame name afterwards aſcended the throne of England; and Agatha, who was betrothed to the king of Galicia, but died on her journey to that country. To Robert, his eldeſt ſon, he left Normandy and Maine; Richard was killed by a deer in the New Foreſt; to Henry he bequeathed only his mother's poſſeſſions; but upon this prince's complaining to him of the ſmallneſs of his patrimony, William is ſaid to have comforted him with the hopes, that the dominions of his brother would be one day united to his perſon, an event which really happened ſome time afterwards.

In his ſtature William was tall and portly. His bones and muſcles were ſo uncommonly ſtrong, that ſcarcely a man of that age was to be found, who could bend his bow, or handle his arms. In his carriage, he was ſtern and haughty; in his temper, jealous and reſerved. His capacity not to be doubted; his ambition unqueſtionable. To the laſt he ſacrificed all the laws of juſtice, and the feelings of humanity. With ſtrict juſtice he may be ranked among the greateſt generals any age has produced. Having been from his childhood at the head of armies, he joined to a great military genius all the knowledge and ſkill that experience could teach. His courage was heroic, and he poſſeſſed it not only in the field but in the cabinet; attempting great things with means that to other men appeared totally unequal to ſuch undertakings, and ſteadily proſecuting what he boldly reſolved; being never diſturbed or diſheartened with difficulties in the courſe of his enterprizes; but having that noble vigour of mind, which inſtead of bending to oppoſition riſes againſt it, and ſeems to have a power of commanding and even controlling fortune.

William's majeſty was never lowered by incontinence, or indecent exceſs. His temperance and chaſtity were his conſtant guards. Through his whole life he had no partner of his bed but his queen. Had he kept his engagements to his people as well as he did his marriage contract, he would have been the beſt of kings; but he indulged other paſſions of a worſe nature, and infinitely more detrimental to the public than thoſe he reſtrained. A luſt of power, which no regard to juſtice could limit, the moſt unrelenting cruelty, and the moſt inſatiable avarice poſſeſſed his ſoul. It is true, among many acts of extreme inhumanity, ſome of great clemency were interwoven; but theſe laſt were either the effects of policy, or of magnanimity, which made him ſlight his ſubmiſſive enemies. But where he had no pride or intereſt in forgiving, his genuine ſavage diſpoſition appeared in its proper colours; and ſome inſtances of his barbarity exceeded the bounds that even the worſt of tyrants and conquerors have preſcribed themſelves.

His religion was after the faſhion of the age in which he lived, belief without examination, and devotion without piety. It was a kind of ſtate policy which prompted him to endow monaſteries, and at the ſame time allowed him to pillage kingdoms; that brought him on his knees before a relic or a croſs, but ſuffered him without controul to trample upon the liberties and rights of mankind. As to the wiſdom of his government, he was indeed ſo far wiſe, that through a long and unquiet reign he knew how to ſupport oppreſſion by terror, by which he carried on with impunity a very iniquitous and violent adminiſtration. But that wiſdom which founds national happineſs upon the principle of virtue, with all his abilities he does not appear to have poſſeſſed.

Though this prince did not excel in thoſe popular arts of government, which ſometimes change the complexion of tyranny, and give it a fallacious form of freedom; yet ſo far he performed the duty of a ſovereign, that he took care to maintain a good police in his realm, by curbing licentiouſneſs with a ſtrong military force, diſperſed throughout the kingdom. But it was a poor compenſation that the highways were ſafe, when the courts of juſtice were dens of thieves, when his Normans in office employed their power to pillage the people, and when the king himſelf had a large ſhare of their extortions. He drew into his treaſury too great a proportion of the wealth of the kingdom, by authoriſing the collectors of his revenues to practiſe the moſt grievous abuſes for raiſing them higher; by a perpetual auction of the crown lands; by various iniquities in the court of Exchequer; by forfeitures wrongfully taken; and by taxations arbitrary, illegal, and vexatious.

It muſt, after all, be confeſſed, that notwithſtanding his rapacious avarice was inſatiable, it was not meanly parſimonious; for he ſupported the dignity of his crown with a decent magnificence; and though never laviſh, yet he was at times liberal, eſpecially to his officers of the army, and the church. In ſhort, he laid up wealth in his coffers as he did arms in his magazines, to be drawn out, when occaſion required, either for the defence or extenſion of his tyrannical ſway. To finiſh the character of this ambitious conqueror in a few words, upon an impartial view of his reign, we ſhall find many ſhining actions to admire, many more to deteſt; and that if, as a king and warrior, he had many great qualities; as a man, he had but few virtues, and his vices eclipſed them all.

CHAPTER II.

WILLIAM II.

William, ſurnamed Rufus, or Red, from the colour of his hair, aſcends the throne by the intereſt of Lanfranc, archbiſhop of Canterbury, in violation of his brother Robert's right of primogeniture—A conſpiracy in favour of Robert, defeated through his inactivity—William's wars in Normandy, Scotland, and Wales—The cruſades in which Robert engages—The king quarrels with Anſelm, whom he had forced into the ſee of Canterbury—A conſpiracy among his barons—The manner of his death, and character.

A. D. 1087. THIS prince, the ſecond ſon of William the Conqueror, knowing that his right of ſucceſſion was founded only on a letter the late king had written in his favour to Lanfranc, archbiſhop of Canterbury, haſtened to England before any intelligence of the death of his father could reach that kingdom, in order, if poſſible, to ſecure the intereſt of that popular prelate, and the poſſeſſion of the throne, which of right belonged to his elder brother Robert. Lanfranc was in great repute with the people, on account of his amiable character. The Engliſh in particular thought him their friend, for his humanity made him one to all in diſtreſs; and the Normans were ſenſible that he had employed the king's favour to moderate the violence of his temper, and to ſoften the effects of his tyranny. He had a paternal regard for William Rufus, whom he himſelf had educated; yet he refuſed to exert his influence, unleſs his pupil would promiſe in the moſt ſolemn manner, to govern with equity and moderation, to maintain the liberties of the people, and to behave like a dutiful and obedient ſon to the church. William, who feared the leaſt delay might fruſtrate his intentions, readily conſented, and the archbiſhop applied himſelf aſſiduouſly to remove the prejudices of the people. To this end reports were propagated that William had imbibed an affectionate regard for the Engliſh; that he had ſeen with grief their oppreſſions; that he conſidered the foreſt laws as fit only for a nation of ſlaves; that he ſhould eſteem the Normans and Engliſh equally his ſubjects; that he intended to reſtore the nation to its former liberty, and govern only by the laws of Edward the Confeſſor. Theſe reports had the deſired effect with reſpect to the Engliſh, who wiſhed to ſee a king in the ſeat of power, who would redreſs their grievances, and reſtore domeſtic tranquillity.

The taſk was however more difficult to gain over the Norman barons, who on many accounts were diſpoſed to favour the claim of Robert. Recourſe was therefore had to the arts of perſuaſion. They were taught to believe, that if Robert obtained the throne, there could be no hopes of holding their eſtates, with which his Norman friends would be gratified; and that their intereſts were cloſely connected with thoſe of William, to whom the Conqueror, their great benefactor, with his dying breath, had bequeathed the crown of England. But William made uſe of a more powerful argument to ſupport his pretenſions, for he got poſſeſſion of the royal treaſure laid up in the palace at Wincheſter, amounting to fifty thouſand pounds weight of ſilver coin, beſides gold, jewels, plate, and a rich wardrobe belonging to the royal family.

Mean time theſe previous ſteps to the ſummit of power were ſtrengthened by the indolence and inactivity of Robert; who, when his friends adviſed him not to truſt his intereſt to precarious hope, but to croſs over immediately into England, and take poſſeſſion of his crown, he anſwered with haughtineſs, "That precipitation was unneceſſary. The ſceptre was his undoubted right. That the Engliſh were his friends, and would never preſume to appoint a ſucceſſor to the throne in his abſence." He was however for once miſtaken. The archbiſhop having aſſembled the principal clergy and nobility, they, from reſpect to his father's appointment, readily concurred in opinion with Lanfranc, by whom William was crowned on the twenty-ſeventh of September at Weſtminſter. The Engliſh were more inclined to bring about this event, becauſe he won their affections by the moſt conciliating meaſures; and the biſhops were induced to favour his pretenſions by the lenient perſuaſions of Lanfranc, ſo that, thus powerfully ſupported, all the vaſſals of the crown, before the end of the year, ſwore fealty to him, and did homage without one diſſenting voice. Robert likewiſe took quiet poſſeſſion of Normandy, where he was highly eſteemed on account of his open, humane, and generous diſpoſition.

Many months had not elapſed, before the throne of William was ſhaken by a ſudden and almoſt general conſpiracy of the Norman barons, at the head of which was Odo, biſhop of Bayeux, the king's uncle, to whom William had reſtored his earldom and lands; but not having been inveſted with power alſo, and jealous of Lanfranc's abilities and high ſtation, he employed all his talents in endeavouring to transfer the crown to Robert. The conſpirators, retiring to their caſtles, put themſelves in a poſture of defence, and, expecting to be ſupported with a powerful army from Normandy, haſtily broke out into open rebellion. Several parts of the kingdom were thrown into the utmoſt confuſion, and ſome of the counties again laid waſte by the ſword of deſolation. William, whoſe preſence of mind never forſook him, in this extremity had recourſe to the Engliſh, and he ſoon found himſelf at the head of thirty thouſand men. With theſe forces he took the field, and ſuddenly marched into Kent, where Odo, and Robert earl of Montague, had ſeized the forteſſes of Rocheſter and Pevenſey. Theſe he reduced by famine. He now, by the prudent advice of Lanfranc, endeavoured to win over the northern nobility by the gentle arts of perſuaſion, telling them, "that they ought to take care how they impeached his right to the crown, ſince the ſame monarch who had made them earls, had made him king; at the ſame time he offered them privately any money or lands they deſired. Theſe conciliating meaſures were attended with the deſired ſucceſs. The chief of the conſpirators abandoned the cauſe of Robert, and returned to their allegiance. Odo eſcaped to Normandy, and his large poſſeſſions were diſtributed amongſt thoſe who had ſerved their ſovereign faithfully in this alarming criſis of danger. To give the finiſhing ſtroke to the deſigns of his enemies, a large body of troops, ſent from Normandy, were deſtroyed in the channel by the fleet which guarded the coaſt, whereby Robert loſt all his remaining intereſt in England, and the whole nation ſubmitted to William quietly, under the hope and aſſurance of good government.

The king no ſooner ſaw all his enemies at his feet, and himſelf firmly fixed in the ſeat of power, than he forgot all his promiſes, and treated his preſervers with the cruelty of his predeceſſor. Proſperity unfolded thoſe corrupt diſpoſitions, which policy and fear had made him conceal. He increaſed, inſtead of mitigating, the ſeverity of the foreſt laws. The complaints of the Engliſh were urged in vain. He was deaf to their petitions, and beheld their miſeries without redreſs. Even Lanfranc remonſtrated in vain. He urged his ſolemn promiſes when a candidate for the crown; he pleaded the generous conduct of the Engliſh, when it was endangered by the late rebellion; but all his pleas, all his remonſtrances, all his efforts, ſerved only to make Rufus more cautious in his proceedings. The revered character of the archbiſhop kept the king within the bounds of decency. But this check was, unhappily for the Engliſh, ſoon removed: Lanfranc departed this life, and left Rufus to purſue his full career of vice and tyranny. The death of this worthy prelate was juſtly regretted by all the virtuous part of the nation, Normans and Engliſh. He made no diſtinction between them; every good man was ſure of his favour and protection. He gained the love of all parties; and was juſtly conſidered as a faithful biſhop, an upright ſtateſman, and zealous patriot.

William, after this prelate's death, grew impatient of controul. An immenſe prodigality, ſupported by extortion, with the inſtigations of a miniſter worſe than himſelf, made the latter years of his reign a continued ſeries of grievous oppreſſions. The whole nation now felt the heavy burdens the feudal laws could, by arbitrary conſtructions, impoſe on the ſubjects. They firſt fell upon the great Norman lords; but the evil did not ſtop there. Whatever demands the king made on his vaſſals, they made on theirs. Whatever power the king exerciſed, they likewiſe exerciſed. Thus the feudal ſyſtem became a heavy weight of oppreſſion, under which all ſuffered, but the middling claſs of people moſt. The Engliſh groaned under the moſt grievous oppreſſions. Every thing was ſold by the king and his miniſters; even the privileges of the church proved a feeble rampart againſt their uſurpations. Mitres and croſiers were put up to ſale, and the higheſt bidder was ſure to be the purchaſer. Benefices, biſhoprics, juſtice itſelf, were ſacrificed to his avarice; and when all other means were exhauſted, confiſcations, the laſt and worſt reſource of a prodigal tyrant, were, under various pretences, adopted.

A. D. 1090.

At the inſtigation of his brother Henry, Rufus paſſed over to Normandy at the head of a powerful army. Robert was in no condition to oppoſe his brother. He beheld, with aſtoniſhment, his towns ſucceſſively taken, and even his capital on the point of falling into the hands of the invader, by the treachery of the governor. He applied in vain to the king of France for aſſiſtance, that monarch being in the intereſt of William. Henry now ſaw his error, and trembled for his own dominions. He therefore, changing ſides, joined Robert, with an excellent body of forces. William, not thinking it prudent to oppoſe the combined armies of his two brothers, laid aſide his deſign of making himſelf maſter of Normandy, and returned to England. A peace was ſoon after concluded between Robert and William, by which it was ſtipulated, that on the death of either without iſſue, the ſurvivor ſhould ſucceed to his dominions.

This contemptuous treatment having alarmed and exaſperated Henry, whoſe name had not been mentioned in the treaty, he reſolved to avenge the inſult upon Robert; and accordingly made himſelf maſter of St. Michael's Mount, on the coaſt of Normandy, whence he infeſted the neighbourhood with his incurſions. Robert and William beſieged him with their joint forces. The place was ſtrongly fortified by art and nature. It was ſituated on a rock, one ſide of which was waſhed by the ſea, and wholly ſurrounded by the tide at high-water. Inſtead therefore of attempting to reduce it by ſtorm, the two brothers turned the ſiege into a blockade; and determined to continue before the place, till famine ſhould force the beſieged to ſurrender. Henry being at one time diſtreſſed for water, Robert gave him an opportunity of ſupplying the garriſon, and even ſent him ſome pipes of wine for his own uſe. William, reproving him for his ill-timed fraternal affection, Robert with quickneſs replied, "What, ſhall I ſuffer my brother to die of thirſt? Where ſhall we find ſuch another when he is gone?" During this ſiege, William frequently uſed to ride round the camp, to ſee that a proper diſcipline was obſerved among the ſoldiers.

One day, as the king was thus employed, he obſerved two men advancing full ſpeed from the caſtle. William, who was a ſtranger to fear, inſtead of retreating, rode up to them, thinking he ſhould be able to take one, if not both of them priſoners. They met, on the firſt onſet, with equal fury; but the lance of one of his antagoniſts piercing the cheſt of William's horſe, he fell, and was thrown violently to the ground. The ſoldier diſmounted; and raiſing his arm to diſpatch his adverſary, William exclaimed, "Hold, fellow, I am the king of England." Struck with aſtoniſhment, the ſoldier ſheathed his ſword, and raiſed him from the ground with the higheſt expreſſions of reſpect. At this inſtant, William, perceiving a body of his troops haſtening to his aſſiſtance, vaulted into his ſaddle, and caſting his eyes, that ſparkled with fire, around, aſked who it was that unhorſed him. He that did it anſwered boldly, "It was I, who took you for an ordinary knight." "By the face of our Lord," replied William with a ſmile, "thou ſhalt henceforth be my ſoldier, and receive from me the recompence thy valour deſerves." This perhaps is the only commendable action in his whole reign. Prince Henry was ſoon after obliged to ſurrender the fortreſs to his brother Robert, and, being ſtripped of his patrimony, wandered about for ſome time from place to place, with few attendants, and in extreme poverty and diſtreſs.

Another war with Scotland ſucceeded this in Normandy. Malcolm made frequent incurſions into England. After ravaging Northumberland, he laid ſiege to Alnwick, where a party of earl Mowbray's troops, commanded by a knight named Morel, attacking him by ſurprize, a ſharp action enſued, in which both Malcolm and his ſon were ſlain. His death, for ſome years, interrupted the regular ſucceſſion to the Scottiſh crown; for, though he left legitimate ſons, his brother Donald, they being minors, was raiſed to the throne; but ſoon after Duncan, Malcolm's natural ſon, formed a conſpiracy againſt him, and, being aſſiſted by William with a ſmall force, obtained poſſeſſion of the kingdom.

Among other public and private virtues, Malcolm was poſſeſſed of an extraordinary greatneſs of mind, of which the following fact is an evident proof. Having received information that one of his nobles had a deſign to aſſaſſinate him, he enjoined the informer ſtrict ſilence. The next morning he went to hunt with a train of his courtiers; and when arrived in the middle of a foreſt, he drew the intended murderer away from the reſt of the company, and thus addreſſed him: "Behold, we are here alone, armed and mounted alike. No one ſees, or hears us, or can give either of us aid againſt each other. If then you have courage and ſpirit, effect upon this ſpot your purpoſe. Accompliſh, this favourable inſtant, your promiſe to my enemies. If you think I ought to be killed by you, where can you perpetrate the brave deed better? When more opportunely? When more manfully? Have you prepared poiſon for me? that is a womaniſh treaſon. Or would you murder me in my bed? an adultereſs could do that. Or have you hid a dagger to ſtab me ſecretly? that is the act of a ruffian.—Rather behave like a brave man, and fight me hand to hand, that your treaſon may, at leaſt, be free from baſeneſs." At theſe words the traitor, ſtruck as if it had been with a thunderbolt, fell at his feet, and implored his pardon. "Fear nothing, you ſhall not ſuffer any evil from me," replied the king; and he kept his promiſe.

A. D. 1094.

Deſigns on Normandy were ſtill entertained by William. He had concluded a peace with Robert, but treaties were feeble bars to his ambition. This impelled him to make a ſecond invaſion of Normandy, and, in a ſhort time he ſubdued ſeveral important places. But the king of France, alarmed at his progreſs, brought a numerous army into the field to the aſſiſtance of Robert. The face of affairs was now ſuddenly changed. The towns and caſtles William had taken were ſucceſſively recovered, and he was, to his mortification, reduced to the neceſſity of acting upon the defenſive. In this critical conjuncture, he diſpatched orders to England for a reinforcement of troops; and till they arrived, he threw up ſtrong intrenchments round his camp, to render any deſigns Robert might form to the prejudice of his army, abortive. The levies were immediately raiſed in England, in number about twenty thouſand. It was an eſtabliſhed cuſtom with the barons or knights, under whom forces were raiſed for foreign ſervice, to furniſh each man with ten ſhillings, towards defraying neceſſary expences.

William wanted money more than men; therefore, when the ſoldiers were drawn up, Ralph Flambard, the king's infamous miniſter, told them, that they might be diſmiſſed from the ſervice, on paying him, to the king's uſe, the bounty money they had received. The offer was readily embraced, they paid each man his ten ſhillings, and were immediately diſcharged. This money was ſo advantageouſly employed by William, that he reaped greater advantage from it, than he could have expected from the army. He corrupted many of Robert's vaſſals, and detached the king of France from his intereſt. But he was prevented from purſuing his advantages by an invaſion of the Welſh, which obliged him to return to England, when he eaſily repelled the enemy, but was unable to make any conſiderable impreſſion on a country guarded by its mountainous ſituation. The Welſh, not thinking themſelves able to meet him in the open field, wiſely retreated to their mountains; whence they continually detached flying parties, who harraſſed the rear of William's army with perpetual ſkirmiſhes, and cut off his convoys; ſo that he was obliged to return, without any laurels to adorn this expedition.

A. D. 1095. An affair of more ſerious concern engroſſed his whole attention about this time. A conſpiracy was formed againſt his life by ſome of the principal barons. Robert Mowbray, earl of Northumberland, was at its head, and he engaged count d'Eu, Richard de Tunbridge, Roger de Lacy, and many others of the nobility to join his party, which now became very numerous. William took the moſt prudent meaſures, without a moment's delay, to diſconcert the ſchemes of the conſpirators. With this view he ſummoned Mowbray to attend him at Wincheſter, to anſwer for his plundering four merchant ſhips that had put into a port under his juriſdiction. The earl, conſcious of his treaſonable practices, refuſed to obey the ſummons. The king therefore marched againſt him; and Mowbray being in no condition to oppoſe his forces, ſhut himſelf up in Bamborough caſtle, from whence, upon its being inveſted, he found means to eſcape. Repairing to Tinmouth, he endeavoured to corrupt the governor; but before he could effect his purpoſe, a detachment of William's army followed him, and took him priſoner. The caſtle of Bamborough ſurrendered, and the governor impeached all the conſpirators. Mowbray was ſentenced to be confined for life in Windſor caſtle. Several were executed; and the eſtates of the greater part of them were confiſcated. Geoffrey, count d'Eu, was impeached of high treaſon, in being privy to the conſpiracy. He denied the charge, and was allowed to vindicate himſelf by ſingle combat; but being defeated, he was condemned to be caſtrated, and to loſe both his eyes. His couſin, William d'Alderic, was ſentenced to be publicly whipped, and hanged afterwards on a gallows thirty feet high. He ſuffered the whole of this ignominious puniſhment with remarkable intrepidity, and, with his dying breath, declared himſelf innocent of the crime laid to his charge.

A. D. 1096. After the death of Lanfranc, William had retained, for ſeveral years, the revenues of Canterbury, and other vacant biſhoprics, in his own hands; but being attacked with a dangerous illneſs, his clergy repreſented to him, that he muſt expect eternal perdition, if he did not atone for his numerous impieties and ſacrileges. The king, to ſtifle a remorſe of conſcience, or, which is moſt probable, to ſilence the clamours of the church, reſolved to fill up the vacancy of Canterbury; and, to this end, ſent for Anſelm, abbot of Bec, in Normandy. The abbot ſteadily refuſed the dignity, and the king as obſtinately perſiſted in his accepting the paſtoral ſtaff; which being tendered to him, Anſelm kept his fiſt ſo faſt clenched, that it required the utmoſt ſtrength of the courtiers preſent to open it, and force that enſign of ſpiritual dignity into his hands. However, when he had accepted of it, he endeavoured to correct all abuſes, even thoſe in dreſs, with great zeal; and, though forced into the ſee of Canterbury, met with a continual oppoſition from the king. It was cuſtomary for perſons raiſed to any place of dignity, or poſt of honour, to make preſents to the king; and William expected from the new archbiſhop a conſiderable ſum; but, to his aſtoniſhment, the prelate's offering amounted to no more than five hundred pounds. Enraged at this parſimonious gift, the king treated Anſelm with great indignity. The archbiſhop left the preſence, carrying the money with him; nor could he be prevailed upon, when emergencies required aſſiſtance from the church, to furniſh any aid towards the expences of government. Anſelm was as tenacious of the rights of the church, as Williaam was of the prerogatives of the crown.

About this time two prelates, Urban and Clement, laid claim to the papal dignity. Anſelm had acknowledged the former, and perſiſted in ſo doing, though William had prohibited his ſubjects from recognizing any pope whom he himſelf had not received. Great diſputes alſo aroſe upon the archbiſhop requeſting to go to Rome, to receive the pall from pope Urban, the king abſolutely refuſing to let him leave the kingdom. When William returned from his expedition againſt the Welſh, he complained that the quota of men, provided by the archbiſhop, were neither ſo fit for ſervice, nor ſo well accoutered as they ought to have been; and he now ſummoned him to anſwer that charge in his court. The prelate, diſdaining to ſubmit to temporal authority, determined not to obey the royal mandate; but fearing compulſive meaſures might be employed to force obedience, he applied to ſome of the nobles, and by them acquainted the king, that he deſired to go to Rome upon very urgent buſineſs. The king ſent back a poſitive denial. The prelate became importunate. He renewed his requeſt again and again, though the charge was dropped; till William at laſt, growing impatient, ſent him word, that if he did go to Rome, he would ſeize upon his temporalities, and acknowledge him no longer for his archbiſhop. Notwithſtanding this threat, the prelate ſet out upon his journey with the badges of a pilgrim; and William, on hearing that he had landed on the continent, ordered all his goods and revenues to be brought into the Exchequer; nor could he, during the remainder of his reign, ever be perſuaded to reſtore them to the church. In this conteſt between Rufus and Anſelm, it appears evidently, and will hereafter be more fully ſeen, how detrimental it is to a nation, when ſacerdotal and regal power are unlimited, or not reſtrained by the conſtitution and its laws.

Theſe internal commotions, party diſputes, and even the enterprizes of ambition, now gave way to the noiſe of the cruſades, which engroſſed wholly the attention of Europe. Superſtition and enthuſiaſm, which compoſed the principal features of thoſe times, produced ſuch effects, as have aſtoniſhed people of more enlightened ages. After Mahomet had united the diſperſed Arabs under one head, they ſubdued a great part of the eaſtern empire, and conquered Jeruſalem. The Chriſtians now with grief beheld thoſe places that had been conſecrated by the preſence of the Deity, in the hands of infidels. However, the Arabs, or Saracens, gave little diſturbance to thoſe zealots who went to perform in the Holy Land, what they eſteemed religious duties; but the Turcomans, or Turks, who were a tribe of Tartars, having taken Syria and Jeruſalem from the Saracens, rendered the devotions of the Chriſtians in the holy city much more dangerous, the pilgrims being expoſed to inſults, extortions, and robberies. A monk of Picardy, known by the name of Peter the Hermit, having made a pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, repreſented at his return, in ſuch ſtrong colours, the outrages and oppreſſions exerciſed by the Turks on the pilgrims, that Urban II. conſidered him as a proper inſtrument to exhort the ſovereigns of Europe to make the conqueſt of the Holy Land.

Peter was now ſent from province to province, in order to blow up the ſparks of enthuſiaſm into a flame, and to rouſe the people to action. He executed his commiſſion fully to the ſatisfaction of the pope; who, perceiving the exclamations of Peter to have produced the deſired effect, he held a council in the open fields of Placentia, at which above thirty thouſand ſeculars, and four thouſand eccleſiaſtics were preſent. The project of invading Paleſtine was unanimouſly applauded, but none enliſted under the banner of his holineſs. He therefore held a ſecond council at Clermont in Auvergne, where he made a ſpeech in the market-place, expatiating on the miſeries ſuffered by the Chriſtians in the Holy Land. Urban's oration and Peter's pathetic exhortations had ſuch an effect, that the whole multitude declared with one voice for war againſt the infidels, and ſolemnly devoted themſelves to the performance of a ſervice, which they were taught to believe meritorious in the ſight of God, and for engaging in which the pope promiſed them the remiſſion of all their ſins; and, in caſe they fell in the glorious cauſe, paſſports under his own ſeal into the other world. No wonder that ſuch terms ſhould operate upon thoſe, moſt of whom were plunged in crimes, the natural attendants of debauchery, and in groſs ignorance, equal to their guilt. No wonder that princes, prelates, and nobles, ſhould exclaim at the concluſion of the pope's ſpeech, "It is the will of God; it is the will of God:" words which were ſo firmly believed to flow from a divine inſpiration, that in all the exploits of thoſe adventurer, they were uſed for the ſignal of battle.

An infinite number of perſons, men of all ranks, now took the croſs, which, when enliſted, they affixed to their right ſhoulders. All orders of men flocked to the ſacred banners; nobles, partizans, peaſants, and prieſts, enrolled their names. Even women, concealing their ſex under the diſguiſe of armour, attended the camp, and frequently, abandoning all ſenſe of decency, proſtituted themſelves without reſerve to the army. The greateſt criminals were forward in a ſervice they conſidered as an atonement for their crimes: and during the courſe of theſe romantic expeditions, the moſt enormous diſorders were committed by men inured to wickedneſs, encouraged by example, and impelled by neceſſity. The hoſt of adventurers was now ſo great, that their wiſeſt leaders, Hugh, count of Vermandois, brother to the king of France, Stephen, count of Blois, Godfrey of Bouillon, prince of Brabant, and Raymond, count of Thoulouſe, began to fear leſt the greatneſs of the armament ſhould defeat its propoſed end. They therefore ſuffered an undiſciplined multitude, computed at three hundred thouſand men to go before them, under the command of Peter the Hermit, and Walter the Money-leſs. Theſe took the road through Hungaria and Bulgaria, toward Conſtantinople; and truſting that heaven would ſupply all their wants by ſupernatural means, they made no proviſion for ſubſiſtence on their march. Hence they ſoon found a neceſſity of obtaining by plunder, what they had in vain expected from miracles; whereupon the enraged inhabitants of thoſe countries through which they paſſed, aſſembling in arms, ſlaughtered them with very little reſiſtance. After theſe followed the more diſciplined armies, who paſſed the ſtreights of Conſtantinople, and moſt of them periſhed in the plains of Aſia. The whole number amounted to ſeven hundred thouſand men.

Though this fanatical fury deprived Europe of millions of inhabitants, yet it had ſome advantages, which redounded to thoſe, who, free from the prevalent infatuation, did not entirely loſe ſight of their preſent intereſt. The churches and cloiſters purchaſed, at very low rates, the eſtates of many barons, who imagined, that a little money and their arms were ſufficient for them to obtain kingdoms in Aſia. Thoſe wiſer princes who ſtaid at home, got rid of their moſt turbulent ſubjects, and at the ſame time took the opportunity of annexing to the crown many conſiderable fiefs, either by purchaſe, or the want of heirs. Nobles ſold their ancient caſtles and eſtates, which in their eyes had loſt their value. The French monarchy recovered its luſtre by this enthuaſtic inſanity. But no prince gained more, or deſerved it leſs, than the king of England. Robert, ſeized with the epidemic frenzy of enthuſiaſm, took the croſs, and made preparations for a cruſade. But finding it would be impracticable for him to appear at the head of his vaſſals in a manner ſuitable to his rank, without a ſupply of money, he had recourſe to his brother William Rufus, to whom he mortgaged his duchy for the ſum of ten thouſand marks. The bargain was ſoon concluded, and William raiſed the money by contributions on his ſubjects of all ranks; even the convents were obliged to melt down their plate, to furniſh the quota demanded of them. William was immediately, upon advancing the loan, put in poſſeſſion of Normandy and Maine; while Robert ſet out with a ſplendid retinue for Paleſtine, filled with an aſſurance of gaining either glory or eternal happineſs as a recompence.

A. D. 1090.

Normandy and Maine being thus ceded to the king, brought him an increaſe of power; and he was conſidered as one of the greateſt princes of his time. And yet a ſingle baron preſumed to ſet that power at defiance. Helic, lord of La Fleche, a ſmall town in Anjou, made ſo many inroads into William's dominions, that he was obliged to croſs the ſea ſeveral times, in order to drive him out of his territories. But Helic embraced the firſt opportunity of the king's abſence to renew his incurſions, and this year laid ſiege to the city of Mans. William was hunting in the New Foreſt, when he received the news of this tranſaction; when, turning to his attendants, he aſked them, in what direction the city of Mans lay from them? He was no ſooner informed, than turning his horſe's head, he rode full ſpeed toward the ſea-ſide, calling to thoſe that were about him, "Let him who loves me, follow." Dartmouth was the neareſt ſea-port town; and there they found only an old crazy veſſel, which William entered, notwithſtanding all the perſuaſions of his attendants to the contrary. The maſter of the veſſel declared, that to put to ſea was nothing leſs than running into unavoidable deſtruction. But the dauntleſs ſpirit of William was not to be terrified at danger. "What!" ſaid he, "didſt thou ever hear of a king that was drowned?" Silenced by this reproof, the maſter ſailed immediately out of the harbour, and the next morning reached Barfleur in ſafety.

Surpriſed at the diſpatch of William, Helic, after a few ſkirmiſhes, raiſed the ſiege, and retreated with the utmoſt precipitation. William purſued the flying enemy, attacked their rear, and took Helic himſelf priſoner. The captive was treated with inſult; which ſo incenſed that intrepid nobleman, that he told Rufus, "He had little cauſe for triumph, as his ſucceſs was owing rather to ſurprize than valour;" adding, "that if he was again at liberty, he would not find it eaſy to defeat him in a fair encounter." This ſpeech awakened all the ſentiments of valour in the breaſt of William. He immediately ordered the count to be ſet at liberty. "Be gone," ſaid he fiercely, "do thy worſt; and, by the face of St. Luke, if thou haſt the good fortune to conquer me, I will not aſk the ſmalleſt return for the freedom I now give thee." But no more engagements happened between them.

A. D. 1100.

The duke of Aquitaine offered, about this time, to mortgage his dominions to William, upon the ſame conditions as his brother Robert had parted with his; namely, for a ſum ſufficient to defray his expences to the Holy Land. William, who ridiculed both the motives that gave riſe to the cruſades, and the madneſs of thoſe who engaged in ſuch chimerical undertakings, agreed to pay down the ſum wanted, and would have been in poſſeſſion of the duchy of Aquitaine, if in the midſt of his projects, and while his heart ſwelled with arrogance and preſumption, a ſudden death had not ſnatched him to the bar of infinite juſtice, and ſaid to him, as to the proud fool in the goſpel, "This night, vain, ambitious monarch, ſhall thy ſoul be required of thee; and whoſe will thy mortgages, and that great wealth be, which thou haſt acquired by injuſtice, rapine, and extortion?"

As the king was hunting in the New Foreſt with Sir Walter Tyrrel, a French knight, remarkable for his ſkill in archery, a ſtag ruſhing from the thicket paſſed near the king, Sir Walter Tyrrel let fly an arrow, which glancing accidentally either from a tree, or from the horns of the ſtag, pierced the king through the heart, and he inſtantly expired. Tyrrel, who had been the innocent cauſe of this fatal accident, fled immediately to the ſea-ſide, where he embarked in a veſſel for France, and joined the cruſade, which was then ſetting out for Jeruſalem. The royal corpſe was treated with the utmoſt neglect. Thoſe who feared his power when living, and had followed his fortunes, paid no regard to his remains. A peaſant, paſſing through the foreſt with his cart, put the body of the king therein, and in that ignominious manner it was conveyed to Wincheſter, where it was interred on the day following without ceremony.

The Engliſh conſidered this melancholy cataſtrophe as one of the moſt fortunate events that could poſſibly have happened; and obſerved, that as the Conqueror had expelled, with the moſt ſhocking circumſtances of cruelty, the inhabitants of Hampſhire, in order to form the New Foreſt; ſo Providence, by a juſt retribution, had rendered that place fatal to ſeveral of his poſterity; for beſides William, his eldeſt ſon Richard, and his grandſon of the ſame name, were killed by accident in the New Foreſt. The death of William Rufus happened on the ſecond of Auguſt, in the fortieth year of his age, and the thirteenth of his reign. It does not appear that he was ever married, and therefore could not have any legitimate children.

While it is evident that many vices ſtained the character of this king, we do not find any monuments of his virtues, unleſs we reckon among the number, his rebuilding London bridge, ſurrounding the Tower of London with a ſtrong rampart, and erecting Weſtminſter hall; a ſmall quantum of national good, over-balanced by a corrupt heart, a boundleſs ambition, a violent temper, bordering on ferocity, a libidinous inſtinct, addicted to what nature abhors, a contempt even of the forms of religion, and a rapacity of an unbounded extent. He was ungrateful, perfidious, cruel, avaricious, and diſſolute. A violent and tyrannical prince; a perfidious, encroaching neighbour; and an ungracious, ungenerous relation. As to his magnanimity, it was little more than a conſtitutional quality; a courage, whereby he only enſlaved his own ſubjects, and diſturbed the tranquillity of thoſe, whom by the ties of blood he was bound to defend. It is paying him no great compliment to ſay he reſembled Cæſar; for though he might poſſeſs his virtue, which conſiſted alone of magnanimity, he poſſeſſed alſo his boundleſs ambition, which centered only in ſelf-gratification. To ſupport this, all his valour, all his military talents were exerciſed. To the ſame point his liberality, or rather political profuſeneſs tended, which ought to be accounted rather a vice than a virtue. If he had lived long, his expences would have undone him; for he had not, as Cæſar had, the treaſures of Rome to ſupport his extravagance; and it had brought him ſome years before his death into ſuch difficulties, that even if his temper had not been deſpotic, his neceſſities would have made him a tyrant. He purſued pleaſure with as much ardour as buſineſs, but never ſacrificed buſineſs to pleaſure. He was addicted to women, yet without any tenderneſs or fixed attachment. He had many concubines, but no miſtreſs; and never would marry, for fear of ſubjecting himſelf to any reſtraint. His judgment was ſolid, yet, as in the caſe of Anſelm, it was often borne down by the violence of his uncontrouled paſſions. He paid ſo little reſpect to oaths, that he ſeemed to conſider them as mere forms of ſtate, or acts which policy might employ and diſpenſe with at pleaſure. In ſhort, the miſery of the Engliſh was complete in this reign: for the nation was as much a prey to licentiouſneſs as to tyranny, ſuffering at once the diſorders of anarchy, and the oppreſſions of arbitrary power, to a very great extent.

A. D. 1100. HENRY the Firſt, ſurnamed Beauclerc, or the fine ſcholar, ſo called from his great learning, had been treated ill after his father's death by both his brothers, who had deprived him of his patrimony, and yet ſometimes made uſe of his aſſiſtance, which he gave freely. After the ſiege of St. Michael, where he had made a brave reſiſtance, and which was ſurrendered on no better condition than freedom to himſelf and garriſon, he took refuge in Brittany, and then in the French Vexin, from whence, after having remained about a year, he again changed his ſituation, and wandered over the provinces of France, with no other attendance than one knight, a chaplain, and three eſquires, expoſed to all the hardſhips of want, and in the ſchool of adverſity learned patience and fortitude; virtues he could not have acquired, had he been always nurſed in the lap of proſperity. But while thus in a ſtate far below his birth and merit, the citizens of Dumfront, incenſed againſt their lord, Robert de Beleſme, earl of Shrewſbury, from whom they could not obtain the leaſt redreſs of their grievances, expelled him, and offered their town, one of the ſtrongeſt in Normandy, to the exiled prince. He accepted their offer, and made for ſome time a ſucceſsful war againſt both his brothers; but when Robert entered upon the cruſade, a reconciliation took place between William and Henry. The laſt was in another part of the New Foreſt, when the news was brought him of his brother's death. Senſible that not a moment was to be loſt in this critical conjuncture, he galloped to Wincheſter caſtle, in order to ſecure the royal treaſure. He demanded the keys where the regalia and money were kept, of William de Breteuil, who oppoſed his will, telling him that Robert was his elder brother, and that, though abſent, it was his duty to preſerve his allegiance to him, the undoubted heir to the Engliſh throne. But Henry drawing his ſword, threatened him with inſtant death if he dared to diſobey his commands. At this critical moment, the earl of Warwick and Robert de Mellant arriving, with a number of the late king's attendants, they all declared in favour of Henry's pretenſions. Upon which Breteuil ſubmitted, and Henry gained poſſeſſion of the regalia, and his brother's treaſure.

After thus ſucceeding in a main point, and his brother's corpſe being interred the next day, Henry haſtened to London, where he was elected king of England by the great council; and three days after his acceſſion was crowned in Weſtminſter Abbey, on the fifteenth of Auguſt, by the biſhop of London. At this time Robert was in Italy, where having, in his return from Paleſtine, married Sibylla, daughter of the count of Converſana, he had lingered for a twelvemonth, and this imprudent delay gave Henry an opportunity of ſeizing the crown, to which Robert was intitled, as well by the right of primogeniture, as by virtue of the laſt treaty concluded between him and William.

Thus a revolution in the affairs of the nation was effected by ſeveral accidental events. A king in the prime of life, and in the zenith of power, was cut off by ſudden death; the true ſucceſſion was ſet aſide; the treaſures of the kingdom were ſeized by a perſon who had not the leaſt legal claim to them; and the throne was filled by a young prince who was little better than a bold uſurper. But they who had warmly ſupported William Rufus againſt Robert in England, had reaſon to apprehend the reſentment of the latter; and the manner in which he had governed Normandy, was a ſtrong preſumption of his unfitneſs to govern England. On the other hand, Henry had ſhewn great talents for governing, and ſome ſtreſs was laid on his being born an Engliſhman.

Henry, having now obtained a crown, knew well the beſt methods of keeping it. He knew that the ſureſt way of obtaining the favour of the Engliſh, would be to grant them ſuch national benefits as would make his intereſt that of the public. Their ſubmiſſion to the tyranny of the two firſt Norman kings had been owing to circumſtances of a tranſient nature; but they ſtill retained a paſſion for liberty, equally natural to the Normans and Engliſh. On the preſent occaſion their diſtruſt and fear of each other, which had prevented their uniting in defence of their privileges, gave way to a ſtrong and equal deſire in both, of reducing the regal authority to ſuch limitation, as, without deſtroying the feudal ſyſtem, might alleviate the heavy burdens with which it was loaded. So ſtrong was this deſire, that neither the elderſhip of the duke of Normandy, which though it did not in thoſe days convey an abſolute right to the crown, was yet a powerful recommendation; nor a ſolemn treaty made with him, and confirmed by the barons, who had ſettled the crown upon him, could ſtand in competition with Henry's offering to aboliſh all the evil cuſtoms that had prevailed in the late reign, and to eſtabliſh the beſt laws that had ever been given under any of the kings, his predeceſſors. Hence the nation reſolved to give the crown to a prince, who ſhould acquire and hold it under no other claim than a compact with his people. Agreeable therefore to the demands of his ſubjects, Henry, as ſoon as the ceremony of the coronation was over, granted them a charter under the great ſeal of England. A tranſlation of this charter, which has been the foundation of many others, we here inſert for the entertainment of our readers, always having in view our promiſe, to furniſh them, as far as our abilities will permit, with a Complete Hiſtory of England.

I. Charter granted by HENRY to all his faithful ſubjects.

“Henry, by the grace of God, king of the Engliſh, to all his barons and faithful ſubjects, both French and Engliſh, greeting.

“Know ye, that by the mercy of God, and by the common council (with the aſſent) of the barons of the kingdom of England, I am crowned king of the ſaid kingdom; and becauſe the kingdom has been oppreſſed with unjuſt exactions, I, from the love of God, and the regard I bear you all, in the firſt place free the holy church, ſo as that I will neither ſell nor farm it out; nor upon the death of any archbiſhop, biſhop, or abbot, will I accept of any of the property of the church, nor ought from any of its tenants, until a ſucceſſor enters upon the ſame. And I baniſh all the evil uſages, with which the kingdom of England has been unjuſtly oppreſſed, part of which evil uſages I here ſet down.

“If any of my barons, earls, or my tenants, holding of me, ſhall die, his heirs ſhall not redeem his land, as was the cuſtom in the days of my brother; but ſhall relieve the ſame by a juſt and lawful relief. In like manner ſhall the tenants of my barons relieve their lands by a lawful (certain) and juſt relief. And if any of my barons, or other of my ſubjects, have a mind to give a daughter, or ſiſter, or niece in marriage, let him treat with me; but I will neither accept any part of his fortune for ſuch licence, nor will I prohibit his diſpoſal of her, unleſs it be to my enemy. And if any one of my barons or ſubjects ſhould, at his death, leave a daughter, his heir, I will diſpoſe of her, with the advice of my barons, together with her lands. And if upon the death of her huſband, a wife ſhall ſurvive without children, ſhe ſhall have her own dowry and marriage portion; nor will I give her to a huſband but with her own conſent, provided the wife keep her body in chaſtity: and either the wife, or ſome other relation, who is to deal juſtly, ſhall be guardian of the children and the eſtate, and I command my barons that they act conformably hereunto towards the ſons, daughters and wives of their tenants.

“The common mintage of money, which was taken throughout cities and counties, and was not in uſe under king Edward, I abſolutely forbid to be taken for the future. If any minter or other perſon be taken with falſe money, let right juſtice be done upon him.

“All fines and debts due to my brother, I forgive, except my juſt farms, and thoſe of bargains which concerned the inheritance of others, or for thoſe effects which juſtly concerned other perſons; and I forgive all bargains which any man has made with regard to his right of inheritance.

“And if any of my barons or tenants ſhall be ſick, ſo as that he ſhall diſpoſe of his money, I will that ſuch diſpoſition ſhall ſtand good; but if he be prevented by ſickneſs or war, ſhall not give or diſpoſe of his effects, let his wife, children, or parents, or his lawful tenants, divide it among themſelves as ſhall ſeem beſt to them.

“If any of my barons or tenants forfeit, he ſhall not give a pledge for favour of the whole fine, as he did in the time of my father and brother; but according to the meaſure of the forfeit ſo ſhall he be fined, in ſuch manner as fines were laid on under thoſe my predeceſſors, who reigned before my father and brother: but if he ſhall be convicted of treaſon, or wickedneſs, let him make ſatisfaction as ſhall ſeem juſt.”

II. Concerning the confirmation of king Edward's laws.

“ I pardon all murders committed before my coronation, and thoſe which ſhall be hereafter committed ſhall be ſatisfied for according to the laws of king Edward.

“ I have, by the common conſent of my barons, retained to myſelf the foreſts, in like manner as my father held them.

“ I grant of my own free gift, to my knights (i. e. tenants by knights ſervice) who defend their lands by their habergeons (or arms) that their demeſne lands and goods ſhall be free from all unjuſt guilds and taxes, and all labours, that their fidelity may be in proportion to my kindneſs; that ſince they are eaſed of ſo great a burden, they may the better provide themſelves with horſes and arms, and ſo be made fitter and more ready for my ſervice and the defence of the kingdom.

“ I reſtore to you the laws of king Edward, together with thoſe amendments which my father made by the advice of his barons.

“ If any one has taken any thing from me, or from any other perſon, he ſhall forthwith reſtore the ſame without making ſatisfaction; and he on whom any ſuch thing is found ſhall make ſure ſatisfaction to the owner.

“ Given in preſence of the archbiſhops, biſhops, barons, earls, ſheriffs, and nobles of all the kingdom of England, on the day of my coronation.”

From the obtaining this charter we may date the union of the Normans with the Engliſh, whoſe intereſts were blended, and inſeparably united under one common claim of national rights.

Henry's conduct, in this inſtance, correſponded with his engagements. He freed his ſubjects from all the burdens that had been illegally impoſed upon them; he remitted all the debts that were due to the crown, and puniſhed thoſe who had made themſelves odious by an abuſe of power, particularly Ralph Flambard, juſticiary of England, and biſhop of Durham; and at the ſame time, by the advice of his parliament, he recalled Anſelm, and placed him at the head of the adminiſtration. However, far from intending to purchaſe the archbiſhop's friendſhip by giving up the rights of his crown, Henry exerted his authority on many occaſions with great firmneſs, and was conſtantly ſupported even with the concurrence of the Engliſh biſhops.

The king alſo granted a charter to the city of London, whereby he confirmed the privileges beſtowed by his father, with ſome conſiderable additional favours. To ſtrengthen his intereſt and power with all parties ſtill more, he married Matilda, a lady accompliſhed with every quality that could render a woman deſirable, the daughter of Malcolm, king of Scotland, by the ſiſter of Edgar Atheling: a match that reſtored the crown to the Saxon royal blood, and united the king and his family after him to the people of England, by the moſt natural and endearing connection.

Robert, about this time, returned from the Holy Land, and took poſſeſſion of the duchy of Normandy without oppoſition. His return revived the hopes and fears of the Normans in England, who had poſſeſſions on the continent; and, being very powerful, they prevailed on moſt of their countrymen to take part with Robert. But the Engliſh, who were attached ſtrongly to Henry, having no eſtates abroad to forfeit, adhered to him firmly; and the whole clergy remained united to his intereſt, by the mediation of Apſelm. That prelate ſerved the king with a zeal that bore down all oppoſition. He even rode through the ranks of the army, recommending to the ſoldiers the defence of their prince, and denouncing the heavieſt cenſures of the church againſt any who ſhould continue to oppoſe him. Thus was the army fixed in the intereſt of their ſovereign, and marched with ardour to oppoſe Robert, who had now landed at Portſmouth with his forces.

The two armies lay for ſome days in ſight of each other, and every appearance ſeemed to prognoſticate a deciſive action. But both parties had powerful reaſons for not proceeding to extremities. The connections of blood, intereſt, friendſhip, and alliances, rendered an engagement very diſagreeable to the officers and ſoldiers on both ſides. They could not, without horror, think of drawing their ſwords againſt their parents, brothers, friends, relations, and countrymen. Robert had been diſappointed in his expectations; he hoped his partizans would have joined him with a greater number of forces; he had experienced his brother's abilities in the art of war; he knew, in caſe of a defeat, he had no reſource, and he ſhould loſe, with the crown of England, his duchy of Normandy. Henry on the other hand was no leſs ſenſible of the riſk he muſt run in the uncertain chance of war. He had much to loſe, and could gain little more than the ſhadow of honour, ſhould victory be on his ſide; and if in the day of battle his ſoldiers proved unfaithful, he might loſe both his life and kingdom. Each contending party was therefore deſirous of putting a period to their diſputes in an amicable manner; and to this end many meſſages paſſed every day between the two camps.

At length a negociation produced the following articles of agreement; That Robert ſhould for ever relinquiſh his pretenſions to the crown of England; in conſideration whereof he ſhould receive an annual penſion of three thouſand marks; that if either of the princes died without iſſue, the ſurvivor ſhould ſucceed to his dominions; that the adherents to each ſhould be pardoned, and reſtored to their poſſeſſions in Normandy or England; and that neither Henry nor Robert ſhould, from that time, encourage, receive, or protect the enemies of the other. This convention was ſworn to by twelve of the principal barons on both ſides. But Henry was the firſt who violated the articles, by puniſhing with fines, confiſcations, or baniſhment, all the active and powerful nobles who had engaged in Robert's invaſion. This he did at different periods, and under various pretences, that he might not appear to infringe the indemnity he had granted. His true motives were however well underſtood, and the terror his conduct produced towards the objects of his reſentment, prevented his ſubjects from conſpiring any more in favour of his brother. Almoſt all the barons Henry thus puniſhed were of the firſt rank in wealth and power, whoſe eſtates he divided among perſons of lower birth, who had zealouſly attached themſelves to his ſervice, hereby balancing the greatneſs of the nobility eſtabliſhed by his father, which cauſed perpetual uneaſineſs to the crown.

As Henry now ſaw himſelf abſolute maſter of England; he therefore reſolved to render himſelf independent of not only every foreign power, but every order among his own ſubjects. The moſt conſiderable power diſtinct from the crown, and which endeavoured to curb its prerogatives, was lodged in the biſhops and abbots. Henry could not ſit eaſy under this reſtraint from the church, particularly from Anſelm, whoſe behaviour during the late invaſion had highly incenſed the Norman faction. Senſible of this, and deſirous of humbling the arrogance of the primate, the king reſolved to make the reſentment of the Norman nobility ſubſervient to his own deſigns; but at the ſame time to proceed in ſuch a manner, as might carry the greateſt appearance of deference to the Roman pontiff.

In purſuance of this policy, the archbiſhop was ſummoned before the king's court, where the prelate, upon his appearing, was required to do homage immediately; to conſecrate thoſe who had been appointed to fill the vacant ſees and abbeys; or to quit the kingdom without delay. Anſelm, unmoved at this peremptory requiſition, appealed to the pope's letters, adding, that he had himſelf been a member of a council held at Bari, in which it was reſolved to excommunicate all thoſe who ſhould admit the claim of lay-inveſtitures; and that, by admitting the validity of ſuch claim, he ſhould be ſelf-condemned and ſelf-excommunicated. "But what is all this to me?" replied the king with great quickneſs, "I am reſolved not to depart from my reſolution, nor ſuffer any one to reſide within my dominions, who ſhall refuſe to pay me the allegiance due to a ſovereign." Anſelm, with equal ſpirit, replied, "That he was reſolved to repair to Canterbury, where he would wait the event with patience and reſignation." Henry, unwilling to come to any dangerous extremity with the church, told the primate, that he would ſend a new deputation to Rome, in order to lay before Paſcal, who then filled the papal chair, the alternative, of either departing from his declaration reſpecting inveſtitures, or of agreeing with his determination that Anſelm ſhould quit the kingdom. Accordingly a deputation was appointed, conſiſting of Gerard, archbiſhop of York, Herbert, biſhop of Thetford, and Robert, biſhop of Cheſter.

Anſelm, afraid of the influence thoſe prelates might have over the pope's deciſions, nominated two monks as deputies of his own, namely, Baldwin of the abbey of Bec, and Alexander of the abbey of Canterbury, with inſtructions to repreſent the danger that threatened the papal authority, ſhould the aſpiring power of the king in this inſtance triumph over the church. The pope having, in a full conſiſtory, examined into the merit of the cauſe, declared in favour of the primate; and Anſelm, who was acquainted with every thing that had paſſed in Rome, ſupported his opinion with firmneſs and reſolution. He not only refuſed to conſecrate ſome new biſhops, who had received inveſtiture from the king, but alſo to communicate with them. Henry was irritated to the higheſt degree; and the primate, to avoid the ſtorm, retired to Rome. The people were alarmed at the departure of the archbiſhop; and the king fearing leſt England ſhould be put under an interdict, and not chuſing to ſee his kingdom waſted by the hand of religious bigotry, wiſely gave up the claim of inveſtitures, and the pope conſented to his exacting from biſhops the homage they owed him as temporal peers. An accommodation having thus taken place between Henry and the church, Anſelm returned to England, and was reinſtated in his temporal and ſpiritual privileges.

A. D. 1103. Henry's attention to his intereſt in other particulars was not in the leaſt diverted by this eccleſiaſtical diſpute. He had already greatly reduced the exorbitant power of the nobility, and reſolved to purſue that attention ſtill farther. William de Warrance, earl of Surry, had been deprived of his eſtate in England, and therefore continually importuned the duke of Normandy to uſe his good offices with Henry, in order to his being reinſtated in his poſſeſſions; and the duke was determined to ſolicit his brother for this favour in perſon. Henry, apprized of this intended viſit, pretended to be highly diſpleaſed with his brother, for having entered his kingdom without permiſſion, eſpecially with bringing over with him perſons whom he knew to be enemies to his perſon and government. He even charged him with a breach of the late treaty, by affording refuge to the rebellious earl of Shrewſbury, and putting him in poſſeſſion of his father's eſtates in Normandy. Robert perceived he had taken a wrong ſtep, and apprehending his liberty in danger, was glad to purchaſe an eſcape, by reſigning his penſion.

In his government, Robert was in every reſpect the reverſe of his brother. Abandoned alternately to diſſolute pleaſure and ſuperſtition, he became ſo remiſs in the care of his treaſures, and the exerciſe of his authority, that his ſervants pillaged him with impunity, and proceeded to practiſe every ſpecies of extortion on his defenceleſs ſubjects. His indolence, his being perpetually immerſed in ſloth or riot, the factions his weakneſs encouraged, and the inſolence of thoſe who even treated him with contempt when they approached his perſon, induced many of the nobles, and the body of the clergy, to apply to the king of England for protection. It may ſeem unnatural that a younger brother, to whom Robert had ceded the crown of England, ſhould now, upon any pretence whatever, deprive him of his patrimony; but Henry, beſides having the barons, his parliament, and the pope on his ſide, to quiet his ſcruples, might recollect how ill he had been uſed by his brother in former times. His impriſonment, his exile, the indignities he had ſuffered, might ſteel his heart againſt any impreſſions of fraternal affection.

A. D. 1105.

However, the application of the Norman nobility afforded Henry a plauſible pretence for interfering in their affairs. He therefore paſſed over into Normandy in a grand fleet, accompanied with a powerful army. The firſt place that felt the force of his arms was Baieux, which, after an obſtinate defence, he took by ſtorm. He next became maſter of Caen, by the voluntary ſubmiſſion of its inhabitants; but being repulſed at Falaiſe, and obliged by the winter ſeaſon to raiſe the ſiege, he returned to England, after aſſuring the Norman nobles, that he would perſevere in labouring for their deliverance.

Agreeable to his promiſe, he returned the following year, and began the campaign with the ſiege of Trenchebray. Robert now perceiving his intentions were to ſtrip him of his dominions, was at laſt rouſed from his lethargy, and being joined by the earl of Mortaigne, and Robert de Belleſme, earl of Shrewſbury, the king's inveterate enemies, he raiſed a conſiderable army, and appeared before his brother's camp, intending to finiſh by one deciſive battle the quarrel between them. By his preſence he ſo animated his troops, that at the commencement of the action, they made a great impreſſion on the Engliſh, who were thrown into ſuch confuſion as offered Robert a fair opportunity of obtaining a complete victory, but which was loſt by the flight of Robert de Belleſme, earl of Shrewſbury, whereby the whole army was thrown into confuſion, and occaſioned their being entirely defeated. Henry made a great ſlaughter among the enemy, and, what gave much more real glory to his arms, he took near ten thouſand priſoners, with whom were numbered his brother, duke Robert, together with the moſt conſiderable barons who adhered to his intereſt. This victory was followed by the reduction of Normandy. Rouen inſtantly ſubmitted to the conqueror; Falaiſe threw open her gates; and by the ſurrender of this laſt fortreſs, prince William, Robert's only ſon, fell into his hands.

Henry hereupon aſſembled the ſtates of Normandy, received homage from its vaſſals, ſettled the adminiſtration of public affairs, and diſmantled the caſtles that had lately been built. He now returned to England, taking with him Robert, his unfortunate brother. This prince was detained in cuſtody during the remainder of his life, which was no leſs than twenty-ſeven years, when he died in the caſtle of Cardiff, in Glamorganſhire. Prince William, his ſon, was committed to the care of Helie de St. Saen, who had married Robert's natural daughter, and who being a man of ſtrict probity, executed the truſt with tenderneſs and fidelity. To Edgar Atheling, another illuſtrious priſoner, Henry gave liberty, and ſettled on him a ſmall penſion, on which he lived in England totally neglected and forgotten. This prince was diſtinguiſhed by perſonal bravery, but what can be a ſtronger proof of the mediocrity of his talents, than, notwithſtanding he enjoyed the only legal right to the crown, his being permitted during the reigns of ſo many tyrannical uſurpers, to live unmoleſted, and deſcend to his grave in peace!

The inhabitants of Normandy, by this revolution, received many advantages; for Henry, with the concurrence of the Norman nobility, confirmed his father's laws, reſumed all his brother's extravagant grants, and promiſed to ſuppreſs, among all orders of his ſubjects, that rapine and violence which had involved the ſtate in want, and which the relaxation of the reins of government, in the hands of Robert, had produced. Theſe engagements were ſtrictly fulfilled. The very dread of Henry's juſtice induced many of them to ſeek refuge in exile, from whence they never returned; and ſome of thoſe who were his priſoners he confined for their lives; though large ſums were offered to purchaſe their freedom.

Notwithſtanding, by the acquiſition of his brother's territories, the ambition of Henry was gratified, yet he found it difficult to maintain and defend them. He was frequently involved in wars that rendered it often neceſſary to croſs the ſeas, in order to ſtop the inroads of neighbouring princes, and diſcontented barons. To defray the extraordinary expences attending this new government, he loaded his Engliſh ſubjects with continual taxes almoſt beyond what they could bear. He had however the wiſdom of accompanying demands of this nature with kind words and ſome popular acts. By theſe marks of paternal regard, as well as by the juſtice he did to the commons againſt their lords, whenever they applied to him for relief or redreſs, he turned the complaints of the ſeverity uſed in collecting the taxes, from himſelf to his miniſters, by whom they were raiſed.

As the general tenor of Henry's government was popular at home, and ſucceſsful abroad, the faults, which his prudence moderated, and his policy varniſhed, were never productive of any conſiderable diſcontent to the people. Whence from the ſecond year of his reign, in which he expelled the moſt turbulent of his barons, to the day of his death, that is, for the ſpace of above thirty-three years, there was not the leaſt commotion in England. A term of tranquillity ſcarce to be paralleled in the hiſtory of this kingdom; and more extraordinary at that time, conſidering how very factious and prone to ſedition the temper of the barons appeared to be, in the beginning of this, and through all the reigns that immediately ſucceeded.

A. D. 1108. Yet though Henry was thus powerful and without inteſtine broils at home, a ſtorm was gathering which threatened to burſt upon his foreign dominions. Philip, king of France, being dead, was ſucceeded by Louis le Gros, or the Fat. This prince, jealous of the growing power of Henry, made preparations for invading his Norman dominions.

It has been already noticed that Henry had committed William Clito, alſo called William Longſword, Robert's only ſon, and his nephew, to the care of Helie. But the king ſoon repented of his choice; for when he would have ſecured William's perſon, Helie withdrew with his pupil to the count of Anjou, who gave him a kind reception, and aſſured him of his protection. In proportion as the young prince grew up to man's eſtate, he had diſcovered virtues that ornamented his birth; and wandering through the courts of Guienne, Burgundy and Brittany, excited the friendly compaſſion of ſeveral princes, and raiſed a general indignation againſt his uncle, who had ſo unjuſtly deprived him of his inheritance.

The hoſtile intention of the French monarch was ſoon perceived by the king of England; who being alarmed leſt he ſhould gain over William to his intereſt, and prompt him to attempt a recovery of his juſt right; he therefore paſſed over into Normandy, and employed every ſtratagem to get the young prince once more into his power, but could not ſucceed.

A. D. 1110. Henry having reſided two years in Normandy, during which period there only paſſed ſome ſlight ſkirmiſhes on the frontiers, and having ſettled his affairs in the beſt manner he could, returned to England. In order to break the confederacy that had been formed againſt him, between the counts of Anjou and Flanders, he contracted his eldeſt ſon William to the daughter of the former, by which means he detached this prince from the alliance, and obliged the confederates to ſign a treaty of peace. This peace was however of ſhort duration, for his nephew, William, had now attained to manhood, and ſhewed ſtrong indications of a great ſpirit, and an underſtanding fit to ſupport his high pretenſions. Henry had offered to beſtow upon him three earldoms in England, and to bring him up in his own court as his adopted ſon; but he diſdained theſe proffers, being afraid perhaps of putting himſelf in the power of a king, to whoſe crown he had a title. The young earl of Flanders now warmly eſpouſed the cauſe of William.

The moſt fortunate event in his favour, was the death of the earl of Evereaux: for Amauri de Montfort claiming the earldom, as heir to the deceaſed, and it being refuſed him by Henry, he by his birth, alliances, riches, and perſonal talents, perſuaded almoſt all France, and Louis himſelf, to declare war againſt the king of England, in behalf of William. The Norman barons engaged likewiſe in the ſame cauſe. The defection among them was ſo general, that the king ſcarce knew in whom to place confidence. He was encompaſſed by treaſon; it was in his court, in his council, in his bedchamber itſelf; one of the gentlemen of which formed a plot againſt his life: and though diſcovered to him before the execution, the puniſhment of the traitor did not quiet the king's fears againſt thoſe who attacked openly. He took into his pay a ſtrong body of foreign troops; and he ſecured on his ſide, among his beſt friends and Engliſh ſubjects, the commons of England. This powerful aid, joined to that of his nephew, the earl of Blois, enabled him to oppoſe the revolt of the Normans, and the arms of all his other enemies, who had combined to deſtroy him.

A. D. 1118. During this Norman war, an event happened that deſerves particular notice. Euſtace, lord of Breteuil, who had married Juliana, a natural daughter of king Henry, and had by her two daughters, being connected in friendſhip with Amauri de Montfort, was perſuaded by him to demand a ſtrong caſtle, becauſe it had formerly been in the poſſeſſion of his anceſtors. Henry afraid at ſuch a time to refuſe almoſt any requeſt, and yet unwilling to truſt him with a fortreſs of ſuch importance, promiſed to deliver it to him after the concluſion of the war, when it could be done with more ſafety, and gave him the governor's ſon as a hoſtage for fulfilling his engagement, taking in return the two daughters of Euſtace, as hoſtages for his fidelity during the continuance of the war. But Euſtace, being perſuaded by Amauri to revolt, cruelly put out the boy's eyes, and in that miſerable condition ſent him back to his father. Henry, exaſperated at ſuch an inſolent act of barbarity, and not having the perpetrator of it in his power, delivered up to the injured governor his two daughters, whom Euſtace had delivered to him as hoſtages of his fidelity. The governor, in the heat of paſſion, and paying no regard to their innocence, or their being of his maſter's blood, inhumanly cut off the ends of their noſes, and put out their eyes. Henry, inſtead of reſenting this cruel exceſs of his rage, loaded him with preſents and favours. One could wiſh for Henry's honour, that he had ſound a leſs horrid expedient, to appeaſe his injured ſervant, without having inflicted on innocence a puniſhment due only to guilt, and in the perſons of thoſe, whom the firſt and greateſt of all moral obligations, the law of nature, obliged him to ſave and protect.

Henry's natural daughter, Juliana, endeavoured to revenge the injuries her children had received, by an attempt to murder her father. Her huſband had left Breteuil in her cuſtody; but the inhabitants having delivered the town up to the king, Juliana retired into the caſtle; when finding herſelf unequal to the taſk of maintaining it againſt the bravery and experience of Henry, ſhe deſired a parley with him; to which he having conſented, this incenſed mother diſcharged an arrow at him out of a croſs bow, but fortunately for them both it ſpent it's force in the air. Juliana was at length compelled to ſurrender the caſtle and herſelf at diſcretion.

All eyes were now fixed upon Henry, to ſee in what manner a prince ſo rigorous in his juſtice, would puniſh a daughter, who had raſhly made an attempt on his life. But Henry imputing her intention to murder him to the violence of her grief, which he himſelf had occaſioned, would not let her ſuffer in life or limb, nor even deprive her of liberty; but he took a whimſical method of expoſing her to ſhame: for the drawbridge having been by his order broken down, on her leaving the caſtle, ſhe was obliged, in the view of his gazing army, to get down from the rampart into the ditch, and to wade through the water of the mote; and with this brand of diſgrace he ſent her to her huſband.

The affairs of Henry wore now a more proſperous aſpect, and he was determined to proſecute the war in Normandy with the utmoſt vigour; which would ſoon have been concluded, had not Louis, attended by William, Robert's ſon, marched to ſuccour the rebels at the head of his army. Henry, upon the firſt notice of that monarch's approach, retired to Rouen, being willing to avoid any hoſtilities with the king of France; but the French having advanced within four miles of Rouen, and ravaged the adjacent country with fire and ſword, he reſolved to give them battle. The two armies met on the plain of Brenneville, where an engagement was begun by William Clito, who by the impetuoſity of his charge, broke the firſt line of the Engliſh; but was repulſed by the ſecond, compoſed of Henry's houſhold troops, and commanded by himſelf at their head. The king maintained his ground with ſurpriſing preſence of mind; he rode from rank to rank, encouraging thoſe who ſtood firm, and rallying the ſquadrons which had been broken, by the intrepid attack of the young Norman prince. The engagement now became general; and while Henry led up his troops againſt the enemy, he was in danger of falling a victim to one of thoſe chances ſo frequent in war, by which the monarch and private ſoldier, the coward and the brave, are equally expoſed.

William de Criſpin, a Norman knight, celebrated for his ſtrength and courage, cut his way to the ſpot where Henry, regardleſs of his own ſafety, ſought in perſon. Fired with the thought of gaining the victory with a ſingle blow, Criſpin fell with the utmoſt fury on the king of England, and ſtruck him twice with ſuch violent force on the head, that the blood guſhed out from his mouth and ears, and he ſeemed, for a moment, to have loſt his ſenſes. Criſpin was juſt about to follow his advantages with a third ſtroke, when Henry, with ſurpriſing reſolution, ſtruck his adverſary with ſo much fury, that he fell headlong from his horſe at the conqueror's feet, and was taken priſoner. This perſonal bravery of Henry had no other effect than defeating the intention of the Norman knight; the battle raged with redoubled fury, and fortune ſeemed inclined to beſtow the palm of victory on the French and Normans. Henry himſelf began to be apprehenſive of the conſequences; but in this critical moment the Engliſh, who formed the rear of the army, advanced, and charged the enemy with ſuch impetuoſity that they gave way on all ſides, and fled with the utmoſt precipitation. All attempts to rally them were fruitleſs. Louis himſelf having been diſmounted, was hurried away with the torrent, and eſcaped by the aſſiſtance of a peaſant, who conducted him through woods and byways, to the caſtle of Andeli, out of the reach of his purſuers.

Louis, notwithſtanding this defeat, ſoon took the field again, and a ſecond battle was fought, more furious than the firſt, at the cloſe of which both of the contending parties claimed the victory, and perhaps with equal reaſon. The French monarch however was made ſenſible, that it would be impoſſible to reſtore the young prince to the dominions of his father by force of arms; and therefore applied to the council of Rheims, aſſembled by pope Calixtus II. flattering himſelf with the thought of being able to turn his fulminations againſt the king of England. Aware of the danger, Henry took the moſt prudent meaſures to avert the ſtorm. With this view he ſent large preſents to his holineſs, and by this powerful argument brought him over to his intereſt. The pope declared he was ſatisfied with the reaſons alledged by Henry in juſtification of his conduct, and diſmiſſed the aſſembly.

At this time, a treaty was ſet on foot, the greateſt difficulty in which was, a diſpute about the homage which the dukes of Normandy were bound to pay to the French crown. Louis could not give up this important point, which ſeemed an inſuperable bar in the way of an accommodation; when Henry found an expedient which ſaved his own dignity, and contented the French king, namely, that his ſon William ſhould be inveſted with the duchy of Normandy in his ſtead, and do homage for it to Louis in the accuſtomed form. This being agreed to, with a reſtitution of places, and mutual exchange of priſoners on both ſides, the peace was concluded to the ſatisfaction of Henry, who without any loſs had ſuſtained all the efforts of a moſt formidable confederacy, and put an end to ſuch a dangerous war, whereby he became more powerful and reſpected than heretofore.

A. D. 1120.

This bright day of proſperity was, however, overcaſt with a domeſtic calamity, that humbled his pride, and diſturbed the remainder of his life with ever-flowing ſorrow. William, his only ſon, was, on his return with him to England, but in another ſhip, drowned in his paſſage, together with his natural ſiſter Matilda, counteſs of Perche; for the crew of the ſhip, either through careleſſneſs, or being intoxicated with liquor, ſuffered her to run upon a rock not far from the Norman ſhore, where ſhe in a ſhort time foundered. The prince got into the boat, and, as the weather was calm, might, had his fate ſo ordered it, been eaſily ſaved; but, moved with the piercing cries of his ſiſter, he ordered it to be rowed back to the ſhip, when ſo many leaped therein that it immediately ſunk. Richard, one of Henry's natural ſons, the counteſs of Cheſter, the king's niece, her huſband, the earl of Cheſter, his brother, who was governor to the prince, a nephew of the emperor Henry V. and other noble perſons, foreigners as well as Engliſh, periſhed by this fatal accident. When the ſhip was ſinking, two perſons climbed to the top of the maſt, and kept their heads above the water. One of them was the young ſon of Gilbert de Aquila, the other a butcher of Rouen. In this ſituation they remained a great part of the night; but the tender youth being benumbed by the wet and cold, loſt his ſtrength, and, recommending his companion to the mercy of God, fell into the ſea, and roſe no more. The butcher held out till morning; and, being ſaved by ſome fiſhermen who came from Barfleur, related the circumſtances of this melancholy event. The dead body of the prince was ſought for in vain; his father was denied even the conſolation of burying him: he had no grave but the ocean.

Henry, with all his magnanimity, could not reſiſt this dreadful ſhock. At hearing the news he fainted; and it was ſome time before he recovered that compoſure of mind, which had hitherto marked his character. Indeed, he had reaſon ſufficient to be grieved, both as a father and a king. The young prince is ſaid to have been of an amiable diſpoſition; and, as Henry had no other legitimate ſon, his death left the ſucceſſion to England and Normandy undetermined. Deſirous, however, of having an heir to ſucceed him, he reſolved to marry again. His late wife Matilda had been dead two years, and now he made choice of Adelais, daughter to the duke of Louvain, a young lady of remarkable beauty and accompliſhments. But the hopes of both the king and the nation were diſappointed. Adelais brought Henry no child.

A. D. 1121.

A. D. 1128.

In this conjuncture, the nation began to turn their eyes towards the ſon of duke Robert. The bravery that prince had diſcovered in the Norman war, in the opinion of the public, added weight to his pretenſions. It is true, England was too firmly attached to Henry, for his nephew's adherents to make any impreſſion on that nation while he was alive; however, in Normandy they were, at the inſtigation of a French cabal, ripe for another revolt: but Henry attacked the conſpirators before they were prepared, and took ſome of their caſtles. Not long after moſt of their leaders, being ſurpriſed on a march, were taken priſoners. By this ſtroke, all the hopes of William Clito were again diſappointed. Many who had deſigned to join him were ſtopped, and many who had declared for his party forſook it. Even the earl of Anjou renounced his friendſhip, and expelled him out of his dominions. Henry now remained maſter of Normandy, where he endeavoured to ſtrengthen his government by the rigorous puniſhments he inflicted on thoſe who had revolted againſt him.

A. D. 1125.

At the time when the king's thoughts were chiefly employed on a ſucceſſor to the throne, the emperor, who had married his daughter Matilda, died without iſſue, upon which he immediately ſent for his daughter, and having ſummoned an aſſembly of the ſtates at Windſor, it was there unanimouſly agreed, to acknowledge the empreſs Maud, or Matilda, as queen of England, in caſe Henry died without iſſue. The Engliſh beheld that princeſs with affection, as ſhe was deſcended, on her mother's ſide, from the ancient race of their Saxon kings, whoſe memories they ſtill revered. But Henry was not ſatiſfied with this acquiſition; he was alſo deſirous of ſecuring to her the duchy of Normandy. Accordingly he married her to Geoffrey Plantagenet, ſon of Fulk, earl of Anjou. By this policy he effectually detached Fulk from William, ſon to duke Robert, and all the allies of that unfortunate prince. But this ſtep, which was taken without the advice of his barons, was extremely diſagreeable to the Engliſh.

A. D. 1127.

William, whom Louis had put in poſſeſſion of Flanders, conceived this a favourable opportunity for recommencing the war; but before he could carry his deſign into execution, he was killed in a battle with the landgrave of Alſace. Thus did this brave prince periſh in the flower of his age, after a long contention with the malice of his ill-fortune. Had he ſurvived his uncle, he probably might have been earl of Flanders, duke of Normandy, and king of England; but he was cut off, and with him all the family of duke Robert, for he had no child. A little time before he expired, he ſent a ſon of Odo, biſhop of Baieux, who had followed his fortunes, with a letter to Henry, written on his death-bed, in which he entreated him to forgive whatever he had done to offend him, and receive his friends to mercy. Henry appeared touched by this affecting letter, and treated all who, in confidence of this recommendation, ſubmitted to him, with great kindneſs, advancing to the higheſt degree of his favour ſome of the moſt deſerving.

A. D. 1129.

During the remainder of his life, Henry remained undiſturbed by any war with France, without doing homage to that crown for Normandy. He had indeed ſurmounted all oppoſition; and a calm of profound tranquillity ſucceeded the boiſterous ſeaſons of war and devaſtations. But the loſs of his ſon ſtill preyed upon his ſpirits, and tended to convince him of the vanity of human glory, and its inſufficiency in affording true content. The milder ſentiments of mercy ſucceeded thoſe of reſentment, which had ſo long filled his breaſt. He extended his pardon to all who implored it; and attached to his intereſt, by acts of kindneſs and generoſity, ſeveral perſons of great influence; but not a ſingle ray of pity was extended to his brother Robert, who ſtill conſumed an ignominious life in Cardiff caſtle.

A. D. 1133.

Affairs in England continuing in a ſtate of tranquillity, Henry took this favourable opportunity of viſiting Normandy; to which he was led, as well by his affection for that country, as by his tenderneſs for his daughter the empreſs Maud. Some time after ſhe was delivered of a ſon, who was named Henry; and the better to inſure, as he imagined, her ſucceſſion, he prevailed upon all the nobility of England and Normandy to renew the oath of fealty, which they had before ſworn to her. While Henry was enjoying his eaſe in Normandy, his brother Robert, whom it muſt be confeſſed, numerous as his faults were, he had treated with great cruelty, was ſnatched from his follies and cares by the hand of death; and this unhappy priſoner was buried in the cathedral of Glouceſter.

A. D. 1134.

A. D. 1135.

Henry enjoyed much ſatisfaction in the company of his daughter; this rendered his reſidence in Normandy very agreeable to him, and he ſeemed determined to ſpend the remainder of his days in that country; but receiving advice that the Welſh had renewed their incurſions, he intended to chaſtiſe the inſolence of thoſe invaders. He was accordingly preparing for his journey, when his ſummons came for an unknown country, and death put a period to all his undertakings. He departed this life at the caſtle of Lyons, near Rouen, on the firſt of December, in the ſixty-eighth year of his age, and the thirty-ſixth of his reign.

By his firſt wife, Matilda, daughter of Malcolm, king of Scotland, by the ſiſter of Edgar Atheling, he had William, duke of Normandy, who was drowned; and Matilda, or the empreſs Maud, married to Geoffrey Plantagenet, count of Anjou.

Henry, when he found his end approaching, declared, in the preſence of Robert, earl of Glouceſter, his natural ſon, and a large aſſembly of nobles who came to know his laſt will, that he bequeathed both England and Normandy to his daughter Matilda, and to her poſterity, without taking any notice of the earl of Anjou, her huſband.

This prince poſſeſſed all the qualities that could fit him for the high ſtation he filled. His perſon was manly; his countenance engaging; his eyes clear, ſerene, and penetrating. The affability of his addreſs encouraged thoſe who might be overawed by a ſenſe of his dignity and wiſdom: and though he often indulged his facetious humour, he knew how to temper it with diſcretion, which always kept him at a diſtance from all indecent familiarities with his courtiers. He poſſeſſed many ſplendid qualities, ſhaded, as their contraſt, with ſome conſpicuous faults. He was brave, affable, ſagacious, and eloquent; temperate in his meals; vigilant and active in employing the beſt means conducive to the intereſts of his crown and people. Ambition was his ruling paſſion, which actuated moſt princes of the Norman race; for to this, as in the caſe of his brother, he certainly ſacrificed all the principles of juſtice, and all the dictates of humanity.

Henry had the glory of reforming and amending the ſtate of the kingdom; and took care that the adminiſtration of juſtice, to all orders of men, ſhould be ſtrict and impartial. He enacted good laws, and by his firmneſs enforced a due obedience to them. In his reign ſtealing was firſt made capital, as was alſo falſe coining, by which the money had been extremely debaſed. The wiſdom and vigour of his adminiſtration procured to the diſtreſſed Normans that tranquillity, ſafety, and happineſs, which they had long ſolicited in vain; yet, it muſt be confeſſed, in his unnatural conduct towards his brother and nephew, the bands of fraternal affection were ſeparated by the ſword of ambition, and the laws of nature and nations were ſacrificed on the altar of bold uſurpation. Like all his predeceſſors, he was jealous of every encroachment on his power; but he relieved his ſubjects from ſeveral oppreſſive grievances under which they had long groaned, and from which they had petitioned to be relieved. While he protected the prerogatives of his crown, he guarded, by refined policy, againſt the encroachments of the Roman pontiff. Among the laws made in his reign, a reunion of the civil and eccleſiaſtical courts, as in the Saxon times, was enacted.

The late king is ſaid to have changed the rents of his patrimonial eſtates, which were formerly paid in kind, into money, which was more eaſily remitted into the Exchequer. He was an implacable enemy to extortion; that officer who dared to make uſe of oppreſſion, was ſure to feel the whole weight of his power. If he broke ſome of the articles of his charter, it ſhould be remembered, that he was the firſt of the Norman race that condeſcended to make a contract with his people. The charter of Henry I. was the foundation-ſtone of Engliſh liberty. He obtained the ſurname of Beauclerc, or the fine ſcholar, from the progreſs he had made in the ſciences; which, conſidering the barbarity of the age, and that his chief employ was war, was no trifling embelliſhment in his character.

It is reported of him, that he was much addicted to women, having no leſs than ſeven illegitimate ſons, and ſix daughters. It is the lot of human kind to err. Let him who is faultleſs caſt the firſt ſtone. If ſome errors and crimes, common to all mankind, have ſtained the memory of this brave prince, this will ſurely be acknowledged, that his virtues were of ſignal ſervice to his country.

CHAPTER IV.

STEPHEN.

The right and pretenſions of Stephen de Blois to the throne of England, and by what means he aſcended that ſeat of dignity—Is crowned by the archbiſhop of Canterbury on the twenty-ſecond of December, 1135—His conceſſions to his ſubjects, in order to fix the crown firmly on his head—The Scots commit the moſt dreadful ravages—A battle, in which they are defeated—A civil war in England—In an engagement between Stephen and the earl of Glouceſter, the former is taken priſoner—The earl of Glouceſter afterwards meets with the ſame fate, and is exchanged for Stephen, who is reſtored to his crown—A peace concluded between Stephen and Henry, by which it is ſtipulated, that Stephen ſhould enjoy the crown, during his life, and Henry ſucceed him as lawful heir—His death and character.

A. D. 1135. STEPHEN was the ſon of Adela, daughter of William the Conqueror, and of Stephen earl of Blois and Champagne. He was earl of Blois, Champagne, Mortaigne, and Bologne in France; and was poſſeſſed of very conſiderable property in England. This he had acquired by the generoſity of the late king, who had invited him and his brother Henry to court, and conferred upon them a great number of favours. To the former Stephen he had given a large eſtate in land, and married him to Matilda, daughter and heireſs of Euſtace, count de Bologne, and niece to the king's firſt wife. The latter he had created abbot of Glaſtonbury, and biſhop of Wincheſter, and procured him the high dignity of legate to the holy ſee. By theſe means the king intended to ſtrengthen the intereſt of his daughter, whoſe cauſe, he imagined, they would the more heartily eſpouſe; but the credit, obtained by his boundleſs generoſity, they employed, not in ſupporting the title of the empreſs, but in raiſing Stephen to the throne. Herein we ſee the vanity of human foreſight. Man may plan events; but infinite wiſdom, united with unlimited power, can alone, when it pleaſes, accompliſh them. Human prudence cannot command, nor regulate, the changeable courſe of things. No prince ever took more pains to ſecure the crown to his family than Henry had done, nor with leſs effect. All his chain of meaſures was broken by accidents, which his penetration could not foreſee; and by the perfidy of thoſe, upon whoſe faithful attachment to his family he had the greateſt reaſon to believe he might ſafely depend. Stephen he placed among the number of his firm friends; but gratitude was not in the catalogue of Stephen's virtues. He had ſworn eventual fealty to the empreſs Maud; but the remembrance of his oath was buried in the grave with Henry; and, perſuaded that his intereſt with his brother was ſufficient to overbalance the claim of that princeſs, he haſtened over to England to uſurp the crown which had adorned the brow of his patron. At the time of king Henry's death, his daughter, the empreſs, happened to be in Anjou with her huſband, where ſhe was employed in ſome important buſineſs relative to that province. Her natural brother, the earl of Glouceſter, who might have maintained her right, was detained in Normandy as executor to the will of his father, in his Norman affairs. Their abſence afforded Stephen a favourable opportunity to mount that throne, which his gracious benefactor had bequeathed to his beloved daughter.

Stephen's younger brother, the biſhop of Wincheſter, was of an active and turbulent diſpoſition, bold, diſſembling, and faithleſs. Even fraternal affection had little weight with this prelate, who was always ready to adapt himſelf to the circumſtances of the times. A fluency of ſpeech, accompanied with a pleaſing addreſs, had procured him an unbounded influence over both the populace and the clergy. The biſhop of Saliſbury was likewiſe a perſon of great abilities, great riches, and great power. Theſe two dignified eccleſiaſtics were the principal ſupporters of Stephen's pretenſions to the crown.

The chief obſtacles to their deſigns, and which had great weight with the archbiſhop of Canterbury and ſome of the nobility, were the oaths they had taken in behalf of the empreſs Maud. Therefore, to remove this difficulty, Hugh Bigot, earl of Norfolk, was prevailed upon to ſwear before the primate that Henry had, in his preſence, releaſed his ſubjects from thoſe oaths, though the king had really confirmed them by his laſt will and verbal declarations, in preſence of all the lords who were with him in Normandy; but theſe not having yet returned to England, the falſehood remained uncontradicted till Stephen was fixed on the throne. What ſlender reaſons ſatisfy the conſcientious ſcruples of ambitious men! Oaths themſelves are not binding, notwithſtanding they cannot recede from them without incurring the crimſon guilt of perjury.

But the biſhop of Saliſbury, in deſerting the empreſs, broke every bond of human ſociety; for not a man in the whole kingdom was more obliged to Henry, who took him into his ſervice during the reign of William Rufus, when he was only a curate in Normandy; and finding him expert in buſineſs, eſpecially in the management of the finances, put an unlimited confidence in his fidelity; ſo that when he came to the crown, he firſt made him chancellor, then a biſhop, and at laſt grand juſticiary; by which high dignity, at the king's deceaſe, he was conſtitutional guardian and regent of the kingdom. We are not told what induced him to betray the empreſs; but it is certain, that immediately after Stephen's coronation he obtained the town of Malmſbury for himſelf; the office of chancellor for his natural ſon, and that of treaſurer for one of his nephews. Theſe were probably the terms upon which he ſold himſelf to Stephen; who was ſo ſenſible how neceſſary it was to corrupt him, that, in a converſation with ſome of his intimate friends, he thus expreſſed his ſentiments: "By the nativity of God, if he were to aſk of me one half of my kingdom, I would grant it him, till this ſeaſon is paſt. He ſhall be ſooner tired of aſking, than I will of giving." Theſe words are very expreſſive of the character of this king. In bargaining for a crown, he thought no price too great, but when that ſeaſon was paſt, he meant to take other meaſures: and the biſhop of Saliſbury was one of the firſt who felt the effects of his fraudulent conduct.

On Stephen's landing in England, the citizens of Dover, who were appriſed of his purpoſe, ſhut their gates againſt him. He did not, however, ſtop to revenge this inſult, but made the beſt of his way to London, where, on his arrival, he was received with cordial congratulations by the citizens, and was crowned at Weſtminſter by the archbiſhop of Canterbury with the uſual ceremonies. Having got thus far toward the accompliſhment of his deſigns, the next ſtep he took was, to ſecure the late king's treaſures, which amounted to one hundred thouſand pounds, equivalent, in theſe times, to one million five hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. By a proper diſtribution of this money, he gained over to his ſide many of the indigent nobility, whoſe ſcruples of conſcience, by the all-prevailing power of gold, were entirely removed. Thus a number of circumſtances concurred to pave the way for Stephen's advancement to the throne.

But every effort would have been vain without the conſent of the nation. To obtain this, Stephen entered into an engagement with the people, by granting them a charter of privileges; in which he made many conceſſions demanded by the barons, and granted the clergy ſuch privileges, as they had in vain wiſhed to extort from his predeceſſors. Theſe he not only ratified by an extraordinary oath, which he took at his coronation, but ſome time after, by another charter given at Oxford. In one clauſe he ſettled the bounds of his foreſts, and gave up all the additions that had been made to them; in another, he promiſed to redreſs all the abuſes, unlawful exactions, or other wrongs the people had ſuffered from the officers of the crown; to maintain peace and juſtice, and to confirm the ancient cuſtoms of the realm in judicial proceedings. All the remaining articles regarded the clergy, to whom the king very amply confirmed the liberties, privileges, and dignities of the church. He concluded with declaring, that he granted the whole with a ſaving of his juſt and royal dignity. But as additional aids, and probably what Stephen chiefly depended on, he procured a bull from Rome, which ratified his title, and invited over from the continent a body of mercenary ſoldiers from Brittany and Flanders, who guarded his throne by the terrors of the ſword.

This monarch was not leſs ſucceſsful in Normandy than in England; for the nobility of that duchy put him in poſſeſſion of the government. Alſo Louis the younger, king of France, not only accepted the homage of Euſtace, Stephen's eldeſt ſon, for the dukedom, but betrothed his ſiſter Conſtantia to the young prince. The count of Blois, likewiſe, reſigned all his pretenſions, and in lieu of them received an annual penſion of two thouſand marks. Even Geoffrey himſelf was forced to conclude a truce with the king of England for two years. The duke of Glouceſter was ſo embarraſſed, that, for ſome time, he knew not what meaſures to take. To ſwear allegiance to the uſurper, would not only be diſhonourable, but a breach of his oath to his ſiſter, whoſe cauſe he had determined to defend; and to refuſe it was to render himſelf incapable of ſerving her. He therefore offered to do homage to Stephen, with an expreſs condition that the king ſhould maintain all his ſtipulations, and never invade any of his rights and dignities. Stephen, though ſenſible that this reſerve, ſo inconſiſtent with the duty of a ſubject, was meant only to afford Robert a pretence for a revolt on the firſt favourable opportunity, was obliged, by the numerous friends of that nobleman, to receive him on thoſe terms.

A. D. 1113.

Though Stephen had obtained all theſe advantages in his favour, yet the people were diſſatisfied with his government, and a ſtorm was viſibly gathering around his throne. This being perceived by Robert, duke of Glouceſter, he raiſed upon the diſcontents of the people the ſtandard of rebellion. His views were ſupportd by David, king of Scotland, who entered England at the head of a powerful army, and penetrated as far as Northallerton in Yorkſhire. In his firſt expedition, he had ravaged all the open country to the Tyne, his army committing the moſt horrid outrages. They firſt plundered the farms and villages, and then ſet them on fire. Even the churches did not eſcape their rage. They murdered the ſick and aged in their beds, infants at the breaſt, and prieſts at the altar. Women with child they alſo killed, with circumſtances of cruelty too ſhocking to be related; and carried into captivity harmleſs virgins, whom they drove before them in crouds bound with cords, and ſtripped naked; and when any of theſe were fainting with fatigue, the inhuman ſoldiers goaded them on with the points of their ſwords.

The Engliſh were enraged to a degree of madneſs by theſe cruelties. Several of the barons, who continued firm in their allegiance, entered into an aſſociation, and reſolved to deliver their country from the dreadful ravages of the invaders, or to periſh in the attempt. They therefore made preparations to give them battle, and erected a ſtandard of a peculiar kind. It was the maſt of a ſhip fixed upon a wheel carriage, on the top of which was fixed a ſilver crucifix, incloſing a conſecrated wafer; under which were hung three banners, dedicated to St. Peter, St. John of Beverly, and St. Wilfrid of Rippon. Theſe decorations were adapted to ſtrike the imagination; and, in fighting under them, the ſoldiers believed themſelves to be the champions of Chriſt, and of thoſe ſaints whoſe enſigns were thus waving over their heads. When it was raiſed, Walter Eſpec, who had a flow of natural eloquence, mounted the carriage upon which the maſt was ſuſtained, and from thence harangued the army in a military oration well ſuited to the occaſion, and concluded with ſaying, that they muſt conquer or die; for who among them could ſurvive a defeat, that would give up his wife to be defiled by the brutal luſt of their enemies, and his children to be ſtuck upon the points of their lances. Then turning to the earl of Albemarle, he ſaid, "I pledge my faith to you, that I will this day either beat the Scots, or be killed by them." Upon which all the nobles cried out with one voice, that they alſo bound themſelves by the ſame oath, and would conquer or fall with him.

The Engliſh immediately ſurrounded their enſign, and drew up in order of battle. Being greatly outnumbered by the enemy, they were formed into one phalanx, or compact body compoſed of foot, in the front of which were pikemen and archers intermixed, and a few horſe in their rear. While the two armies were ſtill at a diſtance, though in ſight of each other, Robert de Bruce went over to David, and put him in mind of the many ſervices the Engliſh and Normans had done to his family; that it was ſurpriſing ſo wiſe a monarch ſhould fight againſt thoſe who were the principal ſupporters of his throne; and that he ought ſeriouſly to conſider, how far he might anſwer before God for the guilt of ſhedding ſo much innocent blood, and the inhuman barbarities that had been committed by his Galwegians, though againſt his orders and inclinations. He exaggerated the numbers of the Engliſh; reminded him of their well-known intrepidity; and endeavoured to work upon his paſſions by the affection he expreſſed for his perſon. David now ſeemed inclined to a treaty. But his nephew's ſon, a young man of an imperious temper, anſwered his ſpeech, and concluded with obſerving, that David could not now go back with honour, either as a king or a ſoldier.

Soon after Bruce had rejoined his friends, the Galloway men, who compoſed the van of the Scottiſh army, began to advance with all the fury natural to their character; whereupon the biſhop of Orkneys made a ſhort harangue to the Engliſh army, exhorting them to fight valiantly for the remiſſion of their ſins. At the concluſion of this ſpeech, they ſtruck their breaſts, calling on God to aſſiſt their arms. The biſhop then gave them a general abſolution, and afterwards his bleſſing.

After three ſhouts, or rather yells, the Galwegians fell upon the Engliſh with their uſual intrepidity. But all their exertions of ability and ſtrength were in vain; the Engliſh ſtood firm, and plied them ſo vigorouſly with their arrows and other miſſiles, that they were put to flight. The prince of Scotland, David's ſon, ſeeing this, advanced at the head of a choſen body of knights to their ſuccour. He broke through the ranks of the enemy, and even attacked a troop of horſe in their rear. Confuſion now appeared to pave the way for a defeat. The Engliſh began to quit their ground, when a ſoldier having cut off the head of one of the bodies ſlain near him, held it up, crying aloud, that it was the Scotch king's; upon this they again cloſed their ranks, charged the Galwegians, whom they ſoon put to flight, and then fell upon the third line of the Scots, who hardly ſtood the firſt onſet. The king, enraged at their cowardice, quitted his horſe, and commanding all the barons and knights who were with him, to diſmount, advanced on foot at the head of his body reſerve. But even theſe, affected with the contagious panic, ſhamefully abandoned their ſovereign; David himſelf refuſed to fly, and his friends with great difficulty ſaved him from captivity, and fled with him to Carliſle.

David was two days in great anxiety about the fate of his ſon. That prince returning from his too eager purſuit, found the Scots army defeated and driven from the field. Having his own body of cavalry with him, he commanded them to throw away all the marks that diſtinguiſhed them; by which means they paſſed the field of battle; but being obliged to leave the high road, they did not reach Carliſle till the third day after the king, though they had diſencumbered themſelves of all their heavy armour. In this engagement, called the Battle of the Standard, the number of the Scots who were ſlain was very great. Several knights, with almoſt all their baggage, were taken; but the Engliſh loſt only one gentleman of diſtinction, and a few privates.

Stephen, on receiving the news of this victory, rewarded the earl of Albemarle and Robert de Ferrers. Had he known alſo how to profit by it, the event might have been fatal to Maud and her brother. But flattering himſelf that he had now attained the ſummit of his hopes, he ſet no bounds to his ambitious projects. He engaged in a controverſy with his clergy, the moſt dangerous of all diſputes in thoſe times, to whoſe authority he could be no ſtranger, and to whom recollection would have informed him he was indebted for his crown. Stephen found he had committed an error in permitting the nobility to fortify their caſtles, and he was determined to correct it. The evil was every day increaſing; and the king perceived, but too late, that the kingdom was garriſoned againſt himſelf. The king therefore begun his intended plan of reformation, by levelling his authority againſt the ſtrong holds of the clergy. Accordingly he ſeized the biſhops of Saliſbury and Lincoln, and obliged them by menaces to deliver up their caſtles.

A. D. 1139.

Hereupon Henry, biſhop of Wincheſter, enraged at the king's attempt to infringe the privileges of the church, convoked a ſynod, and ſummoned Stephen to appear in perſon. The king, who deſpiſed thoſe hypocritical pretences to ſanctity, whereby the eccleſiaſtics impoſed upon the credulity of the people, refuſed to obey the ſummons. He however ſent one Aubery de Vere, a learned lawyer, who juſtified the king's proceeding with great eloquence and force of argument. He obſerved that the followers of the meek and humble Jeſus could not, conſiſtent with their functions, oppoſe their ſovereign with an arm of fleſh; that it was irreconcileable with their ſacred characters, as the preachers of peace, to engage in tumults of civil diſcord; and that the caſtles which were the ſubject of diſpute, could be conſidered no other than aſylums of rebellion. The legate, highly offended at this bold remonſtrance, threatened to pronounce an eccleſiaſtical anathema on the king and all his adherents, when Aubery gave the furious aſſembly to underſtand, that whoever was fool-hardy enough to pronounce a ſpiritual interdict againſt his and their ſovereign, ſhould never live to behold the effects of his daring inſolence. This ſpirited declaration made a deeper impreſſion on their minds, than all his reaſoning. The ſynod, aſtoniſhed at the boldneſs of the pleader, and dreading more the conſequences of Stephen's reſentment, diſſolved their aſſembly; and the two high-ſpirited biſhops were obliged to ſurrender their caſtles into their ſovereign's hands.

The empreſs Maud conſidered theſe differences between the king and church as fortunate circumſtances, that might be improved to her advantage. She therefore landed in England with Robert, earl of Glouceſter, and a retinue of one hundred and forty knights. She repaired, on her arrival, to Arundel caſtle, whoſe gates were opened to her by Adelais, the queen dowager, now married to William de Albiney, earl of Arundel and Suſſex. After making a ſhort ſtay in the caſtle, the earl of Glouceſter, attended only by twelve horſemen, went from thence in a dark night by unfrequented roads towards Briſtol, and was met by a party of horſe, who eſcorted him ſafe to that city.

The king was alarmed at the arrival of the empreſs and her brother. He had reaſon ſufficient to fear the popularity of Glouceſter, and that the nation would join his ſtandard, in order to place his ſiſter on the throne of her father. Quitting therefore Marlborough, where he was at this time, he came before Arundel caſtle at the head of a conſiderable body of forces, in order to make himſelf maſter of that fortreſs. The queen dowager was terrified at the approach of Stephen, and by a meſſenger requeſted that he would not beſiege the empreſs in her palace, but give her liberty to retire to ſome other place, aſſuring him, that ſhe had received her as a gueſt only, not as his competitor for the crown; and flattered herſelf, that ſhe ſhould not be compelled by him to violate the rights of hoſpitality. The king was ſo weak as to comply with her requeſt. He gave his oath for her ſecurity, ſending her, under his own ſafe conduct, to Briſtol, eſcorted by his brother, and the earl of Meulant, his prime miniſter. When the empreſs arrived at Briſtol, ſhe openly proclaimed her pretenſions to the throne. The people reſorted in great numbers to her ſtandard; and Miles, high-conſtable of England, recognized her title, and conducted her to the caſtle of Glouceſter, which he had prepared for her reception. Stephen, on the other hand, now exerted himſelf with great ſpirit. He drove the biſhop of Ely out of that iſland, and plundered all his wealth. His uncle, the biſhop of Saliſbury, had died a little before of grief for the loſs of his treaſures and caſtles; and had the mortification to ſee the poor remainder of his riches, which he had depoſited in his cathedral of Sarum, taken from that church, while he lay on his death-bed, and delivered up to the king by the canons themſelves.

A. D. 1140.

A number of military tranſactions now followed, ſo trifling in their nature, and ſo confuſed in the circumſtances of time and place, that a detail of them would afford the reader little inſtruction or entertainment. The whole kingdom was now become one ſcene of diſtreſsful anarchy; almoſt every individual ſiding with one or other of the contending parties; ſome ſwayed by affection, others by intereſt. The powerful barons attacked each other's domains, with all the rage of inveterate enemies. Caſtles, churches, monaſteries, towns, and villages, were every day levelled to the ground, or laid in aſhes, to gratify the private animoſities of contending nobles. The moſt inhuman cruelties were practiſed on the innocent inhabitants, whoſe only crime conſiſted in a compulſion, which obliged them to participate in the fortune of their lords. It muſt be acknowledged, however, that theſe diſorders of a lawleſs banditti received not the leaſt countenance either from Stephen or the earl of Glouceſter; they ſaw with concern the natural conſequences of civil diſcord; and exerted all their power to heal the miſeries of the people; to terminate theſe ſcenes of deſtruction; and to bring the ferocious barons to a ſenſe of the ſhocking enormities lately perpetrated.

A. D. 1141.

Several negociations were to this end ſet on foot, with the moſt laudable motives; but they produced no interruption in theſe deſtructive acts of hoſtility, or in their dreadful conſequences, as the importance of the diſpute, which was for a crown, ſoon rendered them abortive. All hopes of peace were now abandoned. But the ſiege of the caſtle of Lincoln, undertaken by Stephen, brought on a battle between the two contending powers much ſooner than was expected. That caſtle was conſidered as a place of the utmoſt importance, and Glouceſter determined, if poſſible, to relieve it. Accordingly he marched with the utmoſt expedition; and his troops, having forded the Trent, appeared in the vicinity of the caſtle, before Stephen had received any information of their approach. A battle was now unavoidable, and both armies prepared for a conteſt that was to decide the fate of the crown of England.

The battle was begun by William de Ypres, the moſt experienced general of his time. He fell with the utmoſt fury on a body of Welſh, poſted on the left wing of Glouceſter's army, and put them to flight; but purſuing the broken ſquadron too far, his diviſion was entirely broken. The earl of Glouceſter taking advantage of this ſucceſs, fell with amazing impetuoſity on the infantry, which compoſed the center of the royal army, where Stephen himſelf fought in perſon. The battle now raged with inexpreſſible fury. The field was covered with ſlain. Stephen's infantry, being deſerted by the horſe, were obliged to retreat; but the king diſdaining to turn his back, diſputed every inch of ground againſt an amazing ſuperiority of the enemy. After an obſtinate conteſt, the king was at length ſurrounded. He fought with the utmoſt bravery, till his battle-ax and his ſword were broken, when he was taken priſoner by the earl of Glouceſter, who ordered that, in his confinement, he ſhould be treated with the utmoſt reſpect and humanity. But the king's friends, a common policy with time-ſerving courtiers, deſerted him on his reverſe of fortune.

The city of London, ever faithful when treated with a reſpect due to her importance, and the county of Kent, where his queen Matilda, his ſon Euſtace, and his friend William de Ypres, ſtill retained their authority, were the only places of conſequence that continued faithful to the impriſoned monarch. All claſſes of men now worſhipped the riſing ſun, and bowed the knee to the victor. Even the king's brother, the biſhop of Wincheſter, courted the favour of the empreſs: the attractions of power, with this proud prelate, were ſtronger than fraternal affection. Henry threw off the maſk, and declared openly for Maud, who, in return, promiſed him all the honours an ambitious churchman could requeſt or receive. Armed with the legatine power, and proud of diſplaying his authority, Henry ſummoned a ſynod; and after aſſerting, that the clergy were intruſted by heaven with the right of electing and ordaining kings, he declared that it was the will of the moſt High, that the empreſs Maud ſhould be placed on the throne of England.

The only laymen ſummoned to this aſſembly were the deputies of London. Their preſence alarmed the legate; for they were ſo far from agreeing with the ſentiments of his declaration, that they peremptorily demanded the liberty of their king, in a tone that plainly indicated they had power ſufficient, in caſe of a refuſal, to procure it. The legate only anſwered, by recapitulating the errors of Stephen's adminiſtration. "He connived," ſaid the prelate, "at the licentious behaviour of all men; ſo that virtue and peace abondoned this country, and oppreſſion filled its ſeat. Biſhops have been impriſoned contrary to law; abbies have been put up to ſale; churches and convents have been plundered of their treaſures, though devoted to the ſacred purpoſes of religion. For theſe, and other offences, heaven itſelf has viſibly interpoſed, and wreſted the ſceptre from the hand of my brother; and this aſſembly have ſolemnly agreed, to preſent it to the empreſs Maud, to whom it of right belongs." Aſtoniſhed at the impudence and wickedneſs of the legate, the deputies, proteſting againſt the proceedings of the ſynod, returned to London. Henry upon this declared the empreſs queen, and paſſed a general ſentence of excommunication againſt all the king's adherents.

Perceiving the clergy had unanimouſly declared in her favour, the greateſt part of England were induced, by their powerful example, to acknowledge her ſovereignty. Near Midſummer, Maud entered London, with her uncle the king of Scotland, who came to aſſiſt at her coronation. Mean while the earl of Glouceſter negociated with the barons of the oppoſite faction. The haughty he allured with careſſes, the mercenary with promiſes; his deportment was full of courteſy, moderation, and humanity. Had the empreſs been guided by his prudent counſels, ſhe had enjoyed, during her life, the crown of her father; but her pride and inſolence, the ſtriking features of her character, which were ſtrongly expreſſed in her looks, her mein, her language, rendered all his meaſures abortive. She aſſumed a moſt imperious air, and behaved in the moſt deſpotic manner. Some of Stephen's party, who came to offer their allegiance, ſhe received with affected coolneſs; others ſhe drove from her preſence with upbraiding and threats. All the grants made by that prince, even thoſe to the church, ſhe revoked, to give them to her favourites. From thoſe who ſubmitted to her, ſhe often took a part of their lands as fines for their paſt conduct; and all the barons, who from a ſenſe of honour and fidelity delayed to abandon their late maſter, ſhe wholly deprived of their honours and eſtates, conferring them upon others.

The citizens of London remonſtrating againſt the heavy impoſitions laid upon them, ſhe, with rage in her eyes, frowns on her brow, and ſuch a diſorder of paſſions, as equally deſtroyed the ſoftneſs of the woman, and the majeſty of the queen, told them, that they had laviſhly granted their money to Stephen, and muſt not expect lenity from her, who would not remit the leaſt part of the ſum ſhe had demanded. Reſolving to ſhew her independence, ſhe determined to refuſe every petition. Neither the ſoft whiſpers of humanity, aſſiſted by the powerful interceſſions of Glouceſter, could prevail over her obſtinacy; ſhe looked upon all advice as an inſult upon her underſtanding, and perſevered in her haughty, contemptuous conduct, till ſhe loſt the affections of her people. One inſtance of extreme folly in her behaviour, and which indeed ſhewed a weakneſs of intellects, particularly contributed to this. Stephen's royal conſort, a queen, whoſe virtues even his enemies honoured, endeavoured to procure his liberty, upon the hard conditions of reſigning the crown, and entering into a convent, or going to the Holy Land for the remainder of his life, which the chief lords of his party engaged he ſhould do, and offered their caſtles and many hoſtages, to ſecure the performance of this ſtipulation; all which advantageous terms Maud weakly and with a contemptuous air of diſdain, rejected.

The inflexibility of the queen's temper was beheld with grief by Glouceſter, who feared the probable conſequences. The citizens were at once alarmed and incenſed. They complained loudly of her tyranny, and the people caught the infection from the capital. The Londoners entered into a conſpiracy to ſeize her perſon. The earl of Glouceſter, appriſed of their intention, uſed every method in his power to ſooth the citizens; but his attempts were not attended with ſucceſs: they conceived ſo deep a deteſtation of her inſolent behaviour, that all the endeavours of that popular nobleman could not eraſe. He was greatly affected with this change of popular opinion. He perceived the gathering ſtorm, and prudently withdrew with Maud and her friends to Oxford. They had ſcarcely left the city, when the populace aſſaulted the palace and ſtripped it of all its rich furniture.

The biſhop ſaw this reverſe of fortune, and again embraced the party of his brother. He abſolved thoſe he had before excommunicated; and by his emiſſaries, diſperſed throughout the whole kingdom grievous complaints againſt the empreſs. The allegiance he had ſworn to her was forgotten; his oaths were not proof againſt intereſt. Maud was no ſtranger to the character of Henry. She knew nothing was to be expected from his diſſimulation; and therefore, advancing at the head of her troops, encamped in the neighbourhood of Wincheſter. Orders were immediately diſpatched to the legate, commanding his attendance at a council the empreſs had ſummoned to meet in her camp. He ſaw the ſnare, and eſcaped through a poſtern gate; but the caſtle fell into the hands of the empreſs. Henry fled to London, joined Euſtace and William de Ypres, and openly declared in favour of Stephen. A reſpectable body of forces were ſoon raiſed; and the legate, attended by his aſſociates, marched to Wincheſter with ſuch expedition, that the empreſs and her friends had but juſt time to ſhut themſelves up in the caſtle, before it was inveſted by the enemy.

Henry had furniſhed the fortreſs with ſuch a ſtock of proviſion, that the beſieged held out ſeven weeks; and every attempt to take it by aſſault failed, by the valour and conduct of the duke of Glouceſter. But famine at length effected what force had attempted in vain. The garriſon had but this alternative, either to cut themſelves a paſſage through the legate's forces, or ſurrender at diſcretion. They choſe the former, and made the neceſſary preparations for the deſperate attempt. The care of the perſon of the empreſs was committed to the main body of their forces; while Glouceſter, at the head of two hundred followers, ſallied out of the caſtle, and attacked the beſiegers with the utmoſt bravery. Alarmed at the boldneſs of this party of the beſieged, the legate's army left their poſts to repulſe ſo formidable a band of aſſailants. The expected opportunity now offered: and the empreſs, attended by a great part of her forces, made her eſcape. She fled to the city of Glouceſter, where ſhe was joined by Miles, who had long ſerved her with unſhaken fidelity. But though the empreſs eſcaped by the noble efforts of the duke of Glouceſter, his courage proved fatal to his liberty. He was taken priſoner, and ſent to the caſtle of Rocheſter. The empreſs, ſenſible that every hope of ſucceſs depended on the valour and ability of her brother, conſented to exchange Stephen for him.

A ſynod of the clergy was now ſummoned by the biſhop of Wincheſter, who endeavoured to vindicate his conduct with regard to his brother; but even the clergy ſeemed not to be affected with his harangue. The legatine power, indeed, with which he was inveſted, commanded their ſilence; they feared the anger of the pope, more than the anger of heaven. But a lay deputy from the empreſs, nobly undertook what a daſtardly clergy had refuſed. He entered a proteſt againſt the legate's proceedings, accuſed him of complicated perjury; affirmed, that the landing of the empreſs was owing to his repeated invitations; and the ſevere treatment his brother had experienced, was in conſequence of his pernicious advice. He concluded with charging him, on the faith he had ſworn to the empreſs as his ſovereign, not to do any thing in that aſſembly againſt her title and dignity.

The legate kept a profound ſilence. Conſcious guilt, or rather prelatical policy, ſealed his lips. However, he recollected himſelf ſufficiently to pronounce the ſentence of excommunication againſt the empreſs, and all her adherents. The whole aſſembly were ſtruck with ſurprize and indignation: they could not hear, without horror, eccleſiaſtical cenſures, ſo directly oppoſite in their tendency, pronounced, without any other reaſon than that of ſatisfying his own pride and malevolence. This was, however, the laſt time he exerted this authority. Pope Celiſtine II. on his acceſſion to the papal chair, deprived him of the legatine power, and beſtowed it on Theobald, archbiſhop of Canterbury.

A. D. 1142. At this critical period, the earl of Glouceſter perceived the effects of his ſiſter's pride and obſtinacy. Her party was decreaſed in numbers, and even many of her powerful friends had forſaken her ſtandard. He ſaw that ſhe could now never hope to aſcend the throne by the ſuffrages of the Engliſh; and feared it was too late to recover the popularity ſhe had loſt through her haughtineſs. He, however, determined to perſevere in the cauſe he had undertaken, till death, or a deciſive victory, might put an end to the conteſt. A council of Maud's principal friends was ſummoned at the Devizes, when it was reſolved to ſolicit a foreign aſſiſtance; and Glouceſter was appointed to go over to the continent, in order to perſuade Geoffrey of Anjou to land in England, at the head of an army.

All the abilities, and the utmoſt activity of Stephen were now exerted, to profit by this defection of Maud's friends; and, which more ſtrengthened his intereſt, the abſence of the duke of Glouceſter. The empreſs had no army capable of meeting the enemy in the open field, and was obliged to elude the vigilance of Stephen, by retreating from one poſt to another. Her friends now became cool in her ſervice; and ſhe found herſelf, by her own imprudent conduct, deſerted by the brave citizens of London, who of themſelves could have effectually given ſucceſs to her operations. At laſt ſhe retired to Oxford, then one of the ſtrongeſt fortifications in the kingdom, and determined there to wait the arrival of ſuccours from her huſband.

Stephen immediately made himſelf maſter of the city, and then laid cloſe ſiege to the caſtle. Mean time, the earl of Glouceſter, though maſter of the moſt engaging arts of perſuaſion, could not prevail on Geoffrey Plantagenet to paſs with him over into England at the head of his forces; all he could obtain was a reinforcement of four hundred knights, under the command of Henry his eldeſt ſon. With this ſmall body of men the earl of Glouceſter landed in Dorſetſhire, and took Wareham, the garriſon of which ſurrendered to him. He then made himſelf maſter of the Iſle of Portland, which Stephen had fortified. By theſe diverſions he intended to induce the king to abandon Oxford; but he was not to be allured to abandon the object he had in view. The arrival of Glouceſter and prince Henry greatly leſſened his army; his ſoldiers deſerted in ſuch numbers, that ſome of the avenues to the caſtle were left unguarded. Maud did not neglect ſo favourable an opportunity for making her eſcape. It was now the middle of winter; the ground was covered with ſnow, and the waters of the rivers entirely frozen. Encouraged by theſe favourable circumſtances, ſhe dreſſed herſelf and her attendants in white, in order to prevent their being ſeen by the centinels. They then croſſed the river on the ice, and walked on foot above ſix miles to Abingdon. The caſtle of Oxford ſurrendered the next morning to Stephen, who was ſufficiently mortified upon finding all the fruits of his labours ſnatched from him at the very time when he thought himſelf ſure of his prey.

During the ſiege, Glouceſter, finding that by all his ſtratagems he could not force the king to leave Oxford, and knowing the dangerous ſituation of the empreſs became every day more alarming, ſent to all her adherents to meet him at Cirenceſter, declaring his intention of leading them directly to the relief of the empreſs. They came, and were on their march thither, when, to their inexpreſſible joy, they heard ſhe was ſafe in Wallingford. Here they joined her with the young prince, her ſon. The ſight of this object of her affections excited the full force of parental tenderneſs. While ſtraining him to her boſom, ſhe forgot, for a moment, all her afflictions, and all her fears. The empreſs had often been ſaved, when juſt on the very brink of deſtruction. She had a mind that could not bear proſperity; but that ſpirit, which power rendered haughty and inſolent, was great in misfortune, and intrepid in danger. Henry, her ſon, after having devoted ſome time to filial duty, was ſent to Briſtol, where he continued four years under the care of his uncle, who trained him in ſuch exerciſes as were moſt proper to fit his body for war, and in thoſe ſtudies which might embelliſh and ſtrengthen his mind. From this time when Maud made her eſcape, nothing material happened between the two contending parties, except a few ſkirmiſhes, and the taking ſome caſtles.

A. D. 1147. A ſingular circumſtance at this time blaſted the hopes of Maud, and ſtruck at the very root of her intereſt. The earl of Glouceſter, whoſe loſs no reſource could ſupply, died of a fever, and was buried at Briſtol. He had lately unwillingly been ſeparated from prince Henry, whoſe father, the earl of Anjou, had requeſted, from apprehenſions of danger, to return into Normandy. Glouceſter, juſt before his death, had parted with the prince at Wareham, never to ſee him more. In this accompliſhed nobleman, the empreſs loſt the only perſon that deſerved her entire confidence, he being, unqueſtionably, the wiſeſt man of thoſe times; and, which more juſtly embalms his memory, his virtues were ſuch as even thoſe times could not corrupt. Perhaps he was the only partizan in her cauſe, who ſerved the empreſs without views of intereſt. He was brave, prudent, generous, and ſincere; an enemy to tyranny, an enemy to injuſtice, an enemy to deceit. He was beloved by his ſoldiers, by his friends, by his country. The virtuous part of it lamented his death, and even Stephen himſelf dropped a tear in reſpect to his memory. Thus deprived of her guide, the empreſs ſoon found it impoſſible for her to maintain any longer the conteſt for the crown. In leſs than four months after the death of her brother, ſhe was conſtrained, in order to preſerve her liberty, to paſs over into Normandy, there to reſide again with a huſband whom ſhe never loved, and who did not love her; but who was generous or prudent enough to receive her with kindneſs in this ſad reverſe of fortune, when her pride was ſufficiently humbled by ſufferings.

Prince Henry was now ſixteen years old: and beginning to diſcover a manly vigour of body and mind, his friends earneſtly deſired his preſence in England. The king of Scotland had taken poſſeſſion of the three counties adjacent to his kingdom, nor could Stephen drive him out of them. David was now willing to engage heartily in Henry's cauſe, on condition of yielding thoſe three counties free to him and his heirs, without doing homage for them to the crown of England. He therefore invited him over with a promiſe of aid; upon which the earl of Anjou ſent him into England, with a good body of choſen troops, both of horſe and foot. He landed ſafely, and marched into ſome of the weſtern counties; where, being joined by ſeveral barons of note, they proceeded to the king of Scotland, who was then at Carliſle, at the head of an army. David received Henry with a tender affection; and during Whitſuntide feſtival, which was kept there with extraordinary pomp, that monarch conferred on Henry the honour of knighthood, which in thoſe days was eſteemed neceſſary for princes as ſoon as they were capable of bearing arms. But, previous to this ceremony, David required of Henry to take an oath never to reſume from him or his heirs, any part of the three counties of which he had obtained poſſeſſion. Henry took the oath preſcribed, and yielded thoſe provinces, in hopes of recovering the reſt of the kingdom by the aſſiſtance of the Scots.

A. D. 1151.

Geoffrey Plantagenet, count of Anjou, and Maud's conſort, at this time perceiving his end approaching, and deſirous of ſettling the ſucceſſion of his dominions on the ſureſt foundation, inveſted young Henry with his duchy. The king of France, incenſed at this deſignation, without his conſent having firſt been obtained as ſovereign lord of the fief, invaded Normandy, and laid ſiege to Arques. He ſuſpected that Henry was too young to give him any great oppoſition, but he was miſtaken; for he made ſo powerful a diverſion in France, that Louis was obliged to raiſe the ſiege, and march to the defence of his own dominions. The conſequence was, that peace was concluded, by which Louis inveſted Henry with the duchy of Normandy. Geoffrey now dying, Henry was left in poſſeſſion of Normandy, Main and Anjou.

Soon after Henry concluded a marriage, which brought him an additional acceſſion of power. Eleanor, the daughter and heireſs of William, duke of Guienne and earl of Poictou, had been married ſixteen years to Louis VII. king of France, and had attended him in a cruſade. But having loſt the affection of her huſband, who ſuſpected her of having had an intrigue with an handſome Saracen, and being of quite oppoſite diſpoſitions, he procured a divorce from her under the pretence of conſanguinity, and reſtored the rich provinces of Guienne, Poictou, and Xaintonge, which, by her marriage, were annexed to the crown of France. Young Henry paid a ſucceſsful courtſhip; and marrying her ſix weeks after her divorce, obtained the poſſeſſion of all her dominions as her dowry.

About this time Stephen involved himſelf in a quarrel with the pope. His holineſs had ſummoned a council to meet at Rheims; but inſtead of permitting Stephen to elect five deputies required, the pope nominated them himſelf. Stephen complained loudly of this breach of national privilege; but Eugenius, who then filled the papal chair, regarded not his remonſtrances. Enraged at this inſult, the king refuſed them permiſſion to attend; and the holy father, in revenge, laid the kingdom under an interdict, or ſentence of excommunication. By this, all the offices of religion were ſuſpended; the churches ſhut up, and the dead were not permitted to be depoſited in conſecrated ground. An univerſal terror ſpread through the nation; and the king found it neceſſary to make ſubmiſſions to the pope, in order to procure a reverſion of the ſentence. This quarrel with the holy ſee being concluded, Stephen, in order to fix the Engliſh ſceptre in his family, attempted to procure the coronation of his ſon Euſtace with the uſual ſolemnities. Theobald, archbiſhop of Canterbury, whoſe power was increaſed by the legatine authority, abſolutely refuſed to aſſiſt at the ceremony. Incenſed at this peremptory denial, Stephen committed the archbiſhop a cloſe priſoner. But he found means to corrupt his guards, and paſſed over to the continent. This eſcape rendered the king's attempt to ſecure the ſucceſſion abortive; it being then conſidered, that the archbiſhop of Canterbury poſſeſſed an unalienable right to crown the kings of England.

A. D. 1153.

On the ſixth of January Henry landed an army in England, which was ſoon increaſed by the moſt reſpectable part of the nobility in the kingdom. Stephen ſaw the gathering ſtorm, and laboured with aſſiduity to break its force. The ſeverity of the ſeaſon had no effect upon his ardour. He marched, at the head of his forces, to meet the duke of Normandy; but the badneſs of the roads ſo greatly retarded his progreſs, that Henry made himſelf maſter of ſeveral ſtrong caſtles before Stephen could come to their relief. At laſt the two armies met in the neighbourhood of Wallingford, each determined to decide, by a general action, the great conteſt for the Engliſh crown. But while Stephen was preparing for the battle, the earl of Arundel, who was engaged in his cauſe, having aſſembled the principal nobility and officers, made an animated ſpeech, in which he propoſed to put an end to the war, by an agreement that Stephen ſhould enjoy the crown during his life, and that Henry ſhould ſucceed him as king of England. This ſpeech, the tenor of which correſponded with the ſentiments and wiſhes of the whole nation, was received with great applauſe. The impreſſion it made on the nobles was ſoon communicated to the ſoldiers; whereupon they inſtantly, as if animated with one ſoul, grounded their arms, and loudly declared they wiſhed for peace.

The earl then communicated their ſentiments to the king. Aſtoniſhment, rage, and indignation, choaked up the ſpeech of Euſtace his ſon. Stephen was amazed, confounded, and intimidated. But after the conflict of contending paſſions had ſubſided, he yielded to a ceſſation of arms, and to a conference with the young prince. The ſame propoſal was now laid before Henry, who at firſt refuſed his aſſent, imagining that Stephen might live many years, and that neither a ſincere nor laſting peace could be effected upon ſuch terms; however, he conſented to an interview with the king, and they met on the bank of the Thames, where, after a conference, they parted, without coming to any deciſive concluſion. The greateſt obſtacle in the way was Euſtace, who, at his father's return, upbraided him bitterly for having the abject compliance to treat with his enemy; and told him, that by liſtening to ſuch terms, he would ſacrifice not only his ſon, but his own dignity to a vain ſhadow of peace, and to the mere name of royalty. But the nobles, unwilling to ſheath the ſword in the bowels of their countrymen, interpoſed their authority, and a ceſſation of arms took place. When this was expired, and both parties were preparing for renewing hoſtilities, Euſtace died of a fever; which ſudden event occaſioned a parliament to be aſſembled at Wincheſter, by whom it was reſolved, that Stephen ſhould enjoy his crown unmoleſted during life, and that on his deceaſe Henry ſhould ſucceed to the kingdom.

After this act had paſſed, Henry returned to Normandy, and Stephen made a progreſs through ſeveral counties of England. In his circuit he reformed many abuſes; iſſued ſeveral ſalutary edicts; and employed his time to heal the wounds of his bleeding country. Indeed, by his conduct one might conclude, that he determined to devote the remainder of his days in promoting the happineſs of his ſubjects. But while he was thus endeavouring to diffuſe univerſal harmony through the whole kingdom, death put a period to his life at A. D. 1154. Dover, on the 25th of October, in the fiftieth year of his age, and the nineteenth of his reign. He was buried in the abbey of Feverſham, which he himſelf had founded. Beſides Euſtace, he had another ſon, named William, who was earl of Bologne, in right of his mother the queen. He had likewiſe a daughter, named Mary, eſpouſed to Philip of Alſatia; alſo two natural ſons, William and Gervaſe, the laſt of whom was abbot of Weſtminſter.

During this period, the hiſtory of learning is very defective. The numerous civil wars and rebellions that deſolated the kingdom, diſturbed the progreſs of literature, and prevented the muſes from taking up their abode in Britain. Eccleſiaſtical controverſies indeed abounded, that had no other tendency than that of fomenting civil diſcord, and exalting the power of the mitre, and making it independent of the crown; or of placing the obſervance of ſuperſtitious rites above the practice of pure, undefiled religion. A few, it is true, like beacons on the ſummit of diſtant hills, have thrown a glimmering light over this night of Romiſh ignorance, and faintly irradiated the gloom of Gothic barbarity.

1. Florence, a monk of Worceſter, often called Florentius Baronius, compoſed a chronicle of the world from the creation to 1118. He was conſidered as a careful and indefatigable hiſtorian. He died in 1119.

2. Alfred, or Alured, a prieſt and treaſurer of the college of Beverley, appears to have been a writer of genius and abilities; but his hiſtory has ſuffered greatly by the hands of ignorant tranſcribers. He died in 1136.

3. Eadermus was cotemporary with Alfred, and an intimate with Anſelm, archbiſhop of Canterbury. He wrote the hiſtories of William I. William II. and Henry I. and if we make allowances for his prejudices in favour of the papal authority, his works may be conſidered as impartial. The time of his death is uncertain.

4. William of Malmſbury is deſervedly placed at the head of all the Engliſh hiſtorians of his time. His ſentiments are bold and manly; his ſtile nervous and elegant, far ſuperior to what might be expected from the barbarous age in which he lived. He was a monk and librarian of the college of Malmſbury, and his principal work is, de Geſtis Anglorum, with an appendix, entitled, Hiſtoriarum Novellæ. He died in 1142.

5. Simeon of Durham wrote a hiſtory of the Engliſh tranſactions till the year 1129. He was both a monk and preceptor in the convent of Durham. Leland tells us, that he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his indefatigable aſſiduity in collecting the monuments of Engliſh learning that had eſcaped the ravages of the Danes. The time of his death is unknown.

6. Henry of Huntingdon compoſed a hiſtory of England in ten books, ending with the death of Stephen. This work is very defective in method, and abounds with a number of fabulous legends, tranſcribed from Geoffrey of Monmouth's hiſtory. He alſo wrote a continuation of Bede's eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, and a chronological table of the kings of England. The time of his death is uncertain.

7. But the moſt eminent monument of learning of thoſe times is the Saxon Chronicle, which begins with the birth of Chriſt, and ends with the death of Stephen.

It is evident from the difference of ſtile, and other characteriſtic marks, that theſe annals were written by ſeveral authors, and at various periods of time. But their authenticity is unqueſtionable, eſpecially with regard to the wars between the Anglo-Saxons and Britons; and they have been the foundation of all our hiſtories to the Norman conqueſt. Dr. Gibſon, afterwards biſhop of London, publiſhed at Oxford, 1692, an accurate edition of the Saxon Chronicle, with an elegant tranſlation.

We ſhall now attempt to delineate the character of king Stephen; in doing which it will be neceſſary to obſerve, that ambition was his predominant paſſion; to gratify which he added perjury to ingratitude, trampled on the juſt rights of others, and involved an innocent people in all the horrors of civil diſcord. His induſtry, activity, and courage, are not to be diſputed: nor did he want the ſofter virtues of affability, clemency, and generoſity, which, had they been under the guidance of wiſdom and juſtice, would have placed him among the beſt of our kings. We do not find, notwithſtanding his precarious ſituation, he ever indulged himſelf in the exerciſe of any cruelty or revenge. But the extent of his genius was not proportioned to the great plan of action upon which his talents, not of the ſuperior kind, were employed; ever puſhing on to bold undertakings, yet ſeldom ſucceſsful: for, ſetting out wrong, and having left the ſtrait path of virtue, he got into a labyrinth of perplexed meaſures, out of which he could never extricate himſelf either with reputation or ſafety.

In his attachments he was too warm; in his reſentments, particularly toward the biſhops, too impetuous; herein not conforming to the times and circumſtances in which he was placed, that required a ſteady, calm, and regular prudence. His black ingratitude, in running counter to the obligations he lay under to his uncle king Henry, is a ſtain on his character which even the merit of good government could not have effaced. He forgot his obligations to the clergy; and that reſource he might have found in the affection of his people. Bribes, and a ſtanding army of odious foreign mercenaries, were the wretched ſupports whereon he leaned, to ſecure a precarious and unnatural power. His conceſſions to the biſhops weakened the regal prerogative; and when he ventured to oppoſe them, he did it in a manner which hurt the privileges of his temporal barons no leſs than theirs, and made civil liberty appear to be intereſted in their defence.

His private life was far better than his public conduct. He was a good huſband, a kind father. To his children he was too kind, becauſe he took no care to reſtrain the vices of their youth. Having gained a crown by uſurpation, he governed by a foreign miniſter, and foreign arms; yet, at the ſame time, gave way to innovations, which rendered his ſubjects formidable to him; then, by all the means of abſolute deſpotiſm, without regard to law or juſtice, endeavoured to ſubdue the power he had raiſed; and after having made his reign a long civil war, purchaſed at laſt a diſhonourable peace, by excluding his ſon from the ſucceſſion, adopting his enemy, and leaving himſelf little more than the empty name of a king.

No great idea can be formed of a monarch, whoſe whole conduct in government broke every rule of good and true policy. If he might have been permitted to continue only earl of Montagne, he would, perhaps, have ſupported that rank with a fair reputation. But, conſidering him in the moſt favourable light, we ſhall find him unfit for a throne. Had he aſcended this ſeat of power by right of inheritance, and lived in leſs troubleſome times, he would, in all probability, have been tranſmitted to poſterity with applauſe, and recorded as one of the moſt illuſtrious princes of the Norman race.

A. D. 1155. HENRY II. ſon of the empreſs Matilda, or Maud, by her ſecond huſband Geoffrey Plantagenet, count of Anjou, aſcended the throne of England by an hereditary right derived from his grandfather Henry I. as alſo by virtue of the late treaty he had concluded with Stephen. He was maſter, in right of his father, of Anjou, Touraine, and Maine; in that of his mother, of Normandy; and in that of Eleanor, his conſort, of Guienne, Poictou, Xaintogne, Auvergne, Perigord, Angoumois, and Limoſin. Theſe provinces compoſed near a third of the whole monarchy of France, and were even ſuperior in extent and opulence to thoſe territories which were ſubjugated to the immediate juriſdiction of that king. Henry, on the death of Stephen, was beſieging a caſtle in Normandy. His council adviſed him to haſten to England, leſt his enemies ſhould take advantage of his abſence to excite diſturbances; but he could not be perſuaded to raiſe the ſiege, till the caſtle had been forced to ſurrender at diſcretion. He then went to Rouen to confer with his mother, who prudently determined not to go with him to England, where ſhe was not beloved.

Henry, after this, repaired with Eleanor his queen, and a ſplendid train of nobility, to Barfleur, and as ſoon as the wind was favourable he put to ſea, when he was in danger of being ſhipwrecked; but the ſtorm abating, they landed near Hurſt Caſtle on the ſeventh of December, about ſix weeks after Stephen's death. Upon his arrival at Wincheſter, the clergy, nobility, and gentry, came from all parts to meet him, and with the loudeſt acclamations teſtified their willingneſs to obey him, not only as their ſovereign, but as their deliverer. His journey from thence to London appeared a continual proceſſion, and that city received him with the higheſt marks of diſtinction. On the nineteenth of December he and his queen were crowned in Weſtminſter Abbey, by Theobald, archbiſhop of Canterbury, with no other compact with his people, than the uſual oaths required of the ancient kings of England. Indeed, they had imbibed a very flattering idea of the virtues and abilities of their new king; and the firſt acts of his government fully juſtified the good opinion they had entertained of him.

Having adviſed with his parliament concerning the ſtate of the kingdom, he exerted himſelf agreeable to their reſolutions to remove the complaints of his ſubjects. He began with diſmiſſing all thoſe foreign mercenaries who had long fattened on the ſpoils of the nation. Theſe, with their leader William de Ypres, he commanded to leave the realm on pain of death. He deſtroyed the caſtles which Stephen, againſt the faith he had given, reſerved undemoliſhed, except a few, that from their ſituation were thought neceſſary for the defence of the kingdom. He revoked all the grants made by his predeceſſors, and even thoſe which the empreſs his mother had laviſhed on her favourites. He repaired the coin, which had been ſhamefully debaſed during the late confuſions, and took proper meaſures for preventing a return of the like abuſes.

He was rigorous in the execution of juſtice; while at the ſame time the powerful were reſtrained from acts of tyranny, and the licentious from diſturbing the repoſe of the innocent. A few turbulent barons at firſt oppoſed the deſtruction of their caſtles. The earl of Albemarle, Hugh Mortimer, and the ſon of Miles, earl of Hertford, were inclined to make reſiſtance to this ſalutary meaſure; but the king calling a general council of the nation, all their ſchemes were diſconcerted, and they were obliged to ſubmit. To endear himſelf ſtill more to his ſubjects, he granted them a charter of liberties, in which that of his grandfather, Henry I. was confirmed. Thus was his kingdom, which had ſuffered equally by tyranny and faction, re-eſtabliſhed in thoſe legal rights, which were the proper fences to guard it from both theſe evils.

The king now embarked for Normandy, in order to oppoſe the deſigns of his brother Geoffrey, who, ſince his departure, had made an incurſion into Anjou and Maine, and took poſſeſſion of a conſiderable part of thoſe provinces, A. D. 1156.

vinces, to which he avowed a pretended right. On his appearance the people returned to their allegiance; and Geoffrey, finding it would be in vain to contend with the ſuperior power of his brother, reſigned his claim for an annual penſion of a thouſand pounds ſterling money. Henry took poſſeſſion of the lands and caſtles, together with the earldom of Nantz, which the inhabitants, who had expelled count Hoel, put into his hands. On his return to England in 1157, Cadwaller, brother to Owen, a prince of Wales, applied to Henry for protection, and encouraged him to revenge the inſults of the Welſh, who had, during his abſence, committed great outrages by invading their country. Henry therefore marched at the head of a powerful army to Wincheſter, where he received advice that Owen had advanced as far as Baſingwerk in Flintſhire to meet him. But this was only an artifice, to draw the Engliſh into a narrow and difficult paſs between two ranges of hills, where Owen had placed a numerous ambuſcade, under the command of his ſons.

Henry, confiding too much in the ſtrength of his army, and not ſufficiently conſulting thoſe who had a more perfect knowledge of the country, fell into the ſnare, and paid dearly for his raſhneſs. When he had advanced into the middle of theſe ſtraits with his vanguard, the Welſh riſing at once with the moſt horrible outcries, from under the cover of the woods that hung over the ſteep and rocky ſides of the paſs, aſſaulted them with ſtones, arrows, and other miſſile weapons. The confuſion they were thrown into, and the ſituation of the place quite diſabled them from reſiſting this unexpected attack. Euſtace FitzJohn, and Robert de Courſey, two barons, being ſlain, and Henry finding it impoſſible to proceed farther, endeavoured to retire back to the entrance of the ſtraits, which with much difficulty he performed; but moſt of his troops were miſerably deſtroyed, before he could extricate them or himſelf from their unhappy ſituation. Henry de Eſſex, hereditary ſtandard-bearer, being ſeized with a panic, letting the royal ſtandard drop from his hands, betook himſelf to flight, and meeting the reſt of the army, cried aloud, "The king is ſlain!"

The conſternation became general. The Welſh, perceiving their diſmay, attacked them with great fury. They would have been ſhamefully routed, if, at that inſtant, Henry had not ſhewn himſelf, and with a countenance full of alacrity, encouraged, rallied, and led them on to the charge; when, animated with the joy of ſeeing him ſafe, they quickly drove the enemy back into the wood. The king now drew off his forces, and calling a council of war, it was reſolved to leave the woody hills between which they had ſo unhappily attempted to paſs, and march along the ſea-ſhore, till they ſhould get beyond Baſingwerk, to the back of the poſt the Welſh had taken; at the ſame time the fleet was ordered to ſail along the coaſt, and make deſcents upon the more open parts of the country.

This plan having been diſcovered by Owen, he retired to a ſtrong poſition in the mountains of Snowden. Henry immediately ſubdued all Flintſhire; and, to ſecure his poſſeſſions, made roads for an army to paſs without difficulty through the whole province; cut down the woods; rebuilt the caſtles of Ruthland and Baſingwerk; began that of Flint; and founded a houſe for the knights templars, which was a new kind of garriſon, before unknown in that country. While thus employed, Owen, dreading the conſequences ſhould they be completed, came down from the mountains, and advanced to the borders of Flintſhire. Several ſkirmiſhes afterwards happened between the two armies, but no general action; Owen being not diſpoſed to venture a battle in an open country, and Henry, inſtructed by the loſs he had ſuſtained, as carefully avoided expoſing himſelf, or his army, to any more ambuſcades. In the mean time, having aſſembled a fleet at Cheſter, by his orders they ſailed from thence, and aſſiſted his operations in Flintſhire; after which he ſent it to harraſs the coaſts of North Wales, under the command of Madoc ap Meredith. Some of the forces of that prince, in conjunction with the Engliſh, made a deſcent on the Iſle of Angleſey, where they ravaged the country without reſiſtance; but as they were returning to their ſhips, encumbered with ſpoils, the whole ſtrength of the iſle ſuddenly attacked and cut them to pieces.

Owen, notwithſtanding this ſucceſs in his favour, on finding himſelf unable to hinder the Engliſh from deſolating the moſt fertile parts of his maritime provinces, became very uneaſy from the apprehenſions of wanting proviſions, ſhould he either remain in the poſt he had taken, or ſhut himſelf up with his army in the deſerts of Snowden. He therefore adopted the moſt prudent ſtep of ſuing for peace, which Henry granted him, on condition of his rendering him homage, yielding up all the diſtricts and caſtles in North Wales which had been taken from the Engliſh during the reign of king Stephen, and delivering two of his ſons as hoſtages for his future fidelity. He alſo obliged him to reſtore the lands he had taken from his brother Cadwaller. Having obtained theſe great points, and put ſtrong garriſons in the caſtles of Ruthland and Baſingwerk, he left the war to be finiſhed by the lords of the marches, ſuppoſing that the inferior Welſh princes would not continue long in arms, after Owen had ſubmitted. Nor was he miſtaken; for at the commencement of the year following, all the princes of South Wales, except Rhees ap Griffyth, and all the leſſer chieftains of that country, came to the king in England, and made a peace with him on the above conditions.

However no perfect ſettlement of South Wales could be effected, while Rhees ap Griffyth remained unconquered. That prince commanded his people to remove their flocks, herds, and other effects, to the deſert of Tywy; and, though deſerted by all his confederates, continued the war with the king of England. Henry, who had an eſteem for him on account of his magnanimity, ſent him a friendly invitation to come to his court, with an aſſurance that he ſhould be kindly received; but added, if he refuſed that favour, the whole power of England ſhould be ſent to bring him thither. That prince having conſulted his friends, who perſuaded him to go, he followed their advice. Henry having received his homage, gave him the patrimonial eſtates of his anceſtors; but not without receiving from him in return two of his ſons, as hoſtages for his future fidelity. Thus Henry had the honour of concluding this troubleſome and dangerous war, and of recovering all the Engliſh poſſeſſions which Stephen had loſt within the confines of Wales, and likewiſe of reſtoring to England its ſovereignty over the whole nation, by forcing its princes to hold their territories as vaſſals under homage and fealty.

A. D. 1158.

The king's brother, Geoffrey, dying ſoon after he had acquired poſſeſſion of Nantz, Henry laid claim to his territories; and having a competitor in Conan, duke of Brittany, who took poſſeſſion of the ſame, he was reſolved to ſupport his more juſt pretenſions by force of arms. In order to prevent Lewis, the French king, from interpoſing in this controverſy, Henry paid him a viſit, and ſo influenced him by civilities and careſſes, that an alliance was contracted between the two kings; and it was agreed, that young Henry, heir-apparent to the Engliſh crown, ſhould be betrothed to Margaret of France, though the former was only five years of age, and the latter ſtill in her cradle. Secure now of not being moleſted in his operations on the ſide of France, Henry advanced at the head of his army into Brittany; and Conan, deſpairing of ſucceſs againſt ſo powerful an enemy, delivered up the county of Nantz to the Engliſh monarch. And in order to ſecure his friendſhip and ſupport, as a counterbalance to the turbulent diſpoſition of his ſubjects, Conan betrothed his daughter, and only child, and yet an infant, to Geoffrey, the king's third ſon, who was alſo of the ſame tender years. Henry by his political alliance with Lewis, hoped to recover the Norman Vexin, which had been ceded by his father to Lewis le Gros. This territory was of great importance, containing a chain of forts, which if united to the duchy of Normandy, would form a good barrier for the defence of that country, but remaining under the juriſdiction of France, would expoſe it to continual danger. Henry therefore propoſed that theſe places ſhould be given by the French king as a dowry with his daughter. This negociation was carried on and ſucceſsfully concluded. After which Lewis, to expreſs the ſatisfaction he felt in the union of the two families, invited Henry to come to Paris, and receive the princeſs himſelf. Henry accepted the invitation, and was received with all the honours, that the civility of thoſe times could deviſe; he accepted them with an amiable and graceful politeneſs; but as much as poſſible avoided all pompous forms and ceremonies, his mind being too great, his underſtanding too ſolid, to be fond of ſuch pageantry.

A. D. 1159. The mother of queen Eleanor, named Philippa, was the only iſſue of William IV. count of Tholouſe; and ſhould have inherited his dominions, had not that prince, deſirous of preſerving the ſucceſſion in the male line, conveyed the principality to his brother, Raymond de St. Giles, by an illuſory contract of ſale. By this fictitious bargain, the county of Tholouſe cauſed a diſpute between the male and female heirs, which in turns, as opportunity favoured their pretenſions, had obtained poſſeſſion. Alphonſo, the ſon of Raymond, was now the reigning ſovereign; and Henry avowed his reſolution of ſupporting his queen's right to that earldom, which Lewis himſelf, when huſband to Eleanor, thought well founded; but his ſentiments, changing with his intereſt, which might be affected by any further addition of territory to the Engliſh monarch, he now determined to defend by his whole force the title of Alphonſo. The ſword therefore was drawn to decide the controverſy. Henry knew that the reduction of Tholouſe, a city remarkable for its ſtrength, would require a powerful body of troops; and being ſenſible at the ſame time, that the uſual cuſtom of raiſing an army in England would not anſwer his purpoſe, he had recourſe to a ſcheme of which he flattered himſelf his people would not diſapprove.

The king, agreeable to the feudal ſyſtem, iſſued out his orders, for all his military tenants to take the field, at the head of a certain number of their vaſſals, in proportion to the number of their fiefs. But the delays occaſioned by the ſlowneſs with which the military tenants came into the field, the ſpirit they poſſeſſed when there, and the ſhortneſs of the time they were obliged to ſerve, being only forty days, rendered them not only of little uſe, but even dangerous. Nor was this method of raiſing troops leſs inconvenient to the ſubject. When a war was to be carried on without the kingdom, the expences in going to and returning from the army, which they were obliged to bear themſelves, became an intolerable burden; their domeſtic affairs, while in ſervice, ſuffered greatly; the tillage of their lands was neglected, and a famine was ſometimes the conſequence. Henry therefore excuſed the perſonal attendance of his military tenants for a ſum of money. The people were delighted with this exchange; it being much more agreeable to them to advance a ſtipulated ſum than to furniſh troops, and to head them in perſon. The king was pleaſed to find he had united his ſentiments with thoſe of his ſubjects. They cheerfully paid the ſums levied upon them, and Henry with the money hired foreign mercenaries, over whom he had a more certain authority, and whoſe time of ſervice was unlimited. The barons of England engaged readily to ſupport the king's pretenſions: all his ſubjects had ſuch a regard for him, that they thought his intereſt their own; and all his nobility followed him with incredible ardour in this expedition.

The firſt military operation was undertaken againſt Cahors, the capital of the generality of Quercy, and Henry was ſoon maſter of that place; but the city of Tholouſe made a noble defence, baffling all the exertions of the Engliſh monarch to take it. Lewis was alarmed. He feared that if Henry ſhould make himſelf maſter of the principal places in the heart of France, his ambition might tempt him to advance even to the gates of Paris. He therefore, with a ſmall body of forces, threw himſelf into Tholouſe, before Henry could completely inveſt that city. Upon this military operations immediately ceaſed. The king of England declaring, influenced by a nice punctilio of honour, that he owed ſo much reſpect to his ſuperior lord, that he would not attack a place defended by him in perſon. In conſequence of this declaration he raiſed the ſiege, and a peace was ſoon after concluded between the two monarchs. However Henry made war on all the other territories of earl Raymond, and in leſs than three months conquered the greateſt part of the earldom of Tholouſe.

In this war, Becket performed ſignal ſervice: for he brought with him into the field ſeven hundred knights, all of his own houſehold, each of whom was attended by a ſquire; and theſe were eſteemed the braveſt ſoldiers in the king's army, charging firſt, and behaving with the greateſt intrepidity in every action. Nor was the chancellor leſs active. He took by ſtorm three caſtles which were thought impregnable, and on that account left unattempted by Henry. And when the king was in Normandy he joined him, bringing with him twelve hundred knights, and four thouſand ſtipendaries of an inferior degree, which he hired at his own expence. During his ſervice he engaged in a ſingle combat Engelran de Frie, a French knight of diſtinguiſhed valour, diſmounted him with his lance, and gained his horſe, which he led off in triumph. But the peace between the two kings of England and France was of ſhort continuance. A. D. 1160.

Henry's eldeſt ſon had for ſome time been betrothed to Margaret, the daughter of Lewis, and it was agreed by the marriage treaty that the princeſs ſhould have Giſors, with part of the Norman Vexin, for her portion, which places were to remain in the poſſeſſion of the knights Templars, till the marriage ſhould be conſummated. Deſirous of getting into his hands theſe valuable acquiſitions, Henry prevailed upon the cardinals Piſa and Pavia, to grant him a ſynodical decree, diſpenſing with the nonage of the parties. The nuptials were immediately celebrated, though the prince was but ſeven, and the princeſs only three years of age; and the Templars, conſidering themſelves as free from their engagements, delivered up the caſtle of Giſors, and the other places aſſigned as Margaret's dowry. Lewis was not a little offended at this ſtratagem of the Engliſh monarch, and a war between them ſeemed inevitable. But Alexander III. brought about a reconciliation. Alexander, who the preceding year was driven from Rome by Victor IV. had retired into France. Lewis and Henry acknowledged him for the true ſucceſſor of St. Peter, and the pontiff in return endeavoured to bring about a peace between the two kings, who were equally his friends. They both met his holineſs at the caſtle of Torci, on the banks of the Loire. The two monarchs diſmounting to receive him, and each of them holding one of his ſtirrups, walked on foot by his ſide, and in this manner conducted him into the caſtle. Can we wonder at the inſolence of the Roman pontiff in the affair of Becket, when two of the moſt powerful princes in Europe were guilty of ſuch an unpardonable weakneſs!

A. D. 1162. The king having been ſo long detained in Normandy, his affairs in England required his preſence. He therefore embarked and landed at Southampton, where he was received by all his nobility both ſpiritual and temporal with great demonſtrations of joy. He now began an undertaking, which, had it ſucceeded, would have compleated his glory. The clergy had for ſeveral years been making gradual encroachments on the prerogative of the crown, ſo that it was a queſtion at this time whether the king or the biſhops might be conſidered as the head of the kingdom. Henry for ſome time had it in contemplation to ſtop the rapid progreſs of eccleſiaſtical ambition; but the mild behaviour and advanced age of Theobald, archbiſhop of Canterbury, together with his merit in refuſing to place the crown on the head of Euſtace, Stephen's ſon, prevented Henry, during the life of that prelate, from taking thoſe meaſures which he now adopted, and was reſolutely bent to purſue.

After the death of Theobald, the king promoted Thomas à Becket to the vacant ſee, and he was now become his chief favourite. From him therefore he not only thought himſelf ſecure againſt oppoſition to his intended reform, but fully expected a ready compliance with all his intentions. Never did a prince of ſuch penetration appear, in the iſſue, to have been ſo miſtaken in the genius and character of a prime miniſter. Becket had been raiſed by Theobald to conſiderable preferments in the church, and on Henry's acceſſion to the crown, was recommended to him by that primate as a perſon worthy of his confidence and favour. Henry accordingly promoted him to ſeveral places of truſt, and ſoon after to that of chancellor, one of the firſt civil offices in the kingdom. He was put in poſſeſſion of Eye and Berkham, two baronies that had been forfeited to the crown. He was made provoſt of Beverly, dean of Haſtings, and conſtable of the Tower, and to complete his grandeur, he was appointed tutor to prince Henry, the king's eldeſt ſon.

This diſtinguiſhed favourite was the ſon of a reputable tradeſman in London, bred to the law, in the practice of which he had acquired great reputation. His perſon was graceful; his countenance pleaſing; his wit lively; his judgment ſolid; his eloquence powerful; his addreſs ſweetly engaging; and his memory ready on all occaſions. Employments and truſts of all kinds were heaped upon him without meaſure. He had a ſcandalous number of eccleſiaſtical benefices; he had the temporalities of vacant prelacies, the revenues of which he uſed with the ſame freedom as if they had been his own rents, without keeping any regular account, and with the appearance of the moſt extravagant prodigality. The ſplendor of his furniture, which was profuſely ornamented; the luxuries with which his table was conſtantly provided; the pomp of his retinue, and the value of his donations, were correſpondent to his immenſe revenues, exceeding in oſtentation and profuſeneſs any thing before ſeen in a ſubject. He retained a great number of knights in his ſervice; and ſo high was he in public eſteem, that even the moſt haughty among the barons conſidered themſelves as honoured by being admitted to his table. The ſons of the principal nobility received their education in his houſe, where the king himſelf frequently accepted of entertainments. His amuſements tallied with the ſplendid manner of his life. Tilting, hawking, hunting, and the game of cheſs, employed his hours of relaxation, with other ſports of a more gay kind; which, as he had only taken deacon's orders, he did not think unſuitable to his character. He expoſed his perſon in ſeveral military exploits; and being ſent on an embaſſy to France, he aſtoniſhed that court with the number and magnificence of his retinue.

The late archbiſhop of Canterbury, Theobald, being a ſtranger to ambition, had lived in a good correſpondence with the ſtate. All the great points of controverſy between the royal and eccleſiaſtical powers had, during his mild adminiſtration, lain dormant. Becket at this time behaved ſo little like a high churchman, that Henry could not imagine he would revive thoſe diſputes, eſpecially as he was well acquainted with the king's intention of retrenching, or rather confining within their old boundaries all eccleſiaſtical privileges, and had always ſhewed a ready diſpoſition to comply with the monarch's inclinations in this and all other particulars; on account of which he lived on terms of unreſtrained familiarity with his maſter, who when he was inclined to retire from the fatigues of buſineſs, admitted this compliant time-ſerver to be a partner in his convivial ſports. But the high-prieſt was no ſooner inveſted with that dignity, which rendered him, during life, the ſecond perſon in the kingdom, than he entirely changed both his demeanor and conduct, ſtriving to acquire that character for ſanctity, of which he had ſhewed no ſigns, when in his buſy and ſplendid courſe of oſtentatious vanity.

Though Becket ſtill retained the neceſſary food for his pride, a pompous retinue, in his own perſon he affected the greateſt auſterity, and the moſt rigid mortification. Under his canonical habit he wore the frock of a monk, and under that a haircloth next his ſkin, which, by his affected care to conceal, was neceſſarily the more remarked by all his devotees. His uſual diet was bread, which he rendered unpalatable by an infuſion of bitter herbs. He daily, on his knees, waſhed the feet of thirteen poor perſons, whom he afterwards diſmiſſed with preſents. He gained the affection of the monks by his frequent charities to their convents. He ſeemed to be perpetually employed in reciting prayers and pious lectures, or in peruſing religious books. His countenance exhibited a picture of ſorrowful contrition, and he converſed freely with perſons of all ranks who profeſſed a ſanctity of manners. The hoſpitality of the favourite was kept up by the primate; but the mode of it was changed. He dined in public every day, with profuſion and ſplendor; but the noblemen and others who dined with him were placed at another table, none being permitted to ſit at his, except the monks of the convent of Canterbury, and a ſelect ſet of clergymen eminent for their learning, whom he had particularly attached to his perſon. Inſtead of the uſual entertainment of muſic, ſome Latin book was read to him during the time of dinner, after which he retired to a private apartment with ſuch friends in whom he could confide.

The reputation of Thomas à Becket was by theſe pious frauds raiſed high in the eſtimation of popular opinion, which was ſtill more exalted by his ſending the great ſeal to Henry in Normandy, with this laconic meſſage, "that he deſired him to provide himſelf with another chancellor; for he was hardly ſufficient for one office, much leſs for two." However, notwithſtanding this outward ſhew of humility, the diſcerning few perceived the wolf in ſheep's cloathing, and were convinced that Becket was meditating ſome great deſign, and that he had only changed the object of his ambition. Indeed the reaſon he himſelf aſſigns for reſigning the ſeals, is not ſtamped with the mark of a genuine contrite ſpirit. Henry, who was beſt acquainted with his temper, found it very difficult to impute his giving up an office uſually held by a churchman, to a ſcruple of conſcience, or a diſlike of temporal power: he conſidered it as a certain indication of a more dangerous kind of ambition; and believed, that the archbiſhop would have continued his miniſter, if he had not aſpired to become his rival, by exalting the mitre above the crown.

The ſequel proved plainly the truth of this conjecture; for St. Thomas having ſecured the affection of all the bigots in the kingdom, did not wait for Henry's commencing thoſe projects, which he well knew that prince had formed againſt eccleſiaſtical innovations and abuſes: he became himſelf the aggreſſor, and endeavoured to intimidate the king by his bold proceedings. He ſummoned the earl of Clare, a nobleman of great intereſt and reputation, to ſurrender the barony of Tunbridge, which had formerly belonged to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, but had been in the poſſeſſion of the family of that nobleman ever ſince the Conqueſt. Becket alledged, that it was not in the power of any of his predeceſſors to alienate lands in prejudice of the church. But the earl having received his honours and eſtate from the crown, diſregarded the ſummons. The primate next took a bolder ſtep, claiming upon the ſame ground, the cuſtody of the caſtle and tower of Rocheſter from the king himſelf.

At this time, William de Eyneſford, a military tenant of the crown, was the patron of a living belonging to a manor, that held of the archbiſhop of Canterbury. Becket, who now pretended a right to all ſuch vacant churches, preſented one Lawrence, a prieſt, to that of Eyneſford; but the incumbent was violently expelled by William, patron of the living in queſtion. The patron, who acted both as judge and party in ſpiritual courts, iſſued out a ſentence of excommunication againſt Eyneſford, who complained to the king of the injury he had received, in being expoſed to the penalties contained in that terrible ſentence, without the conſent of his ſovereign. Henry, who had now broken off all perſonal intercourſe with Becket, ſent a meſſenger to him, with orders to abſolve Eyneſford without delay; but was anſwered by this meek prelate, that the king had no right to inform him whom he ſhould excommunicate, or whom abſolve. However, after many remonſtrances and menaces, St. Thomas condeſcended, though with a very ill grace, to comply with the royal mandate.

Henry, notwithſtanding this oppoſition from the archbiſhop, maintained his reſolution of rectifying the diſorders of the clergy, who were very licentious in their manners, under pretence that they were not ſubordinate to the civil power, and that ſpiritual penalties alone could be inflicted for their enormous offences. The late times of national confuſion had demoliſhed all diſtinctions; clerks and prieſts were as notorious for wickedneſs as the laity. Holy orders were become a full protection for crimes of the deepeſt dye. Robberies, murders, rapes, and adulteries, were daily committed by eccleſiaſtics with impunity. Many perſons, during the former reign, who were by no means qualified either by their learning or virtues, had taken orders, that they might indulge themſelves in their irregularities without fear of cenſure. Theſe perſons held not any eccleſiaſtical preferment, nor did they belong to any dioceſe; ſo that not being under controul, their behaviour was flagitious in a very high degree.

The prieſts of this age, among other ways of deluding the people, had introduced the practice of ſelling pardons, which at length became a very gainful trade, and enriched the clergy in proportion as it impoveriſhed the laity; who were taught, that an implicit obedience to the will of the prieſt, was a principal part of their duty. Henry was determined, by a rigorous puniſhment of theſe offenders, to free his people from their oppreſſions; nor was it long before an opportunity offered, which afforded him a plauſible allegation for carrying his juſt deſign into execution.

The daughter of a man of fortune in Worceſterſhire had been debauched by a prieſt, who had murdered her father, to avoid the effects which he apprehended might attend the commiſſion of ſuch a crime. The murmurs of the people ran high, and the king inſiſted that the culprit ſhould be delivered up to the civil magiſtrate. Becket pleaded the privilege of the church; and gave orders that the delinquent ſhould be confined in the biſhop's priſon, to prevent his being taken into cuſtody by the king's officers. Hereupon Henry demanded, that he ſhould be firſt tried by the ſpiritual court, and then given up to the ſecular power: but this was oppoſed by the archbiſhop, who alledged the injuſtice of trying a man twice for the ſame crime, and maintained, no greater puniſhment than degradation could be inflicted on him, though he himſelf had, but a few months before, branded a prieſt in the face with a red hot iron, for ſtealing a chalice out of a church.

Henry immediately convened a general aſſembly of all the biſhops, of whom he demanded that the murderer ſhould be delivered into the hands of juſtice, and that a law might be enacted for the more effectual puniſhment of ſuch offenders for the future. Becket retired with the biſhops to conſider of the propoſition made by the king; but they being guided by his will, it was determined that the culprit ſhould not be delivered into the hands of the ſecular power. The king demanded, whether they would obſerve the laws and cuſtoms of this kingdom; to which the biſhops, after conſulting with the primate, replied, that they were ready to ſubmit in all things, "ſaving the rights and privileges of the church." Henry was provoked to the higheſt degree at an anſwer ſo palpably evaſive, and left the aſſembly with viſible marks of diſpleaſure in his countenance.

At length the biſhops reflected cooly on the part they had acted, in contempt of royal prerogative. They knew the power of Becket at Rome, and weighed it with that of Henry on the throne of England. They concluded it was the ſafeſt ſtep, to make their intereſt as barons the meaſure of their obedience as churchmen. Accordingly they made ſubmiſſion to the king at Oxford, and there retracted their reſervation. Becket, however, continued inflexible; and nothing but the interpoſition of the pope's legate Philip, who dreaded the reſentment of ſo powerful a prince, could have prevailed with him to retract his opinion, and give an expreſs promiſe of obſerving the ancient uſages of the realm. Henry, however, could not reſt contented with a declaration in general terms. He was determined to define expreſly, and fix the limits of the civil power; and to form into ſtanding laws thoſe cuſtoms with which he required a compliance, in order to put a ſtop to the uſurpations of the church, before they were too firmly eſtabliſhed by time. With this intent he ſummoned a general council of the prelates and nobility at Clarendon, where he ſubmitted the ſubject of diſpute to their diſcuſſion, deſiring, at the ſame time, their concurrence to his plan of proceeding.

A. D. 1164.

The biſhops in general complied through fear; and in this aſſembly a number of articles were paſſed into laws, with little oppoſition, which were afterwards diſtinguiſhed by the title of the Conſtitutions of Clarendon; a recital of which we here inſert, for the peruſal, if agreeable, of our more curious, indulgent, and numerous readers.

Conſtitutions of Clarendon.

I. "All ſuits about the preſentation and advowſon of churches, between either laity or clergy, ſhall be tried and determined in the king's courts.

II. "Churches belonging to the king's fee, cannot be granted in perpetuity, without his conſent.

III. "Clergymen accuſed of any crime whatever, and ſummoned by the king's juſtices, ſhall appear in his court, and plead to ſuch articles as the civil magiſtrate ſhall require; and in the eccleſiaſtical court to ſuch as are cognizable therein, provided the king's juſtices ſend an officer to inſpect the proceedings of the ſpiritual court; and in caſe a clerk is convicted, or pleads guilty, he is to loſe his privilege, and be protected by the court no longer.

IV. "No archbiſhops, biſhops, or prieſts, may go out of the kingdom, without leave firſt obtained from the king; and, on obtaining a licence, they ſhall give ſecurity not to aſk or obtain any thing either in their paſſage, ſtay, or return, to the prejudice of the king, or his kingdom.

V. "Excommunicated perſons ſhall not be obliged to make oath, or give ſecurity, to continue in the place where they live; but only to conform to the judgment of the church in order to their abſolution.

VI. "Laymen ſhall not be accuſed in the ſpiritual courts but by legal, reputable, promoters and witneſſes, in the preſence of a biſhop; yet ſo as the archdeacon loſe not his right, nor any of his dues; and if the offenders are ſuch that no one will or dare accuſe them, then the ſheriff, at the biſhop's requeſt, ſhall cauſe twelve legal men of the town or vicinage, to make oath before the biſhop that they will declare the truth of the matter according to the beſt of their knowledge.

VII. "None, either of the king's tenants, or of his miniſterial officers, ſhall be excommunicated, nor any of their lands put under an interdict, unleſs application be firſt made to the king, if he be in England; or, in caſe he be out of the realm, to his juſticiary, that he may ſee juſtice done in their caſe; ſo that what is cognizable in the king's court may be there determined, and what pertaineth to the eccleſiaſtical, may be remitted thither.

VIII. "All appeals, in ſpiritual cauſes, ſhall be made from the archdeacon to the biſhop; from the biſhop to the primate; and from the primate, in failure of juſtice, to the king; nor ſhall it be lawful to proceed farther without the king's conſent.

IX. "If a ſuit ariſe between a clergyman and a layman, which the firſt pretends to be held by frank almoine, (a tenure of lands or tenements beſtowed for perpetual alms,) and the latter maintains it to be a lay-fee, the tenure ſhall be tried before the king's juſticiary by the verdict of twelve lawful men, ſummoned according to the cuſtom of the courts, by order of the king's chief-juſtice; and if the tenement is found to be held in frank almoine, the ſuit ſhall be tried in the ſpiritual court; but if the verdict brings in a lay-fee, the ſuit ſhall be carried on in the king's court, unleſs they both hold of the ſame lord, either ſpiritual or temporal, in which caſe it ſhall be tried in his court; provided, however, that the perſon, ſeiſed of the tenement in queſtion, be not, on account of ſuch verdict, diſſeiſed till the ſuit is determined.

X. "If any inhabitant of a city, caſtle, borough, or demeſne manor of the king, be cited for any time by the archdeacon or biſhop, and will not make ſatisfaction upon their ſummons, they may interdict him from divine ſervice; but they ought not to excommunicate him, till the king's principal officer of the place be made acquainted therewith, that he may oblige the perſon to make ſatisfaction to the church; and ſhould ſuch officer fail in ſo doing, he ſhall be finable at the king's pleaſure; and the biſhop may then exert his eccleſiaſtical authority upon the accuſed perſon.

XI. "All archbiſhops, biſhops, and others of the clergy, poſſeſſed of eccleſiaſtical dignities or benefices, who hold of the king in capite, are to look upon their eſtates as baronies, and ſhall appear before the king's juſtices and officers to anſwer the duties of their tenures; they ſhall alſo perform and obſerve all the royal cuſtoms, rights, and ſervices, and ſhall hold themſelves, as other barons, obliged to be preſent at judicial proceedings in the king's court, till ſentence comes to be given againſt life or limb.

XII. "When any archbiſhopric, biſhopric, abbey, or prior, of royal foundation or patronage, becomes vacant, the king ſhall enter thereon, and receive all the iſſues and profits thereof as of his own eſtates; and when he ſhall think fit that the vacancy of ſuch church be filled up, the king ſhall ſend his mandate to the chapter or convent, and the election ſhall be made in the king's chapel, with his conſent, and by the advice of ſuch dignitaries of the realm as he ſhall call together for that purpoſe; and the perſon ſo elected ſhall there, before his conſecration, do homage and fealty to the king, as to his liege lord, for life, limb, and earthly honour, ſaving his order.

XIII. "If any of the nobility ſhould violently oppoſe the biſhop or archbiſhop, or archdeacon, in doing juſtice on themſelves to their tenants, the king ſhall take cognizance of the matter, and oblige them to ſubmit to juſtice. And if any deny the king his rights, and decline ſtanding to the judgment of the court, then the archbiſhop, biſhop, and archdeacons, ſhall employ their cenſures and authority to oblige them to make the king ſatiſfaction.

XIV. "Goods or chattels, forfeited to the king, ſhall not be protected in any church or church-yard, to ſecure them from being ſeized according to law, becauſe they belong to the king wherever they may be found, either in the precincts of the church, or elſewhere.

XV. "The clergy ſhall no longer pretend to the right of enforcing the payment of debts contracted by oath or promiſe. All actions and ſuits for debts, however contracted, ſhall be tried in the civil courts.

XVI. "The ſons of tenants, holding in villainage, ſhall not be ordained, without conſent firſt obtained of the lord of the manor, on whoſe lands they were known to be born."

The above conſtitutions being reduced to writing, it was reſolved that every member preſent ſhould ſubſcribe their names, and take an oath to obſerve them. All the prelates readily obeyed, except Becket, who objected to ſetting his name, alledging, that would be a contradiction to the general promiſe he had given, and which he thought quite ſufficient. The king and the temporal lords were highly offended at this oppoſition, which amounted to a confeſſion that he meant to impoſe on his ſovereign, and fraudulently evade the obedience he had promiſed. The grand prior of the Templars threw himſelf upon his knees, and with many tears intreated Becket, if he paid any regard to his own ſafety, or that of the church, not to provoke with a fruitleſs oppoſition, the indignation of a powerful monarch, who was abſolutely determined on his purpoſe, and had ſworn to take ample revenge on every perſon who ſhould in this matter dare to oppoſe him. Becket finding himſelf deſerted by his own party, and thus preſſed by Richard de Haſtings, he gave his aſſent in theſe remarkable words: "It is my maſter's pleaſure that I ſhould forſwear myſelf, and at preſent I ſubmit to it, reſolving to incur a perjury, and to repent afterwards as I may." The biſhops heard him with a marked aſtoniſhment, and were not a little abaſhed at what he had ſaid. Yet he declared his aſſent to the conſtitution, and promiſed "legally, with good faith, and without reſerve and fraud," to obey them, and even took an oath to ratify his ſolemn promiſe. They then ſigned the articles and ſet their ſeals to them; but this Becket peremptorily refuſed; a reſerve which is not to his honour; for after his formal declarations that he would obſerve the conſtitutions, it was trifling and inconſiſtent to ſcruple the ſigning them: for, beſides his verbal engagement, the conſent he had given to the articles is expreſsly declared in the preamble of the act, which is as ſtrong a teſtimony againſt him as his ſubſcription or ſignature could be; and moſt authors agree that he received one authentic copy of it, another being delivered to the archbiſhop of York, and a third to the king himſelf, to be enrolled among the royal charters.

After having thus far obtained the completion of his deſires, Henry tranſmitted the conſtitutions of Clarendon to Rome, in order to their being ratified by Alexander III. who was ſovereign pontiff; but when they came to be examined in the ſacred college, the pope condemned and annulled moſt of the articles, judging them to be ſubverſive of the papal power in England, by rendering it dependent on the ſtate. Becket, pleaſed at this determination, forgot in an inſtant of time his ſolemn engagements; and expecting now to be ſupported in oppoſition to the will of his maſter, he expreſſed the deepeſt ſorrow (what a precious ſaint this!) for his conceſſions, labouring inceſſantly to engage all the biſhops to perjure themſelves, for the honour of God, in ſupport of their eccleſiaſtical privileges. To inforce his arguments St. Thomas had recourſe to his former artifice of ſelf-mortification. He redoubled his auſterities, in order, as he ſaid, to puniſh himſelf for his ſinful compliance with the king's pleaſure: he even refuſed to exerciſe any part of his epiſcopal function, till he had received abſolution from the pope, which he well knew could be eaſily obtained; and there is now extant a letter from that pontiff to him, which abſolves him from his ſin, and enjoins this pious ſon of the church to return to the ſervice of the altar, leſt his abſence from it ſhould occaſion a public ſcandal. The primate finding himſelf ſtill expoſed to the king's reſentment, endeavoured twice to eſcape out of the kingdom without the king's knowledge, which was expreſsly forbidden by thoſe conſtitutions he had ſworn to obſerve without fraud or deceit; but contrary winds detained him.

As the primate had ſubmitted to a renewed courſe of mortification, Henry deemed that he intended an inſult to himſelf; ſo that his former partiality to his favourite was converted to hatred, and the breach between them grew daily more wide.. At length the king requeſted of his holineſs, that he would appoint a legate in England, whoſe ſuperior power might curb the violent conduct of Becket. The pope readily conſented to ſend a legate, but inſerted a clauſe in his commiſſion, by which he was enjoined not to do any thing to the prejudice of the archbiſhop; a circumſtance that defeated the end which Henry had in view; whereupon he ſent back the commiſſion with the utmoſt diſdain, and determined to ſeek another mode of revenge on the haughty prelate. An opportunity of executing this reſolution in a legal manner ſoon offered; it was in conſequence of an order having been ſent from the king's court, requiring him to do juſtice to a great officer of the houſhold, in relation to an eſtate which he claimed from the church of Canterbury, concerning which that nobleman complained to the king by an appeal, declaring that juſtice was denied him by the archbiſhop.

Hereupon the king ſent a citation to Becket, by which he was ordered to appear before his ſovereign lord, upon an appointed day. But the primate's anſwer was an expreſs declaration, that he would not obey the ſummons. This refuſal being an evident infringement of the king's right, as well as an inſult offered to his dignity, it was reſolved unanimouſly in council, to bring Thomas à Becket before the high court of parliament, to anſwer for this and many other offences. A great council of the nation was accordingly ſummoned at Northampton, which being aſſembled, Henry complained in very moderate terms of the contempt the archbiſhop had ſhewn to his mandate. Becket, on being called, confeſſed the fact, and, being condemned guilty of contumacy againſt the king's majeſty, his goods and chattels were confiſcated. The biſhops unanimouſly concurred with the temporal barons in this ſentence; and it being underſtood that a fine of five hundred pounds would be accepted by Henry, the primate found ſecurities for the payment of that ſum.

Henry, on the following day, made a demand of five hundred pounds, which he ſaid he had lent the archbiſhop when chancellor. Becket affirmed it was a gift; but not being able to bring proof, he was condemned to repay the money. On the third day, the king brought a higher charge againſt him, namely, that while chancellor, he had many years in his poſſeſſion the profits of ſeveral vacant biſhoprics and abbies, and he was now required to account for the rents, and alſo for the expenditure of other caſual ſums that had paſſed through his hands. Becket, in reply, ſaid, that not having before been cited on this matter, he was not prepared to anſwer the charge, but in due time and place he would not fail to do the king right. Henry did not object to allow him time, but demanded ſufficient bail for his appearance. Upon which he deſired leave to conſult with the biſhops; and the king permitted him to retire apart with them into an adjoining room.

The prelate was now greatly perplexed; but he reſolved neither to reſign his archbiſhopric, which ſome of the biſhops adviſed him to do, nor to ſubmit to an examination. After continuing ſilent for ſome time, he deſired to ſpeak with the earls of Leiceſter and Cornwall, who were then with the king. Theſe lords being ſent for, he told them, that the perſons to whom his cauſe was beſt known not being there, he deſired a reſpite till the next day, when he would anſwer "as God ſhould inſpire him." This being reported to the king by the biſhops of London and Rocheſter, as purporting that he would then deliver in his accounts, Henry ſent back the two earls with his aſſent to the required delay, if he would then perform what the two prelates had promiſed in his name; but the archdefaulter denied that he had authoriſed them to carry ſuch a meſſage. However the king permitted him to depart, and the next day being Sunday, adjourned the council till Monday, that he might have no reaſon to complain of the proceedings againſt him being carried on with too much ſpeed.

Becket, on his return home, finding himſelf forſaken by the great train of knights who had attended him to the parliament, the agitation of his ſpirits was ſo violent, that it brought upon him a fit of the cholic, which ſeized him on Sunday night, and rendered him incapable of attending the council the next day. All the members imagined his illneſs to be ſeigned; but to be certain they deputed ſome of the principal nobility to cite him to the court. They ſaw his illneſs was real, and he aſſured them, that with the aſſiſtance of God, he would not fail to appear before them the next day, though he ſhould be carried in his litter.

He was viſited, early in the morning, by many of the biſhops, who endeavoured to perſuade him, for the ſake of peace, to ſubmit intirely to the king's pleaſure; adding, that if he did not, he would be impeached by parliament of perjury and treaſon. This advice St. Thomas rejected, ſaying, "he appealed to the church of Rome;" and added, "If the ſecular power ſhould preſume to lay hands on me, I command you, in behalf of your father and metropolitan, to thunder out the proper eccleſiaſtical cenſures."

Soon after the biſhops left him, he ſaid maſs at an altar dedicated to St. Stephen, ordering it to begin, as on the feſtival of the martyr, with theſe words of ſcripture, "Princes ſat and ſpake againſt me." Having thus fortified his mind with the artifices of ſelf-deception, to which was added a concealed conſecrated hoſt, he proceeded to the parliament. When he arrived at the outer door, he took the croſs from the perſon who bore it before him, and holding it up, entered alone into the room where the barons were aſſembled, expecting his coming. The whole aſſembly was aſtoniſhed at ſeeing him appear before them in ſo extraordinary a manner. The biſhop of Hereford offered to carry the croſs, being his chaplain, but he refuſed to deliver it, intimating, that he bore it as his protection, and that by this enſign it would be evident under what prince he fought. Upon this the archbiſhop of York reprehended him ſeverely, for thus entering the ſupreme court of his ſovereign in the way of defiance, accompanied with a premeditated inſult; and he was told both by that prelate and the biſhop of London, that he would find the king's weapon of greater force than his; to which he replied, that the king's weapon indeed could kill the body, but that in his hand could kill the ſoul, and ſend it to hell. He then again appealed to the pope, and prohibited them from aſſiſting in any other judgment reſpecting him.

Information having been received by the king of the inſolent manner of his coming, he retired to an inner apartment of the caſtle, and ordered all the other ſpiritual and temporal lords to attend him there. He now complained of Becket's contemptuous behaviour, in attempting to appear before him in an unheard of manner that was a reproach to him, as if ſome treachery had been attempted againſt the primate's perſon. It was anſwered, that Becket had always in his deportment diſplayed vanity, ſelf-conceit, and arrogance; that this inſtance was indeed a groſs affront, not only to his ſovereign, but all the peers aſſembled in parliament, and that for his ingratitude, perfidy, and violation of his oath, he ought to be impeached of high-treaſon. This appeared to be the unanimous opinion of all preſent, yet the king, from an ill-timed lenity, would not allow them to proceed on this ground, but only ſent ſome lords to demand of the archbiſhop, whether he was prepared to do the king right, reſpecting the debt he claimed, according to his promiſe. Becket's anſwer amounted to an abſolute refuſal, which, with his appeal to the pope, appeared to all the temporal barons ſuch an act of deliberate diſobedience, that they adhered to their former reſolution of an attainder againſt him for perjury and high-treaſon.

The biſhops, who found themſelves under great difficulties how to act in this critical moment, after a conſultation, implored the king's permiſſion to appeal to the ſee of Rome againſt their metropolitan, on account of his perjury; ſolemnly promiſing to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to prevail on pope Alexander to degrade him, if the king would excuſe them joining with the temporal lords in the ſentence they ſeemed determined to pronounce. To this requeſt Henry yielded with more complaiſance than diſcretion. The biſhops then went to Becket, and told him, that putting themſelves under the protection of the pope, they cited him to anſwer their accuſations; all which was no more than a refined ſtratagem of arrant prieſtcraft, in order to gain time, and avoid the ſtorm which was ready to be diſcharged on their heads.

The king, in the mean time, demanded juſtice againſt Becket from the temporal barons, and they unanimouſly found him guilty of perjury and treaſon. Becket, to prevent hearing his ſentence pronounced againſt him in due form, roſe up haſtily and departed. As he was paſſing along, many called him a perjured traitor; whereupon looking back with a ſtern countenance, St. Thomas ſaid aloud, that did not his holy orders forbid it, he would by arms defend himſelf againſt any one who ſhould charge him with the crimes of perjury aud treaſon. Henry, fearing leſt his inſolent language and behaviour, might be productive of ſome act of illegal violence to his perſon, prudently iſſued out a proclamation, forbidding all perſons on pain of death, to do the archbiſhop or his people any harm. Soon after the king received a meſſage from him, requeſting permiſſion to leave the kingdom. Anſwer was returned by Henry, that he would adviſe with his council upon the ſubject of his petition the next day. The archbiſhop however apprehending his liberty might be in danger, but without any uneaſy apprehenſion from having violated his oath and good faith, departed privately from the convent at midnight, attended only by two friends, and rode towards Lincoln, in order to elude any purſuit; after ſtaying ſome time with the ſame intent at different places, he ſet ſail from Sandwich in a ſmall fiſhing ſmack, and arrived ſafe at Gravelins, on the tenth of November, though ſtrict orders had been ſent to the ſea ports to prevent his leaving the kingdom.

Becket was received by Lewis and the pope, who was ſtill at the court of France, with every mark of reſpect; by the munificence of the former, he lived with a degree of ſplendor in the monaſtery of Pontigni, and the latter prepared to iſſue bulls to revenge his diſgrace. All the thunder of the Vatican was intended to be launched againſt the head of the Engliſh monarch and his miniſters. Henry was no ſooner informed of Becket's eſcape, than he immediately diſpatched a reſpectable embaſſy to the pope, to ſolicit the depoſition of that prelate, offering to double the revenue of Peter's pence; but the pope was inflexible: he received his ambaſſadors very coolly, and they immediately returned to their maſter. On their arrival, the king ſummoned an aſſembly of his nobles, by whom it was determined to ſequeſter all the poſſeſſions of the ſee of Canterbury, together with all the revenues of the churches, chapels, and rents of the clergy, who adhered to Becket; all the primate's relations and domeſtics, both of the clergy and laity, were baniſhed the kingdom at the ſame time.

The greateſt error committed by Henry, in the management of this diſpute, was allowing the biſhops to appeal to Alexander: as it acknowledged a right of judicature belonging to the pope, in a matter of which he had no proper cognizance; and gave him an authority to revive, and re-judge what ought to have been finally determined in England, by the law of the land and the judgment of the barons, in whoſe ſentence againſt the primate Henry ſhould, in good policy and for his own ſafety, have joined; but he might probably have adopted his own meaſures, with a view of keeping the biſhops on his ſide, and by thinking, that they would, eaſily perſuade the pope to conſider the diſpute between him and his late chancellor, as a cauſe in which the church had no concern; not conſidering, that pride, hypocriſy, and duplicity, were the characteriſtics of churchmen in thoſe days.

The very high reſpect with which Becket was treated abroad, could not fail of exciting the indignation of Henry, who ſeemed at this time to ſet his face againſt the pope's ſupremacy, and to have formed a reſolution of delivering his ſubjects from the burden of eccleſiaſtical tyranny; for he iſſued orders to his juſticiaries, that no appeals ſhould be made to the pope or archbiſhop, and forbad the receiving any mandates from them, or applying to their authority in any inſtance whatever. He declared, that they who ſhould preſume to bring an interdict on the kingdom, he would puniſh with loſs of limb or death, whether laymen or clergymen. The pope and Becket, on the contrary, formed a reſolution of proceeding to violent meaſures with the king. The modeſt primate drew a compariſon between himſelf and Chriſt, and ſaid, he underwent a ſecond crucifixion from the preſent oppreſſions on the church. He excommunicated thoſe who had been concerned in ſequeſtering the revenues of the archiepiſcopal ſee, and all who paid obedience to the conſtitutions of Clarendon. He proceeded even to threaten his ſovereign with excommunication, unleſs he repented of what he had done; and his influence procured a ratification of his cenſures from the pope.

A. D. 1165. Henry was not a little alarmed at the troubles which about this time were excited in Italy by the thunder of the Vatican. He therefore paſſed over to the continent, in order, if poſſible, to prevent an interdict being laid on the kingdom, by a perſonal conference with his holineſs. But he was diſappointed. The proud prelate remained inflexible, and Henry returned to England. It is ſurpriſing, and difficult to be accounted for, unleſs the king was in his heart a ſlave to the church of Rome, that he who entertained a proper regard for the dignity of his crown, ſhould afterwards ſtoop to ſuch mean conceſſions as he is known to have done. At this time he employed againſt his opponents every weapon of temporal power remaining in his hands; he ſuſpended the payment of Peter's pence, made advances towards an alliance with the emperor Barbaroſſa, the empire being then under an interdict, and diſcovered ſome intentions of acknowledging Paſcal III. hoping by theſe expedients to terrify the crafty pontiff, and prevent his proceeding to extremities againſt him and his kingdom.

During theſe tranſactions the pope and Henry began to perceive, that in the preſent ſituation of affairs, nothing farther could be done with ſafety, than to bring the diſpute to an amicable deciſion. A meeting was therefore appointed at a village in the neighbourhood of Paris, where Henry, Lewis, and the archbiſhop were preſent. The laſt offered to ſubmit, with the clauſe, "ſaving the honour of God," which Henry wiſely remarked was an evaſion, that would, whenever he pleaſed, ſerve his turn, and give riſe hereafter to freſh diſputes; concluding with this remarkable propoſal, which he addreſſed to the king of France; "Sir, there have been many kings of England of leſs power than I poſſeſs; there have been many former archbiſhops of Canterbury much better and holier men than Thomas à Becket; yet I will be ſatisfied, if he will conſent to make the ſame conceſſions to me, which the wiſeſt and moſt holy of his predeceſſors have made to the weakeſt and leaſt powerful of mine." This frank declaration had a great effect on moſt preſent; but Becket refuſed to ſubmit, Lewis appeared to be diſguſted, and the two kings parted without taking leave of the archbiſhop; yet the friendſhip between Lewis and Becket was ſoon after renewed, and the latter became more than ever a favourite with the courts of France and Rome.

A. D. 1169. Repeated excommunications, iſſued by Becket, now ſucceeded each other with ſuch amazing rapidity, that the king had ſcarcely a ſervant about him, who was not under an interdict. The fortitude of his miniſters ſeemed to ſhake, and ſeveral councils were held in order to terminate the diſpute. At length, in the year following, matters were brought toward a peaceable concluſion, and the primate was permitted to return to his ſee on the following conditions. He was not required to give up any of the rights of the church, or reſign any of thoſe pretenſions which had been the ground of the controverſy; but, without making any conceſſions, ſhould be, with all his adherents, reſtored to their livings; and that even the incumbents of ſuch as depended upon the ſee of Canterbury, and had been filled during the primate's abſence, ſhould be expelled, and Becket have full liberty to ſupply the vacancies. In return for theſe conceſſions, which ſtruck at the dignity of the crown, Henry reaped only the advantage of ſeeing his miniſters abſolved from the ſentence of excommunication, and of preventing the interdict taking place, which was ready to be laid upon all his dominions without exception.

This intereſting diſpute being ſettled, not much to the king's credit, he held a great council at Windſor. In this aſſembly the kingdom was divided into circuits, and certain commiſſioners appointed to make a progreſs through them, in order to take cognizance of all abuſes committed by the ſheriffs, bailiffs, and other inferior officers. This inquiſition produced the moſt ſalutary effects. But the main buſineſs Henry had in view, and which he now brought forward, was the coronation of his eldeſt ſon, who had been knighted by his father. No objection was made to the propoſal of the king; the only difficulty ſtarted was with regard to the prelate who was to perform the ceremony. It was generally underſtood to be the prerogative of the archbiſhop of Canterbury; but on this occaſion it was performed by the archbiſhop of York; who, aſſiſted by the biſhops of London and Durham, placed the crown on the head of young Henry.

This prince was a ſtranger to generous paſſions; gratitude was not in the catalogue of his virtues. His father, deſirous of teſtifying every mark of paternal love for his favourite ſon, ſerved the firſt diſh at his table with his own hands, ſaying at the ſame time, "You may now boaſt, my ſon, of being as honourably ſerved as any monarch upon earth." But the haughty ſoul of Harry knew not how to make a proper return to this engaging condeſcenſion in an indulgent parent. Turning to the archbiſhop of York, he whiſpered, with a contemptuous ſneer, "That he thought it no mighty degradation for the ſon of a petty count to ſerve the heir of a great king." Henry heard not this ungracious reflection, and was yet a ſtranger to his ſon's imperious diſpoſition.

The king of France took offence at this coronation, becauſe his daughter Margaret, wife to the young king, was not crowned with her huſband. Henry therefore promiſed Lewis, that the ceremony ſhould be repeated, and his daughter receive both the crown and the royal unction with her huſband. The breaſt of Becket was alſo filled with the ſpirit of malevolence. He threatened vengeance againſt thoſe prelates who had performed the ceremony; but his fury ſpent itſelf in vain. The pope ſuſpended the effects of his anathemas till a proper enquiry could be made.

The king was now returned to Normandy, and St. Thomas was preparing for his journey to England, in order to take poſſeſſion of his dioceſe, and light up afreſh the torch of civil diſſenſion. He had but juſt landed in England, when he made a progreſs through Kent with a pomp and oſtentation ill becoming a man who had ſo lately received the royal pardon. He paraded through the towns and villages, exhibiting himſelf as a martyr to the cauſe of the church, while the credulous multitude hailed his appearance with hymns of congratulation and thankſgiving. Becket had brought to England three fine horſes, which he intended for a preſent to the young prince, who hearing that he had advanced to Southwark, in the ridiculous parade above mentioned, ſent him word, that he might diſpenſe with his viſit, and that his preſence would not be accepted. In this oſtentatious perambulation Becket had been attended by a number of knights, and other perſons in arms, and finding that the hearts of the people were devoted to him, he began to exerciſe his eccleſiaſtical power in a manner that ſufficiently teſtified the pride and rancour of his heart. He ſuſpended the archbiſhop of York, who had crowned the king's eldeſt ſon; he excommunicated the biſhop of Saliſbury and London, and treated other dignified clergymen with equal rigour; but the moſt ſingular proofs of his low pride and folly were, his excommunicating a man for ſpeaking diſreſpectfully of him, and another for cutting off the tail of one of his horſes.

The archbiſhop of York, with the biſhops of London and Saliſbury had, in the mean time, gone over to Normandy, and at the feet of the king implored his juſtice for themſelves, his whole clergy, and for the nation in general. The archbiſhop remarked, that while Becket lived, the king could never hope to be in ſafety. Upon this, Henry gave a looſe to the violent commotions of his mind, excited by their moving complaints, and exclaimed in all the anguiſh of affronted majeſty, "that the man whom he had raiſed from the duſt, had trampled upon the whole kingdom; had driven him and his children from the throne, and triumphed there unreſiſted; that he was very unfortunate to have maintained ſo many ungrateful cowards in his court, none of whom would vindicate his honour and revenge him of one inſolent, turbulent prieſt." Theſe paſſionate expreſſions excited the attention of the whole court; but were particularly noticed by four knights of the houſehold, who conſidered them as a hint for Becket's death; and, having communicated their thoughts to each other, bound themſelves by a ſolemn oath, to revenge the inſults that had been offered to their ſovereign.

Reginald Fitz-Urſe, William de Tracy, Hugh de Moreville, and Richard Brito, were the four gentlemen of the bed-chamber, who imagined they ſhould oblige their maſter by murdering Becket. With this view they ſecretly retired from the court, and embarked for England in different ſhips. Some menacing expreſſions they had dropped gave ſuſpicion of their deſign; of which when Henry was informed, he diſpatched a meſſenger after them, with expreſs orders not to attempt any thing againſt the perſon of the primate. Theſe orders, however, were too late, to prevent the execution of their fatal purpoſe; for the conſpirators being aſſembled at the caſtle of Saltwood, they were joined there by twelve other perſons, with whom they haſtened to Canterbury. The twelve aſſiſtants took their ſtations in different parts of the town, and the four principals repaired to the houſe of the archbiſhop. Having ſecured two or three of his domeſtics, they entered his apartment, and reproached him in bitter terms for the ſupercilious arrogance of his conduct.

Becket did not ſeem in the leaſt daunted at this unexpected charge; but what he ſaid, in reply, tended only to confirm the aſſaſſins in the reſolution they had taken to deſtroy him. The hour of veſpers now approached, and the archbiſhop repaired to the church of St. Benedict. He was followed by the conſpirators; and he had no ſooner reached the altar than they ſplit his ſkull, and the blood and brains were ſprinkled on the pavement. Thus was the nation delivered from the tyranny of an imperious prelate, who endeavoured to eſtabliſh the authority of the church on the ruins of the civil eſtabliſhment. We may conclude he was not a man of real piety, ſeeing he was deficient in one of its moſt eſſential requiſites, humility. A proud, contentious Chriſtian, is a contradiction in terms.

A. D. 1171.

Thus Thomas à Becket was murdered in the fifty-third year of his age, yet no tumult enſued on that account in any part of the kingdom; no man ſought to take vengeance on his murderers, or even bring them to juſtice; but when his death was known, multitudes of people flocked to the church, lamenting over the body, and croſſing their foreheads with his blood. After his burial, many ridiculous ſtories were propagated and believed, of miracles wrought at his tomb. Men, nay horſes, dogs, and cows, were ſaid to have been reſtored to life. It was aſſerted and credited that the archbiſhop, a little while before his interment, quitted his coffin to light the candles of his own funeral; and that, after the ceremonial, he ſtretched out his hands, as if beſtowing his bleſſing upon the ſurrounding multitude.

Alexander, the Roman pontiff, taking advantage of the credulity of the people, canonized Becket by the name of St. Thomas of Canterbury; and his body was removed to a magnificent ſhrine, enriched with preſents from all parts of Chriſtendom. Pilgrimages were performed to obtain his interceſſion; and it was computed, that in one year above one hundred thouſand pilgrims arrived in Canterbury, to pay their devotions at his ſhrine. However, even in thoſe times of dark ignorance, men of ſuperior diſcernment were ſo far from acknowledging Becket for a ſaint, that they would not allow he had a claim to the character of an honeſt man; and about fifty years after his death it was publicly diſputed at Paris, whether his ſoul was in heaven or in hell.

No ſooner had the news of his murder reached the ears of Henry, than it filled him with unaffected concern. He ſhut himſelf up from the light of the day, and from all commerce with his ſervants; he even refuſed, during three days, food and ſuſtenance. The courtiers in waiting, apprehending that his grief would be attended with fatal conſequences, broke in upon his ſolitude, and by making uſe of every argument of conſolation, at length prevailed upon him to accept of nouriſhment; at the ſame time intreated him to avert the anger of the pontiff, whoſe reſentment he might juſtly apprehend on account of the primate's murder. In purſuance of this ſalutary advice, a ſplendid embaſſy was ſent to Rome, in order to ſtay, if poſſible, the thunders of the Vatican. Alexander at firſt refuſed an audience to Henry's ambaſſadors; but by a proper diſtribution of large ſums of money, his intention was fully anſwered; and his holineſs contented himſelf with iſſuing general denunciations againſt the principals and accomplices of Becket's murder.

The archbiſhop of Sens, who had always been an implacable enemy to the Engliſh monarch, laid an interdict upon all the French provinces ſubject to Henry; but the pope prevented the conſequences that might have reſulted from that ſentence. Two cardinals were ſent with legatine powers into Normandy, to examine into the king's conduct reſpecting the murder of Becket; and a conference was opened at Avranches, where Henry and his eldeſt ſon, together with all the clergy of Normandy were preſent. After long debates, the whole affair was ſettled, and all differences between Henry and the pope were terminated on the following conditions: The king declared upon oath in the church of St. Andrew, that he had neither deſired, nor commanded the murder of Becket; but as ſome words had eſcaped him, in the agony of grief, which might have given occaſion to it, he was deſirous of atoning for that offence, by ſtipulating to pay a ſum of money ſufficient to maintain two hundred knights for one year in the Holy Land, and to ſerve himſelf three years againſt the infidels, ſhould his holineſs require it. He farther engaged, not to inſiſt on any cuſtoms derogatory to eccleſiaſtical privileges, that had been introduced in the courſe of his reign, nor to hinder appeals to the pope; but content himſelf with exacting ſufficient ſecurity from thoſe who left his dominions, that they ſhould attempt nothing againſt the rights of his crown and kingdom. Thus Henry extricated himſelf, upon very eaſy terms, from a very alarming ſituation.

A. D. 1172. The king embarked for England, where affairs of conſequence demanded his preſence; and having now nothing to fear from the ſpiritual ſword, he reſumed, probably to divert the attention of the people from Becket's death, the deſign he had ſome years before formed, of making a conqueſt of Ireland. Adrian IV. who at that time filled the papal chair, deſirous of augmenting the revenues of the holy ſee, encouraged Henry to purſue the plan he had formed, and granted him a bull with ample privileges. The reader will not, perhaps, be diſpleaſed to ſee this curious inſtrument at large, as it affords a convincing proof that the popes of Rome, even in thoſe early times, uſurped the power of conferring kingdoms and ſtates on whom they pleaſed.

POPE ADRIAN's BULL.

“ Adrian, ſervant of the ſervants of God, to his ſon in Chriſt Jeſus, Henry, king of England, ſends greeting, an apoſtolical benediction.

“ THE deſire your highneſs expreſſed to advance the glory of your name on earth, and to obtain in heaven the prize of eternal happineſs, deſerves commendation. As a good catholic prince, you are very careful to enlarge the borders of the church; to ſpread the knowledge of the truth among the barbarous and the ignorant; and to extirpate the weeds of vice in the garden of the Lord, for which you apply to us for countenance and direction. We are confident that your enterprize will be crowned with ſucceſs, becauſe you have undertaken it from the nobleſt motives; for whatever is taken in hand from a principle of faith and religion, is always ſure to ſucceed. It is certain, as you yourſelf acknowledge, that Ireland as well as all other iſlands that have the happineſs of being enlightened by the ſun of righteouſneſs, and have embraced the doctrines of chriſtianity, are undoubtedly St. Peter's right, and belong to the juriſdiction of the Roman ſee. We therefore think, after mature deliberation, that to ſettle in that iſland colonies of the faithful, will be well-pleaſing to God.

“ You have informed us, that you intend to make an expedition into Ireland, to ſubject the iſland to juſt laws, and to extirpate vice, which has long prevailed in that country. You promiſe to pay us out of every houſe a yearly acknowledgement of one penny, and to maintain the rights of the church without the leaſt infringement or diminution. Upon theſe conditions we conſent and allow you to make deſcent upon that iſland, to enlarge the bounds of the church; to check the progreſs of immorality; to reform the manners of the inhabitants; and to promote the growth of virtue and the Chriſtian religion. We exhort you to do whatever you ſhall judge neceſſary to advance the honour of God, and the ſalvation of the people, whom we charge you to render ſubmiſſive to your juriſdiction, and that they own you for their ſovereign lord; provided always, that the rights of the church be inviolably obſerved, and Peter-pence duly paid. If, therefore, you think proper to carry your deſign into execution, labour, above all things, to improve the inhabitants in virtue. Uſe both your own endeavours, and the endeavours of ſuch as you ſhall judge worthy of being employed in this work, that the church of God be more and more enriched; that religion flouriſh in the country; and that the things tending to the honour of God, and the ſalvation of ſouls, be diſpoſed of in ſuch a manner as may entitle you to an immortal fame upon earth, and an eternal reward in heaven.”

Henry, on receipt of this bull, ſet up a pretended claim to Ireland; and an opportunity about this time offered for his interference in the affairs of that iſland. Dermot Macmorrogh, a petty king of Leinſter, had baſely ſeiſed Omack, wife of Ororic, king of Meath, during the abſence of her huſband; who, provoked by this outrage, collected forces, and aſſiſted by Roderic, king of Connaught, drove the tyrant from his dominions. The exiled prince had recourſe to Henry, who was in Guienne, imploring his aſſiſtance, and offered, in caſe he reſtored him to his throne, to hold his dominions in vaſſalage under the crown of England. Henry readily accepted the propoſal; but being, embarraſſed by the rebellion of his French ſubjects, he gave Dermot no other aſſiſtance than his letters patent, by which all his ſubjects were permitted to aid the prince in perſon, yet he himſelf declined to embark in the enterprize. Supported by this authority, Dermot went to Briſtol, where he concluded a treaty with Richard, ſurnamed Strongbow, earl of Strigul, who, having impaired his fortune by expenſive pleaſures, was ready for any deſperate undertaking; and promiſed Dermot his ſervices on condition of marrying Eva, Dermot's daughter, and being declared heir to all his territories. A treaty upon theſe terms being concluded between them, while Strongbow was aſſembling forces, Dermot went into Wales, where he engaged for his expedition Robert Fitz-Stephens, and Maurice Fitz-Gerald. Being now aſſured of ſufficient ſuccour, he repaired privately to Ireland, and reſided in the monaſtery of Fernes, where he made preparations for the reception of his Engliſh auxiliaries.

Soon afterwards Fitz-Stephens landed in Ireland with one hundred and thirty knights, ſixty eſquires, and three hundred archers. This ſmall body, being brave men, and completely armed, a ſight almoſt unknown in Ireland, filled the inhabitants with terror; and Fitz-Stephens, being ſoon after joined by Maurice de Prendergaſt, with ten knights and ſixty archers, he was enabled to attempt the ſiege of Wexford, where, after gaining a battle, he took the town. Fitz-Gerald arrived ſoon after with ten knights, thirty eſquires, and one hundred archers, and joining the other adventurers, formed a force which carried all before it. Roderic, the chief king of the iſland, was defeated in an engagement; and the prince of Oſſory, being compelled to ſubmit, gave hoſtages for his peaceable behaviour.

Not contented with the reſtoration of his dominions, Dermot now projected the dethroning of Roderic, and aſpired even to the ſole ſovereignty of Ireland. With this view he diſpatched a meſſenger to Strongbow, claiming the performance of his promiſe, diſplaying, at the ſame time, the great advantages that might now be reaped, by a ſmall a ſmall reinforcement of troops from England. Strongbow ſent over Raymond, one of his retinue, with ten knights and ſeventy archers, who landing near Waterford, are ſaid to have defeated three thouſand Iriſh; and he himſelf, a few days after, brought over above two hundred horſe, and a hundred archers, with whom, joining his fellow-adventurers, they made themſelves maſters of Waterford, and took Dublin by aſſault. Roderic, in revenge, cut off the head of Dermot's ſon, who had been left in his hands as an hoſtage; and Richard Strongbow having married Eva, ſoon after became, by the death of Dermot, king of Leinſter, and prepared for conquering the whole iſland; of which, beſides many ſmall tribes, there were five principal ſovereignties, Munſter, Leinſter, Meath, Ulſter and Connaught. There is the greateſt reaſon to believe, that Ireland was originally peopled from England; and at this period they remained in a ſtate of barbariſm, without even agriculture, without arts, deſtitute of laws, manners, and of learning. Ferocious by nature, and fond of liberty, they oppoſed every attempt to civilize them; and, like ancient Britons, when attacked by a ſuperior force, fled to their foreſts, mountains, and caverns for ſafety. Roderic, and the other Iriſh princes, alarmed at the danger which now threatened the whole iſland, entered into a confederacy, and, uniting their forces, beſieged Dublin with an army of thirty thouſand men; but Strongbow, at the head of ninety knights, with their followers, attacking them in the night, routed this body of forces, and made a prodigious ſlaughter in the purſuit.

Affairs were thus ſituated in Ireland, when Henry landed from the continent. Diſpleaſed at the manner his ſubjects went on, conquering kingdoms for themſelves, and probably touched with a fit of jealouſy for his own dignity in not being a ſharer in their glory, he ſent letters to Strongbow, charging him upon his allegiance to repair to him immediately, and give an account of his conduct in Ireland. The earl, who knew he was not in a condition to diſpute the king's orders, repaired to him at Glouceſter, where he found means to appeaſe his anger by making him the moſt humble ſubmiſſions, and offers of holding ſuch parts of his conqueſts as he ſhould approve, under vaſſalage to his crown.

The king now having determined to invade the iſland in perſon, after taking proper precautions for the peace of Wales, embarked at Milford, and landed about eight miles from Waterford, at the head of five hundred knights, beſides other ſoldiers. The Iriſh, diſpirited by their late defeats, had laid aſide all thoughts of reſiſtance; ſo that in the progreſs Henry made through the iſland, he had little more to do than to appear the protector, and receive the homage of his new ſubjects, whom he treated with remarkable lenity and kindneſs. He kept his Chriſtmas feſtival in Dublin, the metropolis of his new-acquired kingdom, where he convened a national ſynod; committed to moſt of the Iriſh princes the government of their own territories; beſtowed on Strongbow the commiſſion of ſeneſchal of Ireland; and after a ſtay of a few months, having been ſummoned by the pope to appear in Normandy, returned to England in triumph, from whence he paſſed over to the continent.

On the king's arrival at Savigny, the two legates Albert and Theodine, to whom the trial of his conduct, with regard to the murder of Becket, had been committed, opened their commiſſion. At firſt, their demands were ſo exorbitant, that Henry broke off the negociation, and threatened to return to Ireland. The cardinals, ſenſible that the ſeaſon for taking advantage of that tragical incident was now paſt, were obliged to lower their tone, and the king of England had the good fortune to conclude an accommodation with them on eaſy terms. The conceſſions having been ſigned, Henry received abſolution from the legates, and was confirmed in the grant pope Adrian had made him of Ireland.

Having now reached the ſummit of human glory, Henry flattered himſelf with enjoying a ſeries of undiſturbed tranquillity. He was deceived in theſe pleaſing expectations. His children proved a ſource of the moſt ſevere diſquietude. Henry, his eldeſt ſon, was weary of bearing the royal title without authority. He had married Margaret, daughter to Lewis king of France, and the ceremony of his coronation had been repeated, in order that his conſort might be included in the ſolemnity. He had alſo been permitted to pay a viſit to his father-in-law, and continued ſome time at the court of France. Lewis, ever attentive to excite commotions in England, embraced this opportunity of kindling the flames of domeſtic diſcord in the family of Henry. He perſuaded the young prince, that in conſequence of the ceremony of the coronation, he was entitled to an immediate poſſeſſion of a part of the dominions of his father. Imperious by nature, and full of this extravagant idea, young Henry returned to England, and demanded of his father, either his kingdom, or the duchy of Normandy. The king was aſtoniſhed at this unexpected demand, and began to fear that his hopes of happineſs were built on a chimerical foundation. He endeavoured to convince his ſon of the unreaſonableneſs of his deſire; and painted in proper colours the folly of a requeſt, which could only tend to weaken the power of his family, and, ultimately, his own authority. But his endeavours were in vain; the prince diſcovered the higheſt diſcontent blended with inſolence, at his father's refuſal; and, retiring to France, put himſelf under the protection of Lewis, whoſe deſire of leſſening the power of Henry, had given riſe to this domeſtic diſcord.

But the diſobedience of his eldeſt ſon was not the only misfortune that diſturbed the tranquillity of Henry. Queen Eleanor was jealous of her huſband, and, communicating her diſcontent to her two younger ſons Geoffrey and Richard, perſuaded them that they alſo were entitled to the preſent poſſeſſion of the territories aſſigned them: ſhe likewiſe prevailed upon them to fly ſecretly to the court of France, and alſo put on man's clothes, in order to eſcape to the ſame court, when ſhe was ſeized by Henry's order, and confined. Thus Europe beheld with aſtoniſhment the moſt indulgent of parents at war with his own children, three boys, ſcarcely arrived at the age of manhood, requiring a great monarch in the full vigour of life, and in the height of reputation, to quit the throne, and place them on it; and, at the ſame time, ſeveral princes, who were not aſhamed to ſupport them in their abſurd and unnatural pretenſions.

A. D. 1173.

The king of France was not the only monarch who began now to be jealous of Henry's growing power. William, king of Scotland, had long beheld it with terror, and trembled for the conſequences. He followed young Henry to France, under pretence of renewing the league that had long continued between the Scottiſh and French nations; but in reality to concert proper meaſures for diſtreſſing the king of England, Nothing leſs than the amazing abilities of the Engliſh monarch could have extricated him out of the innumerable difficulties with which he was now ſurrounded. The deſertion of many of his powerful barons, particularly in Normandy, gave him reaſon to fear that his own ſubjects would deſert him in the day of battle; he therefore took twenty thouſand Brabanters, all veteran troops, in his pay, and by his liberality attached them firmly to his perſon. He alſo applied to pope Alexander, who, in compliance with this requeſt, promulgated anathemas againſt young Henry and all his adherents: but the papal thunder, whoſe effect was irreſiſtible in eccleſiaſtical cauſes, loſt its power when employed in a diſpute merely temporal: the flaming bolts of the Vatican fell harmleſs to the ground. Indeed, the clergy were very remiſs in ſupporting a ſentence, that was not in the leaſt connected with the intereſt of their order. The king was therefore obliged to have recourſe to arms; and his virtues never ſhone with ſo much luſtre as in this alarming criſis. The ſight of impending dangers animated him with freſh courage. Bleſt with the moſt aſtoniſhing preſence of mind, he viewed with the moſt intrepid coolneſs the approaching ſtorm, and planned the moſt prudent meaſures to break its force.

Lewis, on this occaſion, ſummoned an aſſembly of the chief vaſſals of his crown to meet at Paris, and engaged them by oath to adhere to young Henry's cauſe. In return, that prince ſwore never to deſert his French allies; and having cauſed a new great ſeal to be made, laviſhly diſtributed among them conſiderable parts of thoſe territories which he propoſed to conquer from his father. The counts of Flanders, Bologne, Blois, and Eu, jealous of Henry's power, and allured by the proſpect of advantages they hoped to obtain from the young unnatural prince, declared openly in his favour. William of Scotland entered into the ſame confederacy; and a plan was formed for a general invaſion of the different parts of the extenſive dominions of the king of England.

Richard was the firſt who began hoſtilities, by repairing into Guienne, and exciting the greater part of the inhabitants to take up arms againſt his father. Geoffrey ſtirred up a rebellion in Brittany, and put himſelf at the head of the inſurgents. Normandy was invaded by the king of France, aſſiſted by the earls of Flanders, Bologne, and Blois. The Scottiſh monarch led an army into the northern parts of England; and the earl of Leiceſter landed in Eſſex at the head of a large body of Flemiſh troops, to excite an inſurrection among the Engliſh.

The active genius of Henry now towered above misfortunes. He ſaw his dangers, but was not intimidated. He had taken ſuch precautions in providing for the defence of his frontiers, that Lewis, after loſing the greater part of his army, was obliged to abandon the enterprize. Ten thouſand Brabanters, ſent by Henry into Brittany, defeated the rebels, and obliged them to return to their duty. The army of Leiceſter was routed at St. Edmonſbury in Suffolk, and above ten thouſand Flemings ſlain on the ſpot. Henry advanced at the head of his army againſt the inſurgents in Guienne, retook the places they had ſeized, and obliged them to lay down their arms, and ſubmit to his authority.

A. D. 1174. Having thus defeated the deſigns of his enemies in France, and put his frontiers out of danger from any attempts of his enemies, the king landed at Southampton; and in order to gain the affections of his people, before he proceeded againſt the Scottiſh army, ſubmitted to an act of humiliation, which all the power of the church could not have impoſed on him. He knew that the ridiculous ſtories of Becket's miracles were firmly believed by a weak and bigotted people, and that he himſelf lay under ſtrong ſuſpicions of being acceſſary to his death. He determined, therefore, to remove every ſhadow of complaint, by joining in the reigning devotions of the times. He ſet out for Canterbury in order to make atonement for his offences at Becket's tomb.

As ſoon as he came within ſight of the cathedral, at the diſtance of three miles, he diſmounted, and walked barefoot over a road that was full of rough and ſharp ſtones, which ſo wounded his feet, that, in many places, they were ſtained with his blood. When he got to the tomb, he threw himſelf proſtrate before it, and remained ſome time in fervent prayer: during which the biſhop of London, in his name, declared to the people, that he had neither commanded, nor adviſed, nor by any artifice contrived, the death of Becket; for the truth of which he appealed, in the moſt ſolemn manner, to the teſtimony of God. Not content with this, he ſubmitted to a penance ſtill more ſingular and humbling. He aſſembled a chapter of the monks, diſrobed himſelf before them, ordered a ſcourge of diſcipline to be put into the hands of each, and preſented his bare ſhoulders to the laſhes, which ſeveral biſhops and abbots inflicted on him. This ſharp penance being over, he returned to his prayers before the tomb, which he continued all that day and the next night; not even ſuffering a carpet to be ſpread under him, but kneeling on the hard pavement. Early in the morning he made a ſolemn proceſſion round the altars of the church, and paid his devotions to the ſaints interred there; then returning to the ſhrine of the canonized prelate, he made an offering of forty pounds per annum, to ſupport a number of lamps, to be kept continually burning before his tomb. True devotion is more becoming, while it is unſullied by oſtentations.

Scarcely had Henry recovered from a fever, occaſioned by his ſevere penance, when his ſleep was diſturbed in the middle of the night by a meſſenger, who inſiſted upon being admitted to his preſence at that unſeaſonable hour. Being introduced by a gentleman of the bed-chamber, he told the king he was ſent with good tidings from Ranulph de Glanville: Henry enquired kindly after his health. He is well, anſwered the meſſenger, and holds your enemy, the king of Scotland, a captive at Richmond caſtle in Yorkſhire. Henry, aſtoniſhed, ordered him to repeat what he had ſaid. After doing ſo, he produced a letter, which contained the particulars of this great event. The king had no ſooner read it, than leaping out of his bed, and ſhedding tears of gratitude, he with eyes and hands raiſed to heaven, gave God thanks. He then ſent for his friends, to partake with him of the pleaſure he felt at this unexpected news; the particulars of which were as follow:

William, king of Scotland, blocking up the caſtle at Alnwick with his regular forces, ſent all his irregulars to ravage the country. A troop of theſe, under the command of Duncan, earl of Fife, entered Warkworth, which they burned to the ground, and maſſacred all the inhabitants, men, women, and children. This act of cruelty raiſed the ſtrongeſt reſentments in the people of all the northern counties. The Yorkſhire barons aſſembled under Ranulph de Glanville, ſheriff, forming a body of horſe, in which were about four hundred knights, and after a long forced march, they entered Newcaſtle on the fourth of July. They there learned in what manner the forces of the enemy were ſcattered; which giving them a reaſonable hope of finding the king weakly guarded, they reſolved to ſet out the next morning, in order to ſurprize that part of the army which lay before Alnwick caſtle. As they proceeded on their march, ſo thick a fog aroſe that they could with difficulty find their way; upon which ſome adviſed returning back to Newcaſtle; but Bernard de Baliol, one of the principal barons, declaring, that rather than ſtain his character with the infamy of ſuch a retreat, he would go forwards alone, they all reſolved to proceed. While advancing, the miſt which had covered and concealed their march, ſuddenly diſperſing, they had a near view of Alnwick caſtle, and ſoon diſcerned the Scotch king, amidſt a troop of between ſixty and ſeventy horſemen, diverting himſelf with the exerciſes of chivalry in an open plain. He at firſt took them for the detachment commanded by Duncan, returning from Warkworth; but on their nearer approach, diſcovering by their banners that they were Engliſh, he was amazed, yet not daunted; for ſuppoſing ſome bands of his forces which were on every ſide ſcouring the country, would come to his aid, or perhaps from the mere impulſe of a raſh unthinking courage, he fiercely ſhook his ſpear, ſaying to his men, that "now it would be ſeen who was a good knight;" having thus ſpoke, he led his men immediately to the attack, charging foremoſt himſelf; but his horſe being killed under him in the firſt ſhock, he was taken priſoner, and with him moſt of his knights. Some nobles who were not engaged in the action, hearing what had happened, threw themſelves into the hands of the Engliſh, that they might be partakers in the ill fortune of their ſovereign. The victorious party, without encountering any other detachment of the enemy. returned that evening to Newcaſtle, and the next day they conducted their royal priſoner to the caſtle of Richmond. All his army, on the firſt account they received of this misfortune, retired precipitately into Scotland. Such remarkable ſucceſs was attributed to the protection of St. Thomas, and this opinion, ſpreading through the whole kingdom, tended greatly to depreſs the ſpirits of the Engliſh rebels; but many barons being ſtill in arms, Henry marched without delay to chaſtiſe them. He firſt inveſted the caſtle of Framlingham, belonging to Hugh Bigod, who was too well acquainted with the martial diſpoſition of Henry to attempt defending his fortreſs. The biſhop of Durham, who had effected an entire independence, delivered up the caſtles of Norham and Alverton. The officers of the earl of Leiceſter followed the biſhop's example and gave up the caſtles of Montſorrel, Groby, and Leiceſter. Mowbray delivered up the caſtle of Thirſk, and the earl of Ferrers, Stotville, and Duſelde.

Such was the iſſue of this unnatural rebellion in England; and this prodigious career of ſucceſs rendered it impracticable to purſue the intended invaſion from Graveline, where the younger Henry was ready to embark with a powerful army. Lewis, therefore, in conjunction with the earl of Flanders, laid ſiege to Rouen. The combined army puſhed the ſiege with great vigour, and the French king flattered himſelf with being able to make himſelf maſter of the place before the arrival of Henry. He was however miſtaken. The garriſon made a noble defence, and Henry landed before Lewis could ſubdue even the outworks. The preſence of the Engliſh monarch ſtruck the enemy with terror; and the combined forces retired from the ſiege with the utmoſt precipitation, leaving behind them all their baggage.

A concluſion of the war was now deſired by all the confederates. Every enterprize they had formed with confident hopes of ſucceſs, from their great ſuperiority of ſtrength, having been ſtrangely defeated by ſuch a ſeries of incidents in Henry's favour, that the immediate hand of God ſeemed to appear in ſupporting and maintaining his cauſe. The only doubt was, whether the king of England would conſent to a peace, when revenge and glory ſeemed equally to demand a continuance of the war againſt enemies diſappointed in all their undertakings. But no advantage he could gain over them appeared of ſuch importance to the happineſs of his life, or the welfare of his people, as recovering his children out of their hands, and reclaiming them from thoſe errors into which their inexperienced youth had drawn them. Lewis having demanded a conference, Henry appeared at it, with the moſt moderate and pacific diſpoſition. A truce was agreed to, and Henry was ſuffered to make war on his ſon Richard, who having gained the poſſeſſion of ſome caſtles in Poictou, ſingly refuſed to accept the propoſed conditions. None of the other confederates would now aſſiſt him, ſo that helpleſs, and flying with a few of his barons, from one retreat to another, as Henry purſued him, he was at laſt conſtrained, notwithſtanding the ſtubborn pride of his heart, to ſubmit without reſerve to the king's mercy; who took the rebel to his boſom with the kindeſt marks of parental affection. They went together to another conference, appointed by the king of France, at which were likewiſe preſent the two other brothers, Henry and Geoffrey Plantagenet, with all the greater vaſſals of the French crown, except the earl of Flanders. Henry now granted his ſons leſs advantageous terms than he had before offered. The principal were conſiderable penſions, and ſome caſtles which he granted them for their reſidence, with an indemnity of all their adherents, who were reſtored to their honours and eſtates.

The king of Scotland was the only conſiderable loſer, of all thoſe who had embraced the cauſe of the young princes. Henry reſtored to liberty, without any ranſom, about nine hundred knights, whom he had taken priſoners; but William paid for his freedom the ancient independency of his crown. He agreed to do homage to Henry for Scotland, and all his other poſſeſſions; that his barons and nobility ſhould do the ſame; that the biſhops ſhould take an oath of fealty; that both ſhould ſwear to adhere to the king of England, if William ſhould break his engagements; and that the fortreſſes of Edinburgh, Roxborough, Sterling, Jedborough, and Berwick, ſhould be delivered into Henry's hands, till the performance of the articles. Accordingly William, after his being releaſed, brought up all his barons, prelates, and abbots, who did homage to Henry in York cathedral. He alſo engaged the king and ſtates of Scotland, to make a perpetual ceſſion of the fortreſſes of Roxborough and Berwick. Few princes were ever ſo happy to gain ſuch conſiderable advantages of their weaker neighbours with ſuch juſtice, as Henry gained from the king of Scotland, who had wantonly waged againſt him an unjuſt war, in which all the neighbouring princes, and even his own unnatural ſons, were, without provocation, combined againſt him.

Before the king left Normandy, his eldeſt ſon ſtaid at Rouen, while he went into Anjou, in which time ſeveral meſſengers were ſent from Lewis, to perſuade the young prince not to venture to go into England with his royal parent, who, it was inſinuated, as ſoon as he ſhould have him in his power there, would confine him in priſon; which artful repreſentations ſo terrified the young prince, that when his father ordered him to come to Caen, from whence they were to take ſhipping, he refuſed to obey.

Henry having been informed of the reaſons which produced this reluctance, aſſured him by ſeveral gracious meſſages that he had nothing to fear. Thus encouraged, he threw himſelf at his father's feet, in the preſence of many nobles, and with a great effuſion of tears, implored his forgiveneſs of all he had done to offend him; and moſt earneſtly begged that, as his father and lord, he would receive from him homage, and an oath of allegiance; adding, that till he permitted him, as he had done his two brothers, to give him theſe pledges of future loyalty, he ſhould never believe his indignation againſt him entirely removed.

Touched with this mark of filial contrition, Henry conſented; upon which the prince not only took the oath of allegiance, but voluntarily ſwore that he would be guided in the whole ordering of his houſhold, and all his other affairs, by his father's advice; and as long as he lived, would do no harm to thoſe vaſſals who had ſerved his father in this war, on account of that ſervice; but would honour and promote them as men who had been faithful both to their king and to him. Theſe matters being adjuſted between the father and ſon, they went to Barfleur, and embarking there landed at Portſmouth, to the inexpreſſible joy of all Henry's faithful ſubjects.

Thus ended this rebellion, the firſt and laſt ever raiſed in England, without ſome diſpute on the title of the king to the crown, ſome difference on the ſcore of religion, or the pretence of ſome grievances injurious to the public. Yet, ill-founded as it was, it ſhook the throne; but divine providence ſo aſſiſted the juſt cauſe of the king, that his combined enemies fell before him, and their malice ſerved only to make his virtues more conſpicuous, and his power more extenſive.

A. D. 1176. The benign influence of peace being now extended over every part of Henry's dominions, he applied himſelf to the adminiſtration of juſtice, and to render permanent the affection of his Engliſh ſubjects. With theſe views he ſummoned a general council of the barons and prelates at Northampton. In this aſſembly the laws of Edward the Confeſſor were revived, to the entire ſatisfaction of the people. And in order to carry thoſe laws into execution, he cauſed the kingdom to be divided into ſix parts, and aſſigned to each three itinerant juſtices. Thoſe diviſions differ very little from the circuits of the judges in theſe days. He reſtored the barons, who had joined his rebellious ſons, to their eſtates. But having learned from experience the danger of ſuffering ſo many caſtles to exiſt in the very heart of his kingdom, he ſeized many of them, and demoliſhed others. He cauſed ſevere penalties to be inflicted for the crimes of murder, robbery, and coining. He demoliſhed in a great meaſure the ſuperſtitious trial by ordeal, by ordaining, that any perſon accuſed of murder or heinous felony, ſhould, though acquitted by the ordeal, be obliged to abjure the realm.

Henry was alſo deſirous of aboliſhing that abſurd cuſtom of appealing to ſingle combat; but this had taken too firm a root among the nobility and gentry; he therefore contented himſelf with admitting either of the parties to challenge a trial by jury of twelve freeholders: this method of trial was very ancient in England, having been eſtabliſhed by the laws of Alfred the Great; but the barbarous taſte of the age had of late given more credit to the trial by ſingle combat, which had for ſome time been the method of deciding all important controverſies of a perſonal nature. By theſe and other wiſe regulations, Henry became the delight of his people. All Europe, from hating and dreading, now began to admire and revere him. His abilities were ſuperior to any, his power was guarded beyond inſult, and his clemency now made more conqueſts in peace, than his arms had ever done in war. A ſettled tranquillity in his kingdom afforded him that ſatisfaction he had ſought in vain from power and grandeur. England knew what it was to be governed by Engliſh councils; her laws were acquiring a new degree of duration: and the people were contented, protected, and happy.

A. D. 1179. At this time Lewis, king of France, worn out with years, was deſirous of reſigning his crown to Philip his ſon, but that young prince falling ill, on the day appointed for his coronation, his father, contrary to the advice of his council, reſolved to make a pilgrimage to Becket's ſhrine, in order to obtain the interceſſion of that ſaint for his recovery. Henry met the French monarch at Dover, and conducted him to Canterbury, where they both paid their devotions at the altar of St. Thomas; and Lewis offered at his tomb a maſſy cup of pure gold, and beſtowed beſides upon the monks a grant of two hundred gallons of wine annually. The monks, ſenſible that the honour of their ſaint was concerned, did not fail to publiſh, that the prayers of Lewis were anſwered, and that the young prince was by the prevalent interceſſion of Becket, reſtored to health. Lewis died ſoon after his return, and was ſucceeded by Philip, an ambitious, politic prince, who took every occaſion to depreſs the power of the Engliſh monarch.

A. D. 1180. The abilities of Henry, though very great, were found inadequate to the arduous taſk of reforming his rebellious ſons. Young Henry again renewed his pretenſions to Normandy, again unſheathed the ſword againſt his father, and was protected by Philip, who favoured his unnatural deſigns. But while the young ingrate was buſily employed at Martel, a caſtle near Turenne, in digeſting the plan of his intended conſpiracy, he was ſeized with a violent fever. Alarmed at the approach of death, who, at the inſtant he gives the fatal ſtroke, takes off the veil of ſelf-deception, young Henry began a ſerious review of his paſt conduct, which now, ſtripped of all falſe diſguiſes, appeared to him what it really was, a monſter of deformity. Terrified at the ſight, and penetrated deeply with contrition for his filial ingratitude, he diſpatched a meſſage to the king, expreſſive of his ſincere repentance; earneſtly ſoliciting the honour of a viſit, that he might not die without the conſolation of having obtained his father's forgiveneſs. After ſuch repeated inſtances the king had experienced of his ſon's treachery, it was natural for him to ſuſpect, that he only feigned indiſpoſition, for the purpoſe of accompliſhing a deſign againſt his crown or life; he therefore paid no regard to his requeſt. But receiving ſoon after an account of his ſon's death, the tenderneſs of the father ſubdued all his philoſophy and fortitude. He fainted thrice, and when nature found utterance, burſt forth in exceſſive lamentations of grief and ſorrow. He upbraided himſelf ſeverely for having refuſed the requeſt of a dying, repentant, though undutiful ſon; and regretted that groundleſs ſuſpicion, which had deprived the youth of the laſt opportunity of making atonement for the errors of his life. Prince Henry died on the eleventh of June, in the twenty-eighth year of his age.

A. D. 1187. Some hopes were now entertained that the two ſons of Henry, Richard and Geoffrey, had laid aſide their rebellious intentions; but the former, diſguſted at a deſign formed by his father of ſettling Guienne as an appendage upon John, his youngeſt brother, departed the kingdom, and prepared to ſeize by force what he was only intitled to by birth; while Geoffrey repaired to the court of France, to ſolicit aſſiſtance againſt his father, becauſe he had refuſed compliance with an inſolent demand, that Anjou ſhould be annexed to his duchy of Brittany. But the king was ſoon after relieved from all future intrigues of this unprincipled ſon, having received intelligence that Geoffrey had been killed in a tournament at Paris.

Notwithſtanding the vicious diſpoſition of this prince, which he had manifeſted in numberleſs inſtances, the news of his untimely end proved the ſource of deep affliction to Henry; but his death was regretted by few of his ſubjects; for Geoffrey was a prince in whom pride, diſſimulation and perfidy, were equally blended. Neither principles of honour, nor thoſe of religion, had the leaſt influence over, or could reſtrain his headſtrong refractory temper. He was acquainted with every vice, held in univerſal deteſtation, and therefore diſtinguiſhed by the opprobrious epithet of the child of perdition.

Not long after the death of this prince, the melancholy news arrived, that the holy city of Jeruſalem was taken by Saladin, ſultan of Egypt, and that Guy de Luſignan was in the hands of the infidels. This diſmal intelligence aſtoniſhed all the Chriſtians of the weſtern parts. Pope Urban III. is ſaid to have died of grief; and his ſucceſſor, Gregory VIII. employed his whole time in calling to arms all thoſe who acknowledged his authority. Philip and Henry for a time ſuſpended their quarrels, and vied with each other in their readineſs to ſuccour Paleſtine. They both took the croſs; and both ordered, that ſuch of their ſubjects as did not chuſe to engage in the cruſade, ſhould pay the tenth part of their revenues and moveables to defray the expence of the armament. Moſt of the regular clergy were exempted from this impoſt, called Saladin's tax; and the ſecular required the ſame privilege, notwithſtanding they were the chief inſtigators of theſe romantic enterpriſes.

A. D. 1188. In a ſhort time after theſe tranſactions, the greater part of the inhabitants of Poictou roſe up in arms againſt Richard, upon a very frivolous occaſion. The chief of the confederacy was Geoffrey of Luſignan; who made ſo vigorous a reſiſtance, that Richard, ſummoning all his ſtrength, entered his country with fire and ſword, and that of the earl of Tholouſe, who had alſo joined the inſurgents. The earls immediately applied to the king of France for protection. Philip, who had ſo lately entered into a ſacred engagement with Henry, ſent an ambaſſador to England, to know whether Richard had acted by his authority. He was told, that Richard had informed the archbiſhop of Dublin, that thoſe hoſtilities were commenced by the approbation and authority of Philip himſelf. The king of France, inſtead of being covered with ſhame and confuſion at this detection, entered the county of Berry, taking a great number of its principal places, with ſome caſtles which belonged to Henry.

Henry, alarmed at ſuch proceedings, immediately paſſed into Normandy, where he put himſelf at the head of a powerful army, and a ſharp conteſt was for ſome time maintained between theſe two monarchs. It was now the common cauſe of Henry and his ſon Richard to check the progreſs of the French arms. The former therefore advanced againſt Mante, where Philip had then taken up his quarters; while the latter fell into that part of Berry which belonged to the crown of France, laying waſte, and plundering the whole country through which he paſſed. As this war deſtroyed the hopes of ſucceſs in the propoſed cruſade, it gave great ſcandal; which obliged Philip to hold a conference with Henry at the uſual place, between Trie and Guiſons, in order to accommodate their differences; but the two kings, neither of whom perhaps were under the guidance of ſincerity, ſeparated with greater animoſity than they had met; and Philip, in a rage, ordered the beautiful elm, under which their conferences were held, to be cut down, ſwearing, that no more interviews ſhould honour that ſpot for the future.

The confederate earls were now convinced, that the two kings purſued only their own intereſt, and therefore refuſed to ſerve either of them any longer in ſo bad a cauſe. Upon which the crafty French monarch again attempted a reconciliation with Henry; but in the mean time ſecretly brought over young Richard to his ſide. He artfully repreſented to this headſtrong prince the wrong done him by his father, in detaining from him his bride, together with her fortune, and ſuggeſted, that Henry's not putting him in the rank as heir-apparent to the crown of England, and the duchy of Normandy, was owing to a ſecret deſign he had formed of ſettling the ſucceſſion upon John, his younger brother. Richard behaved on this occaſion with a caution uncommon to his impetuous ſpirit: he declined entering into any engagement with Philip; but as the cauſe of the differences between his father and the French king regarded his conduct, he expreſſed his readineſs to juſtify himſelf before the court of France. For this purpoſe another conference was held, at which Philip, who well knew the inflexibility of Henry, offered to reſtore all things to the ſtate they were in previous to the rupture, provided the princeſs Alice was immediately given in marriage to Richard, who ſhould be declared heir-apparent of Henry's dominions, and receive in due form the homage of his ſubjects. Henry had experienced already ſuch fatal effects from the crowning of his eldeſt ſon, that he rejected theſe conditions; upon which Richard, furious with paſſion, did homage to the king of France, for the dominions his father held of that crown without his knowledge or conſent, and was inveſted with them as if he had already been the lawful proprietor.

A. D. 1189. Cardinal Albano, the pope's legate, diſpleaſed at theſe increaſing difficulties in the way of the cruſade, excommunicated Richard as the chief ſource of diſcord; but this ſentence produced no effects; for the chief barons of Normandy, Anjou, Poictou, and Guienne, being attached to the young prince, declared for him, and ravaged ſuch of the territories, as ſtill adhered to the king. Anagni, ſucceſſor of Albano in the legateſhip, now threatened the French king with laying an interdict on all his dominions; but Philip reproached him for his partiality in taking bribes from the king of England. He valued not his excommunications; telling him, at the ſame time, that the pope had no right to interpoſe in the temporal diſputes of princes; while Richard, ſtill more outrageous, attempted to draw his ſword on the legate, but the company preſent prevented him from committing ſuch a raſh action.

As Henry perceived himſelf obliged to enter upon a war with France, and his eldeſt ſon, now Philip's ally, hoſtilities were renewed with more fury than ever. Philip took Ferte-bernard, Montford, Beaumont, and ſeveral other places. Nantz was taken by aſſault; and Henry, who had thrown himſelf into it, eſcaped with ſome difficulty, who on this occaſion ſeems to have loſt all his ſpirit, with his uſual good fortune. Amboiſe, Chaumont, and Chateau de Loire, on the appearance of Philip and Richard, opened their gates; Tours was inveſted; and the king, who retired to Saumuz, had reaſon to dread the moſt fatal conſequences from this war. He had not, for ſome time, known where to apply for mercenaries, having offended the Brabanters. A late defeat had coſt him the flower of his army. He ſent therefore over to Ralph de Glanville, to raiſe all the militia of England. But Henry's late tax for the cruſade had greatly alienated the affections of his ſubjects. They had ſeen their money extorted from them for ridiculous purpoſes, and now ſaw it laviſhly expended in meaſures unintereſting to them as a people. Thus we ſee the merits of a whole reign of beneficent actions may be cancelled by one oppreſſive ſtep in government.

The warlike genius of Henry was now checked by that of Richard and Philip. It is probable his perſon might have fallen into their hands, had not the neutral princes thought it high time to interpoſe their good offices. The duke of Burgundy, the count of Flanders, and the archbiſhop of Rheims, applied to Henry, and after making him ſenſible of the deſperate ſituation of his affairs, prevailed on him to conſent to an accommodation. The place appointed for holding a conference, lay between Tours and Araſie. Several pretenſions and claims were here ſettled. Henry had undertaken the cruſade. The diſappointment in his not fulfilling filling this engagement had irritated the court of Rome, and was, probably, one of the principal cauſes of his calamity. But he was now too old, and too diſpirited, to undertake that expedition in perſon. It was therefore concluded that Richard ſhould perform in perſon the vows of his father. By the other articles of this treaty, it was agreed that Richard ſhould marry the princeſs Alice, and receive the homage and fealty of all his ſubjects, both in England and on the continent; that Henry ſhould pay twenty thouſand marks to the king of France to defray the charges of the war; that his own barons ſhould engage to make him obſerve this treaty by force; and in caſe of his violating it, ſhould promiſe to join Philip and Richard againſt him; and that all who had entered into confederacy with Richard, ſhould be indemnified.

In moſt treaties Henry had been accuſtomed to give law, but had now the mortification of ſubmitting to the moſt humiliating terms; the agitations of his mind were beyond deſcription. But how were they increaſed, when he, demanding a liſt of the barons to whom pardon was to be extended for their connexions with Richard, found at the head of them the name of his ſon John, who had always been his favourite, whoſe intereſt he had ever anxiouſly at heart, and who had, by his aſcendency over him, often excited the jealouſy of Richard. The unhappy father, already oppreſſed with a heavy load of ſorrows, broke out into expreſſions of the utmoſt deſpair; curſed the day on which he received his miſerable exiſtence; and beſtowed upon his children, in bitterneſs of anguiſh, a malediction, which he could not be prevailed upon to retract. The more his heart was ſuſceptive of friendſhip and tender affection, the more he reſented the barbarous return which his four ſons had made to his paternal care; and this finiſhing blow, by depriving him of every comfort of life, quite broke his ſpirit, and threw him into a fever of a dangerous nature; and on the day after the laſt conference he was carried in a litter to the caſtle of Chinon, and there took to his bed.

His natural ſon Geoffrey had obtained his leave to be abſent when the treaty was ſigned, that he might not be witneſs to his father's humiliation; but, being informed of his illneſs, he haſtened to Chinon, and finding him ſo exceeding weak that he could not ſit up in his bed, he gently raiſed his dropping head, and ſupported it upon his own boſom. Henry fetched a deep ſigh; and turning his languid eyes upon him, ſaid, "My deareſt ſon, as you have, in all dangers, behaved yourſelf moſt dutifully and affectionately to me, doing all that the beſt of ſons could do; ſo will I, if God permit me to recover from this ſickneſs, make ſuch returns to you as the beſt of fathers can make, and place you among the greateſt and moſt powerful ſubjects in all my dominions. But ſhould death prevent my fulfilling this intention, may God, to whom the recompence of all goodneſs belongs, reward you for me." "I have no wiſh," replied the ſon, "but that you may recover and be happy." After theſe words, Geoffrey roſe up; and, unable to reſtrain his guſhing tears, left the room. But, hearing that no hopes of life remained, he returned to perform the laſt duties to his father, who awakened from a kind of trance by his lamentations, opened his eyes, which had been for ſome time cloſed, and knowing him, endeavoured with a faint voice to expreſs his deſire, that he ſhould obtain the biſhopric of Wincheſter, or the archbiſhopric of York. Then taking a ring of great value from his finger, gave it to him with his laſt bleſſing, and ordered that another, which was kept in his treaſury as a precious jewel, ſhould alſo be delivered to him. After which he ſunk down, and expired in a ſhort time after.

Thus died Henry II. on the ſixth of July, in the fifty-eighth year of his age, and the thirty-fifth of his reign.

Almoſt as ſoon as the king had reſigned his breath, the body was treated with even more indecency than that of his great grandfather William the Conqueror; for his ſervants, after rifling his wardrobe, ſtripped the royal corpſe naked; in which uncomely manner it continued, till one of the pages, leſs brutal than the reſt, threw over it a ſhort mantle. The next day Richard came to ſee the dead body of his father, and on viewing it was ſtruck with horror and remorſe; when the attendants, obſerving that at that very inſtant blood iſſued from the mouth and noſtrils of the corpſe, he exclaimed, according to a vulgar ſuperſtition, that he had been his father's murderer; and expreſſed, though too late, that his undutiful conduct had brought his indulgent parent to an untimely end.

By his queen Eleanor Henry had five ſons, two of whom only, namely, Richard I. and John, his youngeſt, ſurvived him: but Geoffrey, his fourth ſon, left Arthur, who was duke of Brittany. He had three daughters; Maud, married to the duke of Saxony; Eleanor, wife of the king of Caſtile; and Joan, conſort to William II. ſurnamed the Good, king of Sicily. Henry alſo had ſeveral natural children. By the fair Roſamond, daughter of lord Clifford, he had Geoffrey, and William Longueeſpee, or Long-ſword. This lady was his firſt miſtreſs, and the moſt celebrated beauty in England. Being then married, he might probably be afraid of his queen's jealouſy, and ſolicitous to hide his intrigue from her knowledge; which he might think ſtill more neceſſary when ſhe was with him in England; and this may have given riſe to the romantic tradition mentioned by Brompton, of his having made a kind of labyrinth in his palace of Woodſtock, to conceal his miſtreſs from the ſight and vengeance of his queen; but the tale of her having been poiſoned in that place by Eleanor, has not the leaſt foundation in authentic hiſtory. Before her death, ſhe retired to the nunnery of Godſtow, near Oxford, and there died. Henry beſtowed large revenues on the convent; in return for which he required, that lamps ſhould be kept perpetually burning about the remains of fair Roſamond, which were placed near the high altar, in a tomb covered with ſilk; but under the reign of his ſucceſſor, Hugh, biſhop of Lincoln, commanded them to be taken from thence, as being unworthy of ſo holy a place; upon which they were removed to the chapter-houſe of the nunnery, and there interred. There is a ſtory related of one Morgan, a Welſhman, provoſt of Beverly, who pretended to be a natural ſon of Henry, by the lady of a knight, named Ralph Bloet; but this pretence ſeems to have been founded on nothing but the man's own vanity and madneſs. Henry is likewiſe ſaid to have carried on an intrigue with Alice, ſiſter to the French king, and even to have had a child by her; but this ſtory is ſtill worſe founded than the former. It is certain, however, that Richard, to whom Alice was betrothed, made uſe of this pretence for refuſing to marry that princeſs.

Particulars reſpecting the character of Henry II.

In his perſon, Henry was of a middle ſtature, yet robuſt and well-proportioned. His features, which were good, formed a dignity of aſpect; and when his mind was ſerene, his eyes had a remarkable ſweetneſs; but when angry, they ſparkled with indignant fire. His paſſionate temper was one among his imperfections. Upon any ſudden provocation, he could not command the firſt emotions of his rage; though, at other times, he poſſeſſed an extraordinary degree of judgment and prudence. Yet this infirmity never betrayed him into furious or cruel actions, but only broke out into words; nor did his anger laſt long; and when he was cool, he became gentle and humane. As his countenance was lively, ſo his converſation was engaging. He preſerved almoſt an uninterrupted ſtate of health, preventing corpulency, to which he was inclined, by an abſtemious diet, and frequent exerciſe, particularly hunting. He was tenderly compaſſionate to all perſons in diſtreſs; and his good œconomy ſeemed chiefly employed in providing an ample fund for his charity and bounty. Beſides what he laid out in occaſional acts of munificence, ſome of which were extraordinary great, he aſſigned the tenth part of the proviſions of his houſhold to be conſtantly given in daily alms to the poor. His treaſures were open to all men of merit; but he was particularly liberal in his preſents to ſtrangers, who came to viſit his court, as many did, drawn by his fame, which was every where high and illuſtrious. When the affairs of his kingdom permitted him to enjoy leiſure, he had always recourſe to books, or the converſation of learned and ingenious men. His palace was a kind of academy, and his table a ſchool, where the moſt abſtruſe points of government were diſcuſſed. Nor was his reading of that uſeleſs kind which forms the pedant, or a mere learned man; to letters he joined erudition; to erudition, knowledge.

His affections, as well as his enmities, were warm and durable; and his long experience of the ingratitude of men, never deſtroyed the ſociability of his temper. He was ſo conſtant in friendſhips, and choſe his miniſters with ſuch diſcretion, that not one of thoſe he principally truſted, was ever diſgraced, except Becket, who rather quitted than loſt the place he had gained in his heart. Thoſe who are moſt ſteady in their attachments, are generally moſt apt to retain their averſions; and thoſe whom this prince once hated, he could ſeldom be perſuaded to admit again to a ſhare in his favour. Yet, with a generous clemency, he pardoned rebellions and other offences committed againſt himſelf. Some gentlemen of his court being accuſed in his preſence, of having, at the inſtigation of the biſhop of Worceſter, talked of him diſreſpectfully and to his diſhonour, they did not deny the words laid to their charge; but, in excuſe alledged, they were ſpoken when diſordered with liquor. On this apology he diſmiſſed them all without any puniſhment, and retained no unkind ſentiments or reſentment towards them or the biſhop. An admirable proof of true magnanimity, and ſuch which is found in few princes; who are often more angry at any liberty taken with their perſons, than at an act of high treaſon againſt their crown.

With his intimate friends he lived in the moſt eaſy familiarity; but though he ſported with his nobility, it doth not appear that he ever contaminated himſelf with the low ſociety of buffoons, or any of thoſe who find acceſs to the leiſure hours of princes, by miniſtering to their vices or ſoothing their follies. His favourite diverſion was hunting, in which he followed the cuſtom of his anceſtors. When not reading, or in council, he had always in his hand a ſword, a hunting ſpear, or a bow and arrows.

He roſe by break of day; purſued the chace till evening with unabated ardour; and when he came home, though all his ſervants were tired with following him, he would not ſit down, but was upon his feet continually, except at his meals, which he uſually made very ſhort. Even while he was conſulting on buſineſs with his miniſters, he ſtood or walked. From a habit of exerciſe he was ſo indefatigable, that if occaſion required, he would perform in one day a journey of three or four to an ordinary traveller; by which expedition he frequently appeared unexpectedly before his enemies, diſconcerted the meaſures that were taken againſt him, and cruſhed the firſt motions to rebellion or ſedition, even in the moſt diſtant parts of all the ſeveral ſtates that were under his government.

The frequent journies he made throughout England, were very beneficial to his people: the execution of the laws, the good order of the cities, the improvement of agriculture, manufactures and trade, being thus under his immediate inſpection. He was the ſoul of his kingdom, pervading every part of it, and animating the whole with his active preſence. Nor were his cares for the public interrupted by luxury, or the powers of his mind relaxed or diſordered by exceſs. He was conſtantly ſober, and often abſtemious both in eating and drinking; and in his dreſs he affected the utmoſt ſimplicity, deſpiſing all ſuperfluous ornaments, that might hinder his exerciſe, or evidence an effeminate regard to his perſon.

A love of women was his predominant pleaſure, he was too ſenſible of their attractions, and too deſirous of pleaſing them to the end of his life. There are ſeveral inſtances upon record of Henry's incontinence, but not of that luſtful kind which influenced the eighth king of his name; for in his love for Roſamond, or any other lady, there was no other weakneſs or criminality, than what was inſeparable from the paſſion itſelf, irregularly indulged. Nor was he laviſh in beſtowing either honours or riches on their relations, or dependants. No worthleſs man ever roſe to power by their favour; nor worthy man ever incurred diſgrace at court by their malice. Henry was indeed too often a lover; but he was always a king.

A happy circumſtanse reſpecting Henry's government was, that his dominions in Britain, and thoſe on the continent, were nearly equal in value. The fortunate ſeizure of William, king of Scotland, with the acts of ſubmiſſion and homage he entered into, ſecured Henry from all domeſtic troubles; but it was not ſo with regard to his dominions on the continent. There he had powerful rivals, who improved the diſcontents of his ſons and ſubjects, and at laſt proved too ſtrong for him to ſubdue. This occaſioned a great difference in his policy reſpecting both people. In proportion as his French ſubjects were mutinous and rebellious, the Engliſh were relieved and encouraged. Henry ſoon reaped the happy fruits of his conduct, and what at firſt ſprung from neceſſity, flowed at laſt from choice. He well knew that in ſeveral preceding reigns, thoſe periods were alone proſperous and eaſy to the government, in which the rights of the people were conſulted. His own experience confirmed this obſervation; nor could he have been able to maintain his ground againſt the intrigues of his queen, the rebellion of his ſons, and the perfidious ſtratagems of the crafty Philip, had it not been for the ſupport of England, reconciled to his government, by his acts in favour of public liberty; ſo that it was owing to Henry's good ſenſe, and the circumſtances of the times, that Engliſh freedom once more reared its head during this reign. Upon the whole, Henry II. was poſſeſſed of every accompliſhment, both of body and mind, that could fit him for the high ſtation in which he was placed, and may juſtly be ranked among the moſt illuſtrious monarchs that ever ſat upon the Engliſh throne. His reign was particularly diſtinguiſhed by the conqueſt of Ireland, already deſcribed; and by his marriage with Eleanor, the divorced queen of France, who was the heireſs of Guienne and Poictou, he became almoſt as powerful in France as the French king himſelf, and the greateſt prince in Chriſtendom. The ſum left in ready money at his death has perhaps been exaggerated, but the moſt moderate accounts make it amount to 200,000l. of our money.

CHAPTER II.

RICHARD I.

An inhuman maſſacre of the Jews at his coronation—His preparations and expedients, by which he raiſed money for the Cruſade—Sets out for the Holy Land with Philip king of France—His principal tranſactions and exploits in the courſe of that expedition—On his return to England, falls into the hands of Leopold, by whom he is kept for ſome time a cloſe priſoner, and then delivered to the emperor, Henry VI. who not only threw him into a dungeon, but loaded him with irons—Recovers his liberty, upon paying a ranſom of one hundred thouſand marks, about two hundred thouſand pounds of our preſent money—Diſorders in England during his abſence—Upon his arrival there, is crowned a ſecond time at Wincheſter—A war with France—His death and character.

A. D. 1189. ON account of his heroic fortitude, Richard obtained the ſurname of Cœur de Lion, or Lion's Heart. At the time of his father's deceaſe, he was in France; where having concluded a peace with Philip, he repaired to Rouen, and was inveſted with the ducal crown of Normandy; after which he paſſed over to England, and was crowned, without oppoſition, on the third of December, at Weſtminſter. His contrition for his undutiful behaviour to his father was ſo ſincere, as to influence him after his ſucceſſion, in the choice of his miniſters and ſervants. Thoſe who had aſſiſted him in his unnatural rebellion, inſtead of being raiſed to the poſts of honour they expected, had the mortification to find they were hated and deſpiſed; while his father's faithful miniſters, who had expoſed all the baſe exploits of his ſons, were received with open arms, and continued in the offices they had with honour diſcharged for their former maſter.

One of Richard's firſt acts of regal power, was releaſing Eleanor, queen dowager, from her confinement, and intruſting her with the government of England during his abſence. He remembered not the unnatural part ſhe had acted in arming children againſt their indulgent parent, and ſacrificing the lives of thouſands at the altar of jealouſy. His bounty to his brother John was profuſe. Beſides confirming him in the poſſeſſion of four thouſand marks a-year, beſtowing on him the county of Montagne in Normandy, and marrying him to Aviſa, daughter of the earl of Glouceſter, he conferred on him the whole eſtate of William Peverell, which had eſcheated to the crown; he alſo delivered to him ſeven earldoms, and even put him in poſſeſſion of eight caſtles, with all the honours annexed to them.

Since his arrival in England, he had generally reſided at Wincheſter; but in the beginning of December he ſet out for London, in order to be crowned. The ceremony was performed by Baldwin, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and celebrated with great magnificence; but the zeal of the people againſt infidels, which was excited by the king's intended cruſade, broke out in a very remarkable and cruel manner on the day of his coronation. The Jews, on account of their religion, were beheld with little leſs indignation than the Mahometans. They had amaſſed great riches, by lending money on exorbitant intereſt. Richard, well knowing the diſpoſition of his ſubjects towards the Jews, publiſhed a proclamation, prohibiting their appearance at the coronation! but ſome of them bringing him large preſents from their nation, preſumed in conſequence of that merit, to approach the hall in which he dined; and being diſcovered, were expoſed to the inſults of the populace, who took this opportunity, under cover of the king's edict, for venting their reſentment againſt them. They were obliged to fly; the people purſued them; and a rumour was immediately circulated, that the king had iſſued orders to maſſacre all the Hebrews. The report was ſo pleaſing to the vulgar prejudices, that the ſuppoſed command was executed in an inſtant on all who had the miſfortune to fall into the hands of their cruel murderers. Thoſe who ſtaid at home were expoſed to equal danger: the populace, inſtigated by rapacity and zeal, broke into their houſes, which they plundered, after having killed the owners; where the Jews barricaded their doors, and defended their property, the rabble ſet fire to the houſes, and made their way through the flames to commit the moſt deteſtable acts of pillage, and to gratify their thirſt for blood.

The licentiouſneſs of the mob in London, which the civil power could with difficulty reſtrain, continued their outrages to an alarming degree: the houſes of rich citizens, though Chriſtians, were next attacked and plundered; till wearineſs and ſatiety at laſt put an end to the riot, ſo horrible and inconſiſtent with humanity: yet Glanville, the juſticiary, when empowered by the king to find out the authors of theſe crimes, ſo many conſiderable citizens were involved in the guilt, that it was thought moſt prudent to drop the proſecution, and very few ſuffered on this occaſion. Nor did the diſorders ſtop at London. The inhabitants of other cities of England, hearing of this ſlaughter of the Jews, imitated the barbarous example. In York, five hundred of thoſe people, who had retired into the caſtle for ſafety, finding themſelves unable to defend it, murdered their wives and children, caſt the dead bodies over the walls, and then ſetting fire to the buildings, periſhed in the flames. The gentry in the neighbourhood, who were all indebted to the Jews, ran to the cathedral where the bonds were kept, and made a ſolemn bonfire of thoſe papers. The king did all in his power to manifeſt his diſpleaſure againſt the authors of this inhuman tragedy. He publiſhed an edict, ſtrictly forbidding any inſult to be offered to the Jews, whom he declared to be under his immediate protection.

The king, having taken the croſs from the hands of the archbiſhop of Tours, was now determined to make an expedition to the Holy Land in perſon. He was indeed more a ſoldier than a devotee; and to gratify his paſſion for military glory, and gather laurels in the field of Paleſtine, he ſcrupled not to ſacrifice at once the intereſt of his crown, and the welfare of his people. His whole attention was now engroſſed in forming ſchemes for raiſing money to defray neceſſary expences. His father's treaſures are ſaid to have amounted to two hundred thouſand marks, and he reſolved to augment that ſum by every expedient, however pernicious it might be to his ſubjects or himſelf. The biſhop of Ely dying without will, he confiſcated his eſtate, which was very conſiderable. He put to ſale the manors and revenues of the crown; and even diſpoſed of the great ſeal to William Longchamp, his prime miniſter. Ralph de Glanville, chief juſticiary, expoſtulated with him on theſe proceedings, as derogatory to his own dignity, and oppreſſive to his ſubjects. The king replied, "That he would ſell the city of London itſelf, if he could find a purchaſer." This anſwer ſhocked the upright juſticiary. He was alarmed for his country, and remonſtrated freely with the king on the conſequences that muſt attend ſuch precipitate meaſures. But Richard ſo highly reſented the liberty taken by his juſticiary, that he deprived him of his office, and committed him to priſon; and he was obliged to purchaſe his freedom at the price of fifteen thouſand pounds. Upon which he ſold the poſt of juſticiary to the biſhop of Durham for a thouſand marks; and the ſame prelate bought the earldom of Northumberland for his life.

Many of thoſe who were engaged to join the cruſade, having repented of their vow, purchaſed the liberty of violating it: and Richard, who was in leſs need of men than money, on thoſe conditions, having obtained a bull from pope Clement, diſpenſed with their attendance. So negligent was he of the future intereſt and honour of the crown of England, that he ſold the vaſſalage of Scotland, together with the fortreſſes of Roxborough and Berwick, for ſo ſmall a ſum as ten thouſand marks, and agreed to accept the homage of the king of Scotland, merely for the territories that prince held in England. All ranks and ſtations among the Engliſh were indeed oppreſſed by numerous exactions. Offices of inquiſition into the behaviour of magiſtrates were erected, not for reformation but oppreſſion. The innocent and guilty ſuffered in common, and nothing but paying large ſums into the king's coffers, gave ſafety to the one or indemnity to the other. Such were the arts by which this brave, ill-fated, and worſe judging prince, reduced the patrimony of the crown, exhauſted the ſubſtance of his people, and proſtituted the juſtice of his country, merely to procure a temporary ſupply, for ſatisfying his unbounded vanity.

But notwithſtanding Richard thus ſacrificed every conſideration to the ſuppoſed ſucceſs of a romantic enterprize, his conduct had ſo little the appearance of real ſanctity, that Fulk, curate of Neuilly, who from the merit of being a zealous preacher for the cruſade, had acquired the privilege of ſpeaking the boldeſt truths, adviſed him to get rid of his pride, avarice, and voluptuouſneſs, which he termed the king's favourite daughters. "You adviſe well," replied Richard, "and I diſpoſe of the firſt to the Templars, of the ſecond to the Benedictines, and of the third to my prelates."

His next care was, to provide for the adminiſtration of public affairs during his abſence; in ſettling of which, he purſued the dictates of his own caprice, without conſulting his council, and againſt the ſenſe of the whole nation; leaving Hugh, biſhop of Durham, and Longchamp, biſhop of Ely, regents of the kingdom. The latter was a Norman of mean birth, who by art and addreſs had inſinuated himſelf into his favour. He had before created him chancellor, and now engaged the pope to inveſt him with legatine authority, that both the civil and eccleſiaſtical power being centered in him, he might be the better able to ſecure the public tranquillity. Four of the principal barons were appointed their aſſiſtants and counſellors in the adminiſtration.

A. D. 1190. Richard, having thus provided for the ſafety of his kingdom, paſſed over to the continent, and had an interview with Philip at Gue de St. Remi, in order to ſettle finally the meaſures during the whole expedition. Here they appointed the firſt place of their rendezvous to be in the plains of Vezelay, on the borders of Burgundy. Here alſo the two kings ſwore mutually to maintain an uninterrupted peace, pledged their faith not to invade each others dominions during the cruſade, exchanged the oaths of their principal nobility to the ſame effect, and ſubjected themſelves in the moſt ſolemn manner, to the penalty of interdicts and excommunications, if they ever violated this religious engagement. And it was determined, in order to prevent the calamities which hitherto attended all the cruſades, to conduct their armies to Paleſtine by ſea, that by means of their naval power they might open a communication with their own ſtates, and all the weſtern parts of Europe. Every thing being thus ſettled, Richard, after receiving the pilgrim's ſtaff at Tours, repaired to Vezelay, where, being joined by the king of France, they reviewed their forces, amounting to one hundred thouſand men. The two armies now ſeparated, Philip taking the road to Genoa, and Richard that of Marſeilles, their reſpective fleets having received inſtructions to rendezvous at thoſe ports; Richard waited eight days at Marſeilles, when his fleet not arriving, he hired twenty gallies, on board of which he embarked for Meſſina in Sicily, leaving orders for the whole fleet to follow him with all expedition. This order was punctually obeyed; the fleet arrived ſafe at Meſſina, where they found the king of France with his whole navy, ready to join them; and at this place they ſtaid all the winter.

During this interval of time thoſe feuds and animoſities firſt broke out, which ultimately defeated the principal deſign of the expedition. It was not indeed reaſonable to expect, that two kings, competitors in power, and rivals in honour, would long continue to act in concert, and ſacrifice their own paſſions to the intereſt of the cruſade. Could this have been expected, the intention would have been anſwered, and the Holy Land entirely recovered from the infidels. But the torch of diſcord was lighted up by the hand of jealouſy. Philip could not behold, without envy, the forces of his rival in glory ſo much ſuperior to his own; the power of Richard filled the breaſt of Philip with malignity, who being politic and deceitful, did not fail to take every advantage againſt him; and thus that harmony, which was neceſſary to the ſucceſs of their undertaking, was entirely broken.

Jane, Richard's ſiſter, had married William II. laſt king of Sicily and Naples, but he dying without iſſue, Tancred, his natural brother, ſeized the throne of Sicily. Tancred having put the queen dowager, Richard's ſiſter, into confinement, and refuſed to put her in poſſeſſion of her money and effects, to which ſhe claimed a right on the part of her huſband, her brother Richard demanded the reſtoration of both with her liberty. Tancred complied immediately with the laſt demand, and the lady was ſent from Palermo to Richard, with a very ſplendid convoy. He alſo concluded an alliance with Richard, who agreed that his nephew, Arthur, the young duke of Brittany, ſhould marry one of Tancred's daughters. But before theſe terms of friendſhip were ſettled, Richard, jealous both of Tancred and the inhabitants of Meſſina, took up his quarters in the ſuburbs, and having ſeized a ſmall fort which commanded the harbour, kept himſelf upon his guard againſt any ſurprize.

The citizens taking umbrage at this, mutual inſults and attacks paſſed between them and the Engliſh. Philip, whoſe troops were quartered in the city, had a conference with Richard, to accommodate the quarrel. But while the two kings, who met in the fields, were engaged in diſcourſe on this ſubject, a body of Sicilians appeared to be drawing towards them; upon which Richard, with a body of his troops puſhed forward, in order to enquire into the reaſon of this extraordinary movement. The Engliſh wanting only a pretence for attacking them, drove them into the town, and entered with them at the gates; Richard made uſe of his authority to prevent their plundering the defenceleſs inhabitants; but in token of his victory, or in order to humble them, he commanded the ſtandard of England to be erected on the wall. Philip, conſidering the city as his head quarters, ordered his troops to pull down the colours: but Richard ſent to let him know, that though he himſelf was willing to remove the cauſe of offence, he would not permit it to be done by others; and if the French king attempted ſuch an inſult, it would be attended with an effuſion of blood. Philip, ſatisfied with this kind of haughty ſubmiſſion, recalled his orders, and the difference, in appearance, was accommodated, though the remains of rancour and jealouſy ſtill ſubſiſted in their breaſts.

The king of Sicily was ſoon ſenſible that he could only hope for ſafety by ſubmitting to all Richard's demands; Tancred therefore agreed to pay to Richard twenty thouſand ounces of gold, for his ſiſter's dower, and twenty thouſand more for his acquittance of all his claim to the moveables left by the late king. It is to be obſerved, that Tancred was at this very time under apprehenſions of an invaſion from the Saracens, and from the coaſt of Italy. This perhaps diſpoſed him the more readily to pay down ſuch exorbitant ſums; but he received another valuable conſideration; for he not only procured the king of England to become guarantee for the poſſeſſion of his throne, but alſo the oath of all his nobility, who engaged that Richard ſhould defend him, with all his forces, againſt the attacks of his enemies. This ſtipulation not being agreeable to Philip, it was now propoſed by the two monarchs, to obviate future contentions by a ſolemn treaty, which, when brought upon the carpet, inſtead of bringing matters to an amicable concluſion, became the occaſion of new diſputes. In one of theſe, the honour of Philip's family was deeply concerned.

Richard, when only heir to the crown, had inſiſted on his being allowed to marry Alice of France; but after his having aſcended the throne, he no longer mentioned that alliance, and was now preparing to eſpouſe Berengaria, daughter of Sanchez, king of Navarre, with whom he became enamoured during his ſtay in Guienne; and queen Eleanor was daily expected to arrive at Meſſina with that princeſs. When Philip therefore renewed his application for marrying his ſiſter Alice, Richard gave him an abſolute refuſal. Tancred, who wiſhed for his own ſecurity to inflame their mutual hatred, employed an artifice that might have been attended with fatal conſequences. He ſhewed Richard a letter, ſigned by the French king, and delivered to him, as he pretended, by the duke of Burgundy; wherein Philip deſired Tancred to fall upon the quarters of the Engliſh, and promiſed to aſſiſt in putting them to the ſword. The unwary Richard gave credit to the information; but complained of this treachery to Philip, who denied the letter, and charged Tancred with forgery and falſehood; on which Richard was, or pretended to be, entirely ſatisfied.

A. D. 1191. Information was received by Richard, in the beginning of February, that his mother and the princeſs Berengaria, were arrived at Naples; upon which he ſent his gallies to attend and bring them to Meſſina. Philip, convinced of the infidelity of Alice, permitted Richard to give his hand to Berengaria; and having ſettled all other controverſies with the king of England, that monarch ſet ſail for the Holy Land, having for ſome time been inceſſantly importuned by the Chriſtians, who were carrying on the ſiege of Acre. He waited for ſome time for the arrival of his mother and Berengaria; and when they joined him, every thing was prepared with the utmoſt expedition for their departure. Queen Eleanor returned to England; but Berengaria and his ſiſter, the queen dowager of Sicily, attended him on the expedition.

By means of the large ſums received from Tancred, Richard was enabled to make great additions to his fleet, which now conſiſted of one hundred and fifty ſail of large ſhips, and fifty-three well armed gallies. This fleet, on leaving the port of Meſſina, met with a violent tempeſt; and the ſquadron in which the two princeſſes were embarked, was, on the twelfth of April, drove on the coaſt of Cyprus, and ſome of the veſſels were wrecked near Limiſſo in that iſland. Iſaac, governor of Cyprus, who had aſſumed the pompous title of emperor, plundered the ſhips that were ſtranded, impriſoned the ſeamen and paſſengers, and even refuſed the princeſſes liberty notwithſtanding their dangerous ſituation, to enter the harbour of Limiſſo. Richard, enraged at hearing this cruel tranſaction, immediately came to their relief. He diſembarked his troops, defeated Iſaac, who oppoſed his landing, entered Limiſſo by ſtorm, and having the next day obtained a ſecond victory, obliged Iſaac to ſurrender at diſcretion, and placed governors over the whole iſland. Here the king married Berengaria, who inſtantly embarking, took with her Iſaac's daughter, a dangerous rival, who was thought to have ſeduced the affections of her huſband.

When Richard arrived in Paleſtine, the ſiege of Acre or Ptolemais had been carried on above two years, by the united force of all the Chriſtian armies in the Holy Land, and had been defended by the utmoſt efforts of Saladin and the Saracens. The arrival of Richard and Philip gave new life to the common cauſe; and theſe princes ſharing in the honour and danger of every attack, gave hopes of a final victory over the infidels. Extraordinary acts of valour were performed, by the emulation of theſe rival kings; but Richard, animated with a more precipitant courage, drew to himſelf the general attention, and acquired a prodigious reputation. This diſtinguiſhed courage in the king of England, raiſed a flame of jealouſy in the breaſt of Philip, who now conſidered himſelf as totally eclipſed by the valiant exploits of the former. However, notwithſtanding the variance between Richard and Philip, as the length of the ſiege had reduced the Saracen garriſon to the laſt extremity, they ſurrendered themſelves priſoners; and in return for their lives, agreed to reſtore all the Chriſtian captives. Thus this long ſiege, reſembling in ſome particulars that of Troy, which had engaged the attention of Europe and Aſia, was at laſt brought to a period, after the loſs of three hundred thouſand Chriſtians! The city having ſurrendered, was agreeable to the determination of arbitrators, divided between the two kings. Philip now expreſſed a deſire of returning home. Richard conſented to his departure, but not till he had obtained from him a ſolemn vow, that he would not invade his territories, nor ſuffer them to be invaded by others, during his abſence.

The future behaviour of Philip plainly evinced what confidence ſhould be placed in a man who had already been guilty of ſo many inſtances of perfidy. On his return through Italy, he complained to the pope of the ill-treatment he had received from Richard, whoſe intolerable inſolence, he alledged, was the cauſe of his returning from the cruſade; at the ſame time begging abſolution from his holineſs, from the vow he had made, in order to afford him an opportunity of avenging himſelf for the injuries he had received. The pope abſolved him from his oath in quitting the cruſade, but ſtrictly enjoined him not to invade Richard's territories. A number of pilgrims ſoon followed the example of Philip, ſo that to Richard was left the whole charge of proſecuting the war, which he did with unremitting ardour.

In order to prepare the way for the ſiege of Jeruſalem, the cruſaders now under Richard's command, reſolved to open the campaign, by attempting that of Aſcalon; and with a view of gaining a better ſupply of proviſions, marched along the ſeacoaſt of Joppa. Saladin, in order to interrupt their paſſage, encamped in the road with an army of three hundred thouſand men; and this occaſioned one of the greateſt battles which any age has produced. The right wing of the Chriſtian army was commanded by James d'Aveſnes; the left by the duke of Burgundy. Saladin had concealed part of his troops on the right behind ſome hills, which covered them from the ſight of the Chriſtians. On this body of reſerve he placed his greateſt hopes of victory; and therefore, without altering his poſition, waited the attack of the enemy, who began the action with their right wing. The Saracens ſupported the ſhock with great reſolution; and by the ſuperiority of their numbers, put that body into great diſorder. Their leader, James d'Aveſnes was ſlain, in endeavouring to rally his broken troops, and lead them once more againſt the infidels. The duke of Burgundy, at the head of the left wing, made a furious charge upon the right of the enemy, who, agreeable to their orders, retreated as they fought; whereby the duke was deceived, and followed them to a conſiderable diſtance from the main body of the army. Saladin perceiving this, ordered the ambuſh behind the hills to move forward. Theſe troops, ſurrounding the duke's forces, made a dreadful ſlaughter. The fate of the Chriſtian army now depended on Richard. He had been very ſucceſsful in his attacks, and had compelled the troops that oppoſed him, to retreat in diſorder. He was purſuing them when informed of the dangerous ſituation of his two wings. Upon which, marching immediately to the duke of Burgundy's aſſiſtance, he fell upon the victorious troops of Saladin with ſuch impetuoſity, that he ſoon wreſted from them the palm of victory, which they thought to have ſecured. Richard, on this occaſion, performed the moſt aſtoniſhiſhing acts of valour; and thoſe who before were filled with envy, were now ſtruck with admiration.

One of the Saracen generals, remarkable for his ſtrength and agility, ſeeing the wonders which Richard performed, thought by the conqueſt of ſuch a warrior to grace his arms. He therefore ſpurred his horſe and advanced againſt the brave Engliſh monarch. So diſtinguiſhed a combat drew the attention of both armies; as the event, had the king been vanquiſhed, muſt have decided the fate of the day; but Richard, after having received a ſtroke from the infidel, aimed a blow with ſuch force, that it divided his head from his body, and falling aſlant, took away part of the Saracen's ſhoulder. The battle was now renewed with more fury than before; it ſeemed to be contracted to the ſpot where Richard fought in perſon; every ſword was aimed, every weapon directed, either to deſtroy or protect him. The brave earl of Leiceſter loſt his liberty, fighting at the ſide of his maſter, by whom he was generouſly reſcued at the hazard of his own. Saladin was obliged to reinforce his right wing with part of his victorious troops from the left; this motion gave the right wing of the Chriſtians time to recover themſelves; who, finding the oppoſition they had before met with to grow weaker, they recovered new vigour, and quickly rallied; then falling with the utmoſt fury on the Saracen troops that oppoſed them, they renewed the action with ſurprizing intrepidity, and at length forced them to ſeek their ſafety in a precipitate flight.

Richard ſtill maintained the battle in ſpite of the vaſt ſuperiority of the enemy; though his horſe was ready to ſink under him, and he himſelf almoſt fainting with fatigue, rather by the blows he had given, than thoſe he had received. He was, however, in danger of being overpowered by numbers, had not his right wing, meeting with no farther oppoſition, advanced to his aſſiſtance. Finding themſelves attacked by a body of freſh forces, the Saracens began to give way; nor was it in the power of Saladin, though he exerted himſelf with the utmoſt aſſiduity and fortitude, to rally them. The Chriſtians, taking advantage of their diſorder, preſſed them with ſo much vigour that they betook themſelves to flight. Above fifty thouſand of the infidels were left dead on the field of battle.

The Saracens were by this complete victory ſtruck with a panic: they abandoned the maritime cities of Aſcalon and Cæſaria, after demoliſhing the fortifications, which, with ſome other places, fell into the hands of the Chriſtians. Richard marched directly to Joppa, where he ſtaid ſome time to repair the fortifications, that if he ſhould be obliged to retreat, he might have a ſecure port to embark his forces for Europe. While he continued at this place, he frequently amuſed himſelf with hunting in the neighbourhood, attended only by a few of his intimate friends. As he was one day returning from the chace, with only ſix perſons in his train, he alighted from his horſe, laid himſelf down under a tree, and fell aſleep. He was, however, ſoon diſturbed, by the approach of a ſmall party of Saracen horſe paſſing by the place. Richard immediately, as they were few in numbers, purſued them; till he was artfully drawn into an ambuſcade, and ſurrounded by a ſquadron of horſe. He defended himſelf for a conſiderable time with great bravery, without the leaſt thought of retreating, notwithſtanding the prodigious diſparity of numbers.

But even the valour of Richard would have been exerted in vain, had not one of his attendants, by a remarkable preſence of mind, ſaved him from the impending danger. Four of his attendants were ſlain; when William Deſpreaux, his only ſurviving friend, cried out in the Saracen tongue, "Hold! I am the king of England!" Every eye of the aſſailants was now turned to Deſpreaux; and thoſe who were engaged with Richard immediately left him, that they might ſhare in the glory of taking priſoner the perſon, whom they imagined to be the Engliſh monarch. This counter-ſtratagem afforded Richard an opportunity of eſcaping. Deſpreaux did not diſcover himſelf till he came before Saladin; when, falling at his feet, he, with tears of joy, confeſſed the deception he had made uſe of to ſave his maſter. Saladin commended his fidelity, and treated him with great reſpect; but ſenſible that Richard would never ſuffer a perſon, who had ſignally aſſiſted him, to remain in confinement, demanded ten emirs in exchange for ſo faithful a ſervant.

Joppa being now put in a ſtate of defence, Richard advanced within ſight of Jeruſalem, the grand object of the expedition. Saladin, determined to prevent, if poſſible, this famous city from falling into his hands, drew up his army on the plains of Rama to oppoſe his paſſage. A ſecond battle enſued, and Richard was again victorious. Nothing now prevented his attacking the place, but the crafty advice of the knights Templars, who, being in the intereſt of Philip, perſuaded the Engliſh monarch to lay aſide his attempt againſt Jeruſalem till the enſuing ſpring. Richard, who was more of a warrior than a politician, without ſuſpecting the motive of the knights, who were envious of the glory he would obtain by the conqueſt of the Holy City, followed their advice; and marching to Aſcalon, repaired the fortifications which had been demoliſhed by Saladin's forces.

A. D. 1192. At this time the diſpute was renewed between Guy de Luſignan and Conrade, with regard to the crown of Jeruſalem; and the duke of Burgundy refuſed to act any longer in conjunction with the Engliſh. The French troops, retiring into places of ſafety, paſſed their time in luxury and indolence. Deſirous of making himſelf maſter of Jeruſalem, Richard put an end to the diſpute by declaring in favour of Conrade, and appointing him king of Jeruſalem. But at the ſame time he indemnified Guy for the loſs of a nominal, by preſenting him with a real crown. He beſtowed upon him the kingdom of Cyprus. Pleaſed with having obtained the honour he had ſo long deſired, Conrade, who was now at Tyre, made preparations for joining the Chriſtian army at Aſcalon. But before he could embark, he was ſtabbed in the ſtreets of that city by two aſſaſſins, ſent for that purpoſe by a Saracen prince, known by the name of The Old Man of the Mountains. The ſubjects of that chief eſteemed aſſaſſination meritorious, when ſanctified by his mandate: they courted death, were it even in the extremities of Europe, in the execution of his orders. The Old Man juſtified his cruel proceeding, in a letter he wrote to the duke of Auſtria ſome time after; declaring that the marquis fell by the poniards of his ſoldiers, in revenge for his having put to death one of his merchants, whoſe ſhip was forced into Tyre by a tempeſt.

The progreſs of the Chriſtian army underwent a freſh obſtruction by the death of Conrade: but his widow ſoon after marrying Henry, count of Champagne, that nobleman was, in her right, declared king of Jeruſalem; and at his intreaties the French conſented to join the army of Richard, who immediately marched to attack the capital of Paleſtine. But when Richard thought of putting a glorious period to the expedition, his hopes were rendered abortive by diviſions among the leaders of the confederate army. The duke of Burgundy drew off his forces, and marched directly to Tyre. The duke of Auſtria followed the example of the French general: he abandoned the king of England, when fortune held up in his view the palm of victory, and when the Saracens, ſhut up within the walls of Jeruſalem, trembled for their liberty. Richard now ſaw all his hopes of future laurels cut down. It would have been folly in extreme for him to have beſieged a city famous for its ſtrength, eſpecially as Saladin, at the head of a numerous army, hovered on the mountains, ready to fall upon the maritime places the moment they ſhould be deſerted by the Chriſtians. The Engliſh monarch was therefore obliged to abandon the enterprize, and accordingly marched his army to Acre. But he had ſcarcely reached the environs of that city, before advice arrived that Saladin had taken Joppa, and was preſſing the ſiege of the caſtle with ſo much fury, that the garriſon muſt ſurrender unleſs ſpeedily relieved.

Richard, who never abandoned his ſoldiers in diſtreſs, ordered his army to the relief of Joppa; while he himſelf, at the head of a ſmall body of choſen troops embarked at Acre, and reached Joppa ſome time before the main body of his army. The name of Richard was terrible to the infidels; he fell on the beſiegers with ſuch irreſiſtible fury, that they abandoned the enterprize with precipitation, and retreated to the neighbouring mountains. But it was impoſſible for this gallant hero, with only a handful of followers, compared with the numerous armies of Saladin, to gratify the darling paſſion of his ſoul, by taking Jeruſalem; eſpecially when he had the mortification to find, that the enthuſiaſtic ardour of the cruſaders was abated, and that their long abſence from home, fatigue, want, and the variety of incidents attendant on war, rendered all but himſelf deſirous of returning to their own country. Richard, therefore, who was no ſtranger to their wiſhes, concluded a truce with Saladin, by which it was agreed, that Acre, Joppa, with ſome other ſea-port towns, ſhould remain in the hands of the Chriſtians; and that pilgrims, without the leaſt moleſtation, ſhould have free liberty to viſit the holy ſepulchre, and that all of their religion ſhould be allowed to trade in any part of the ſultan's dominions. This truce was ſuperſtitiouſly concluded for three years, three months, three weeks, three days, and three hours. Shortly after the concluſion of this truce, the humane and brave Saladin died. Before he expired, he ordered his winding ſheet to be carried as a ſtandard through every ſtreet of the city; while a crier went before, and proclaimed with a loud voice, "This is all that remains to the mighty Saladin, the conqueror of the eaſt." By his laſt will he left large charities, to be diſtributed to the poor of every denomination, without diſtinction of Jew, Chriſtian, or Mahometan.

There being now no buſineſs of importance to detain Richard, the intelligence he received of the intrigues of the king of France, and his brother John, made him haſten to Europe. Not thinking it ſafe to paſs through France, he ſailed for Italy; but being ſhipwrecked near Aquileia, he, on his landing put on the diſguiſe of a pilgrim, in order to travel unobſerved through Germany. Being purſued by the governor of Iſtria, he was obliged to leave the direct road to England, and paſs by Vienna; where, being betrayed by his expences and liberalities, more ſuited to a monarch than a pilgrim, he was arreſted on the twentieth of December at Gynacia, by order of Leopold, duke of Auſtria, whom this great monarch had inſulted at the ſiege of Acre; and that duke, ſtimulated by his revenge, kept him for ſome time a cloſe priſoner, and then baſely delivered him to Henry VI. his inveterate enemy, who not only threw him into a dungeon, but loaded him with irons.

Since it might appear to many very unpolite, and affectedly ſingular, and our prudence might alſo perhaps be called in queſtion, if we viſited, or continued long, even with a king of England, when confined by a concurrence of unfortunate events, in a loathſome priſon, in a dungeon too, and entirely at the mercy of his ungenerous enemies; indeed we are a little better acquainted with the world than to be guilty of ſuch an abſurdity, and to diſcover ſo much inexperience, as to aſſociate with a wretch loaded with chains, and covered with misfortunes; we ſhall therefore follow the example of men much more wiſe, learned, and pious, than we pretend to be; and, leaving Richard to ſtruggle with his hard fate as well as he can, paſs over into England, and enquire what tranſactions happened there, during the king's abſence in the Holy Land.

As ſoon as queen Eleanor had conducted the princeſs Berengaria to Meſſina, ſhe gave her ſon a faithful account of the ſtate of affairs in England. That kingdom was involved in much confuſion by William Longchamp, biſhop of Ely, guardian of the realm. This imperious prelate, though of mean extraction, diſdaining to have a colleague of equal authority, had committed Hugh, biſhop of Durham, to priſon, and governed the nation by his ſole authority. He exerciſed all the ſtate of a deſpotic monarch. His oppreſſive meaſures were unbounded. Both clergy and laity were ſtripped of their poſſeſſions, which were given to his own creatures. The king's revenues were embezzled to make purchaſes for himſelf; the vacant churches and abbies he ſequeſtered. In travelling he was attended by ſo numerous a retinue, that more damage was ſuſtained in the convents where he lodged for one night's entertainment only, than could be made good for a conſiderable time. Among thoſe whom he deemed domeſtics, to wait at his table, were ſons of the firſt nobility in the kingdom, who thought themſelves amply repaid by intermarrying with the remoteſt branches of his family. A prince of Marſeilles, on application being made to him by Hugh for redreſs, ordered William to reſtore the places he had taken from him; but he, with great arrogance, perſiſted in his arbitrary proceedings, and abſolutely refuſed a compliance with his orders. The king was now convinced of his error in appointing ſuch a mean perſon to ſo high and important a ſtation. He therefore ſigned a new commiſſion, and named a council, without whoſe concurrence Longchamp was not to act. This commiſſion Richard ſent to England by Walter, archbiſhop of Rouen, accompanied with William Mareſchal, earl of Striguel, laying a poſitive injunction on the regent not to act without their advice; but when arrived in England, finding the univerſal tyranny of the legate, they were intimidated from ſhewing their powers; John only was informed of their commiſſion.

The reverence the Engliſh entertained for the perſon of their king, together with the ſanctity of the cauſe in which he was embarked, prevented a civil war from raging among the people, reduced to the greateſt extremity, through the arbitrary proceedings of an imperious churchman. He diveſted Gerard de Camville of the ſheriffdom of Lincolnſhire: even the king's brother did not eſcape the inſults offered by this prelate to the greateſt of the nobility. However, being oppoſed by John, his pride was ſomewhat lowered; and at this juncture he was, by the pope's death, deprived of his legatine authority. An event alſo happened ſoon after, which highly exaſperated the nobility, clergy, and the people in general, againſt Longchamp. Geoffrey, the king's natural brother, had, ſome time before Richard's departure for the Holy Land, been elected to the ſee of York; but ſome diſputes ariſing between them, Geoffrey had promiſed not to reſide in England during the abſence of his brother in Paleſtine. But queen Eleanor having obtained a diſpenſation of the king's promiſe, Geoffrey arrived in England to take poſſeſſion of his ſee. Longchamp ordered him to be arreſted; but the archbiſhop having received intelligence of his deſign, fled for refuge to the church of St. Martin. The regent's officers, paying no regard to the ſanctity of the place, dragged him from the altar in his ſacerdotal robes, and committed him to Dover caſtle.

The deteſtation of all ranks of the people was now excited at this violent proceeding. The clergy were particularly alarmed. The biſhop of Lincoln excommunicated all concerned in this ſacrilegious outrage; and the ſentence was confirmed in a general convocation held at Reading. The biſhops even threatened the kingdom with an interdict, if Geoffrey was not immediately releaſed. The regent was now ſufficiently alarmed, and Geoffrey was ſet at liberty. But this was not ſufficient: it was now reſolved to put a final period to the deſpotic adminiſtration of Longchamp. A general aſſembly of the nobles and prelates was accordingly ſummoned, where the king's commiſſion was read, and Longchamp ordered to attend. He promiſed to aſſiſt at the conference; but conſcious that his actions could not ſtand a ſcrutiny, he fled to London, and ſhut himſelf up in the Tower. Being cloſely inveſted by the nobility and citizens, and not having ſufficient ſtores, particularly of proviſions, he endeavoured to eſcape in the habit of a female, in hopes of gaining the continent; but his aukward deportment led to a diſcovery; upon which he was ſeized by the populace and impriſoned in a cellar, till the pleaſure of the council ſhould be known. The great ſeal of England was now delivered to Walter, archbiſhop of Rouen, a perſon of great prudence, modeſty and integrity. He always conſulted his colleagues in the affairs of government; and by his prudent management reſtored peace to the kingdom. Longchamp found means, after having been deprived of all his offices, to eſcape over to France, where, by promoting the views of Philip, he endeavoured to diſturb the new adminiſtration of his country.

With reſpect to John, who had joined in the oppoſition againſt Longchamp, as he was poſſeſſed of neither virtue nor honour, the ſpecious pretext to public ſpirit no longer ſerving as a cloak for his private ambition, he therefore refuſed to co-operate with thoſe who were actuated by the moſt noble and laudable views in the ſervice of their country. John's preſent behaviour ſo plainly indicated what might be expected from him in future, that it was reſolved to invite queen Eleanor into England, in order to ſtrengthen the royal party.

When Philip, king of France, arrived from Paleſtine, a conference was propoſed by him with William Fitz-Ralph, ſeneſchal of Normandy, and the nobility of that duchy; at which conference he demanded in marriage Adela, his ſiſter, with the caſtle of Guiſors, and the provinces of Eu and Aumale, aſſerting that they were ceded to him by the treaty of Meſſina. The Normans, alledging that they were not authoriſed to make the ceſſion, refuſed compliance. Philip threatened to aſſert his right by force of arms; whilſt the Normans, in return, prepared for defence. Being diſappointed in this attempt, he made an offer to prince John of his ſiſter in marriage, together with the poſſeſſion of his brother's dominions on the continent. John embraced eagerly the propoſal of Philip, in hopes of gratifying a pique againſt his brother, and was preparing to ſet out for the place appointed for a conference; but through the remonſtrances of his mother, joined with the menaces of the juſticiaries, who threatened to confiſcate his property if he quitted the kingdom, he was prevented from putting his deſign in execution.

Philip now reſolved to invade Normandy. Such is the ſtability of Gallic faith. But his nobles refuſed to join him in the expedition, having taken a ſolemn oath to the contrary when in Paleſtine. The pope alſo declared in favour of Richard, expreſſing his abhorrence of thoſe who would take advantage of the abſence of a prince, who was ſo laudably employed in fighting battles for the cauſe of their church, and moſt holy religion. Thus was the treacherous French monarch again diſappointed in his perfidious deſigns. The lords juſtices now united more firmly than ever; they called another meeting of the ſtates; and a general oath of fidelity was taken to Richard and his heirs, againſt all mankind. At the ſame time they kept a watchful eye over all the ſea-ports, where they placed ſtrong garriſons, commanded by experienced officers, whoſe fidelity they could depend upon. They ſoon found they had occaſion for all theſe prudent precautions.

John recalled Longchamp, whom he had before driven out of the kingdom; that, by joining their intereſts, they might diſtreſs, or at leaſt embarraſs the adminiſtration. Longchamp, confiding in ſo powerful a protector, returned immediately; and John uſed all his intereſt to replace him in his former poſt and dignity. But this notorious inconſiſtency of conduct ſerved only to unite the government more cloſely againſt both; and the prelate was given to underſtand, that if he did not, without a moment's delay, prepare to quit the kingdom, he would, by a due courſe of law, be proceeded againſt as a traitor. This menace, which was to have been put in execution, produced the deſired effect. Longchamp, who well knew his former actions would not bear inſpection, left the kingdom, and returned to the continent. John, deſpairing of gaining his point in England by dividing, or corrupting, or over-awing, ceaſed from his oppoſition; and the affairs of government went ſmoothly on, the people being perfectly ſatisfied with the adminiſtration.

While the dominions of Richard were thus threatened to be ſeized by the hand of perfidy, that prince was ſuffering in priſon every kind of inſult and indignity. A warrior, who at the head of his army made even the mighty Saladin tremble, was now treated with contempt and cruelty. He was brought before the diet, and accuſed of ſeveral crimes, which had no exiſtence but in the malignant minds of his enemies. He juſtified himſelf with an eloquence that confounded his perſecutors, and covered them with confuſion. And when the fatal intelligence of his impriſonment reached England, the council were aſtoniſhed, and inſtantly foreſaw all the dangerous conſequences that might ariſe from ſo melancholy an event.

Eleanor, the queen-dowager, exerted herſelf on this occaſion. She wrote letter after letter to the pope, exclaiming againſt this injurious treatment of her ſon; repreſented the impiety of detaining in priſon the moſt illuſtrious champion that had ever marched under the banner of Chriſt into the Holy Land; claiming his protection, and upbraiding him, that in a cauſe in which juſtice, religion, and the dignity of the church were ſo nearly concerned, the ſpiritual thunders ſhould ſo long be ſuſpended. At length the pope declared loudly in favour of Richard; threatening to lay the whole empire under an interdict if he was not releaſed. The princes of Germany alſo exclaimed in ſtrong terms againſt the emperor's conduct; ſo that Henry, who had liſtened to the propoſals of the king of France and prince John, now found it impoſſible to execute his and their baſe purpoſes, or to detain the king of England much longer in priſon. He therefore agreed with Richard for his ranſom, who purchaſed his liberty for the ſum of one hundred and fifty thouſand marks, of which one hundred thouſand were to be paid before he was ſet free, and ſixty-ſeven hoſtages to be delivered as a ſecurity for the remainder.

A. D. 1194. No ſooner had the Engliſh received an account of this treaty, than they exerted themſelves in raiſing the ſum required for the king's ranſom. Twenty ſhillings were levied on each knight's fee; but that not being ſufficient, the voluntary zeal of the people readily ſupplied the deficiency. The parochial clergy contributed a tenth of their tithes; the biſhops, abbots, and nobles, paid a fourth of their annual income; and the churches and monaſteries melted down as much plate as amounted to thirty thouſand marks. The ſum being thus collected, queen Eleanor, and Walter, archbiſhop of Rouen, ſet out with it for Germany; paid the money to the emperor and the duke of Auſtria at Mentz, and having delivered the required hoſtages, ſet the king at liberty.

Richard, who well knew the diſpoſition of theſe tyrants, did not ſtop a moment in their territories; but, proceeding with the utmoſt expedition, embarked at the mouth of the Scheldt, and, after a very ſhort paſſage, landed in England. Happy was it for Richard that no accident retarded his journey. Henry had been detected in aſſaſſinating the biſhop of Liege, and in making the ſame attempt on the duke of Louvain; and to render himſelf, if poſſible, more odious, he had reſolved to form an alliance with Philip; to detain Richard in perpetual captivity; to keep the money they had already paid for his ranſom; and to extort freſh ſums from Philip and John, who had made him large offers to detain the captive king. He therefore gave orders that Richard ſhould be purſued and ſtopped; but that prince had uſed ſuch expedition, that when the meſſengers arrived at Antwerp, the veſſel had ſailed, and landed him ſafe at Sandwich on the twentieth of March, after an abſence of four years and three months, fifteen months of which time he had been in captivity.

On the king's arrival in London, where he made a triumphal entry, he was received with the utmoſt demonſtrations of joy by his ſubjects. They beheld with rapture their favourite king, who had acquired ſo much glory, and ſpread the reputation of the Engliſh farther than their fame had ever before extended. Every token of reſpect was ſhewn him, and ſuch a vaſt profuſion of riches flowed from every quarter, as aſtoniſhed thoſe German noblemen who accompanied him; one of whom remarked, that a greater price would have been fixed for his ranſom, had the emperor been acquainted with the wealth of his ſubjects. This endearing behaviour of his people baniſhed from the mind of Richard thoſe indignities he had experienced during his impriſonment; all his alarms, his fatigues, and his ſufferings, were buried in oblivion. On the other hand, Philip, the French king, was aſtoniſhed when he heard that Richard was ſet at liberty; and he is ſaid to have written to John in theſe words, "Take care of yourſelf, the devil is broke looſe."

Not long before the arrival of Richard in England, his brother John had diſpatched Adam de St. Edmund, his chaplain, to his adherents, with orders to them to fortify their caſtles. Adam, who poſſeſſed a larger ſhare of vanity than diſcretion, openly boaſted of his maſter's connections with Philip; which the mayor of London being informed of, ordered him to be arreſted, and his papers ſeized, by which means the baſe deſigns of John were fully diſcovered. Orders were immediately iſſued from the council to beſiege his caſtles, and diſſeiſe him of all his poſſeſſions; the biſhops alſo excommunicated him and all his adherents. Richard not only approved of theſe meaſures, but ſummoned a general council at Nottingham, where he demanded judgment againſt John, count of Montagne, and Hugh Novant, biſhop of Coventry. They were both cited to appear within forty days; otherwiſe it was decreed, that John ſhould forfeit all his poſſeſſions, and a proceſs be commenced againſt the biſhop, both in the civil and eccleſiaſtical courts. This council likewiſe agreed on a tax, called hidage, to be laid on all ploughed land throughout the kingdom.

A day was now appointed for the ſecond coronation of Richard; thus giving the people another opportunity of publicly diſplaying their exultations. This ceremony the king pleaded the neceſſity of repeating, in order to wipe off the ignominy of his captivity. However plauſible this reaſon may appear, it is moſt probable that his real motive was, to have an opportunity of new modelling the kingdom, of annulling the ſales, and of reſuming the grants which he had made previous to his departure for Paleſtine. He alleged, that the purchaſers had already indemnified themſelves by the profits of the eſtates; that neceſſity had compelled him to make thoſe grants; that the money had been ſpent in an expedition favoured both by the clergy and the laity; and that therefore it was unjuſt the crown ſhould bear the whole burden. None diſputed the force of theſe reaſons, or the juſtice of the intended reſumption. Hugh, biſhop of Durham, reſigned the earldom of Northumberland; Geoffrey, biſhop of Wincheſter, ſurrendered the ſheriffalty of Hampſhire, the caſtle of Wincheſter, and the two manors he had purchaſed previous to the cruſading expedition. All other purchaſers and grantees followed the example of theſe prelates, and ſeemed to vie with one another who ſhould be the firſt to make the required ſurrender.

Richard, during theſe tranſactions, made preparations to revenge the many injuries he had received undeſervedly from Philip's perfidy. To this end he raiſed an army; and embarking at Portſmouth in a fleet of one hundred large ſhips, landed at Barfleur, from whence he proceeded to his palace at Bures, near Bayeux. The next morning his brother John, throwing himſelf at his feet, implored his pardon, which was granted through the interceſſion of his mother. "I forgive him," ſaid the king; "and I hope I ſhall as eaſily forget his injuries, as he my pardon." In the following year Richard reſtored to him the counties of Montagne and Glouceſter, with an annuity of eight thouſand livres in lieu of thoſe poſſeſſions not given back to him. But John, in returning to his duty, was guilty of an act of treachery, which has ſtained his name with infamy. Before he left Philip's party, he invited to dinner all the officers which that prince had placed in the citadel of Evreux, and cauſed them to be maſſacred during the entertainment; then fell on the garriſon, with the aſſiſtance of the townſmen, and having put them all to the ſword, delivered up the place to his brother.

At this time Philip was laying ſiege to Verneuil, to the relief of which Richard advanced, reſolving to give him battle; but that prince not being willing to face him, whom he had ſo often injured, declined an engagement, and retired in the night with precipitation. After repairing the walls of Verneuil, the king directed his courſe to Tours, where the citizens voluntarily preſented him with two thouſand marks; and from thence he proceeded to Loches, which he took by aſſault. The king of France, alarmed at the rapid progreſs of the enemy, propoſed a conference at Ponte de l'Arche; but while the Engliſh commiſſioners waited for the Gallic deputies, Philip took the caſtle of Fontaines, near Rouen, and in his retreat ſurpriſed the earl of Leiceſter, in the neighbourhood of Gournay; he afterwards burnt the town of Evreux, and then marched to Fretteval.

This flagrant breach of faith incenſed Richard ſo much, that he advanced to Vendome, to give him battle; but the perfidious Frenchman, not daring to venture an engagement, retired in great confuſion. The Engliſh monarch purſued his flying foe, and coming up with him, defeated his army with great ſlaughter, and Philip narrowly eſcaped with his life. All his baggage and treaſure were taken, with the contracts ſigned by the rebellious barons, who had bound themſelves to aſſiſt Philip and John againſt the king of England. Immediately after this deciſive victory, Richard marched with great expedition into Guienne, againſt the count of Angouleſme, and Geoffrey de Rancone, who had raiſed an inſurrection, and in ſixteen days reduced all their towns and caſtles, and took three hundred knights and forty thouſand ſoldiers.

Philip now ſued in earneſt for peace, and a truce for a year was concluded between the two monarchs. In this interval, in order to regulate his revenue, Richard directed the itinerant juſtices to make an exact detail of the eſtates of the crown, and the lands of wards, with eſcheats and forfeitures; he alſo obliged the Jews to deliver true inventories of their eſtates on pain of forfeiture. The biſhop of Ely was deprived of his office of chancellor, and, a new ſeal being made, a very conſiderable ſum of money was produced by fees paid for the renewing of charters.

Leopold, duke of Auſtria, having about this time cruſhed his leg, by a fall from his horſe at a tournament, a fever enſued, which brought on a mortification; and on the approach of death, being ſtruck with remorſe for his injuſtice to Richard, he ordered, by his will, that all the Engliſh hoſtages in his hands ſhould be ſet at liberty; that the money which he had received for his ranſom ſhould be returned, and the remainder of the debt due to him be remitted. His ſon was ſo unwilling to execute theſe articles, that he ſuffered his father's body to lie a week unburied, before he would releaſe the hoſtages; for the clergy unanimouſly refuſed to perform the funeral rites till the whole of theſe articles were complied with.

A. D. 1196. From the contentions, founded on animoſity, that ſubſiſted between Philip and Richard, aroſe a continual ſeries of hoſtilities, and truces, which were broken almoſt as ſoon as concluded. They were little more than ceſſations from war, till both parties could recruit their armies. But to ſupport theſe military expeditions, Richard was obliged to load his ſubjects with taxes, which, by becoming intolerable, excited among them a general complaint; and the great talents of Hubert, the juſticiary, were hardly ſufficient to prevent the univerſal diſcontent from breaking out into open rebellion. Theſe diſturbances were greatly augmented by one William Fitz-Oſborn, commonly called Longbeard; who had gained great popularity among the rabble, by exclaiming, how grievouſly the poor had been oppreſſed by an unequal aſſeſſment of the taxes for the ranſom of the king. He was continually exciting a ſpirit of reſentment in the poor againſt the rich, by the moſt inflammatory ſpeeches; pretending there was a colluſion among the great to eaſe themſelves of the load of public taxes, and to throw the whole weight on the ſhoulders of the labouring poor, who were conſidered in no better light than that of beaſts of burden. Theſe inſinuations produced the deſired effect; the fury of the people was raiſed to a height bordering on madneſs; and a tumult enſued in St. Paul's Church-Yard, where ſeveral perſons loſt their lives.

The juſticiary, alarmed by this dangerous inſurrection, ordered Longbeard (a name given him, becauſe he ſuffered his beard to grow to an enormous length) to appear before him; but he was ſo far from obeying the ſummons, that he killed the officer who delivered the citation. The more ſenſible part of his followers were ſtruck with horror at this inhuman action; they abandoned the pretended advocate for the rights of the people, and a few of the loweſt ſort only now adhered to him. He ſaw the deſertion of the greateſt part of his followers, but continued for ſome days to rob and murder his fellow citizens with cruel barbarity. It was now high time for government to interpoſe, in order to prevent an open rebellion. A ſtrong party of ſoldiers were accordingly ſent into the city, with ſtrict orders to apprehend the incendiary, dead or alive.

The rioters were ſtruck with terror, and retired, with Longbeard at their head, to the church of St. Mary le Bow, where they ſhut themſelves up, hoping that a general inſurrection would follow in their favour. They were deceived: the citizens ſaw their error, and abandoned him to his fate. Longbeard however refuſed to ſurrender; and being driven from the body of the church, he retreated with his followers into the ſteeple, from whence they diſcharged a ſhower of ſtones, darts and other miſſiles, on their aſſailants. Unwilling to expoſe the lives of the ſoldiers to the attacks of ſuch deſperadoes, the officers cauſed a large quantity of wet ſtraw to be carried into the body of the church, and ſet on fire. The ſmoke effectually anſwered the propoſed end, and prevented any further oppoſition. The inſurgents, apprehenſive of ſuffocation, ſurrendered at diſcretion. Longbeard was ſentenced to be drawn at a horſe's tail through the principal ſtreets of the city, and afterwards to be hung in chains with nine of his accomplices.

A. D. 1197. As the emperor now beheld the ſuperiority of Richard's arms over thoſe of France, he made advances for his friendſhip; and offered to give him a diſcharge from the ſhare of his ranſom that remained unpaid, on condition of his entering into an offenſive alliance againſt Philip. Richard readily embraced this propoſal. But though the treaty with the emperor took no effect, it ſerved to rekindle the war between England and France, before the truce was expired. It was carried on in Normandy with unremitted animoſity, but produced very few remarkable events. Richard indeed having formed an alliance with the counts of Champagne, Thoulouſe, Bologne, Flanders, and other conſiderable vaſſals, imagined he ſhould now gain great advantages over his rival. But he ſoon experienced the inſincerity of thoſe princes, and was unable to make much impreſſion on the dominions of ſo active and crafty an opponent as Philip. In order to fruſtrate his deſigns, Richard ſtrengthened the frontiers of Normandy; and making himſelf maſter of the town of St. Vallery, in Picardy, deſtroyed the caſtle, and ſeized all the ſhips in the harbour. Prince John and Marcadee, generals of the Brabantines, took the caſtle of Melly, in Beauvais, and demoliſhed the fortifications.

The biſhop, Peter de Dreux, a martial prelate, and couſin-german to the king of France, was taken priſoner, and was cloſely confined at Rouen, loaded with fetters. Two of the clergy waited on the king, to requeſt his majeſty, that more lenity might be ſhewn to the biſhop, when the king, who hated him, informed them, that he having received many injuries from him, while in Germany, had ordered him his preſent puniſhment by way of retaliation. The pope was alſo applied to in his behalf, who demanded his liberty, calling him his ſon, and inſiſted in ſtrong terms on the privileges of the church. Richard ſent to his holineſs the coat of mail Peter had worn in battle, and which was beſmeared with blood, ordering the meſſenger to uſe the words of Jacob's ſons to their father, "This have we found; know now whether it is thy ſon's coat or not." The pontiff, who knew Richard's haughty ſpirit was not to be trifled with, replied, "That the coat ſent by the king did not belong to a ſon of the church, but to a ſon of the camp; and that the priſoner ſhould repoſe in Richard's mercy alone for redreſs." The prelate thus abandoned, was obliged to purchaſe his liberty at the price of ten thouſand marks.

The abſence of the king, and his engagements in foreign wars, encouraged the Welſh to invade his dominions. Rees, prince of South-Wales, collecting a conſiderable number of forces, laid ſiege to the town and caſtle of Caermarthen, which he took and laid in aſhes. Roger Mortimer and Hugh Say, two noblemen of the greateſt intereſt in thoſe parts, attempted to check his progreſs, but were routed with great loſs. The caſtles of Culn, Radnor, and Pain, now fell into the hands of Rees; but the laſt was delivered to its owner, William de Brouſe, on certain conditions. The progreſs of the Welſh at length drew the regent himſelf into the field, at the head of a powerful army; but the Welſh were wiſe enough not to hazard a battle, ſo that all Hubert could do was to take a few of their caſtles, which, as ſoon as the ſeaſon obliged him to retire, fell again into their hands.

Obſervation proves, that the convulſions of kingdoms, equally with thoſe of nature, have their advantages. The Holy War muſt have ſhaken every pillar of ſtate, and weakened every nerve of government, had not the ſpirit of commerce happily ſucceeded that of war. Richard's cruſading adventures had opened to his Engliſh ſubjects countries almoſt unknown to them before, and intercourſes hitherto unattempted. The ports of England, in conſequence of the conqueror's eſtabliſhments, continued yet free, or at leaſt, their cuſtoms were ſo ſmall, as hardly to be felt, and natural conveniences promoted mutual advantages. All the continent of Europe had been for ſome years in arms; England alone enjoyed the happineſs of peace. This invited commerce; nor could the kingdom have otherwiſe ſupplied the immenſe ſums that were every year furniſhed for fruitleſs wars on the continent. As all taxes, in their laſt reſort, fall upon the landed intereſt, the meaner tenants felt themſelves intenſely oppreſſed; but the trading part of the nation opened channels of traffic, which, in time, ſupplied thoſe tenants with the means of anſwering the demands of government. But as the means of the one increaſed, the claims of the other kept equal pace with the augmentation; and about this time the influx of riches and treaſure greatly altered the value of the ſpecie: for it appeared by the regent's accounts, that he had raiſed, at a medium, five hundred and fifty thouſand marks for the king's uſe only, during the two preceding years of his adminiſtration. This vaſt increaſe of revenue could be owing only to the great increaſe of commerce, ſince ſo few years before, the raiſing an hundred and fifty thouſand marks had been attended with the utmoſt diſtreſs.

A. D. 1199.

In Normandy the war was carried on with ſuch ferocity, that both kings frequently put out the eyes of their priſoners; but Philip, finding no advantage could be gained over the Engliſh monarch by arms, and weary of a war which exhauſted his country, applied to pope Innocent III. who then filled the papal chair, to employ his good offices in bringing about a peace with Richard. The pope readily complied with his requeſt, and ſent the cardinal of St. Mary to act as mediator between the contending parties. A negociation was accordingly begun, and conſiderable progreſs made in a treaty for a permanent peace, when the death of Richard, by an unfortunate accident, put an end to the negociation and all his labours.

Having laid ſiege to the caſtle of Chalus, in order to compel Vidomar, viſcount de Limoges, one of the vaſſals, to deliver to him a conſiderable treaſure, which that nobleman had found in his grounds, but which Richard claimed as ſuperior lord of the country; he one day, attended by Marcadee, in reconnoitering the place, ventured too near, when Bertram de Gourdon, an archer, took an aim at him from the wall of the caſtle, and pierced him in the ſhoulder with an arrow, cloſe to the neck. An unſkilful ſurgeon, endeavouring to extract the weapon, mangled the fleſh ſo deſperately, that the wound gangrened, of which he died, eleven days after the fatal deſign was executed, on the 6th of April, in the forty-ſecond year of his age, and the tenth of his reign. When he found his end approaching, he requeſted his will might be made, by which he bequeathed the kingdom of England, with all his other dominions, and three fourths of his treaſure to his brother John: the remaining fourth he divided among his ſervants and the poor; and to his nephew Otho, emperor of Germany, he bequeathed all his jewels. His body he ordered to be buried at Fontevraud in Anjou, at the feet of the king his father, in order to teſtify his grief for his undutiful behaviour towards him.

Richard left only one natural ſon, named Philip, to whom he bequeathed the lordſhip of Cognac in Guienne. A ſhort time before his death the caſtle of Chalus was taken by ſtorm, and all the garriſon hanged except Bertram de Gourdon, who being brought into the king's preſence, on ſeeing him, he cried, "Wretch! what have I ever done, what injury from me, that you ſhould ſeek my life?"—"What have you done to me!" the priſoner cooly replied with an air of bravery; "Why you killed with your own hands my father, and my two brothers, and you intended to have hanged me. I am now in your power. Satiſfy your revenge. I am prepared to ſuffer every torment you can inflict, ſhall endure them all and die with pleaſure, ſince I have been the inſtrument to deliver the world from ſuch a tyrant, who has filled it with blood and carnage." This ſpirited reply had more effect on the mind of Richard, than all the admonitions of the ghoſtly confeſſor. He ordered Gourdon to be ſet at liberty, and to be preſented with one hundred ſhillings; but Marcadee, like a true ruffian, ordered the unhappy man to be flead alive, and afterwards hanged.

Many remarkable occurrences happened during this reign, the noticing of which may perhaps be acceptable to our readers. Richard added three lions paſſant to his arms, being the firſt king of England that ever bore them. He alſo ordered one ſtandard for weights and meaſures, that they might be the ſame throughout the kingdom. The city of London aſſumed a new form of juriſdiction, by chuſing a mayor, and being divided into ſeveral corporations and ſocieties, now called companies. Henry Fitz-Alvin was the firſt mayor of London, and continued in that office four and twenty years. We cannot give any circumſtance more curious, reſpecting the cuſtoms of the age in this reign, than the manner in which engagements at ſea, and the ſieges of fortified towns were carried on, before gunpowder was invented.

All the ſhips of war were gallies, with two rows of oars, and to the prow was fixed a piece of wood, commonly called a ſpur, deſigned to ſtrike and pierce the ſhips of the enemy. There were alſo leſſer gallies, with only one tier of oars, which being ſhorter, and therefore moving with greater facility, were fitter for throwing combuſtibles, and were uſed for this purpoſe. In order to give an idea of naval engagements, we ſhall give a deſcription of one, which the Chriſtians, who were going to the ſiege of Ptolemais, had with the Turks on that coaſt. When the fleets were advancing to engage, that of the Chriſtians was drawn up in a creſcent or half moon, and at the two ends of the curve were placed the largeſt gallies, that they might the better repel the attacks of the enemy. On the upper deck of each galley the ſoldiers belonging to it were drawn up in a circle, with their bucklers cloſely joined, the rowers ſitting all together on the lower deck, that thoſe who fought above might have the more room. The action began on both ſides with a diſcharge of their miſſile weapons: then the Chriſtians rowed forwards with all their force to ſtrike the enemies gallies, with the ſpurs or beaks of theirs: after which they came to cloſe fighting; the oppoſite oars were mixed and entangled together; they held the gallies together with grappling irons, and fired the planks with a kind of burning oil, commonly called Greek-wildfire, which, with a pernicious ſtench, our author, Geoffrey de Vineſauf, ſays, conſumed even flint and iron, nor could be extinguiſhed but by ſprinkling ſand, or pouring vinegar upon it. While this wildfire was known only to the Greeks, it was of great uſe in the defence of Conſtantinople; but in the twelfth century the ſecret was diſcovered by many other nations, and was alſo uſed in the defence of towns, caſtles, &c.

About this time the military art was in many particulars the ſame with that of the antient Romans. Among other machines uſed by them in ſieges, the Engliſh and other nations had moveable towers built of wood, and of ſuch a height that the tops of them overlooked the battlements of the city. They were covered with raw hides, to prevent their being burnt, and had alſo a net work of ropes, which hung before them, in order to deaden the violence of the ſtones that were thrown againſt them by the engines of the beſieged; theſe engines were the baliſtæ of the antients; their force was prodigious; they threw ſtones of vaſt weight, and were employed by the beſiegers to batter the walls, and by the beſieged to defend them. Their manner of fortifying towns and caſtles, was alſo much the ſame as had been practiſed by the old Romans: but the armies differed much from thoſe of that people; for their principal ſtrength was in cavalry, whereas among the Romans it conſiſted of their legions, which was chiefly compoſed of infantry.

Strictures on the Character of Richard I.

Richard in his perſon was fair, tall, comely, and well proportioned, with prodigious bodily ſtrength. His eyes were blue, and full of vivacity; he had light hair, and a majeſtic manner; and it has been remarked, that his arms were unuſually long. He was poſſeſſed of a good underſtanding, an uncommon penetration, and a fund of manly eloquence. His converſation was ſpirited, and he was particularly admired for his talent of repartee. But the moſt dazzling part of his character was his military talents. No man, even in that romantic age, carried perſonal courage and intrepidity to a greater height, and from this quality he gained the appellation of Lion's-heart. He was paſſionately fond of military glory, and never thought any toils, any dangers, any difficulties, too great to attain it. His talents were admirably adapted to the acquiſition of renown, and he poſſeſſed the good as well as the bad qualities incident to that character. He was therefore much better qualified to dazzle his contemporaries by the ſplendor of his enterprizes, than either to promote the happineſs of his people, or his own true grandeur, by a ſound and well regulated policy. Several writers have given a ſtrange contradictory deſcription of his character, by ſaying, he was open, frank, generous, ſincere, and brave; but at the ſame time, ambitious, domineering, haughty, reſentful, proud, and cruel; jarring qualities which cannot be ſuppoſed to have ever exiſted in one man. His behaviour to his father was certainly unnatural and baſe; but then it is to be conſidered, he unhappily fell into the hands of a crafty, politic Frenchman, at an age too when the paſſions are ſeldom under the guidance of cool reaſon; and his ſincere contrition is far from being an indication of a bad heart, under the influence of pride, revenge, or cruelty. The open frankneſs with which he pardoned his brother John, after a ſeries of ingratitude, treachery, and rebellion, and the readineſs with which he renewed his truces with the perfidious monarch of France, are ſuch ſtriking inſtances of generoſity and condeſcenſion, as are not to be met with but in great and exalted minds. The ſame may be obſerved of his conduct towards Bertram, by whom he was mortally wounded. His love of glory carried him into the fields of Paleſtine; and if in the exerciſe of his great military talents, or in the courſe of his reign, ſome actions appear arbitrary, oppreſſive, and cruel, we muſt remember he was of a warm, paſſionate temper, which frequently involved him in expeditions, calculated rather to promote his own glory, than the intereſts of his people; to ſupport which he impoſed many exorbitant, ſometimes unjuſtifiable taxes; and yet he was greatly beloved by his Engliſh ſubjects, and is conſidered the firſt prince who bore them a ſincere affection. Eminent talents, nay even ſhining virtues, in ſuperior minds, are frequently ſhaded with headſtrong paſſions, and remarkable vices. His enterprizing genius would not ſuffer him to remain long inactive; ſo that, during the whole of his reign, he was not more than eight months in England. He ſpent near three years in the cruſade, and notwithſtanding his paſt miſfortunes, he was ſo pleaſed with the fame he had acquired in the eaſt, that he determined to expoſe himſelf to new hazards, and to have again exhauſted his kingdom by another expedition into the Holy Land. It is pretended, in proof of his tyranny and cruelty, that Hubert, his juſticiary, ſent him over to France, in the ſpace of three years, the ſum of one million, one hundred thouſand marks; but the value of land, and prices of commodities, prove, that no ſuch enormous ſums could be levied on the people. A hide of land, which conſiſted of about a hundred and twenty acres, was then let for twenty ſhillings a year, and there were but two hundred and forty-three thouſand ſix hundred hydes in England. The uſual price of an ox was four ſhillings, of a labouring horſe the ſame, of a ſow one ſhilling, of a ſheep with fine wool ten-pence, and with coarſe ſixpence; beſides, the revenues of the crown, being in this, and ſeveral former reigns, moſtly ſpent abroad, there could be but little ſpecie circulating in the kingdom. However cenſurable, therefore, the conduct of this king may appear in the eyes of ſome, it muſt be univerſally allowed, that he excelled all the princes of his time in heroic courage; and as, with all his faults, he was beloved by the Engliſh, it is in our opinion, a duty incumbent on their poſterity, to touch his reputation with a tender hand and an impartial judgment.

CHAP. II.

JOHN.

John aſcends the throne agreeable to the will of his predeceſſor, notwithſtanding Arthur, ſon to Geoffrey, John's elder brother, had a preferable title—He is crowned at Weſtminſter, on the twenty-eighth of May—War with France renewed, in the courſe of which, Arthur is taken priſoner and baſely murdered—The whole of John's foreign dominions conquered, and united by Philip to the crown of France—John quarrels with the pope, in conſequence of which his kingdom is laid under an interdict, and he himſelf excommunicated—An inſurrection of the barons, who compel him to ſign, in Runnemede-meadow, a charter of liberties, called MAGNA CHARTA, or the great charter, A. D. 1215—He endeavours with the aſſiſtance of foreign mercenaries to revoke his grants; and the barons invite over Lewis, ſon to the king of France—The civil war terminated by the death of John—His character.

A. D. 1199. JOHN, who was ſurnamed Sans-terre, or Lackland, becauſe his father left him no inheritance, ſucceeded his brother, Richard I. Richard, before his departure to the Holy Land, had appointed Arthur, ſon to his brother Geoffrey, his ſucceſſor, but afterwards changed his mind, and by his laſt will bequeathed his ſceptre to his brother John; notwithſtanding which there remained a doubt as to the right of ſucceſſion, which had not been ſettled by any law ſince the time of William the Conqueror. It was a queſtion, whether Arthur, duke of Brittany, had not a prior right to his uncle, being the immediate repreſentative of his father Geoffrey; and it was likewiſe doubted, whether, if the law was favourable to the nephew, Richard had a right to diſpoſe of his poſſeſſion. However, John found no difficulty in prevailing on the Engliſh to declare in his favour; for while he continued on the continent to ſecure his foreign dominions, he left the care of his affairs in England to Hubert, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and William Mareſchal, in conjunction with queen Eleanor, and Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, the chief juſticiary. Theſe having fixed the greateſt men of the kingdom in his intereſt, invited them to meet at Northampton; where they magnified the liberality and munificent diſpoſition of John, and prevailed on them to acknowledge him as the ſovereign, by taking the oath of fealty. John having been informed of the ſteps taken in his favour, embarked for England, and landing at Shoreham, proceeded immediately to London, where he had arrived only two days, when he was crowned in Weſtminſter-abbey, with the uſual ceremonies, on the twenty-eighth of May, by Hubert, archbiſhop of Canterbury. Immediately after his coronation, he confirmed the archbiſhop in his office of chancellor, created Mareſchal, earl of Pembroke, and Fitz-Peter, earl of Eſſex, beſides conferring ſeveral marks of diſtinction on other barons. However ſeveral of the provinces on the continent revolted. The barons of Touraine, Maine, and Anjou, declared in favour of Arthur, his nephew, and applied to the king of France for aſſiſtance. Philip, who wiſhed for an opportunity to embarraſs John, took young Arthur under his protection, ſending him, with his ſon Lewis, to be educated at Paris. Theſe tranſactions occaſioned a renewal of hoſtilities between the Engliſh and French, which was continued for a while with trifling ſucceſſes to either party; but the intriguing policy of Philip contributed to enable John to bring this war to a concluſion; for the French king behaving in the provinces that had declared for Arthur, without any regard to the intereſt of this prince, Conſtantia, his mother, became jealous of Philip's deſigns; and finding means to carry off Arthur ſecretly from Paris, ſhe put him into the hands of his uncle; reſtored thoſe provinces which had revolted; and made the young prince do homage to John for the duchy of Brittany. This unexpected event induced Philip to deſire a peace, which, after ſeveral fruitleſs conferences, was concluded, ſeemingly to the ſatisfaction of all contending parties. Thus by the mutual jealouſies of his enemies, did John become the undiſputed ſovereign of all the dominions appertaining to the crown of England, yet he had not prudence ſufficient to preſerve the power he ſo eaſily acquired.

One of John's firſt imprudent ſteps, which proved the ſource of many misfortunes, was his indulging a paſſion for Iſabella, the daughter of the count of Angouleme, Aymar Taillefer, while his own wife was living, and at a time when the young lady was under a contract of marriage with Hugh, count de la Marche, who was paſſionately in love with her, and to whoſe care, on account of her tender years, ſhe had been conſigned. Regardleſs of this engagement, or the conſequences that might follow his weak conduct, John prevailed upon Taillefer to carry off his daughter from her huſband; and having procured a divorce from his wife Aviſa, heireſs of the family of Glouceſter, under pretence that ſhe was too nearly related to him, married Iſabella, giving himſelf not the leaſt concern about the menaces of the pope, who loudly complained of ſuch irregular proceedings, or the reſentment of the injured count. An inſurrection againſt him was immediately formed, which obliged him to apply to his Engliſh ſubjects for aſſiſtance; and by their aid the conteſt was ſoon decided in his favour; which ſerved only to excite him to the commiſſion of other acts equally impolitic and unjuſtifiable. At this period it was common for diſputes of all kinds to be determined by the barbarous cuſtom of duelling, which, with ſhame be it ſpoken, continues in an age ſo refined as the preſent. Cauſes in the lords court being frequently decided by this antient uſuage, John retained for his champions certain bravos, who were deputed to fight in his behalf, when any of the nobility ſhould oppoſe the rapid ſtrides he made towards arbitrary power. The count de la Marche, and other barons, conſidered this both as an affront and an injury, delaring they would never draw their ſwords againſt men of ſuch inferior quality. The conſequence of which was, that another confederacy of the French barons was formed againſt him; to break which John had recourſe to promiſes, oaths, and proteſtations; but having violated every engagement, his enemies, knowing his weakneſs, reſolved to puſh him to extremities; and they were ſoon encouraged in their oppoſition to his deſpicable adminiſtration by the junction of a new ally.

A. D. 1203. Young Arthur, who was now riſing to man's eſtate, apprehenſive of his uncle's dangerous character, reſolved to ſeek ſecurity by an union with Philip and the diſcontented barons, and therefore joined the French army, which had begun hoſtilities againſt the king of England. Philip received him with marks of diſtinction, knighted him, gave him in marriage his daughter Mary, and not only inveſted him with the duchy of Brittany, but with the counties of Maine and Anjou, which had been reſigned by him to his uncle. The progreſs of the French forces was remarkably rapid; inſomuch that John made ſeveral advances towards a peace; but the French monarch declared, that he would not ſheath the ſword, unleſs the king of England would ſubmit to reſign all his tranſmarine dominions to his nephew, the undoubted and lawful heir. Philip now ſupported the intereſt of Arthur with the utmoſt vigour. Several towns ſubmitted to the young prince, and for a while ſucceſs ſeemed to follow his footſteps. He knew that queen Eleanor was a ſworn enemy to his intereſt, and conceived a deſign of ſecuring her perſon. She reſided in the caſtle of Mirabel, the fortifications of which were in a ruinous condition; the garriſon too few to make a long reſiſtance. Arthur being placed by Philip at the head of two hundred knights, he led them precipitantly againſt that fortreſs. It was taken at the firſt aſſault; but the queen, with the greater part of the garriſon, retired into the tower, there making a gallant defence. The danger of his mother rouſed John from his indolence. He marched to her relief with an army of Engliſh and Brabanters, attacked the camp of Arthur, put his forces to flight, took the young prince, together with the count of Marche, and moſt of the revolted barons priſoners. The king ſent the greater part of his captives over to England, but Arthur was impriſoned in the caſtle of Falaiſe; after which he returned into Normandy in triumph, without improving his victory. The rival of John being now in his power, he began to conſider how he ſhould diſpoſe of him, ſo as to prevent his being troubleſome in future; and it immediately ſtruck the daſtardly tyrant, that to be happy he muſt commence aſſaſſin; and that his death alone could be effectual to anſwer the propoſed end.

Our hiſtorians vary in their accounts of the manner this young prince came to his end, but it is generally allowed, that he was never ſeen in public after his confinement; and the following circumſtances, that attended a black deed of darkneſs, appear to be beſt authenticated. The king, it is ſaid, firſt propoſed to William de la Braye, one of his ſervants, to diſpatch Arthur; but he replied with a becoming ſpirit, "that he was a gentleman, not an executioner;" and refuſed to comply with the king's deſire. Thus diſappointed, John applied to another inſtrument of murder, leſs ſcrupulous, who actually went to the caſtle in which the prince was confined, with a view of putting him to death; but this intended aſſaſſin having informed Hubert de Bourg, who was chamberlain to the king, and conſtable of Falaiſe, of the nature of his commiſſion, the latter, anxious to ſave the life of the young innocent, told the other, that he himſelf would undertake to execute the king's mandate, and having ſent away the aſſaſſin, ſpread abroad a report of Arthur's death, and to give it credit, performed publicly all the ceremonies of his interment. It is not to be imagined, that an affair of this dark complexion could long remain a ſecret. Conſtantia was inconſolable, ſuppoſing her ſon to have been murdered, their faithful adherents threatened the ſevereſt revenge; the revolted barons perſevered more obſtinately in their rebellion; and public clamor growing every day ſtronger, Hubert thought it moſt prudent to inform the world, that the young prince was yet ſafe in cuſtody. This circumſtance coming to the knowledge of the king, he determined to be himſelf the perpetrator of that bloody deed, for which he could not find a ready executioner. To execute this horrid purpoſe with ſecrecy, he cauſed Arthur to be removed to the caſtle of Rouen, on the borders of the river Seine; and going in a boat to that place, during the dead of night, he commanded that young Arthur ſhould be brought before him. A ſeries of miſfortunes, impriſonment, and fearful apprehenſions of an untimely end, had ſo dejected the ſpirit of this unfortunate prince, that unable, in ſuch a trying moment, to ſupport himſelf with any degree of fortitude, he fell at the feet of his uncle, and implored his compaſſion; but the inhuman butcher, callous to all the finer feelings of humanity, with a look of revenge, making no reply, ſtabbed him with his own barbarous hands; then faſtening a ſtone to his body caſt it into the river Seine. From the ruin that purſued this inhuman murderer of his kinſman, princes may learn, that the direct path of honour is altogether as eligible for thoſe in the higheſt, as for thoſe in more humble ſtations; and the middling claſs of people, by attending to the juſtice of providence, vindicated on this and many other inſtances, throughout the hiſtory of England, may perceive, that notwithſtanding the inequalities of this life, there are certain puniſhments the conſequences of criminal actions, and a ſure retribution, in many caſes, of a vicious conduct, even independant of, and previous to, a world to come. All Europe accuſed John of murder, though perpetrated in the inner chamber, at the ſolemn hour of midnight. The crimſon deed rendered him univerſally hated; and he was henceforward the leaſt able to find friends, when he ſtood in need of aſſiſtance.

The now unhappy diſconſolate Conſtantia cried aloud for revenge and protection. She applied to the king of France, preſenting a petition ſigned by all the barons in Brittany. Philip readily undertook her cauſe, and ſummoned the king of England before his court, to take his trial for the ſuppoſed murder of prince Arthur. But when the day of hearing came, John appeared only by his deputies, the biſhop of Ely and Hubert de Bourg. Their buſineſs was to demand of Philip a ſafe conduct for their maſter to the court of France. "He may come ſafely," ſaid Philip, with a ſtern countenance: "but will he be alſo ſafe in returning?" replied the biſhop of Ely. "Yes," anſwered Philip, "if the judgment of his peers will permit him." The ambaſſadors ſufficiently perceived the inſidious tendency of this expreſſion, and inſiſted upon a clearer explanation, and the king's granting a ſafe conduct. Philip refuſed this; ſwearing by all the ſaints of France, "That he ſhould return no otherwiſe than according to the ſentence of the court." The biſhop then told Philip, "that John was to be conſidered as king of England, as well as duke of Normandy; and the barons of England would not permit their king to riſque his life or his liberty at the French court, even though he ſhould agree to it himſelf." Philip's anſwer was both ready and juſt. "If, my lord," ſaid he, "the duke of Normandy's ambition led him to acquire a higher title, ought I, who am his lord, to loſe his allegiance as my vaſſal? What is it to me that he has aſcended the throne of England?" The ambaſſadors remained ſilent; for his remarks were unanſwerable upon the principles of the feudal law. The court therefore proceeded to paſs the following ſentence: "That John, duke of Normandy, not regarding the oath he had taken to Philip his lord, and being a vaſſal of the king of France, had, within the ſeigniory of that crown, murdered his elder brother's ſon, who was alſo a vaſſal of the ſame; therefore the ſaid John is declared a traitor; and, as an enemy to the crown of France, he is adjudged to forfeit all his ſeigniories, which he held by homage, and re-entry into the ſame is ordered to be made by force."

John from this period had no other means of ſupporting his power, than by ſeverity to thoſe whom he thought might oppoſe him, and making it the intereſt of others to engage in his ſervice. His late crime was ſucceeded by a ſupine inactivity, and his time ſpent in dalliance with his young queen. With his innocence he had loſt his ſpirit. He had dipped his hands in blood, and was more fearful of reflection than puniſhment. He ſtrove to delude his own heart, and in the ſtream of pleaſure drown the voice of conſcious guilt.

Now Philip, whoſe ambitious views had been hitherto reſtrained by the martial genius of Richard, prepared to put the ſentence againſt John into execution. A more favourable event could not have happened, for annexing to his crown ſo many valuable fiefs, which, during ſeveral ages, had been diſmembered from it. His vaſſals were in no condition to oppoſe him; the inhuman action of John engaged them to his ſide; the duchy of Brittany, exaſperated at the murder of their prince, promoted all his meaſures, and rendered all his attempts on Normandy eaſy and ſucceſsful. The count of Alençon deſerted his ſovereign, and delivered up all the places under his command to the French monarch, who now ſeparated his army, in order to give them ſome repoſe.

In the mean time, John, ſuddenly collecting his forces, laid ſiege to Alençon; when Philip, unable to reaſſemble his ſcattered troops, found an expedient to prevent the mortification of ſeeing his friend and confederate oppreſſed. A tournament being at that time held at Moret, in the Gatinois, whither all the chief nobility of France and its neighbourhood had reſorted, Philip preſented himſelf before them, and with great addreſs pointed out the plains of Alençon as the more honourable field, wherein they might not only ſignalize their courage, but, by aſſiſting him, diſplay their generoſity. The martial ſpirit of theſe brave knights inſtantly took fire. They vowed to take ample vengeance on the tyrannical murderer; and putting themſelves, with their retinues, under the command of Philip, marched without the leaſt delay to the relief of Alençon; when John, hearing of their approach, raiſed the ſiege, and fled with ſuch precipitation, that all his tents, military machines, and baggage, fell into the hands of the enemy. This was almoſt the laſt feeble effort of that cowardly prince, for the defence of his foreign dominions. He remained inactive at Rouen, ſpending his time in paſtimes with his wife, as if he had been in a ſtate of profound tranquillity, and his affairs in the moſt happy ſituation. If war was ever mentioned, he gave himſelf ſuch vaunting airs as made him ſtill more contemptible. "Let the French go on," ſaid he, "I will retake in one day what it has coſt them years to acquire." The Engliſh barons, ſeeing the progreſs of the French arms without reſiſtance, were amazed at his ſtupidity. Finding their time waſted to no purpoſe, they ſecretly withdrew from their colours and returned to England, reſolving no longer to defend a weak, indolent prince, who had deſerted himſelf.

Notwithſtanding John thus neglected every natural expedient for his ſafety, he had the meanneſs to apply to pope Innocent III. whom he entreated to interpoſe his authority between him and the king of France. Innocent, pleaſed with an opportunity of exerting the papal authority, ſent Philip orders to ceaſe hoſtilities, and to make peace with the king of England; but theſe commands were received with indignation by the French barons, who diſclaimed the temporal authority exerted by the pontiff; and Philip, inſtead of paying obedience to them, laid ſiege to Chateau Gaillard.

A. D. 1204.

Roger de Lacy, conſtable of Cheſter, and one of the moſt able generals of the age, defended this place with the greateſt intrepidity for a whole year. The fortreſs was remarkable for its ſtrength; and Philip was obliged to reduce it by a blockade. The intrepid governor, after having repulſed every attempt, to which ſucceeded the miſeries of famine, was at laſt ſubdued by a ſudden aſſault in the night time, and taken priſoner, with the whole of his garriſon. Philip, charmed with the abilities of Lacy, treated him with great reſpect, and allowed him the whole city of Paris for the place of his confinement. True magnanimity reſpects valour, even in an enemy. Philip found little difficulty in reducing the other fortreſſes of Normandy. Every city opened its gates at the approach of the French monarch. The inhabitants of Rouen, indeed, who hated the French, would willingly have defended themſelves to the laſt extremity; but ſome of their outworks being taken, and finding, left as they were to themſelves, all further reſiſtance would be in vain, they agreed to deliver up the place, provided they were not relieved in thirty days. No ſupply arrived, and the French monarch took poſſeſſion of the city. The other towns followed the example of the capital. Thus was the important duchy of Normandy united to the crown of France, near three centuries after the ceſſion of it by Charles the Simple, to Rollo the firſt duke. Animated with his preſent career of ſucceſs, Philip now led his army into the weſtern provinces, where he ſoon reduced under his dominion, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, and part of Poictou. Thus, by the puſillanimity of John, within three years the French crown received ſuch an acceſſion of power and grandeur, as, in the ordinary courſe of things, might have required ſeveral ages to attain. In the mean time John, in order to cover this diſgrace, on his arrival in England exclaimed loudly againſt his barons, who he pretended had deſerted his ſtandard in Normandy; and extorted from them, in a very arbitrary manner, a ſeventh part of all their moveables, as a puniſhment for their offence. Soon after he compelled them to grant him two marks and a half on each knight's fee, for an expedition into Normandy, but did not attempt to go there. The next year he ſummoned all his barons to attend him on that expedition; but meeting with ſome oppoſition from his miniſters, he diſmiſſed both the fleet and army. He next put to ſea with a ſmall body of forces, and it was believed that he now intended to exert himſelf for the recovery of his dominions. Perhaps his guilty fears would not ſuffer him to proceed; for, after a few days, his ſubjects were ſurprized to ſee him return, like another Caligula, without having made the leaſt attempt.

A. D. 1205.

A. D. 1206.

This year John appeared to be inſpired with freſh ardor, declaring he would ſtrike a ſtroke which ſhould reſtore the drooping honours of his country. Gui de Thouars, who governed Brittany, being jealous of the rapid progreſs made by his ally the French king, promiſed to join the king of England with all his forces. John embraced the offer; and once more embarking proceeded to Angiers, which city he burnt to the ground; but being informed of the approach of Philip's army, the vain-glorious coward ſtole to his ſhips, reimbarked his army, and ſailed back to England, under additional circumſtances of diſgrace. Nothing was wanting to complete his misfortunes but a quarrel with the church, and this he ſoon effected by his imprudence. It had been cuſtomary for the clergy not to acknowledge any ſubjection but to the pope; and when they had elected any of their order to an eccleſiaſtical dignity, to abide by the confirmation of the ſovereign pontiff. There had been frequent diſputes between the ſuffragan biſhops and the monks of St. Auſtin, reſpecting the election of archbiſhops; and both parties were in poſſeſſion of precedents, which had given a ſanction to their pretenſions. Matters were thus circumſtanced at the time of the death of Hubert, archbiſhop of Canterbury; on which event the monks of St. Auſtin held a private meeting in their cathedral at Canterbury, and elected Reginald their ſub-prior archbiſhop in his room. This election created the utmoſt diſturbance among the biſhops, who inſiſted that their privileges had been invaded; and an eccleſiaſtical conteſt was likely to be the conſequence. John, deficient in policy, as in every other princely qualification, took part with the ſuffragan biſhops, and recommended to them John de Grey, biſhop of Norwich, who was immediately choſen archbiſhop. The conſequence was ſuch as might eaſily have been foreſeen: both parties made an immediate appeal to the ſee of Rome: the ſub-prior ſet out for Italy, to obtain the pope's confirmation of his election; and on the biſhop of Norwich being elected, twelve deputies were ſent to ſupport his election; and the biſhops likewiſe ſent agents to ſupport their cauſe. Innocent ſet aſide both the elections as uncanonical and illegal; and ordered, that the monks ſhould chooſe cardinal Stephen Langton, an Engliſhman then at Rome, archbiſhop of Canterbury. This they for a while refuſed to do; but the pope threatening excommunication in caſe of refuſal, the election was accordingly made, and Langton was conſecrated by the pope.

Innocent, apprehending that this uſurpation on the crown of England would be reſented by that court, wrote John a ſoothing letter, and made him a preſent of four gold rings ſet with precious ſtones, which were repreſented as invaluable, on account of the myſteries they contained; but John, notwithſtanding he accepted the pope's preſent, reſolved not to admit Langton to be archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Weak men are generally violent in their proceedings. On receiving the pope's letter, he ſent two of his knights to expel the monks of St. Auſtin, who took poſſeſſion of their treaſures. Theſe violent proceedings of the king coincided with the pope's wiſhes; who foreſeeing that he would not be able to abide the conteſt with him, had recourſe to every method that he thought would promote the important end he had in view. He ſoothed, implored, and urged the king to a compliance with his determination; and when he found that all theſe modes of proceeding were fruitleſs, he proceeded to threatenings, and ſent three Engliſh prelates to the king to acquaint him, that if he continued pertinacious, the whole kingdom ſhould be laid under an interdict. The reſt of the prelates proſtrated themſelves before the king, beſeeching him in terms of the utmoſt earneſtneſs, that he would accept the biſhop who had been newly elected, reinſtate the monks in poſſeſſion of their convent, and not expoſe his church to the reſentment of the ſee of Rome. Their intreaties, however, were of no kind of uſe, but rather excited the indignation of the king; who ſwore, "by God's teeth," his cuſtomary oath, that, "if the kingdom was put under an interdict, he would baniſh the whole body of the clergy, and confiſcate all their poſſeſſions."

Notwithſtanding this ridiculous vapouring, the pope, who was not ignorant of John's weakneſs, iſſued the fatal interdict, which he had for ſome time held ſuſpended over the head of this infatuated monarch. This ſentence, the political engine of the court of Rome, was calculated to operate with irreſiſtible force on the minds of the people. It was pronounced againſt ſovereigns for the ſlighteſt offences, and made the guilt of one productive of inexpreſſible miſery to millions. The nation hereby was, on a ſudden, deprived of all exterior acts of religion: the altars were ſtripped of their ornaments, the croſſes, the relicks, the pictures, the ſtatues of the ſaints, the images were laid on the ground; and, as if the air itſelf was polluted, the prieſts carefully covered them up, even from their own approach and veneration. The uſe of the bells entirely ceaſed in all churches; they were removed from the ſteeples, and laid on the ground with other ſacred utenſils. The doors were ſhut while maſs was celebrated, and none but prieſts admitted. The laity partook of no religious rite, except baptiſm of new-born infants, and the ſacrament to dying perſons. The dead were not interred in conſecrated ground; they were thrown into ditches, or buried in common fields; nor were their obſequies attended with any funeral ceremonies. Marriage was celebrated in church-yards; the people were prohibited the uſe of meat; debarred from all pleaſures and entertainments; forbid to ſalute each other, or to beſtow a decent attention to their perſons and apparel. Every circumſtance was followed with deep diſtreſs, and created horrid apprehenſions of divine wrath and vengeance.

John, in order to oppoſe temporal to theſe ſpiritual terrors, inſtantly confiſcated the revenues of the clergy who obeyed the interdict; baniſhed the biſhops; ſhut up the monks in their convent, allowing them only a ſmall part of their incomes, to provide them with food and raiment; and treated not only Langton's adherents, but all who obeyed the commands of Rome with the utmoſt rigour. At the ſame time the more ſenſibly to diſtreſs the clergy, and to expoſe them to ridicule, he threw all their concubines into priſon. It may not be amiſs here to obſerve, that after archbiſhop Anſelm had rigorouſly executed in England the canons which enjoined celibacy, the eccleſiaſtics gave almoſt univerſally into concubinage; even convents were ſupplied with this kind of neceſſary proviſion; to which the court of Rome made but a ſlight oppoſition; and it at length became every where uſual, for prieſts to apply to the ordinary to obtain a formal liberty for this indulgence. The biſhop did all he could that the practice ſhould not degenerate into licentiouſneſs; and, to prevent the fleſh gaining an entire aſcendant over the ſpirit, confined the carnal mind to the uſe of one woman; enjoining him to be conſtant to her bed, and obliging him, that the pariſhes might not be overſtocked, or be troubleſome, to provide for her ſubſiſtence, and that of her children. Of what little eſtimation are liberty, and the old inſtitutions of the Bible, when paſſive obedience to the infallibility of antichriſt can purchaſe the whole circle of terreſtrial enjoyments!

A. D. 1208.

John, while the ſtate of the kingdom was in this deplorable ſituation, attempted military expeditions againſt Scotland, Ireland, and the Welch, over whom he gained ſeveral advantages, owing more to the weakneſs of his enemies, than to his own abilities or vigour.

In the mean time, the danger to which his throne was expoſed from the diſſatisfaction of the clergy, encreaſed his propenſity to tyranny; and he became daily more and more obnoxious to his people, who hated a ſovereign that had made himſelf contemptible by his vices. He appears to have diſguſted particularly his nobles, whoſe families he diſhonoured by his licentious amours; whom he alſo attempted to deprive of the pleaſures of hunting, hawking, and fowling; and that his deer might have a ready acceſs into their fields, he ordered the hedges and fences of his foreſts to be levelled. He even obliged them to put into his hands their ſons or near relations, as hoſtages for their allegiance. His meſſengers coming to William de Barouſe, a baron of great diſtinction, his lady imprudently replied to their demand, "That ſhe would never truſt her ſons with a man who had murdered his nephew;" but her huſband, in order to ſoften this bitter ſarcaſm, anſwered, with more moderation, "that if his lady had been wanting in her duty, he knew what was his; and that if he had, in any manner, offended the king, he was ready to anſwer for his offences in the king's court, before his peers." The meſſengers returning without the required hoſtages, John flew into a violent paſſion, reſolving inſtantly to impriſon the earl and his family. But they, being forewarned of their danger, fled to Ireland, where they endeavoured to conceal themſelves; but the tyrant, having diſcovered their retreat, ordered the wife and her ſon to be thrown into priſon, where they were ſtarved to death; and the baron by flying into France narrowly eſcaped.

Among the artifices of the Romiſh court are in particular to advance, by degrees, from the leaſt to the moſt ſevere ſentence. The interdict not having produced its effect, Innocent now proceeded, in 1209, to that of excommunication. This ſecond ſhaft of vengeance was no ſooner hurled againſt John from the Vatican, than its conſequences began to appear. Geoffrey, archdeacon of Norwich, who was one of the barons of the Exchequer, being told that the biſhops of London, Worceſter, and Ely, had paſſed the ſentence, mentioned to his colleague while ſitting on the bench, the danger of ſerving under an excommunicated king; and immediately riſing, they left the court. Exaſperated at the behaviour of Geoffrey, John ordered him to be ſeized, and throwing him into priſon, cauſed his ſhoulders to be covered with a weighty leaden rope; by which, and other ſeverities, he put an end to his life. The biſhops, on finding themſelves expoſed either to the king's jealouſy or the hatred of the people, gradually ſtole out of the kingdom; ſo that at laſt there were only three prelates left to perform the epiſcopal office. Many of the nobility followed them; and thoſe who ſtaid were juſtly ſuſpected of having ſecretly entered into a confederacy againſt his majeſty.

About this time John began to be alarmed at his dangerous ſituation. He therefore ſent for Langton, with whom he had a conference at Dover, and wherein he offered to acknowledge him primate; to ſubmit to the pope; to reſtore the clergy he had baniſhed; and to pay them a limited ſum as a compenſation for the produce of their revenues. But Langton, not ſatisfied with theſe conceſſions, demanded that full reſtitution ſhould be made to all the clergy; a condition which the king was, probably, then unable to fulfil; and foreſeeing that theſe damages would amount to an immenſe ſum, the conference was broken up.

A. D. 1212.

This and another conference, held at Northampton with Pandolf the pope's legate, not having produced the end propoſed, his holineſs proceeded another ſtep againſt his refractory ſon, by abſolving all his ſubjects from their oaths of fidelity and allegiance; declaring every individual in the realm excommunicated, who, either in public or private, had any intercourſe with him at his councils, at his table, or by converſation; which ſentence was denounced with the utmoſt ſolemnity. John, however, ſtill perſevered in his contumacy, which cauſed Innocent to dart his laſt thunderbolt of depoſition againſt the king of England. This ſentence requiring an armed force to put it in execution, the pope caſt his eye on Philip, king of France, offering that monarch, with the crown of England, numberleſs ſpiritual benefits as the reward of his ſervices, for aggrandizing the power of the catholic church. Philip could not reſiſt a prize of ſo tempting a nature. To carry the ſentence into execution, he levied a great army, with a fleet of ſeventeen hundred veſſels, collected in the ports of Normandy; a force, to all appearance, equal to the greatneſs of his intended invaſion. On the other hand, John iſſued out writs, requiring the attendance, not only of all his military vaſſals, but of all able bodied men, at Dover, out of whom he choſe an army of ſixty thouſand men; who, had they been actuated by a love for their king, and zeal to defend their country, might have bid defiance to the power of France, and the thunder of the Vatican. But John, being an excommunicated tyrant, was regarded by the people with horror, at the ſame time that his barons deſpiſed him for his cowardice, and many of them held a treaſonable correſpondence with the enemy.

The eyes of all Europe were now fixed on the vaſt preparations making by different parties; and the fate of the church was expected to be determined by a deciſive blow. This important event, however, was not to be accompliſhed by the ſword. The profound policy of the pope was eminently diſplayed on this occaſion. He knew his intereſt conſiſted in not ſuffering John, deſtitute of fortune and principles, to be overcome by any enemy but himſelf. His view was therefore to intimidate him in ſuch a manner, as might bring him the more eaſily into his meaſures. To this end he ordered his legate Pandolf, to go over to England with a private commiſſion, by which he empowered him, in caſe he found the king in a proper temper, to receive his ſubmiſſion on ſuch terms, as the legate, by virtue of his authority, knew would be acceptable to the Romiſh church.

A. D. 1213.

This legate, Pandolf, in paſſing through France, beheld, with much ſeeming ſatisfaction, the preparations making by Philip for a deſcent on the Engliſh coaſt; and highly extolled that monarch for his zeal in the laudable cauſe in which he had embarked; at the ſame time he ſent over two knights Templars, to deſire an interview with John at Dover, which was readily granted. On his arrival in England, the legate uſed every artifice to bring this infatuated prince to a compliance with his propoſals. He painted in ſtrong colours the inveterate hatred his meaſures had produced among his ſubjects; he acquainted him with a ſecret confederacy, which he urged was then forming againſt him; he magnified Philip's prodigious armament, that John, terrified at his loſt condition, promiſed to ſubmit entirely to the pope; to acknowledge Langton for primate; to reſtore all the exiled clergy; to admit to his grace all who had been outlawed or impriſoned; to grant a compenſation for all damages ſuffered by thoſe who had adhered to the pope; and to conſign eight thouſand pounds in part of payment. Four barons joined with the king in ſwearing to obſerve this treaty; but his ignominy was not yet complete, for it was followed with the humiliating ceremony of homage. Pandolf propoſed that John ſhould reſign his kingdom to the church, there being no other way by which which he could ſo effectually diſappoint the hope of the French monarch. To this humiliating propoſal John alſo aſſenting, he ſigned a charter, by which he declared, that, not conſtrained by fear, but of his own free will, for the remiſſion of his ſins, and thoſe of his family, he reſigned England and Ireland to St. Peter, St. Paul, to pope Innocent, and to his ſucceſſors in the apoſtolic chair. He agreed to hold theſe his dominions as feudatory of the church of Rome, by an annual payment of a thouſand marks, ſeven hundred for England, and three hundred for Ireland. In conſequence of this agreement, the next day, which was the fifteenth of May, the king repaired to Dover church, attended by the legate, with a numerous train of lords and officers of the army, where, in the preſence of them all he took off his crown, and laid it with the other enſigns of royalty at Pandolf's feet, who was ſeated on a throne; after which, having firſt ſigned the above charter, he did homage to him as the pope's repreſentative, with all the ſubmiſſive rites which the feudal law required of vaſſals to their liege lord. He threw himſelf upon his knees before the legate, and, lifting up his joined hands, put them within thoſe of Pandolf; then ſwore fealty to the pope, and paid part of the tribute which he owed for his kingdom, as the patrimony of St. Peter. Pandolf, elevated by this triumph of the ſacerdotal over the regal power, diſcovered extravagant ſymptoms of joyful exultation. The arch-hypocrite even trampled on the money that was laid at his feet, as a mark of the kingdom's ſubjection; an inſolence which, though all preſent beheld with glowing indignation, the biſhop of Dublin only had ſpirit to notice, who exclaimed aloud againſt the legate's pride and intolerable inſolence. Pandolf, not ſatisfied with theſe mortifying acts of ſuperiority, kept the crown and ſceptre five days, and then reſtored them as a ſpecial favour of the holy ſee; but, notwithſtanding a king of England ſubmitted to ſuch baſe indignities, he refuſed to take off the interdict and excommunication till the loſſes of the eccleſiaſtics could be eſtimated, for whom he inſiſted upon having a full reſtitution and reward.

All theſe humiliating circumſtances, diſgraceful as they were, could not alter John's diſpoſition to tyranny. A hermit, named Peter of Pomfret, having predicted, that the king ſhould loſe his crown this very year, was cloſely confined in Corfe caſtle; and now, by the king's order, he was arraigned and tried as an impoſtor. The hermit pleaded in his defence, that his prophecy was accompliſhed, the king having reſigned his crown and independency; which plea was ſuppoſed to augment his guilt, and he was dragged at a horſe's tail to Warham, where both he and a perfectly innocent ſon were hanged on a gibbet.

Now, Philip, being fully convinced he was made a dupe of by the ſee of Rome, was determined to proſecute the war, in defiance of the pope and his bulls. The French barons alſo vowed that they would follow their prince in this expedition; except the earl of Flanders, who having made a ſecret treaty with John, declared againſt the impiety of the undertaking; when Philip, unwilling to leave behind him ſo dangerous an enemy, turned his arms againſt the dominions of that prince. In the interim, the earl of Saliſbury, admiral of the Engliſh fleet, and the king's natural brother, attacked the French in their harbours, took three hundred of their ſhips, and deſtroyed one hundred more; when Philip, finding it impoſſible to hinder the reſt from falling into his hands, ſet fire to them himſelf; and thus were his deſigns entirely fruſtrated upon England.

The exiled prelates returned about this time to England in triumph, Langton appearing at their head. The king on hearing of their approach went to meet them; and throwing himſelf before them on the ground, intreated them, with tears, to have compaſſion on him and his kingdom. The primate obſerving theſe marks of repentance, led him to the chapter houſe of Wincheſter, where, on the twentieth of July, he again ſwore allegiance to the pope, promiſing to love, maintain, and defend the clergy. Langton then gave him abſolution, and permitted the king to dine with him. The ſentence of interdict was however ſtill in force. Nicholas, biſhop of Freſcati, coming into England, in the room of Pandolf, declared, that the pope would not take off that ſentence, till every thing was reſtored to the clergy, which had been taken from them, and they had received ample reparation for all the damages they had ſuſtained. Certain barons being appointed to take an account of theſe claims, John ſeemed aſtoniſhed at the greatneſs of the ſums to which the clergy made their loſſes amount; the monks of Canterbury alone demanding no leſs than twenty thouſand marks. The king to ſtop theſe kind of claims, which appeared endleſs, offered a hundred thouſand marks for a full diſcharge, but this they rejected with diſdain. However the pope, willing to favour his new vaſſal, directed his legate to accommodate the affair; the reſult of which was, that the biſhops and conſiderable abbots obtained full reparation, while the inferior clergy were obliged to ſit down as contented as they could, under their loſſes. The interdict being now removed, John, by a new charter ſealed with gold, ſolemnly renewed his profeſſions of homage to the ſee of Rome.

A. D. 1214.

At laſt, by the cunning of pope Innocent, this troubleſome affair having been brought to a concluſion, the king went to Poictou, which ſtill acknowledged his authority, and then laid ſiege to a caſtle near Angiers; but prince Lewis, Philip's ſon, approaching with an army, he raiſed the ſiege with ſuch precipitation, that he left his tents, baggage, and military machines behind him; and again returned with diſgrace to England. He now appeared to content himſelf with ruling his own kingdom; and his cloſe connection with the pope, made him imagine he ſhould perform this arduous taſk with little or no difficulty; but other misfortunes awaited him which he did not foreſee.

Having reſented the deſertion of his barons, John, in his laſt expedition on the continent, collected an army of his tenants and foreſters, to reduce them to reaſon. With this intention he marched as far as Northampton, where he was overtaken by Langton, archbiſhop of Canterbury. That prelate is an example to prove, that every man of ſenſe will, if poſſible, be independent. Though he owed his advancement to the pope, yet he no ſooner became an Engliſh baron, than he ſtood forth in oppoſition to all the meaſures which tended to ſubject the crown of England to a foreign power. The tyranny of the pope was, to him, as intolerable as that of any other power; and the tyranny of the king as odious as that of the pontiff. He therefore very freely expoſtulated with the king, urging, that he had violated his engagements by making war upon his ſubjects before they had been tried by their peers, or judged by the equity of his court. John, relying upon the protection of the pope, anſwered fiercely, that matters of this kind came not under his juriſdiction, which extended not to any affair of a civil nature. The next morning he ſet out for Nottingham, breathing fury againſt his adverſaries. Langton renewed his remonſtrances, and the king, at length, convinced by the force of his arguments, appointed a day for the accuſed barons to appear at his court, to anſwer the complaints that ſhould be preferred againſt them there.

A private meeting of the barons was held at London in the month of September, when the primate laid before them a charter of Henry I. which, he ſaid, he had happily found in a monaſtery; and exhorted them to inſiſt on its being renewed; whereupon the barons ſwore, that they would loſe their lives rather than not comply with ſo reaſonable, ſo honourable, and juſt a demand. The confederacy ſoon ſpread, and comprehended moſt of the barons in England; and a more numerous aſſembly was ſummoned by Langton, at St. Edmund's-bury, under the colour of devotion; where he again produced the charter; renewed his exhortations to proceed with unanimity and vigour; and repreſented in the ſtrongeſt light, the tyranny to which they had been long ſubject, and from which they were to free themſelves and their poſterity. The barons, animated by his eloquence, formed a general confederacy, to which there were few in the kingdom who did not accede; and agreed before the high altar, that at Chriſtmas they would preſent their petition to the king in a body. They then ſeparated, after mutually promiſing, to enliſt men, to purchaſe arms, and to ſupply their caſtles with ſuch ſtores and proviſions as were neceſſary.

A. D. 1215. On the ſixth of January, being the day appointed, the barons repaired to London, and demanded of the king, that, in conſequence of his oath he had taken before the primate, as well as out of reſpect to their juſt rights, he would be pleaſed to grant a renewal of Henry's charter, and a confirmation of the laws of St. Edward. John, alarmed at their power, unanimity, and zeal, promiſed to give them a poſitive anſwer at Eaſter. Having procured this interval, John endeavoured to gain over the clergy on his ſide, granting them a charter, in which he relinquiſhed for ever a privilege, earneſtly contended for by all his anceſtors, in allowing them a free election on all vacancies: he likewiſe made a vow to lead an army into Paleſtine; and alſo diſpatched an agent to Rome, in order to appeal to the pope; while at the ſame time the barons were not inactive in their endeavours to attach his holineſs to their intereſt.

Innocent was concerned at obſerving the fire juſt ready to be lighted in England, but ſecretly inclined to John, whom he found willing to ſacrifice every conſideration to his preſent ſafety. He however wrote letters to the king, prelates, and nobles. He adviſed the firſt to treat the barons with grace and indulgence, and to grant them ſuch of their demands as ſhould appear reaſonable. He exhorted the ſecond to employ their good offices in putting an end to civil diſcord, by making a peace between the contending parties; and to the laſt he expreſſed his diſapprobation of their conduct, in reſolving by force of arms to extort conceſſions from their lawful ſovereign and king.

The barons from this perceived, that the pope intended to take part with the king; but they were already gone too far to recede; and they received freſh vigour, by having certain intelligence that moſt of the biſhops, as well as all the inferior clergy, highly approved their late conduct.

About the approach of Eaſter, when the barons were to expect the king's anſwer to their petition, they aſſembled by agreement at Stamford, having collected a force conſiſting of above two thouſand knights, beſides their retainers, and an infinite number of inferior perſons. Having advanced in a body to Brackley, within fifteen miles of Oxford, the court being there kept, they received a meſſage from the king by the primate, deſiring to know what were the liberties they ſo zealouſly demanded of their ſovereign. In anſwer to which, they delivered a writing, containing the chief articles; which being read to the king, he flew into a violent paſſion, aſking the meſſengers, why his barons did not demand the whole kingdom of him; ſwearing, that he would never grant their demands; but the king's menaces were not an object of conſideration with the barons, who knew very well his imbecility and inconſtancy.

No ſooner were the confederated nobles informed of John's reſolve, than having choſen Robert Fitz-Walter their general, whom they called, Mareſchal of the army of God and holy church, they, without farther ceremony, proceeded to lay ſiege to the caſtle of Northampton, which they carried in only fifteen days; but they were willingly admitted into Bedford caſtle by William Beauchamp, its governor. From this place they advanced to Ware. Here they received intelligence that the citizens of London were diſpoſed to give them a welcome reception: proceeding therefore to the capital without loſs of time, they entered at Aldgate, which was opened to receive them. They now ſtationed proper guards, took into cuſtody ſuch perſons as they had reaſon to ſuſpect, and then wrote circular letters to all the nobility and perſons of diſtinction, who had not declared in their favour, threatening, that if they refuſed to join them, they would demoliſh their caſtles, and ravage their eſtates. Theſe menaces had their intended effect, for moſt of the great men repaired to London, and united in the aſſociation. The king was now at Odiham, with very few attendants, ſome ſay only ſeven knights. He was mortified and alarmed in the higheſt degree. He had not a friend to whom he could apply for advice or aſſiſtance, and he found the dreadful effects of his tyrannical diſpoſition, in the univerſal contempt in which he was held. His affairs were now indeed arrived at a moſt alarming criſis; and he began to think ſeriouſly of compromiſing all differences with his ſubjects. Reflecting on his calamitous ſituation, he made propoſals to refer the deciſion of the matter to the pope, or to eight barons; four to be choſen by himſelf, and four by his opponents; but theſe were rejected with diſdain. The king had no farther hope but in abſolute ſubmiſſion; wherefore he ſent word to the barons, that he would comply with all their demands; in conſequence of which a conference was appointed to be held, and preparations were made for adjuſting this important agreement. The meadow of Runnemede, between Staines and Windſor, was the place fixed on; here the confederated barons made their appearance on the fifteenth of June, and two days afterwards came the king's commiſſioners, each party forming a kind of ſeparate encampment, like declared enemies. The barons being reſolved to abate nothing of their demands, and the king's agents in general being of their ſentiments, the treaty was not long protracted. At the end of a few days, the king with a readineſs that was rather wondered at, as it was known to be the effect of compulſion, ſigned the famous charter, known by the name of MAGNA CHARTA. We ſhall here inſert a tranſlation of the important deed, whereby the moſt valuable privileges were ſecured to every order of men, which, at this day, is conſidered as the foundation of Engliſh liberty and happineſs.

MAGNA CHARTA,

The great charter of liberties, granted by king John to his ſubjects, in the year 1215.

“ John, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy and Acquitaine, and earl of Anjou, to the arbhbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, earls, barons, juſticiaries of the foreſts, ſheriffs, governors, officers, and to all bailiffs and others his faithful ſubjects, greeting. Know ye, that we, in the preſence of God, and for the health of our ſoul, and the ſouls of all

King John signing MAGNA CHARTA, at the desire of the nglish Barons who take up Arms in the Cause of Liberty, in unnemead Meadow, between Stains and Windsor, June 5. 1215.

John signing MAGNA CHARTA at the desire of the Barons who took up Arms in the Cause of Liberty, at ingmead Meadow, between Staines and Windsor, June our anceſtors and heirs, and to the honour of God, and the exaltation of holy church, and the amendment of our kingdom, by the advice of our venerable fathers, Stephen, archbiſhop of Canterbury, primate of all England, and cardinal of the holy Roman church; Henry, archbiſhop of Dublin; William, biſhop of London; Peter of Wincheſter; Jocelyn, of Bath and Glaſtonbury; Hugh, of Lincoln; Walter, of Worceſter; William, of Coventry; Benedict, of Rocheſter, biſhops; and maſter Pandolf, the pope's ſubdeacon and ancient ſervant; brother Aymeric, maſter of the Temple in England; and the noble perſons William Mareſcal, earl of Pembroke; William, earl of Saliſbury; William, earl of Warrenne; William, earl of Arundel; Alar de Galoway, conſtable of Scotland; Warin Fitzgerald, Peter Fitzherbert, and Hubert de Bourgh, ſeneſchal of Poictou: Hugo de Neville, Matthew Fitzherbert, Thomas Baſſet, Alen Baſſet, Philip de Albiney, Robert de Ropele, John Mareſchal, John Fitzhugh, and other our liege men, have in the firſt place, granted to God, and by this our preſent charter, confirmed for us and our heirs for ever.

1. "That the church of England ſhall be free, and enjoy her rights entire, and her liberties inviolable, and we will have them to be obſerved, that it may appear from hence, that the freedom of elections, which was reckoned chief and indiſpenſible to the Engliſh church, and confirmed by our charter, and obtained the confirmation of from pope Innocent III. before the diſcord between us and our barons, was granted of mere free will; which charter we ſhall obſerve, and do will it to be well obſerved by our heirs for ever.

2. "We have alſo granted, to all freemen of our kingdom, for us and our heirs for ever; all the under written liberties, to have and to hold them and their heirs, of us and our heirs.

3. "If any of our earls or barons, or others who hold of us in chief, by military ſervice, ſhall die, and at the time of his death, his heir ſhall be of full age, and owe a relief; he ſhall have his inheritance by the ancient relief; that is, the heir or heirs of an earl, for a whole earl's barony, by an hundred pounds; the heir or heirs of a knight, for a whole knight's fee, by an hundred ſhillings at moſt; and whoever oweth leſs, ſhall give leſs, according to the ancient cuſtom of fees.

4. "But if the heir of any ſuch ſhall be under age, and be in ward, his lord ſhall not have the wardſhip of him, nor his land, before he hath received his homage; and after ſuch heir ſhall be in ward, and attain to the age of one and twenty years, he ſhall, when he comes of age, have his inheritance without relief, and without fine.

5. "The warden of the land of ſuch heir, who ſhall be under age, ſhall not take of the land of ſuch heir, other than reaſonable iſſues, reaſonable cuſtoms, and reaſonable ſervices; and that without deſtruction or waſte of the tenants or effects upon the eſtate. And if we ſhall commit the guardianſhip of thoſe lands to the ſheriff, or any other perſon, who is anſwerable to us for the iſſues of the land; and if he ſhall make deſtruction and waſte upon the wardlands, we will compel him to give ſatisfaction; and the land ſhall be committed to lawful and diſcreet tenants of that fee, who ſhall be anſwerable for the iſſues to us, or to him to whom we ſhall aſſign them. And if we ſhall give or ſell to any one the wardſhip of ſuch lands; and if he makes deſtruction or waſte upon them, he ſhall loſe the wardſhip itſelf, which ſhall be committed to two lawful and diſcreet tenants of the fee, who ſhall in like manner be anſwerable to us aforeſaid.

6. "But the warden, ſo long as he ſhall have the wardſhip of the land, ſhall keep up the houſes, parks, warrens, ponds, mills, and other things pertaining to the land, out of the iſſues of the ſame land, and ſhall reſtore to the heir when he comes of full age, the whole land ſtocked with ploughs and carriages, according as the time of wainage ſhall require, and the iſſues of the land can reaſonably bear. And all theſe things ſhall be obſerved in the cuſtodies of vacant archbiſhoprics, biſhoprics, abbies, priories, churches, and dignities, which appertain to us, except that theſe wardſhips are not to be ſold.

7. "Heirs ſhall be married without diſparagement, ſo as that before matrimony ſhall be contracted, thoſe who are neareſt in blood to the heir ſhall be made acquainted with it.

8. "A widow after the death of her huſband, ſhall forthwith and without difficulty, have her marriage and inheritance, nor ſhall ſhe give any thing for her dower, or her marriage, or her inheritance which her huſband and ſhe held, at the day of his death; and ſhe may remain in the manſion houſe of her huſband, forty days after his death, within which term her dower ſhall be aſcertained.

9. "No widow ſhall be diſtrained to marry herſelf, ſo long as ſhe has a mind to live without a huſband. But at the ſame time, ſhe ſhall give ſecurity, that ſhe will not marry without our conſent, if ſhe holds of us, or without the conſent of the lord of whom ſhe holds, if ſhe holds of another.

10. "Neither we nor our bailiffs ſhall ſeize any land or rent for any debt, ſo long as there ſhall be chattels of the debtor's upon the premiſes, ſufficient to pay the debt, and the debtor be ready to ſatisfy it. Nor ſhall the ſureties of the debtor be diſtrained, ſo long as the principal debtor is ſufficient for the payment of the debt.

11. "And if the principal debtor ſhall fail in the payment of the debt, not having wherewithal to pay it, or will not diſcharge it when he is able, then the ſureties ſhall anſwer the debt; and if they will, they ſhall have the lands and rents of the debtor, until they ſhall be ſatisfied for the debt which they paid for him, unleſs the principal debtor can ſhew himſelf acquitted thereof againſt the ſaid ſureties.

12. "If any one have borrowed any thing of the Jews, more or leſs, and dies before the debt be ſatisfied, there ſhall no intereſt be paid for that debt, ſo long as the heir is under age of whomſoever he may hold; and if the debt falls into our hands, we will take only the chattels mentioned in the charter or inſtrument.

13. "And if any one ſhall die indebted to the Jews, his wife ſhall have her dower and pay nothing of that debt; and if the deceaſed left children under age, they ſhall have neceſſaries provided for them, according to the tenement or real eſtate of the deceaſed; and out of the reſidue the debt ſhall be paid, ſaving, however, the ſervice of the lord. In like manner let it be with the debts due to other perſons than Jews.

14. "No ſcutage or aid ſhall be impoſed in our kingdom, unleſs by the common council of the nation, except for ranſoming our perſon, and making our eldeſt ſon a knight, and once for marrying our eldeſt daughter; and for theſe three only a reaſonable aid ſhall be demanded.

15. "In like manner it ſhall be concerning the aids of the city of London; and that city ſhall have all its antient liberties and free cuſtoms, as well by land as by water.

16. "Furthermore, we will and grant, that all other cities, boroughs, towns, and ports, ſhall have all their liberties, and free cuſtoms, and for holding the common council of the kingdom concerning the aſſeſſment of their aids, except in the three caſes aforeſaid.

17. "And for the aſſeſſing of ſcutages, we ſhall cauſe to be ſummoned the archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, earls, and great barons of the realm, ſingly by our letters.

18. "And furthermore, we ſhall cauſe to be ſummoned in general, by our ſheriffs and bailiffs, all others who hold of us in chief, at a certain day; that is to ſay, forty days before their meeting at leaſt, and to a certain place; and in all letters of ſuch ſummons, we will declare the cauſe of the ſummons.

19. "And ſummons being thus made, the buſineſs ſhall proceed on the day appointed, according to advice of ſuch as ſhall be preſent, although all that were ſummoned come not.

20. "We will not, for the future, grant to any one that he may take aid of his own free tenants, unleſs to ranſom his perſon, and to make his eldeſt ſon a knight, and once to marry his eldeſt daughter; and for this there ſhall only be paid a reaſonable aid.

21. "No man ſhall be diſtrained to perform more ſervices for a knight's fee, or other free tenement, than is due from thence.

22. "Common pleas ſhall not follow our court, but ſhall be holden in ſome certain place: trials upon the writ of novel diſſeiſin, and of mort d'anceſtor, and of deraign preſentment, ſhall not be taken but in their proper counties, and after this manner: we, or if we ſhall be out of the realm, our chief juſticiary ſhall ſend two juſticiaries through every county four times a year, who with four knights, choſen out of every ſhire by the people, ſhall hold the ſaid aſſizes in the county, on the day, and at the place appointed.

23. "And if any matter cannot be determined on the day appointed for holding the aſſizes in each county, ſo many of the knights and freeholders as have been at the aſſizes aforeſaid, ſhall be appointed to decide them as is neceſſary, according as there is more or leſs buſineſs. Aſſizes of deraign preſentment to churches, ſhall always be taken before the juſticiaries of the bench.

24. "A free man ſhall not be amerced for a ſmall fault, but according to the degree of the fault; and for a great crime in proportion to the heinouſneſs of it, ſaving to him his contentment, and after the ſame manner a merchant, ſaving to him his merchandize.

25. "And a villain ſhall be amerced after the ſame manner, ſaving to him his wainage, if he falls under our amerciament; and none the aforeſaid amerciament ſhall be aſſeſſed, but by the oath of honeſt men in the neighbourhood.

26. "Earls and barons ſhall not be amerced but by their peers, and according to the degree of offence.

27. "No eccleſiaſtical perſon ſhall be amerced for his lay tenement, but according to the proportion of the others aforeſaid, and not according to the value of his eccleſiaſtical benefice.

28. "Neither a town, nor any tenement, ſhall be diſtraiped, to make bridges over rivers, unleſs that anciently and of right they are bound to do it. No river for the future ſhall be embanked, but what was embanked in the time of king Henry our grandfather.

29. "No ſheriff, caſtellan, coroner, or other of our bailiffs, ſhall hold pleas of the crown.

30. "All counties, hundreds, wapentakes, and trethings, ſhall ſtand at the old form, without any increaſe, except in our demeſne manors.

31. "If any one, holding of us a lay fee, dies, and the ſheriff, or our bailiff, ſhew our letters patent of ſummons concerning the debt due to us from the deceaſed, it ſhall be lawfui for the ſheriff or our bailiff, to attach and regiſter the chattels of the deceaſed, found upon his lay fee, to the value of the debt, by the view of lawful men, ſo as nothing be removed, until our whole debt be paid; and the reſt ſhall be left to the executors, who are to fulfil the will of the deceaſed; and if nothing be due from him to his, all the chattels ſhall remain to the deceaſed, ſaving to his wife and children their reaſonable ſhares.

32. "If any free man ſhall die inteſtate, his chattels ſhall be diſtributed by the hands of his neareſt relations and friends, by view of the church, ſaving to every one his debts, which the deceaſed owed to him.

33. "No conſtable or bailiff of ours ſhall take corn, or other chattels of any man, who is not of the town where the caſtle is, unleſs he preſently gives him money for it, or hath reſpite of payment by the good-will of the ſeller. But if he be of the ſame town, he ſhall pay him within forty days.

34. "No conſtable ſhall diſtrain any knight, to give money for caſtle guard, if he himſelf will do it in his own perſon, or by another able man, in caſe he cannot do it through any reaſonable cauſe.

35. "And if we lead him, or ſend him into the army, he ſhall be free from ſuch guard, for the time he ſhall be in the army by our command.

36. "No ſheriff or bailiff of ours, or any other, ſhall take horſes or carts of any freeman for carriage, but by the good-will of the ſaid freeman, without paying according to the rate anciently appointed; that is to ſay, for a cart and two horſes, ten-pence a day; and for a cart with three horſes, fourteen pence a day.

37. "Neither ſhall we, or our bailiffs, take any man's timber for our caſtles, or other uſes, unleſs by the conſent of the owner of the timber.

38. "We will retain the lands of thoſe that are convicted of felony, only one year and a day, and then they ſhall be returned to the lord of the fee.

39. "All wares for the time to come, ſhall be put down in the rivers of Thames and Medway, and throughout England, except upon the ſea-coaſt.

40. "The writ, which is called præcipe, ſhall not, for the future, be made out to any one of any tenement, whereby a freeman may loſe his court.

41. "There ſhall be one meaſure of wine, and one of ale, throughout our whole realm, and one meaſure of corn; that is to ſay, the London quarter, and one breadth of dyed cloth, and ruſſets, and haberjects; that is to ſay, two ells within the liſt. As to the weights, they ſhall be as the meaſures.

42. "From henceforth nothing ſhall be given or taken for a writ of inquiſition of life and limbs; but it ſhall be granted gratis, and not denied.

43. "If any one holds of us by fee-farm, or ſoccage, or burgage, and holds lands of another by military ſervice, we will not have the wardſhip of the heir, or land, which is of another man's fee, by reaſon of what he holds of us by fee-farm, ſoccage, or burgage; nor will we have the wardſhip of the fee-farm, ſoccage, or burgage, unleſs the fee-farm is bound to perform military ſervice.

44. "We will not have the wardſhip of an heir, nor of any land, which he holds of another by military ſervice, by reaſon of any pettit-ſerjeanty he hold of us, as by the ſervice of giving us knives, arrows, or the like.

45. "No bailiff ſhall for the future put any man to his law, upon his ſingle word, without credible witneſſes produced to prove it.

46. "No freeman ſhall be taken or impriſoned, or diſſeiſed, or out-lawed, or baniſhed, or any ways deſtroyed; nor will we paſs ſentence upon him, or commit him to priſon, unleſs by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.

47. "We will ſell no man, we will deny no man, nor delay right nor juſtice.

48. "All merchants, unleſs they be publicly prohibited, ſhall have ſafe and ſecure conduct, to go out of, and to come into England; and to ſtay there, and to paſs as well by land as by water; for buying and ſelling by the antient and allowed cuſtoms, without any evil tolls, except in time of war, or when they are of any nation at war with us.

49. "And if there be found any ſuch in our land, at the beginning of the war, they ſhall be attached without damage to their bodies or goods, until it may be known to us, or our chief juſticiary, how our merchants are treated in the nation at war with us; and if ours be ſafe there, the others ſhall be ſafe in our dominions.

50. "It ſhall be lawful in the time to come, for any one to go out of our kingdom and return ſafely and ſecurely by land or by water, ſaving his allegiance to us, unleſs in time of war, by ſome ſhort ſpace, for the common benefit of the realm, except priſoners and out-laws (according to the law of the land,) and people at war with us, and merchants who ſhall be in ſuch condition as is above mentioned.

51. "If any man holds of any eſcheat, as of the honour of Wallingford, Nottingham, Bologne, Lancaſter, or of other eſcheats which are in our hands, and are baronies, and dies, his heirs ſhall give no other relief, and perform no other ſervice to us, than he would to the baron, if the barony were in the poſſeſſion of the baron: we will hold it after the ſame manner the baron held it. Nor will we, by reaſon of ſuch barony or eſcheat, have any eſcheat or wardſhip of any of our men, unleſs he that held the barony or eſcheat held of us in chief elſewhere.

52. "Thoſe men who dwell without the foreſt, ſhall not from henceforth come before our juſticiaries of the foreſt upon common ſummons, but ſuch as are impleaded, or are pledges for any that were attached for ſomething concerning the foreſt. No country court ſhall be holden for the future but from month to month, and where there uſed to be a greater interval, let it be ſo continued. Neither any ſheriff, nor his bailiff ſhall keep his turn in the hundred oftener than twice in a year, and only in the accuſtomed place, that is, once after Eaſter, and once after Michaelmas, and the view of frank-pledge ſhall be held after Michaelmas, that every one may have his liberties which he had, and was wont to have, in the time of king Henry our grandfather, or ſuch as he obtained afterwards. But the view of frank-pledge ſhall be ſo made, that our peace may be kept, and that the tything be full as it was wont to be. And the ſheriff ſhall not ſeek occaſions, but ſhall be content with what the ſheriff was wont to have for making his view in the time of king Henry our grandfather. For the time to come it ſhall not be lawful for any man to give his land to a religious houſe; ſo as to take it again and hold it of that houſe, nor ſhall it be lawful for any religious houſe to receive land, ſo as to grant it him again of whom they received it to hold of him. If any man for the future ſhall give his land to a religious houſe, and be convicted thereof, his gift ſhall be void, and the land ſhall be forfeited to the lord of the fee. Scutage for the future ſhall not be taken, as was uſed to be taken in the time of king Henry our grandfather; nor ſhall the ſheriff oppoſe any man but be content with what he was wont to have. Saving to the archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, priors, templars, hoſpitallers, earls, barons, knights, and all others, as well eccleſiaſtics as ſeculars, the liberties and free cuſtoms which they had before.

53. "We will not make any juſticiaries, conſtables, ſheriffs, or bailiffs, but ſuch as are knowing in the law of the realm, and diſpoſed duly to obſerve it.

54. "All barons who are founders of abbies, and have charters of the kings of England for the advowſon, or are entitled to it by ancient tenure, may have the cuſtody of them when vacant, as they ought to have.

55. "All woods that have been taken into foreſts in our own time, ſhall forthwith be laid out again, and the ſame ſhall be done with regard to rivers, which have been taken or fenced in by us during our reign.

56. "All evil cuſtoms concerning foreſts, warrens, and foreſters, warreners, ſheriffs, and their officers, rivers and their keepers, ſhall forthwith be enquired into in each county, by twelve knights, ſworn of the ſame ſhire, choſen by credible perſons of the ſame county, and upon oath; and within forty days after the ſaid inqueſt, be utterly aboliſhed ſo as never to be reſtored.

57. "We will immediately give up all hoſtages and writings, delivered unto us by our Engliſh ſubjects, as ſecurities for their keeping the peace, and yielding us faithful ſervice.

58. "We will entirely remove from our bailiwicks the relations of Gerard de Athyes, ſo as that for the future they ſhall have no bailiwick in England. We will alſo remove Engelard de Cygony, Andrew, Peter, and Gyon from the chancery; Gyon de Cygony, Geoffrey de Martyn and his brothers, Philip, Mark, and his brother, his nephew Geoffrey, and all their followers.

59. "And as ſoon as peace is reſtored, we will ſend out of the kingdom all foreign ſoldiers, croſsbow men, and ſtipendaries, who are come with horſes and arms, to the prejudice of our people.

60. "If any one hath been diſpoſſeſſed or deprived by us, without the legal judgment of his peers, of his lands, caſtles, liberties, or rights, we will forthwith reſtore them to him; and if any diſpute ariſes upon this head, let the matter be determined by the twenty-five barons hereafter mentioned, for the preſervation of the peace.

61. "As for thoſe things of which any perſon has, without the legal judgment of his peers been diſpoſſeſſed or deprived, either by king Henry our father, or our brother king Richard, and which we have in our hands, or are poſſeſſed by others, and we are bound to warrant and make good, we ſhall have a reſpite during the term uſually allowed the cruiſes; excepting thoſe things about which there is a plea depending, or whereof an inqueſt hath been made by our order, before we undertook the cruſade. But when we return from our pilgrimage, or if we do not undertake it, we will immediately cauſe full juſtice to be adminiſtered therein.

62. "The ſame reſpite we ſhall have for diſafforeſting the foreſts, which Henry our father, or our brother Richard have afforeſted; and for the wardſhip of the lands, which are in another's fee, in the ſame manner as we have hitherto enjoyed thoſe wardſhips, by reaſon of a fee held of us by knight's ſervice; and for the abbies founded in any other fee than our own, in which the lord of the fee ſays he has a right; and when we return from pilgrimage, or if we ſhould not perform it, we will immediately do full juſtice to all the complainants in this behalf.

63. "No man ſhall be taken or impriſoned upon the appeal of a woman, for the death of any other perſon than her huſband.

" 64. "All unjuſt and illegal fines levied by us, and all amerciaments impoſed unjuſtly and contrary to the law of the land, ſhall be entirely forgiven, or elſe be left to the deciſion of the five and twenty barons hereafter mentioned for the preſervation of the peace, or of the major part of them, together with the aforeſaid Stephen, archbiſhop of Canterbury, if he can be preſent, and others whom he ſhall think fit to take with him; and if he cannot be preſent, the buſineſs ſhall, notwithſtanding, proceed without him. But ſo, that if one or more of the aforeſaid five and twenty barons be plaintiffs in the ſame cauſe, they ſhall be ſet aſide as to what concerns this particular affair, and others choſen in their room out of the ſaid five and twenty, and ſworn by the reſt to decide that matter.

65. "If we have diſſeiſed or diſpoſſeſſed the Welch of any lands, liberties, or other things, without the legal judgment of their peers, they ſhall be immediately reſtored to them. And if any diſpute ariſes upon this head, the matter ſhall be determined in the Marches by the judgment of their peers; for tenements in England according to the laws of England; for tenements in Wales according to the laws of Wales; for the tenements of the Marches according to the law of the Marches: the ſame ſhall the Welch do to us and our ſubjects.

66. "As for all thoſe things of which any Welchman hath, without the legal judgment of his peers, been diſſeiſed or deprived by king Henry our father, or our brother king Richard, and which we either have in our hands, or others are poſſeſſed of, and we are obliged to warrant it, we ſhall have a reſpite for the time generally allowed the cruiſes, excepting thoſe things about which a ſuit is depending, or whereof an inqueſt has been made by our order, before we undertook the cruſade. But when we return, or if we ſtay at home without performing our pilgrimage, we ſhall immediately do them full juſtice, according to the laws of the Welch, and of the parts above-mentioned.

67. "We will, without delay, diſmiſs the ſon of Llewellin, and all the Welch hoſtages, and releaſe them from the engagements they have entered into with us for the preſervation of the peace.

68. "We ſhall treat with Alexander, king of Scots, concerning the reſtoring his ſiſters and hoſtages, and his rights and liberties, in the ſame form and manner as we ſhall do to the reſt of the barons of England; unleſs from the charters, which we have from his father, William, late king of Scots, it ought to be otherwiſe; and this ſhall be left to the determination of his peers in our court.

69. "All the aforeſaid cuſtoms and liberties which we have granted to be holden in our kingdom, as much as it belongs to us towards our people of our kingdom, as well clergy as laity, we ſhall obſerve, as far as they are concerned towards their dependants.

70. "And whereas for the honour of God, and the amendment of our kingdom, and for quieting the diſcord that hath ariſen between us and our barons, we have granted all the things aforeſaid; willing to render them firm and laſting, we do give and grant our ſubjects the underwritten ſecurity, namely, that the barons may chuſe five and twenty barons of the kingdom whom they think convenient, who ſhall take care, with all their might, to hold and obſerve, and cauſe to be obſerved, the peace and liberties we have granted them, and by this our preſent charter confirmed; ſo as that if we, our juſticiary, our bailiffs, or any of our officers, ſhall, in any circumſtance fail in the performance of them towards any perſon, or ſhall break through any of theſe articles of peace and ſecurity, and the offence is notified to four barons, choſen out of the five and twenty above-mentioned, the ſaid four barons ſhall repair to us, or our juſticiary, if we are out of the realm, and laying open the grievance, ſhall petition to have it redreſſed without delay; and if it is not redreſſed by us, or, if we ſhould chance to be out of the realm, if it is not redreſſed by our juſticiary within forty days, reckoning from the time it has been notified to us, or to our juſticiary, if we ſhould be out of the realm, the four barons aforeſaid ſhall lay the cauſe before the reſt of the twenty five barons; and the ſaid five and twenty barons, together with the community of the whole kingdom, ſhall diſtrain and diſtreſs us all the ways poſſible; namely, by ſeizing our caſtles, lands, poſſeſſions, and in any other manner they can, till the grievance is redreſſed according to their pleaſure; ſaving harmleſs our own perſon, and the perſon of our queen and children; and when it is redreſſed they ſhall obey us as before.

71. "And any perſon whatſoever in the kingdom may ſwear, that he will obey the orders of the five and twenty barons aforeſaid in the execution of the premiſes, and that he will diſtreſs us jointly with them to the utmoſt of his power; and we give public and free liberty to any one that ſhall pleaſe to ſwear to them, and never ſhall hinder any perſon from taking the ſame oath.

72. "As for all thoſe of our ſubjects who will not, of their own accord, ſwear to join the five and twenty barons in diſtraining and diſtreſſing us, we will iſſue our order to make them take the oath above-mentioned.

73. "And if any one of the five and twenty barons ſhould die, or go out of the kingdom, or be hindered any other way from carrying the things aforeſaid into execution, the reſt of the ſaid five and twenty barons may chuſe another in his room at their diſcretion, who ſhall be ſworn into his office in like manner as the reſt.

74. "In all things that are committed to the execution of the five and twenty barons, if, when they are all aſſembled together, they ſhould happen to diſagree about any matter, or ſome of them, when ſummoned, will not, or cannot come; whatever is agreed upon or enjoined by the major part of thoſe who are preſent, ſhall be reputed as firm and valid as if all the five and twenty had given their conſent; and the aforeſaid five and twenty ſhall ſwear, that all the premiſes they ſhall faithfully obſerve, and cauſe with all their power to be obſerved.

75. "And we will not by ourſelves, or by any other, procure any thing whereby any of theſe conceſſions and liberties be revoked or leſſened; and if any ſuch thing be obtained, let it be null and void; neither ſhall we ever make uſe of it, either by ourſelves or any other.

76. "And all the ill-will, anger, and malice, that hath ariſen between us and our ſubjects of the clergy and laity, from the firſt breaking out of diſſention between us, we do fully remit and forgive. Moreover, all treſpaſſes occaſioned by the ſaid diſſention, from Eaſter, in the ſixteenth year of our reign, till the reſtoration of peace and tranquillity, we hereby entirely remit to all, both clergy and laity, and, as far as in us lies, do fully forgive.

77. "We have moreover granted them our letters patent teſtimonial of Stephen, lord archbiſhop of Canterbury, Henry, lord archbiſhop of Dublin, and the biſhops aforeſaid, as alſo of maſter Pandolf, for the ſecurity and conceſſions aforeſaid.

78. "Wherefore we will, and firmly enjoin, that the church of England be free, and that all men in our kingdom have and hold all the aforeſaid liberties, rights, and conceſſions, truly and peaceably, freely and quietly, fully and wholly, to themſelves and their heirs, of us and our heirs, in all things and places for ever as is aforeſaid.

79. "It is alſo ſworn, as well on our part, as on the part of the barons, that all things aforeſaid ſhall faithfully and ſincerely be obſerved.

"Given under our hand, in the preſence of the witneſſes above-mentioned, and many others, in the meadow called Runnemede, between Windelſore and Staines, the fifteenth day of June, in the ſeventeenth year of our reign."

This charter contained the principal outlines of a juſt and legal government, and provided for the equal diſtribution of juſtice, and the free enjoyment of property; the great objects for which political ſociety was at firſt inſtituted. It was ſigned by John, by all the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and ratified by ſolemn oaths. The barons alſo obliged the king to conſent, that London ſhould remain in their hands, and the Tower in the cuſtody of Langton, till the fifteenth of Auguſt enſuing, or till the articles of the great charter were fully executed. Knowing the perfidiouſneſs of his diſpoſition, they alſo urged him to appoint twenty-five of their number as conſervators of public liberty. Theſe were intended to be a check on his conduct; and, if he preſumed to violate his oath, they were at liberty to levy war againſt him.

Though theſe regulations were ſufficiently degrading, John appeared to ſubmit to them with the utmoſt chearfulneſs; and even iſſued writs, commanding his ſheriffs, their officers, and others, to pay a paſſive obedience to the twenty-five barons. Indeed, all in the kingdom were obliged to enforce the obſervation of the articles contained in Magna Charta; and the freeholders of each county choſe twelve knights, who were to make a report of ſuch evil cuſtoms as required redreſs. John went even farther than this; for he diſmiſſed all his foreign forces, the inſtruments of his tyranny, and pretended, that there was to be a total reform in every part of his government, which ſhould thenceforward have a regard to the welfare of his people. Theſe circumſtances gave ſpirits to his ſubjects, who began to think that all traces of humanity were not expunged from the heart of the king. Happy would it have been for this weak tyrant, had he not diſſembled; but he only waited for a favourable opportunity of overthrowing that glorious column of liberty which his people had juſt erected. His deſire to break the reſtraints under which the barons had laid him, increaſed in proportion to the reſolution they had evinced in carrying their point. The injuries and indignities he had ſuffered from the king of France and the pope, had made a ſlight impreſſion on his mind; but the ſenſe of his being compelled by his own ſubjects to confine himſelf within the bounds of juſtice and humanity, ſhocked his pride; and the thought of being curbed by thoſe whom he held as his vaſſals, ſtung him to the ſoul; not conſidering that kings and miniſters are deputies of the people, who always pay them liberally, and ſometimes for what they have neither ability nor virtue to perform. John, from this period, grew ſullen, ſilent, and reſerved. He ſhunned the company of his nobles; and, as if determined to ſecrete himſelf from public view, retired to the Iſle of Wight. There was a degree of artifice in this proceeding not then comprehended; for he ſent his emiſſaries abroad to invite the rapacious Brabanters and other foreign mercenaries into his ſervice, to whom were promiſed the forfeited eſtates of his opulent nobles. He likewiſe complained to the ſee of Rome of the violence to which he had been obliged to ſubmit. Innocent, who conſidered himſelf as feudal lord of the realm of England, zealouſly eſpouſed his cauſe. He iſſued a bull, in which, "from the plenitude of apoſtolic power, and the authority God had committed to him to build and to deſtroy, to plant and overthrow kingdoms," he abrogated the great charter; prohibited the barons from exacting the obſervance of it, and the king himſelf from regarding it; abſolving him and his ſubjects from all the oaths they had been conſtrained to take, and denouncing a general ſentence of excommunication againſt all who perſevered in maintaining pretenſions ſo treaſonable and iniquitous.

At this time the forces John had ſent for from the continent arrived; whereupon he no longer diſguiſed his intentions, but, throwing off the maſk, recalled all the privileges granted to his ſubjects, which he had ſolemnly ſworn to preſerve. Placing his whole confidence in the pope, he re-aſſumed his tyrannical character. But he ſhould have conſidered the thunder of Rome would have leſs force than when directed againſt him. Langton refuſed to publiſh the ſentence of excommunication againſt the barons; and though he was cited to attend a general council at Rome, in which he was ſuſpended for diſobedience to the pope, and for ſecretly correſponding with the king's enemies; yet John ſtill found that his barons, his people, even his very clergy, continued their confederacy againſt him.

His majeſty's intereſt began to prevail now over the barons, who had no ſooner obtained the great charter, than lulled in a fatal ſecurity, they took no meaſures for re-aſſembling their forces, in caſe the king ſhould introduce a foreign army. Hence John, being maſter of the field, inveſted Rocheſter caſtle, which, though bravely defended by William de Albiney, was obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion. The obſtinacy of the beſieged irritated the king to ſuch a degree, that he would have hanged the governor and all the garriſon; but being informed that repriſals would be made, he ordered only the inferior priſoners to be put to death. Having raiſed two powerful armies, he marched with one into the north, leaving the other under the command of the earl of Saliſbury, to ravage the ſouthern counties. His barbarous foreign mercenaries, incited by a cruel, enraged tyrant, ſpread devaſtation over the face of the kingdom. Rapacious by nature; hired to abet the purpoſes of deſpotiſm, they were guilty of the moſt dreadful outrages. The miſery of the inhabitants is beyond the power of deſcription. Villages and caſtles were ſucceſſively reduced to aſhes. Melford, Morpeth, Alnwick, and Werk were burnt. Roxburg, Haddington, and Dunbar, underwent the ſame fate; John himſelf, like a barbarous ruffian, ſetting fire, with his own hands, to every houſe in which he had lodged. The ſoldiers exerciſed the utmoſt cruelty on the inhabitants to make them diſcover their riches. Ruin and deſtruction marked their progreſs. The king proceeding through the whole kingdom from Dover to Berwick, conſidered every eſtate that was not his own immediate property, as an object of military execution, and laid the country on each ſide of him waſte.

This ſudden change of affairs gave the barons no inconſiderable alarm. Reduced to extremity, they knew not what courſe to take; but, for a while, remained in London, while John's mercenary troops were committing their devaſtations. They had now no proſpect of conqueſt; nor could they entertain any expectations of mercy, ſhould they ſubmit. In this dilemma, recourſe was had to a moſt deſperate expedient. They invited over Lewis, eldeſt ſon of Philip, to defend their juſt rights, promiſing, in caſe of ſucceſs, that they would acknowledge him for their ſovereign. Nothing could be more agreeable to the ambition of the French monarch than an offer of this kind. He cheerfully embraced the propoſal; and having received twenty-five hoſtages for the performance of the contract on the part of the barons, he made every poſſible preparation for the expedition, notwithſtanding the pope threatened him with interdicts and excommunications, if he preſumed to invade the patrimony of St. Peter, or attack a prince under the immediate protection of the holy ſee. But Philip, deſpiſing now all papal cenſures, which formerly he had pretended to reſpect, ſent a body of ſeven thouſand men into England, which was ſoon followed by a more conſiderable army, under the command of his ſon prince Lewis, who landed May the 21ſt, 1216, at Sandwich.

The king's ſucceſſes were conſiderably checked by the arrival of Lewis. The greater part of his foreign troops, who were chiefly natives of France, now deſerted him, declaring they could not fight againſt the heir of their lawful ſovereign. John was encamped near Dover when Lewis landed in the Iſle of Thanet; but inſtead of endeavouring to attack the French forces before they could be joined by the barons, he retreated to Wincheſter. Conſcious guilt and jealous diſtruſt, benumbed all the faculties of his ſoul, and diſarmed him at the very inſtant he ſtood in need of more than common reſolution. His unmanly fears operated more powerfully in favour of Lewis than a numerous army; ſo that he marched to the capital without meeting in his way the leaſt oppoſition. He entered the city amidſt the acclamations of the people. The barons and citizens immediately ſwore fealty to him; while the prince, in return, promiſed ſolemnly to confirm the ancient privileges of the kingdom. The proſpect of the Engliſh was now very gloomy; for if the operations of John ſhould be attended with ſucceſs, they were certain of being ſubjugated to a tyrant: if, on the contrary, the arms of Lewis ſhould prevail, abſolute ſubjection muſt be the conſequence. But the ſequel ſhews that the rights of Engliſhmen were not to be abuſed either by a Lewis or John.

Notwithſtanding Lewis was in poſſeſſion of the capital, and at the head of a numerous army, yet many difficulties remained to be ſurmounted, before he could make himſelf maſter of England. Moſt of the maritime places were in the intereſt of John, who had favoured the ſea-ports with many valuable privileges. This was an alarming circumſtance to Lewis, who conſidered his being maſter of ſome convenient harbour as a matter of the laſt importance. He therefore attempted to make himſelf maſter of Dover; but his enterprize was rendered fruitleſs by the bravery of the beſieged, who defied his power. He therefore carried his arms into the inland parts of Kent and Suſſex, which he reduced with great facility. On the other hand, John flattered himſelf that the bolt of papal thunder, which was now ready to be launched againſt Philip and his ſon, would defeat all their ſchemes, and reſtore him to the quiet poſſeſſion of the Engliſh throne. He was, however, miſtaken. Innocent, indeed, fulminated the ſentence of excommunication againſt both; but the effect fell far ſhort of his expectations. The French biſhops declared the excommunication of Philip void, and Philip was not terrified at the thunder of the Vatican. More anxious of procuring a convenient ſea-port, than of guarding againſt the effects of the pope's anathemas, he once more led his army to Dover, and inveſted that important fortreſs. But Lewis found the attempt more difficult than he had imagined. Hubert de Burgh, the governor, was an experienced officer; and being at the head of a reſolute garriſon, made ſuch furious ſallies upon the French army, that Lewis was obliged to remove his camp to a conſiderable diſtance, and turn the ſiege into a blockade. This miſcarriage not a little mortified the French prince, eſpecially as the barons appeared leſs active in his ſervice: but he was too haughty to conciliate their eſteem, and wanted prudence to foreſee the conſequences of his neglect. He did not even endeavour to conceal his diſguſt; he excluded them from his councils, ſhewing thereby his want of confidence in them; and inſtead of reſtoring the nobility to their honours and eſtates, he beſtowed all his favours upon his own followers. The barons now ſaw their error, in calling in a foreign force to their aſſiſtance; the people complained of the oppreſſions of their new maſters; and it was rumoured, that Melun, one of Lewis's courtiers, falling ſick at London, on the approach of death, ſent for ſome of the Engliſh barons, who were his friends, and informed them, that Lewis intended to exterminate them, and to beſtow their dignities and eſtates on his favourites, in whoſe fidelity he could better confide. This report, whether true or falſe, was univerſally credited; acted powerfully on the Engliſh barons, and was of unſpeakable prejudice to Lewis. The earl of Saliſbury, and others of the principal nobility, in order to elude the ſtorm which threatened their deſtruction, deſerted to the king's army.

John, animated with the hope of being joined by more of the confederate barons, exerted himſelf in collecting a conſiderable army, with the view of making one vigorous effort for the preſervation of his crown. In the interim he was in perpetual motion, to avoid coming to a battle for the preſent. Having experienced the fidelity of the inhabitants of Lynn, in Norfolk, he had there depoſited his crown, ſceptre, and other treaſures; yet, not thinking this a place of ſafety, he determined to remove; but in marching over the waſhes from Lynn into Lincolnſhire, at an improper time of tide, the ſea ruſhed in upon him with ſuch rapidity, that he loſt a great part of his forces, together with all his treaſure, regalia, baggage, and carriages, he himſelf eſcaping with difficulty. In the evening he arrived at the abbey of Swineſhead, and being ill before, was there ſeized with a violent fever, occaſioned by his affliction at this irreparable loſs, and the diſtracted ſtate of his affairs. The next day, being unable to ride, he was carried in a litter to the caſtle of Sleford, and from thence to Newark; where, having made his will, and appointed Henry, his eldeſt ſon, his heir, he died on the eighteenth of October, in the fifty-firſt year of his age, and the eighteenth of his reign. A.D. 1216. By his firſt wife, Aviſa, heireſs of the houſe of Glouceſter, he had not any children; but by his ſecond, Iſabella, daughter of count Aymar, he had two ſons, Henry his ſucceſſor, and Richard, earl of Cornwal. He had alſo three daughters; Jane, wife to Alexander II. king of Scotland; Eleanor, married firſt to William Mareſchal, earl of Pembroke, and afterwards to Simon de Montfort, earl of Leiceſter; and Iſabella, conſort to the emperor Frederick II. He is ſaid to have had ten natural children, but none of them ever acquired any eminence.

During this period literature made very little progreſs. No diſcoveries were made in the ſciences; the arts had no patrons among the great. The little knowledge of the ſciences that ſubſiſted was confined to the cloiſter; nor were even the monks remarkable for their learning. A few of them, indeed, wrote ſeveral chronicles of the Engliſh tranſactions in certain periods, with ſome degree of eloquence; but none equalled William of Malmſbury, whom we have already noticed. The torch of civil diſcord was lighted up in the reign of Henry II. and continued its baneful influence till the death of king John. It is no wonder, therefore, that the ſciences were little cultivated during that period. It is in vain to expect the productions of tranquil retirement when the peace of a kingdom is deſtroyed.

Likewiſe the commerce of England was at a low ebb in the reigns of Henry II. Stephen, Richard I. and John. The Flemings and Italians were in poſſeſſion of its moſt valuable branches. Flanders was the grand market of Europe for all woollen manufactures, and Italy for ſilk; and it is highly probable, that with the habits, manners, cuſtoms, and language of the Normans, we likewiſe imported their manufactures; for the Engliſh were too much engaged in civil wars, and ſo often called off from attending to the arts of peace by their lords, to whom they owed military ſervice, that nothing but wars and tumults, civil diſcord and unnatural rebellions, engaged their attention. Coaches were, however, firſt introduced during the reign of Henry, but not the art of conſtructing them; and the Jews practiſed that uſeful article of commerce, called bills of exchange, in theſe days.

Fluſhed with victory, the Normans ſought only how to paſs away their time in mirth and ruſtic feſtivity; and employed almoſt all their intervals of leiſure, in hunting, feaſting, and women. Nor is their exceſſive licentiouſneſs in this reſpect to be wondered at; for the very laws tended to encourage the practice of many vices. No man could approach the king without a preſent; they ſold all their good offices; and permitted every indulgence that might afford a pretence for extorting money. Richard de Neville gave twenty palfreys to obtain the king's requeſt to Iſolda Biſſet, that ſhe ſhould take him for a huſband. The biſhop of Wincheſter gave one tun of good wine for not putting the king in mind to give a girdle to the counteſs of Albemarle. And Robert de Vaux gave five of the beſt palfreys, that the king would hold his tongue about Henry Pinel's wife. Every violation of chaſtity had its fixed price, which was not beyond the reach of a ſubſtantial yeoman. The lewd lives of the clergy, who cohabited publicly with concubines, tended ſtill farther to debauch the age; nor was it poſſible for the king, or his archbiſhops, to correct their enormities, while ſuperſtition blinded the eyes of the people, and induced them to believe, that what conſecrated a crime in a layman, was in a prieſt a virtue.

Here it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that, during the reign of John, Conſtantinople was taken by the French and Venetians in 1204; and, in a cruſade, the Albigenſes, ſectaries in the ſouth of France, were entirely exterminated. The bloody inquiſition is ſaid to have originated from this cruſade.

Particulars and Character of King John.

John was in ſtature about the middle ſize; of a good ſhape, and an agreeable countenance. He was a bad man; and, if poſſible, a worſe king. He ſeems to have been a compound of every vice that can degrade human nature, without a ſingle virtue or good quality to throw into the oppoſite ſcale. When left to the bent of his own depraved nature, he was raſh, furious, voluptuous, and cruel; and devoted himſelf entirely to the gratification of his vicious paſſions, regardleſs of the happineſs or miſery of his people. His fortune never ſuited with his temper. He loved eaſe and quiet, yet was continually in action. The murder of his nephew; the infringement of public property; and the violation of private honour, have conſigned his memory to eternal ignominy. He was inſolent in proſperity; raſh in adverſity; puſillanimous in war; and tyrannical in peace. He broke every oath; every ſacred bond of ſociety; and was generally hated by his ſubjects, eſpecially in the latter part of his reign. His inactivity, cowardice, ingratitude, treachery and folly, too evidently appear in the ſeveral parts of his life, to give the leaſt room for ſuſpicion, that the diſagreeable picture has been at all overcharged by the prejudices of ancient hiſtorians. It muſt, however, be owned, that his reign, odious and deteſtable as it now appears, was not deſtitute of ſome laudable tranſactions, and procured to the people the moſt important advantages. His tyranny firſt prompted the barons to aſſert, and his ſloth and cowardice afterwards enabled them to obtain, thoſe ineſtimable rights and privileges which now form the baſis of the Engliſh conſtitution, whereby this nation is diſtinguiſhed from every other in the world. He conferred on the city of London, the right of annually electing a mayor out of its own body, an office which was, till then, held for life. He gave the city power to elect and remove ſheriffs at pleaſure, and its common council annually. He alſo introduced the laws of England into Ireland, and granted the Cinque Ports their particular privileges. On the other hand, he ſubjected his kingdom to a ſhameful vaſſalage under the ſee of Rome; obliged his ſubjects to take up arms, to recover thoſe privileges which had been handed down to them by their anceſtors; drove them to ſeek protection from a foreign power; and died at a time when he was in danger of ending his life in a priſon, or as a fugitive from the purſuit of his enemies. The horror which the public entertained of prince Arthur's murder, had more effect in driving him from his French dominions, than all the power of Philip; nor was he ever able to avail himſelf of the many favourable circumſtances that afterwards offered. This ſcourge, and ſelf-tormentor, like another Caligula, lived the life of a tyrant, and, which is the end of moſt tyrants, died as the fool dieth, univerſally deſpiſed; indeed, he ſeems to have valued power, only as it rendered him more ſecure in his acts of miſchief and folly.

HENRY III.

On the king's death civil diſcord prevails in England—The government ſettled in favour of young Henry, by the earl of Pembroke and the pope's legate—The French having been defeated in the great battle of Lincoln, and their general, the count de Perche, killed, Lewis, with his army, leave the kingdom—Commotions occaſioned by the adminiſtration of Hubert de Burgh, the dominion of foreigners, and oppreſſions by the pope—A confederacy of the barons, who obtain from the king the ſtatutes or proviſions of Oxford—Civil war renewed; in which the barons, having obtained a complete victory, take the king himſelf, his ſon prince Edward, his brother Richard, and his nephew Henry d'Allmain, priſoners—The great power of Leiceſter, and how employed—Origin of the preſent Houſe of Commons in 1265—The battle of Eveſham, in which the confederates are completely routed by prince Edward, and the earl of Leiceſter is ſlain—Inſurrection of the earl of Glouceſter, quelled without effuſion of blood—Prince Edward undertakes a cruſade—Death and Character of Henry III. &c.

A. D. 1216. ON the death of king John, his ſon, Henry III. ſurnamed of Wincheſter, was only nine years of age, conſequently unable to hold the reins of government, eſpecially at a time when civil diſcord and univerſal diſſention prevailed in England. The metropolis and more than one half of the kingdom were already in the poſſeſſion of Lewis, ſupported by a majority of Engliſh barons, and by the whole power of France. Fortunately for young Henry, and for his country, the gallant earl of Pembroke, marſhal of England, was at the head of a powerful army, in conſequence of his poſt, and the reins of government could not have been placed in better hands. His abilities and virtues ſtemmed the current of oppoſition. By theſe he weathered the tempeſt, and reſtored tranquillity to the ſtate. He well knew, that no ſucceſs could be expected till a mutual confidence between the king and barons was reſtored: this was therefore his firſt care; and his indefatigable labours to this end were facilitated by the tyrannical behaviour of Lewis, who had ſo highly exaſperated the barons, that they now wanted only a pretence to deſert his ſervice. The noble earl, though he had maintained an unſhaken loyalty to John, even in the loweſt ebb of that weak king's fortune, was too wiſe, and too virtuous, to attempt an excuſe, far leſs a vindication of the meaſures purſued in the late reign. He was equally zealous of hereditary right, and for the ſupport of public liberty, when invaded by incroaching prerogative.

Upon theſe principles he entered upon his arduous work; and at this critical time, with a true ſpirit of patriotiſm, ſummoned a council of the barons at Glouceſter. The meeting was very numerous, all who adhered to the royal family being preſent. As ſoon as the members were ſeated, the earl marſhal entered the aſſembly, leading young Henry by the hand: “Behold,” ſaid he, “your king.” The barons were pleaſed at the ſight of the prince; which Pembroke perceiving, thus addreſſed them: “My dear countrymen, though we expreſſed a juſt reſentment againſt the father of this young prince, on account of his miſtaken and wicked conduct, yet this little child is free from the imputation of his father's guilt; and ſince puniſhment for offences ought only to be inflicted on their authors, it would be unjuſt for us to make the ſon bear the iniquity of the father. It is our duty and intereſt to forget our animoſities, and in compaſſion to the tender years of this infant king, unite to ſupport him on the throne of his anceſtors. Let us exert our utmoſt efforts to drive Lewis and all his followers out of this oppreſſed country, who would infallibly enſlave it, and who has by his arbitrary conduct forfeited all the benefits that have been promiſed him.” This addreſs was ſo well received, that an univerſal acclamation of joy broke out in the aſſembly, who cried unanimouſly, “Let Henry be king.”

Pembroke immediately prepared for the ceremony of the coronation; and the young prince was crowned in the cathedral of Glouceſter, on the 28th day of October, by the biſhops of Bath and Wincheſter, in preſence of Gualo, the pope's legate. But as the crown had been loſt in the waſhes of Lincolnſhire, a ſimple fillet of gold was uſed at the ceremony; which when concluded, the perſon of the king was committed to the cuſtody of the earl of Pembroke, who acted as regent of the kingdom. As it was neceſſary to ſupport the tottering throne by the aſſiſtance of the papal authority, Henry ſwore fealty to the pontiff, and renewed that homage, to which his father had already ſubjected the kingdom. A general amneſty was now publiſhed by the regent, which promiſed to all who ſhould return to their obedience, and acknowledge Henry III. for their lawful ſovereign, that all paſt offences ſhould be buried in oblivion. Nor did the earl ſtop here. Deſirous of reconciling all men to the new government, he prevailed on the young king to grant a new charter of liberties, which differed from the former given by John, in a few alterations, both with regard to civil and eccleſiaſtical pretenſions. Another charter of foreſts was alſo added, whereby all the foreſts that had been incloſed ſince the reign of Henry II. were diſafforeſted, and new perambulations were appointed for that purpoſe: offences in the foreſts were declared to be no longer capital, but puniſhable by fines, impriſonment, and more gentle penalties; and all the proprietors of lands recovered the liberty of cutting their own wood whenever they pleaſed. Theſe famous charters were thus brought nearly to the form in which they have ever ſince remained; and for many generations have been eſteemed the moſt ſacred bulwark of our national liberty. The above prudent meaſures had the deſired effect upon many of the barons, who ſtill adhered to Lewis. They reflected that the cauſe which induced them to take up arms no longer exiſted; that oppoſition now was unnatural rebellion, and that the only method they could purſue with propriety, was that of making their peace with their lawful ſovereign. To this they were alſo ſtrongly induced by the ſentence of excommunication which the pope's legate cauſed to be thundered againſt them in every church throughout the kingdom. This ſentence, however deſpiſed in the firſt tranſports of reſentment, they wiſhed in the calm moments of reflection to be diſannulled, and that they might be readmitted both into the boſom of the church and to the king's peace.

In the mean time Lewis was blocking up the caſtle of Dover, and had frequently attempted to corrupt the fidelity of the governor, by the moſt alluring propoſals; but Hubert de Burgh, nobly diſdained his offers, and declared, that he would defend the right of his young ſovereign, at the expence of his life and fortune. Finding that neither forcible nor lenient methods would prevail over the inflexible honour of Hubert, Lewis raiſed the ſiege, and repaired to London. Having ſecured his intereſt in that metropolis, he inveſted the caſtle of Hertford, which ſurrendered after a faint reſiſtance. Robert Fitz-Walter, hereditary governor, demanded the cuſtody of it, but had the mortification to hear himſelf upbraided as a traitor, and to ſee the government of the fortreſs conferred on a Frenchman, and the caſtle garriſoned by aliens.

A general clamour among the Engliſh (who were not only deprived of their eſtates, but reviled as traitors unworthy to be truſted with a place of that importance) was the conſequence of this inſulting act. They now perceived the truth of Melun's diſcovery on his death-bed, and conſidered themſelves as victims, devoted to deſtruction. In the mean time, Lewis purſued his conqueſts, and about the end of the year returned to London. But the regent, while the French monarch was availing himſelf of the king's death, exerted his utmoſt abilities, in ſecuring the intereſt of young Henry. He informed the pope of his coronation, and ſolicited his protection in favour of a prince, encompaſſed with enemies foreign and domeſtic.

Pope Innocent, ever attentive to his own intereſt, applied himſelf to the preſervation of England, as a part of St. Peter's patrimony. He empowered his legate to renew the excommunication againſt Lewis and his adherents. The whole body of the clergy eſpouſed the royal cauſe, the French prince having incurred their diſpleaſure, by deſtroying their poſſeſſions, ſo that Lewis readily conſented to a ſhort truce; during which he held a general aſſembly at Oxford, while the regent convoked another at Cambridge, and demanded a prolongation of the truce, which Lewis, on hearing that the pope intended to excommunicate him in full conſiſtory, agreed to; that he might have an opportunity of viſiting Paris, and obtaining a ſupply of men and money from his father.

A. D. 1217.

The royal cauſe was greatly promoted by his abſence, for thereupon the earls of Saliſbury, Arundel, and Warrenne, returned to their allegiance, and afterwards wards acted with great zeal in the ſervice of the young king. The legate offered to all who would embark in the royal cauſe, the ſame privileges with thoſe who undertook a cruſade, in order to excite others to follow their example.

The cinque ports, with other maritime places, declared in favour of Henry, and fitted out a ſtrong fleet to diſpute the return of Lewis. That prince having procured a reinforcement of mercenaries under the command of the earl of Perche, embarked for England, and was met in his paſſage by the royal fleet, who took a great number of his ſhips; but he himſelf, with the earl, and a conſiderable body of ſoldiers eſcaped, and landing at Sandwich, reduced the town to aſhes. The truce being now expired, the earl of Cheſter inveſted the caſtle of Mont-Sorrel, in the county of Leiceſter, defended by a French garriſon; and Lewis detached the earl of Perche to ſuſtain the beſieged, with an army of twenty thouſand men.

Seeing the Engliſh were greatly inferior in numbers, they retired, and the count advanced and inveſted the caſtle of Lincoln, which was held for the king, though the town had declared for the barons. As this was a place of great importance, the regent determined to ſuccour it, though at the expence of an engagement. Accordingly, having aſſembled his forces with great diligence and ſecrecy, he advanced as far as Newark, within twelve miles of Lincoln, before the count had the leaſt intimation of his being near.

Upon this ſurpriſe the earl of Perche called a council of war, when ſome of the moſt experienced officers deemed it expedient to quit the town, in order to engage the earl of Pembroke in the open plain where he could charge with his cavalry, which would otherwiſe be uſeleſs; but the majority were for continuing the ſiege, and keeping themſelves within the walls of the town, as the regent's forcing therein was not apprehended.

In conſequence of this opinion they repaired the fortifications, ſo as to render the place defenſible; and the regent approaching, without oppoſition, threw into the caſtle by a poſtern a choice body of troops, under the command of Fulk de Breant, who, according to his inſtructions, ſallied out furiouſly on the beſiegers, while the earl of Pembroke aſſaulted one of the city gates. This double and unexpected attack, threw the enemy into the utmoſt terror and conſternation, who were entangled for want of room, and ſaw themſelves charged with incredible impetuoſity; the legate having given, to animate the common ſoldiers, abſolution, and full aſſurance of paradiſe to all who ſhould fall in battle againſt the enemies of the church; ſo that they behaved, in general, with ſurpriſing alacrity and reſolution. Unable to oppoſe the vigorous attacks of the royal army, they would fain have conſulted their ſafety by a precipitate flight; but the earl of Perche rejected the expedient as mean and inglorious, and at length, after ſurprizing efforts to rally his troops and ſuſtain the impetuoſity of the Engliſh, ſeeing them totally routed, and diſdaining to ſurvive the diſgrace, ruſhed upon the enemy's ſwords.

The number of priſoners taken was great, and no quarter given to the French, who were all cut to pieces. The town, which had long eſpouſed the cauſe of the barons, was abandoned to pillage, and the ſoldiers gained ſuch a vaſt booty, that they diſtinguiſhed the pillage by the appellation of Lincoln fair.

Many happy circumſtances enſued from this deciſive victory. The French evacuated the caſtle of Mont-Sorrel, which was inſtantly diſmantled at the command of the regent. All the adjacent country immediately ſubmitted to the royal army; and the regent, having appeaſed the tumults in the north, prepared to march to the ſouthward, and attempt the reduction of London.

On the news of this defeat, Lewis was ſtruck with the utmoſt conſternation. He immediately raiſed the ſiege of Dover, which he had re-inveſted, and returned to London, in order to repair the loſs he had ſuſtained. He then diſpatched letters to his father the king of France, ſoliciting a ſpeedy reinforcement, without which it would be impoſſible for him to face his enemy in the field, or even quit the kingdom with ſafety. Philip, unwilling to embroil himſelf farther with the pope, affected to diſclaim his proceedings, and publickly refuſed him compliance; but at the ſame time permitted Blanche, his daughter-in-law, to equip an armament in her own name for the relief of her huſband; and accordingly a ſtrong fleet was prepared to tranſport a conſiderable army to England. The regent was no ſooner informed of this expedition, than he ſent out a ſtrong fleet under the command of Philip d'Albiney, and John de Mareſchal, to intercept them in their paſſage, and prevent their debarkation in England. The French fleet ſoon appeared, and was attacked with ſuch fury by the Engliſh, that the greateſt part of their ſhips were taken, and the reſt made France their refuge.

This diſaſter was ſeverely felt by Lewis, eſpecially as the Engliſh army approached London, in which he ſoon found himſelf blocked up by the regent without any hopes of relief; the people now expreſſed their diſcontent without reſerve, his principal partizans had been taken priſoners at Lincoln, many had deſerted him already, and others were on the point of defection. His enemies were maſters of the ſea, and himſelf beſieged in a foreign country, and cut off from all ſources of ſuccour and ſupply. In this forlorn ſituation he demanded an honourable peace of the regent, in which all his allies ſhould be included.

The earl of Pembroke readily complied with his demand. Conferences were accordingly opened, and a treaty of peace concluded, on the following terms: That all the adherents of Lewis ſhould be reſtored to the eſtates and poſſeſſions they enjoyed before the commencement of the troubles; that the city of London ſhould retain her antient privileges; that all priſoners, taken ſince the arrival of Lewis, ſhould be releaſed, and commiſſioners appointed to ſettle the terms on which the reſt ſhould be ranſomed or exchanged; that all the Engliſh, without diſtinction, who had revolted againſt John, ſhould take the oath of allegiance to Henry; that the hoſtages delivered to Lewis for the ranſom of priſoners, ſhould be ſet at liberty upon the payment of the money; that all places, towns, and caſtles, occupied by Lewis in England, ſhould be ſurrendered to king Henry; that the king of Scotland might be comprehended in the treaty; upon reſtoring all that he had ſeized during the war, the ſame reſtitution being made to him by the Engliſh monarch; that the prince of Wales ſhould enjoy the benefit of the ſame ſtipulation; that Lewis ſhould relinquiſh all the iſles that were held in his name, and renounce the homage he had received from the Engliſh ſubjects; that all the ſums which were due to him, and the terms of paying which were fully expired, ſhould be regularly remitted; and that eccleſiaſtics ſhould enjoy the benefit of this treaty, only with reſpect to their law-fees, and not in their clerical capacity.

On the part of Lewis, it was alſo ſtipulated, that he would uſe his intereſt with his father that the foreign dominions belonging to the royal family might be reſtored, and that on failure in his remonſtrances on this ſubject, he would make the reſtitution on his own acceſſion to the crown of France.

When this treaty was ratified and confirmed by the pope's legate, Lewis received abſolution and ſailed for France, after having borrowed five thouſand marks of the citizens of London to pay his debts, and defray the expences of the voyage. Immediately on the embarkation of Lewis, Henry made his public entry into London, amidſt the ſhouts and acclamations of the populace. Here he ſwore to maintain the nation in all its privileges; and this voluntary oath afforded the barons greater ſatisfaction, than could ever have reſulted from the victories of a foreign prince, by which he would have been enabled to enſlave them more.

Now the ſword of civil diſſention being appeaſed, the regent applied himſelf to the improvement of that peace, which he with great difficulty obtained. This proved a very arduous undertaking, as ſome of the nobility looked on the grants of John to be valid, as he died poſſeſſed of the regal power; and others had received from him grants of eſtates, which the late treaty obliged them to reſtore. This created many debates in the council, as well as excited perſonal animoſities among the noblemen, who had eſpouſed the intereſt of different parties, during the late contentions.

A. D. 1218. In order to appeaſe any diſturbances that might ariſe from either of theſe cauſes, the regent commanded all the magiſtrates of the kingdom to obſerve the two charters of king John, and to exact an oath from all perſons that they would obſerve them with the greateſt punctuality. The earl of Pembroke, whoſe whole conduct ſeems to have been influenced by a genuine ſpirit of patriotiſm, in order to ſpare the expence that would have attended the reduction of Llewellin, prince of Wales, propoſed honourable terms of accommodation, to which that prince acceded, and was afterwards abſolved by the legate at the earl's interceſſion. This was the laſt exertion of legatine power by Gualo, who (Pandulph being veſted with that office) was recalled by Honorius, ſucceſſor to Innocent.

A. D. 1219. At this time the nation ſuſtained an irreparable loſs by the death of the earl of Pembroke, who was removed from this ſtage of life, in the midſt of the wiſeſt and moſt faithful endeavours to confirm the peace and happineſs of the people of England. This nobleman was no leſs eminent for his honeſty, than his capacity, being not only endowed with a good head, but poſſeſſing a good heart. No man, in ſo exalted a ſphere, ever had, and none ever deſerved to have, fewer perſonal enemies. It was his peculiar happineſs to reconcile the maxims of policy to the ſtricteſt rules of juſtice; and the unhappineſs of his country, that the young prince loſt ſo faithful a guardian, and wiſe a preceptor, before he had time to imbibe his excellent inſtructions, and imitate his ſhining example. He was ſucceeded by William de Roches, biſhop of Wincheſter; and Hubert de Burgh, who ſo gallantly defended Dover caſtle, was created chief juſticiary of the realm.

A. D. 1220. The coronation of the king was again performed by cardinal Langton, who was freed from the ſuſpenſion on account of which he had quitted the kingdom. Immediately after the coronation, Henry ſet out with the regent on a progreſs through the different counties of the kingdom, in order to examine the conduct of the ſervants of the crown, and remove ſuch governors as were thought averſe to the preſent adminiſtration. None of theſe oppoſed the king's meaſures, except William de Albemarle, governor of Rockingham, who had arrogated a kind of ſovereignty, and affected to deſpiſe the laws of government. This imperious nobleman refuſed to reſign his employment, and put himſelf in a poſture of defence; but hearing of the concurrence of the neighbouring governors with the king's party, he thought proper on capitulation to ſurrender.

A. D. 1221. Now Henry returned to London, where, with his own hands, he laid the firſt ſtone of the new abbey-church of Weſtminſter, which remains to this day a monument of the architecture of that age. About the ſame time cardinal Langton, archbiſhop of Canterbury, transferred the body of Thomas Becket from the ſtone coffin and vault in which it was firſt interred, to a rich ſhrine of gold adorned with precious ſtones. This pompous ceremony was performed in the preſence of the king, and Pandulph the pope's legate, ſurrounded by a vaſt multitude, many of whom came from foreign parts merely to be ſpectators of a ſolemnity ſo ridiculous.

When the citizens of London obtained the prize in a wreſtling match, a ſteward belonging to the abbot of Weſtminſter, one of the combatants, piqued at the glory he had loſt, and determined to revenge the diſgrace, propoſed a ſecond conteſt, and a ram as the prize of the victor. The Londoners, who flocked to the place of diverſion, were ſuddenly attacked by the ſteward and a band of armed ruſtics, by whom, being cruelly maimed and wounded, they were obliged to fly for refuge into the city. The citizens, incenſed at this outrage, took to their arms in a tumultuous manner, determined to be revenged on the perfidious ſteward. Serle, the mayor, endeavoured to appeaſe the mob, and referred them to the abbot for ſatisfaction; but this moderate expedient was rejected at the inſtigation of Conſtantine Fitz-Arnulf, who had been a zealous partizan of the barons, a rich, factious, and popular citizen.

The rioters, inflamed at this incendiary, propoſed that they ſhould march againſt the abbot and his ſteward, and level their houſes with the ground. The mob, readily embracing the propoſal, Conſtantine put himſelf at their head, proceeded to Weſtminſter, and returned in triumph to the city, having demoliſhed ſeveral houſes belonging to the abbey.

When the chief juſticiary was informed of this outrage, excited at the inſtigation of Conſtantine, he repaired to the Tower, and ſummoned the citizens to appear and anſwer for their riotous proceedings. Conſtantine juſtified what he had done with unparalleled impudence, declaring that he would repeat the ſame conduct on a like occaſion. He was thus emboldened by a vain preſumption on the ſecurity which had been ſtipulated in favour of the adherents of Lewis; but the juſticiary informed him, that no benefit accrued from that ſtipulation to rioters, and that he, with his chief accomplices, ſhould be hanged the next morning; a ſentence which was punctually executed, notwithſtanding an offer of fifteen thouſand marks of ſilver for his ranſom. Many of the rioters were puniſhed with the amputation of their hands and feet; and the king expreſſed his reſentment of this behaviour by diſplacing the magiſtrates, by his ſole authority, and ſubſtituting others.

A. D. 1222. This act of ſeverity, as directly oppoſing the charters which had been ſo lately confirmed, raiſed an univerſal clamour amongſt the people; notwithſtanding which, the royal power was ſo abſolute at this period, that the king exacted hoſtages for the peaceable behaviour of the citizens; and the corporation obliged themſelves to deliver them upon demand, by an authentic deed.

Theſe deſpotic meaſures were ſo diſpleaſing to the nation in general, that in a ſubſequent council of the prelates and nobility, the king was peremptorily demanded to execute thoſe charters, which he had ſolemnly ſworn to obſerve and adhere to.

Since the death of the earl of Pembroke, the court had adopted new maxims; and when this addreſs was preſented to the king, William Briwere replied, that it was unreaſonable to demand the execution of charters extorted by force. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, offended at this raſh reply, obſerved, that if he loved the king, he would not prevent the kingdom's peace.

Though young, and beſet with fawning creatures, Henry diſcerned the equity of the demand, and the conſequences that might reſult from a refuſal; and therefore not only declared his approbation of what the archbiſhop had obſerved, but iſſued orders for the exact execution of the articles of the charter throughout the kingdom. The council granted the king a conſiderable ſubſidy for relieving the Chriſtians in the Holy Land, by way of teſtifying their approbation of his behaviour on this occaſion.

A. D. 1223. Philip Auguſtus, king of France, dying about this time, the council of England ſent over ambaſſadors to congratulate Lewis on his acceſſion to the throne, and remind him of the promiſe he made reſpecting Normandy; but the French monarch informed them, that he conſidered himſelf as freed from that obligation, by Henry's infringement of the articles of the treaty in the affair of Conſtantine, and neglect of reſtoring the antient laws purſuant to the charters.

Hubert having provoked the barons, on account of a late act for reſuming the lands and caſtles of the crown, they determined, if poſſible, to deprive him of his authority. In order to accompliſh their deſign, they ſent Peter, biſhop of Wincheſter, an implacable enemy to Hubert, to ſolicit a bull from the pontiff declaring Henry of full age, and authorizing him to take the government into his own hands; and enjoining thoſe who held any offices of ſtate to reſign them into the king's hands, that he might diſpoſe of them as he ſhould deem fit.

The biſhop's requeſt was readily complied with by the pope, but the king, in conſequence of a mandate from his holineſs, was no ſooner in poſſeſſion of the caſtles, than Burgh's governments were reſtored. The principal malecontents were the earls of Cheſter and Albemarle, Fulk de Breant, and Robert de Vipot, who, with ſome other diſcontented barons, held a meeting at Leiceſter, to concert meaſures for carrying their rebellious projects into execution; when the archbiſhop of Canterbury and his ſuffragans, pronounced ſentence of excommunication on all diſturbers of the public peace, and particularly thoſe who refuſed to reſign the caſtles belonging to the crown, which were then in their keeping.

The malecontent barons, in conſequence of this ſpirited meaſure, repaired to Northampton, reſigned the lands, caſtles, and honours which belonged to the crown, and renewed their oaths of allegiance to their king.

A. D. 1225. Now a general aſſembly was held at Weſtminſter, in which Hugh de Burgh laid before the aſſembly the ſtate of the king's affairs abroad, the ſucceſſes of the French, and the neceſſity of an immediate ſupply; concluding with a motion, that a fifteenth part of all moveables belonging to clergy or laity, ſhould for that purpoſe be granted.

This tax was received by the people with great chearfulneſs, as the charters were again confirmed by Henry, who was now in the eighteenth year of his age. Thus ſupplied, Henry equipped an armament for an expedition into Guienne, under the command of his brother Richard, who had reduced ſeveral places; but hearing that the main army of the French was advancing to give him battle, he retreated, and a truce was concluded for three years through the interpoſition of the pope.

While theſe tranſactions were going on in Guienne, Otho, the pope's legate, arrived in England, and a general aſſembly being convened while the king lay dangerouſly ill at Marlborough, he made a very extraordinary propoſal in the name of the pontiff. Having obſerved, that as the holy ſee had long been ſubject to the reproach of ſelling her favours for money, through the extreme indigence of the Roman church, it was the duty of all her members to remove the cauſe of that imputation; he propoſed that two prebends in every cathedral, and as many cells in every convent in England, ſhould be granted to the pope by an authentic deed, confirmed by an act of the general aſſembly.

So unreaſonable appeared this demand, that the council continued ſilent, till the legate complained of being ill treated; when they told him, that the abſence of the king, and ſeveral principal members, would not permit them to deliberate on a point of ſo much importance. Otho, with a true pontifical arrogance, deſired them to continue the ſeſſion till the arrival of his majeſty and the principal members; but regardleſs of his importunity they broke up, without ſo much as conferring on the ſubject; therefore the legate was obliged to wait another opportunity.

In the mean time he made a progreſs through the northern counties, where, under pretence of the right of procurations, he fleeced the churches in ſuch a manner, that the people in general complaining to the pope, he was recalled, in order to avoid exaſperating the Engliſh at ſuch a juncture. At the ſame time the pontiff deputed the archbiſhop of Canterbury, to demand a poſitive anſwer to the propoſal he by his legate had made.

Accordingly Langton obeyed; and the king, with the advice of the prelates declared, that as the affair concerned all the powers in Chriſtendom, he would conform to the reſolutions of the other potentates. During theſe tranſactions, Lewis king of France was poiſoned by his ſon Lewis IX. under the guardianſhip of Blanche of Caſtile, who was alſo declared regent of the kingdom.

A. D. 1226. The reign of Henry began with a tranſaction, which afforded an unfavourable omen of his future government. As he could not, with the leaſt plauſibility, demand a grant of money from the aſſembly after the large ſubſidies he had ſo lately received, he reſolved to revive an expedient, practiſed by his uncle Richard, after his return from Paleſtine. This was an impoſition of a certain tax upon all perſons who enjoyed charters; by which the nation in general, and the monaſteries in particular, were aggrieved; but this extortion was imputed to the juſticiary, who had gained an abſolute aſcendency over the king, and incurred the odium of the people, which was not a little increaſed by the death of the earl of Saliſbury, natural ſon to Henry II.

A. D. 1227. Many ſignal ſervices this nobleman had done to the king; and he was conſidered as a rival in power with Hubert, who invited him to an entertainment in his houſe, where he was ſeized with a languiſhing diſtemper that brought him to the grave; ſo that a general opinion prevailed that at the inſtigation of the juſticiary he had been poiſoned.

This diſguſt to the miniſter was increaſed by the conduct of the prince, who, as he advanced in years, diſcovered an avaricious, capricious, irreſolute, and oppreſſive diſpoſition. The people were perſuaded that a king, deſtitute of maxims and reſolution, could never manage the helm of ſtate, and would therefore be liable to the influence of ſome inſinuating ambitious individual, who as favourite and prime miniſter, might rule him and his kingdom.

Thus Henry was devoted to the caprice of Hubert de Burgh, who, impatient of any control, prevailed on the king to diſmiſs the biſhop of Wincheſter from his councils; and accordingly that prelate was ordered to retire to his dioceſe. After his departure, Hubert perſuaded the king to render himſelf independent of thoſe reſtrictions that controlled him in his adminiſtration, and aſſume a deſpotic power. This advice agreeing with the diſpoſition of the king, the juſticiary prevailed on him to exact five thouſand marks from the city of London, on pretence of that community's having lent the like ſum to Lewis when he left the kingdom. He alſo exacted from Northampton twelve thouſand pounds ſterling, on various frivolous pretences, and extorted large ſums from the monaſteries, notwithſtanding their appeals to the pontiff; but that by which he incurred a general odium, was the unexpected revocation of the two charters, which he had ſo ſolemnly ſworn to obſerve, and alledging the invalidity of any act paſſed in his minority, now renounced.

The natural conſequence of theſe impolitic ſteps was, a univerſal ſpirit of diſſatisfaction among the barons; and prince Richard, lately arrived from Guienne, took the advantage of this alienation to inſult his brother, in conſequence of a quarrel about the inveſtiture of an eſtate in Cornwall, poſſeſſed by one Walleran, a German, who in his abſence had ſeized the manor, and now refuſed to produce his title thereto.

Accordingly Richard ſeized the eſtate, refuſing to ſurrender it till the title was determined by the judgment of his peers. Henry, incenſed at this declaration, ordered his brother to reſtore the lands in diſpute, or immediately quit the kingdom. Richard boldly replied, that he would abide by the deciſion of his peers; and retired to his own houſe. Hubert adviſed the king to arreſt him without delay; but while he heſitated, Richard ſet out for Marlborough, where he communicated the tranſaction to the earl of Pembroke, who approving his behaviour, undertook, in vindication of his right, to form an aſſociation.

A plan was accordingly concerted, in concurrence with the earl of Cheſter and ſome other noblemen, and a rendezvous appointed at Stamford, where they publiſhed a manifeſto containing their grievances, and demanded a confirmation of their charters, and reſtitution of their rights. The juſticiary, to evade the danger that might reſult from this inſurrection, adviſed the king to call a council at Northampton, and promiſe the barons to redreſs the grievances of the nation. This conceſſion induced the barons to lay aſide their deſigns, and return to their allegiance.

A. D. 1228. About this time Stephen Langton, archbiſhop of Canterbury, having died, the monks of St. Auguſtin elected one Walter de Hemiſham to ſucceed him, without even demanding the king's permiſſion. Henry, incenſed at their proceedings, refuſed to confirm his election, and agents were diſpatched with appeals to Rome; when the pope, having examined the merits of the cauſe, annulled the election, and reſerved the nomination of another archbiſhop to himſelf. All the Engliſh envoys concurred in recommending Richard le Grant, chancellor of Lincoln, who was accordingly appointed by the pope, and before he had received the pall, conſecrated at Canterbury by the biſhop of Rocheſter.

A. D. 1229. As the buſineſs of the late convention at Rome was in itſelf ſo ſcandalous, it was induſtriouſly concealed till one Stephen Seagrave came over from the pope, to collect the tenths of all moveables throughout the nation, that had been ſtipulated by the agents, in conſequence of the pontiff's conſenting to the nomination of Richard. A meeting of the nobility being called on the arrival of Stephen, the members were aſtoniſhed at the propoſal; but as a mark of reſpect to his holineſs, agreed to grant him a donation, without proceeding to a minute enquiry into the effects of individuals.

Notwithſtanding, while all the reſt of the nation diſcovered a puſillanimous ſpirit, in ſuffering themſelves to be robbed of their property by this religious freebooter, the earl of Cheſter maintained his independence; inſiſted on his prerogative of Paleſtine; and forbad the nuncio, or any of his agents, to ſet foot within his territories at their peril. The collection of this tax was hardly finiſhed, when the king demanded freſh ſubſidies to enable him to poſecute a war in France, for the recovery of his dominions on the continent. But after a numerous army had been collected from all parts of the kingdom, the expedition was prevented by a neglect of the juſticiary, who had not provided a ſufficient number of tranſports.

A. D. 1230. On the year following a ſcutage was levied to defray the expences of a ſecond armament, which was accordingly tranſported into Bretagne. But the whole attempt was fruſtrated by impolitic conduct; and Henry, having exhauſted his finances abroad, returned to England, and again demanded ſubſidies, which a generous council granted to his relief.

Many diſturbances took place in conſequence of the abſence of Henry from his dominions. The king of Connaught, knowing that moſt of the Engliſh troops were employed in foreign parts, reſolved to avail himſelf of their abſence; and aſſembling a great number of vaſſals, invaded the lands of the Britiſh proprietors, which he waſted with fire and ſword, until he was oppoſed and routed by Geoffrey de Morico, juſticiary of Ireland. Llewellin, prince of Wales, had alſo renewed his incurſions, ravaged the borders of that country with impunity, and returned in ſafety with his plunder.

Now Henry marched into Wales at the head of a numerous army; but meeting with ſome difficulties and much oppoſition, he retreated without having reduced the enemy, or done any thing worthy of our remark.

A. D. 1231. Richard, archbiſhop of Canterbury, about this time reſigned his breath, and the monks choſe Ralph de Neville, biſhop of Chicheſter, and chancellor, for his ſucceſſor; and Henry ſo approved their choice, that he put him in immediate poſſeſſion of the temporalities of the ſee; yet he could not obtain the confirmation of the pope, who ſhrewdly ſuſpected that ſhould he be advanced to the primacy, he would endeavour to detach the Engliſh church from its dependence on the holy ſee.

Impreſſed with this idea, he annulled his election, and ordered the monks to chuſe another, and afterwards a third, who was alſo rejected; but at laſt they elected Edmund, treaſurer of the church of Saliſbury, who being choſen by recommendation of the pope, was duly confirmed. This exertion of deſpotiſm in the court of Rome, excited a general clamour throughout the nation.

It became now a practice to beſtow benefices on Italian prieſts, and inhibit the Engliſh till theſe foreigners were provided for. This being conſidered as a national inſult, many aſſociations were formed for delivering the kingdom from ſuch ſhameful oppreſſion. Circular letters were ſent to the biſhops and chapters, warning them againſt favouring ſuch practices on pain of having their houſes burned, and their farms totally demoliſhed.

Thus they proceeded for ſome time without oppoſition, and the foreign clergy fled for refuge to monaſteries and convents. The pope, on information of theſe outrages, wrote a letter to the king, inſiſting that he ſhould inflict an exemplary puniſhment on the delinquents, otherwiſe he would excommunicate his perſon, and lay his kingdom under an interdict. Henry, alarmed at theſe menaces, appointed inquiſitions in the different parts of the kingdom; and it ſoon appeared that all ranks and degrees of people had given them their countenance.

A. D. 1232.

One Robert de Twange, a gallant young knight, who, under the fictitious name of W. Wither, had headed the rioters, appeared at laſt in the king's preſence, and owned himſelf the ringleader in all the expeditions againſt the Italians, who, he alledged, had endeavoured to deprive him of the only patronage he enjoyed. Henry was charmed with his frank confeſſion; and as ſentence of excommunication had been denounced againſt all concerned in thoſe riots, he ſent him to Rome, with letters recommending him to the indulgence of the pope.

Notwithſtanding the confeſſion of this young knight exculpated Hubert; his profeſſed enemy, Peter de Roches, biſhop of Wincheſter, inſinuated to the pope, that the juſticiary was actually concerned in the late diſturbances, and by that means added the influence of his holineſs to the confederacy already formed againſt Hubert. The juſticiary's enemies perceiving the fickle temper of the king, by calumniating the character and conduct of his miniſter, prevailed on his majeſty to recall the biſhop of Wincheſter to court. This inſinuating artful prelate found means to obtain the favour of this weak prince, by which he filled the vacant poſts with his adherents; and while he ſtrengthened his own party, weakened that of the juſticiary. About this time the prince of Wales made freſh incurſions into the Engliſh territories with impunity; the biſhop repreſented to the king the diſgrace of tamely ſuffering his dominions to be ravaged by a handful of banditti; when Henry informed him, that his finances were not adequate to the expences of his houſhold, much leſs to the charges of a war; Peter took occaſion to inveigh againſt the conduct of the prime miniſter, affirming that his revenues were embezzled; that the wardſhips of the crown were beſtowed on individuals; that the income of vacant benefices were intercepted, as well as that reverting to the crown by death or confiſcation; adding, that by means of honeſt officers and œconomy, he might, like his predeceſſors, keep his coffers always full, and his power conſequently independent of the general aſſembly.

All theſe inſinuations gratified the avaricious and rapacious diſpoſition of Henry, who gave immediate orders for all his ſheriffs and officers of the revenue to produce their accounts. Many who were detected in frauds were deprived of their offices, and impriſoned. Ralph Brito, treaſurer of the chamber, was fined in a thouſand pounds, and his poſt beſtowed upon Peter de Rivaux, nephew to the biſhop of Wincheſter. Having removed the dependents of Hubert from court, this artful prelate prevailed with the king to diveſt him of his office of juſticiary, and confer it on Stephen de Seagrave, one of his principal adherents.

As ſoon as Hubert ſaw that Peter was bent on his ruin, and that the king's affection was wholly alienated from him, he retired to the priory of Merton, in Surry, where he took ſanctuary; and Henry, whoſe reſentment againſt him was now as furious, as his confidence in him had been implicit, ordered the mayor of London to force him, either dead or alive, from his retreat.

In the evening the mayor, in conſequence of this order, aſſembled the populace with the alarm bell, and having acquainted them with the purport of his majeſty's command, directed them to be ready to march the next morning to execute the king's order. This direction was extremely grateful to the mob, who retained an implacable hatred againſt Hubert ever ſince the execution of their favourite leader Conſtantine, and therefore cheerfully diſperſed to make preparations for the arduous and daring undertaking.

Several citizens, in the mean time, of diſtinguiſhed rank, who ſeem to have had more regard to order and good government than either the king, his council, or the mayor, repaired to the biſhop of Wincheſter in Southwark, and repreſented to him the danger that might enſue, not only to the church of Merton, but even the city itſelf, from the ungoverned rage of a licentious multitude. The prelate, inſtead of acting with prudence and moderation becoming his character, told them, that whatever might be the conſequence, they muſt obey the king's command.

Rouſed by this declaration, and prompted by their own reſentment, the populace, to the amount of twenty thouſand armed men, marched towards the church of Merton, where Hubert was kneeling before the altar, expecting his fate with great fortitude and reſolution. But the execution of this lawleſs command was prevented by the remonſtrances of the earl of Cheſter, who, though a profeſſed enemy to Hubert, prevailed on the king, to obviate a reproach he would inevitably incur from ſuch tumultuous as well as ungrateful proceedings, againſt a nobleman whoſe whole life had been devoted to the ſervice of himſelf and family.

Now Henry, affected with the ingenuity of the earl, and conſcious of the truth of his allegation, diſpatched a counter-order to the mayor of London, which, by the care of the biſhop of Wincheſter, arrived time enough to prevent miſchief; and the mob, much chagrined at their diſappointment, returned to London.

Hubert, through the interceſſion of the archbiſhop of Dublin, the biſhop of Chicheſter, and earl of Cheſter, obtained time to prepare for his trial. Relying on the protection of this indulgence, he ſet out for St. Edmundſbury on a viſit to his wife; and Henry, imagining that he intended to make his eſcape, ſent a detachment of three hundred men, under the command of Geoffrey de Craucombe, to apprehend and commit him cloſe priſoner to the Tower. The party detached found Hubert in the chapel of Brentwood, with a croſs in one hand, and a conſecrated wafer in the other; which having wreſted from him, he was dragged out by violence, and conveyed to priſon like a common felon. Next day, Roger, biſhop of London, repaired to court, to complain of this breach of the church's privileges; and threatened to excommunicate all concerned in it, unleſs Hubert was releaſed immediately.

Henry accordingly ordered him to be re-conveyed to the chapel; but at the ſame time the ſheriffs of Hertford and Eſſex were directed to raiſe the populace of thoſe counties, and beſet the place in ſuch a manner, that he could neither eſcape or receive ſuſtenance; and offered him only the alternative of perpetual impriſonment, perpetual exile, or a confeſſion of his treaſon.

Conſcious of his innocence, the earl diſdained to purchaſe life on ſuch inglorious terms; and after remaining in the chapel a whole month, and labouring under great want of the common neceſſaries of life, ſurrendered himſelf to the ſheriff, who delivered him up to the conſtable of the Tower. During his confinement, the king, informed that he had depoſited a conſiderable ſum of money in the hands of the Templars, demanded it of the maſter, who refuſed to comply without Hubert's order, which was immediately granted. This unreſerved compliance appeaſed the indignation of Henry, who now declared he would never conſent to the death of a nobleman, to whom he and his father owed ſuch important obligations. He therefore liſtened to terms of accommodation; and Hubert, after conveying to Henry all the lands he held of the crown, was permitted to enjoy the reſt of his fortunes in quietneſs.

A.D. 1233. Now the biſhop of Wincheſter thinking his own power eſtabliſhed on the ruins of that of Hubert de Burgh, aſſured Henry that as few of the Engliſh nobility were well affected to his government, he could never render himſelf independent, while they poſſeſſed the great offices of the kingdom.

Accordingly he adviſed him to leſſen their power and influence, by depriving them of their lucrative poſts and employments, which he might beſtow on foreigners, and thereby ſecure their unreſerved ſubmiſſion to his pleaſure. Henry, like a weak prince, believed his ſuggeſtions, and embraced his advice.

Above two thouſand knights were imported in a ſhort time from Gaſcony and Poictou, the native country of the biſhop of Wincheſter, who had invited them over to ſhare the ſpoils of the nation. Theſe were immediately provided with lucrative employments, of which the Engliſh barons were diveſted. At length the earl of Pembroke, at the inſtigation of the Engliſh nobility, openly complained of this unjuſt adherence to ſtrangers; and told the king that his attachment to foreigners alienated the affections of his ſubjects, and muſt, if perſiſted in, be attended with dangerous conſequences; frankly aſſuring him, that ſhould he continue to laviſh his favours on foreigners, the barons would be obliged to concert ſome meaſures for delivering the nation from theſe rapacious intruders.

The biſhop of Wincheſter who was preſent at this expoſtulation, immediately replied, that his inſolence deſerved chaſtiſement; adding, that the king had full liberty to call in what foreigners he thought proper for the ſecurity of his crown, and, that if thoſe already in England were not ſufficient, others ſhould be immediately invited over.

Inflamed with this arrogant declaration, the Engliſh nobility retired from court, and began to form aſſociations for their lives and fortunes; while the biſhop of Wincheſter affected to deſpiſe their reſentment, confiding in his foreign friends, who almoſt overſpread the kingdom.

Some ſhort time after, the barons were ſummoned to attend a council at Oxford, but refuſed to expoſe themſelves to the inſults and treachery of perfidious foreigners. They received a ſecond and a third ſummons, with promiſes that their grievances ſhould be redreſſed; but hearing that freſh ſwarms of aliens arrived with military accoutrements, they ſent a deputation to the king, inſiſting on the removal of the biſhop of Wincheſter from all his councils, and the expulſion of his foreign aſſiſtants from the kingdom; otherwiſe they ſhould be obliged to transfer the crown of England to ſome prince more worthy of ſuch an exalted favor.

Henry was alarmed; but the biſhop ſoon diſpelled his fears, by aſſuring him that he ſhould ſhortly be able, with the aſſiſtance of his foreign friends, to chaſtize the inſolence of ſuch rebellious ſubjects, who dared to treat their prince with ſuch indignity. Accordingly, all the barons that ſtill continued about the court were treated as enemies to their country, and obliged to give hoſtages for their peaceable behaviour in future.

A conſpiracy was formed at the ſame time, againſt the earl Mareſchal, who, to avoid the execution, retired into Wales. As the abſence of this nobleman prevented the other barons from coming to any reſolution, the king, with the advice of Wincheſter, ſummoned all his military tenants to meet him in arms at Glouceſter on the fourteenth of Auguſt; and the barons refuſing to obey the citation were proſcribed as traitors, and their eſtates confiſcated and given to foreign mercenaries.

Now the parliament, which had been aſſembled at Weſtminſter, earneſtly beſought the king to be reconciled to his barons, and exclaimed againſt the practice of proſcribing Engliſh noblemen without trial or conviction. The biſhop of Wincheſter not only pretended to juſtify the late proceedings, but impudently aſſerted that the Engliſh nobility were not intitled to the ſame privileges with the peers of France. This aſſertion, falſe as it was inſolent, ſo exaſperated the biſhops in general, that they roſe up and threatened him with the ſentence of excommunication; and, when Wincheſter told them he was exempted from their juriſdiction, as having been conſecrated by the pope, to whom he appealed from any ſtep they might take to his prejudice; they denounced a general ſentence againſt all thoſe who had alienated the king's affections from his ſubjects; but when Henry urged them to excommunicate the earl of Pembroke, they refuſed compliance, alledging the injuſtice of cenſuring a man for vindicating his property and right.

Henry, finding himſelf under a neceſſity of attacking the earl in the field, ordered his troops to rendezvous at Glouceſter, in order to march from thence into Wales. The earl, receiving advice of the approach of the royal army, ordered the cattle to be driven from the adjacent country, ſo that the king's troops, being deſtitute of forage and proviſions, were obliged to retire into Monmouthſhire, to prepare magazines for their ſubſiſtence. The earl, informed that the king and his principal officers had taken up their garriſons in the caſtle Groſmont, while the army lay encamped in the open plain, ſurprized them in the night, routed them the firſt onſet, and took above five hundred horſes, with all the king's baggage, ſo that he was obliged to return to Glouceſter. Pembroke then undertook the ſiege of Monmouth, which was defended by Baldwin de Guiſnes, who making a ſally as the earl was reconnoitring the walls with a ſmall retinue, attacked them with the utmoſt fury. A deſperate conflict enſued, in which the earl, after performing wonders, and killing numbers with his own hands, was very near being carried off priſoner, when Baldwin received a wound with an arrow, which his followers thinking mortal, gathered round him, and gave the earl an opportunity of making his eſcape.

Pembroke's army marched up in the mean time, and ſeeing the danger of their general, ſurrounded and took the whole party. In the mean time Hubert de Burgh, who ſtill continued a priſoner in the caſtle of the Devizes, received advice that the biſhop of Wincheſter determined to take away his life; and that, in order to facilitate his deſign, he was ſoliciting the king for the government of the caſtle; communicating the danger of his ſituation to ſome of the guards, they commiſerating the fate of ſo gallant a man, connived at his eſcape. But the governor, ſenſible of the importance of his charge, detached a party in purſuit of the fugitive, whom they found in a church, and dragged back again to his dungeon.

Henry, at the remonſtrance of the biſhop of Saliſbury, and ſome other prelates, ordered Hubert to be re-conveyed to the church, but with the ſame diſadvantageous circumſtances as before; when at length Richard de Siward routed the ſurrounding mob, and reſcued Hubert, who retired with him into Wales, and joined the earl of Pembroke.

A. D. 1234. Early in the ſpring he defeated a conſiderable body of troops, commanded by John of Monmouth, ravaged the lands belonging to the king's foreign counſellors on the borders of Wales, and laid the town of Shrewſbury in aſhes. Henry, inſtead of oppoſing the progreſs of the Marſhal, retired to Wincheſter, leaving the country to his mercy. The biſhops therefore ſolicited the king to compromiſe with Pembroke, but he rejected this ſalutary advice, at the inſtigation of Wincheſter, unleſs that nobleman would acknowledge himſelf a traitor, and as ſuch throw himſelf at his feet.

But the earl rejected theſe diſhonourable terms, and fell with redoubled fury on the lands of the king's adviſers. But the crafty and inſidious Wincheſter had concerted a ſcheme unknown to all but himſelf. He wrote letters, in the king's name, to Maurice Fitz-gerald, juſticiary of Ireland, Walter and Hugh de Lacy, and others, giving them to underſtand, that Richard, earl of Pembroke had been deprived by a ſentence in the king's court, of all his honours and eſtates, and deſiring that they would ravage his lands in Ireland, in order to draw him over thither; in which caſe, if they would take him either dead or alive, all his fortune in that kingdom ſhould be divided among them.

This artful and treacherous contrivance had the deſired effect; the earl ſet out for Ireland, with only ſixteen attendants, and on his landing was received by Geoffry de Mareis, with all the exterior marks of zeal and attachment. This traitor engaged to raiſe troops for his ſervice, and inveigled him into a parley with his colleagues; on which occaſion, being deſerted by his followers, he received a mortal ſtab in the back with a poniard, of which he died in a few weeks, to the regret of all honeſt men, who revered him as a nobleman of great valour, capacity and virtue, a hater of tyranny, and zealous aſſertor of the conſtitutional rights of his country. But the unprecedented and infamous proceedings of the biſhop of Wincheſter and his adherents now approached their final cloſe; for in an aſſembly at Weſtminſter, the prelates joined as one man in the common cauſe of liberty, and were well ſeconded by the barons; nor was there a ſingle advocate in the whole aſſembly, for the prime miniſter and his foreign faction.

Now Edmund, archbiſhop of Canterbury, accuſed Peter, biſhop of Wincheſter, and his foreign aſſiſtants, as acceſſary to the misfortunes that had befallen the kingdom, and the alienation of the affections of the people from their prince; and finally inſiſted on a ſpeedy redreſs of thoſe grievances, on pain of ſentence being denounced againſt him and all his party.

Henry, alarmed by this ſpirited reſolution, remanded Wincheſter back to his dioceſe, diſmiſſed Peter de Rivaux from the office of high-treaſurer, and ordered him to produce his accounts, and deliver up the caſtles in his cuſtody. Seagrave was ſoon after diveſted of his poſt of juſticiary, the foreigners were obliged to quit the country, and the Engliſh prelates and nobility admitted into the privy council.

Now a change of meaſures immediately followed; ambaſſadors were ſent to conclude a peace with Llewellyn and his aſſociates, and the king himſelf repaired to Glouceſter, to forward the negociation. In his way to that city, he received the news of Pembroke's death, and though he had proſecuted that worthy nobleman with the utmoſt virulence, yet, when he heard the treacherous manner in which he had been betrayed, he could not refrain from tears.

Llewellyn conſented to the propoſals of peace, on condition that the barons who were in alliance with him ſhould be pardoned, and reſtored to their eſtates. Theſe terms being granted, they repaired to court and met with a favourable reception from his majeſty, who among the reſt, diſtinguiſhed Hubert de Burgh with peculiar marks of his favour. Baſſet and Siward were created privy counſellors; Gilbert, brother to the earl of Pembroke, received the inveſtiture of the Engliſh and Iriſh eſtates, and Henry, having previouſly conferred on him the honour of knighthood, delivered into his hands the marſhal's ſtaff, in a parliament held at Worceſter. It being now reſolved to commence a proſecution againſt the late miniſters, Edmund, archbiſhop of Canterbury, produced copies of the letters which had been ſent to the Iriſh noblemen, for the deſtruction of the earl of Pembroke; the recitation of which filled the whole aſſembly with horror and indignation. The miſcreant authors were ſummoned to appear in court at Midſummer, to anſwer this and other charges of mal-adminiſtration, but inſtead of obeying the ſummons, Wincheſter and Rivaux took ſanctuary in the cathedral of Winton, Seagrave retired to the church of St. Mary Newark, in Leiceſterſhire, and another of the accomplices hid himſelf in London in a cellar.

Edmund, who was a prelate of moderation, and averſe to all violent meaſures, prevailed on the king to grant them a ſafe conduct; in conſequence of which they came from their retreats and in order to take their trial appeared in court.

Peter de Rivaux was dreſſed in the habit of a clergyman, under which were concealed a coat of mail and a ſtiletto. Detected in this diſguiſe, he fell on his knees and ſued for mercy, deſiring time to regulate his accounts of the royal revenue, which was granted, though his lay poſſeſſions were ſequeſtered. Seagrave was fined a thouſand marks, and obliged to reſtore ſeveral manors that had been alienated from the crown in his favour, but Peter biſhop of Wincheſter, the principal offender, being a favourite of the pope, both on account of his riches and military knowledge, was at the deſire of his holineſs ſent to Rome to command his armies, and thus effected his eſcape.

Now the council were employed in regulating the confuſed ſtate of the kingdom; the fortreſſes were commited to the care of Engliſh noblemen, well affected to their country; the extent of the civil and eccleſiaſtical policy of the kingdom, was aſcertained by certain reſtrictions, to prevent a mutual encroachment; and proclamations were iſſued, to enforce a due obſervation of the two charters of liberty.

The emperor, Frederick II. about this time, demanded Henry's ſiſter, Iſabella, in marriage; the propoſal was embraced, the articles of the contract ſettled, and the prelates and barons granted a ſcutage; by which thirty thouſand marks were levied, as a dowry for the young princeſs, who was immediately ſent with a ſplendid retinue into Germany, and the nuptials were celebrated at Worms, with great pomp, in preſence of a great number of perſons of the firſt rank and diſtinction.

Henry now determined to marry Eleanor, ſecond daughter of Raymond Berenger, count of Provence, who had already diſpoſed of his eldeſt daughter to the king of France. The council approving this alliance, and the father the propoſals of Henry, the young lady was conducted by the ambaſſadors into England, and the ceremony performed at Canterbury, whence the royal pair proceeded to London, which they entered with great ſplendor and ceremony.

A. D. 1236.

The queen was crowned the Sunday following at Weſtminſter, with a pomp exceeding any thing known before. But what completed the general joy on this occaſion, was the king's readineſs to gratify the people, by holding a court at Merton, in Surry, in which ſeveral regulations were made, and particularly the famous ſtatute, relating to the dowers, and wills of widows; the improvement of waſte; the exemption of heirs from uſury during their minority, for debts contracted by their father; the limitation of writs, and other articles calculated for the eaſe and ſecurity of the people.

Some grievances ſtill remained, but they were ſuch as might eaſily be removed. A council was therefore ſummoned to be held at London, but the weakneſs of Henry ſoon re-appeared, notwithſtanding all the pains which the new miniſtry had taken to regulate his conduct. William de Savorie, biſhop elect of Valence, uncle to the queen, had attended her to England, and was now become a great favourite with the pliant king. The Engliſh nobility, who were always remarkable for their hatred of foreign favourites, determined to cruſh this new influence, before the minion could acquire a degree of authority ſufficient to affect the welfare of the people.

In an aſſembly convened at London, they accordingly preſented a remonſtrance to the king, who was ſo alarmed at their addreſs, that he retired to the Tower, and there propoſed to finiſh the buſineſs of the ſeſſion; but the nobility refuſing to attend in that place, Henry had foreſight enough on this occaſion to remove to his palace and prevent the complaints of his people. This had the deſired effect; the members ſeeing all compulſion on their deliberations taken off, repaired thither, and the king regulated the office of ſheriffs according to their advice.

Conſiderable abuſes had crept into the diſcharge of that important truſt, and the perſons in general who enjoyed it having been creatures of the two laſt miniſters, were become obnoxious to the people. Such therefore were diſcharged, and their places filled with men of birth, fortune, and honour, above the temptation of mercenary deeds.

Alarmed at the power and influence of the barons over the conduct of the king, the foreigners employed every act to ſtrengthen their party. They prevailed on Henry to diſmiſs Ralph Fitznicholas, lord-ſteward, and other officers from the houſhold and council, and to demand the ſeal from the biſhop of Chicheſter, who was a conſummate lawyer, and upright judge; but the prelate boldly refuſed to reſign his poſt, except by order of that council, from which he had received his authority.

Seagrave, Rivaux, and Paſſelwe were recalled to court, and recovered their former influence; the pernicious meaſures, for which they had been ſo juſtly diſgraced, were now revived; the caſtle of Glouceſter was committed to their charge; in ſhort, they engroſſed all the benefactions Henry had to beſtow. But theſe inſolent foreigners, not content with ſatisfying their avarice, muſt alſo gratify their revenge. They exhorted Henry to revoke all alienations of the crown demeſnes, and grants made the nobility before his marriage, and even engaged the pope to interpoſe his authority. Accordingly Gregory iſſued a bull, repreſenting thoſe grants as injurious to the honour of the crown, detrimental to the king's right of ſovereignty, abſolving Henry from the oath by which they had been confirmed, and enjoining a reſumption immediately.

This order was communicated to the parliament of Wincheſter, but the members rejected the propoſal with contempt, alledging that a compliance with the bull, would be an acknowledgment of ſubjection to the Roman ſee, which they conſidered the kingdom entirely independent of.

A. D. 1237. When the new miniſtry found this ſcheme rendered abortive, by the reſolute oppoſition of the repreſentatives of the people, they concerted another, for raiſing money to gratify their own covetouſneſs.

Another aſſembly was convened at Weſtminſter, with this view, where the king informed them, that as his finances were exhauſted by the expences attending his marriage, and the queen's coronation, he deſired they would grant him a ſubſidy, for the neceſſary purpoſes of government. The aſſembly replied, that former ſubſidies had never been employed to the honour and advantage of the nation, but ſquandered on worthleſs foreigners, who ſupplanted his ſubjects in poſts of honour and profit, and ſeemed to vaunt themſelves in oppreſſing the nation.

Soothed by this ſpirited reply, Henry promiſed to abide for the future, by council of his natural-born ſubjects, and that if they would now indulge him with the thirtieth part of their moveables, he would never aſk another ſupply, that ſhould give them the leaſt cauſe of offence. In order to facilitate their compliance, he diſavowed the pope's bull, touching the reſumption of grants, declared he would inviolably obſerve the liberties of Magna Charta, and ordered ſentence of excommunication to be pronounced againſt all perſons who ſhould dare to violate that ſacred conſtitution. The aſſembly, influenced by theſe aſſurances, and the admiſſion of ſeveral Engliſh noblemen into the council, complied with his requeſt, but on condition that the money levied ſhould be depoſited in certain abbeys and churches, as a fund ſacred to the neceſſities of government; not to be laviſhed on governors, who were no longer to rule, in prejudice of his natural-born ſubjects.

The king, however, ſoon receded from theſe ſolemn proteſtations, through the prevailing influence of Valence, who directed every tranſaction, and graſped at every poſt of honour and intereſt.

The ambition and avarice of this favourite ſo exaſperated the Engliſh nobility, that a civil commotion would probably have enſued, had he not left the kingdom, on pretence of viſiting his own country; but as ſoon as he was informed that the reſentment of the barons had ſubſided, he returned to the kingdom, and renewed his former practices. Nevertheleſs being ſtill apprehenſive of danger, he prevailed on Henry, to deſire the pope would ſend over a legate, whoſe authority, added to that of the crown, might intimidate the barons, and reſtrain the mutinous ſpirit of the people. The pope readily granted Henry's requeſt, Otho was inveſted with legatine authority, and ſent over to England.

An univerſal clamour took place on his arrival, yet he conducted himſelf with ſo much prudence and moderation, that he ſoon acquired the eſteem and veneration of the public. Henry, however, was ſo emboldened by his preſence, that he made no difficulty of conferring all his favours on foreign miniſters, and totally diſregarded the remonſtrances of the Engliſh gentry.

A. D. 1238. Now the miniſtry found it abſolutely neceſſary to engage ſome of the leaders of the oppoſition in their intereſt; and they accordingly gained over John earl of Lincoln, and Simon de Montfort earl of Leiceſter. This ambitious young nobleman, thinking himſelf too great for a ſubject, aſpired to the dignity of a ſovereign. With this view he paid his addreſſes ſucceſſively to two heireſſes in foreign countries, the counteſſes of Bologne and Flanders but failing in thoſe attempts, he turned his eyes upon Eleanor, ſecond ſiſter to Henry, and widow of the wiſe and gallant earl of Pembroke.

The foreign miniſters, reſolving to attach Leiceſter to their intereſt, perſuaded Henry to conſent to the marriage, notwithſtanding ſhe had made a vow of chaſtity, at the deceaſe of Pembroke, and as a confirmation of which, taken the ring without the veil, from the archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the preſence of a great number of nobility. The king was ſeverely rebuked for conſenting to this marriage, by the archbiſhop of Canterbury; and the barons, who oppoſed the foreign miniſters, were ſo incenſed at the defection of the earl of Leiceſter and Lincoln, that they began to concert meaſures for doing themſelves juſtice.

Accordingly the earls of Cornwal and Pembroke, with the greateſt part of the nobility of England, engaged in a confederacy againſt the adminiſtration. They aſſembled in arms at Southwark, and being joined by the citizens, repaired to court, and peremptorily inſiſted that Lincoln and Montfort ſhould be removed from the council-board. Henry, alarmed at this demand, had recourſe to the good offices of the legate, who, on the promiſe of large grants, appeaſed the reſentment of Cornwal; and a truce concluded till the firſt Monday in Lent, when all grievances were to be redreſſed, at a general council in London.

The barons appeared according to appointment, but the earl of Cornwal being detached from the aſſociation, the grievances were but half redreſſed, and the diſpute was compromiſed by the mediation of the legate. The two earls were removed from the council, and Leiceſter, fearing his marriage might be diſſolved, by means of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, went privately to Rome, and purchaſed a confirmation at that venal court.

Otho, having effected an accommodation between the king and the barons, ſet out on a viſitation towards the north of England, and taking Oxford in his way, was ſumptuouſly entertained at Oſiney. After dinner, the ſcholars coming to pay their reſpects to his reverence, were refuſed admittance by his Italian porter. Enraged at this treatment, they endeavoured to force their entrance, the legate's ſervants running to ſuſtain the porter, an obſtinate fray enſued. A poor Iriſh ſcholar, begging at the grate, was miſerably ſcalded by the ſteward, who was brother to the legate; and a Welchman, obſerving this outrage, ſhot him dead with an arrow. The legate, alarmed at this diſaſter, fled to the church, whence he eſcaped to Abingdon, where he loudly complained to the king, of the unworthy treatment he had received. Henry immediately detached the earl of Warrenne, with a party of ſoldiers, to apprehend the rioters, and thirty of them being taken, were committed cloſe priſoners to Wallingford caſtle.

Otho, not yet ſatisfied, laid the univerſity under an interdict, and excommunicated all thoſe who had been concerned in the late riot; but the ſcholars ſubmitting to humble themſelves before the legate, the cenſures were removed. Peter de Roches, biſhop of Wincheſter, dying in the courſe of this year, the king recommended William de Valence, to ſucceed him in that rich biſhoprick.

The monks abſolutely refuſed to elect him as being a foreigner, odious to the Engliſh nation, and at the ſame time illiterate and immoral. Yet, in order to manifeſt their inclination to conform to the king's deſire they conferred that dignity on Ralph de Neville, a prelate of unblemiſhed reputation, and ſuppoſed acceptable to his majeſty. Henry, incenſed at the preſumption of the monks, in diſputing his recommendation, applied to the pope, who, in conſideration of a ſum of money, annulled the election, and diſplaced the prior, and ſubſtituting one wholly dependant on the court, procured a majority in favour of Valence. He did not however long enjoy his promotion, for he died the following year at Viterbo, little regretted by the friends of virtue and liberty.

A. D. 1239. The earl of Leiceſter now returned from Rome, and made a ſplendid entry into London, where he was received with great reſpect by the king. He then, by his inſinuations, incenſed his majeſty againſt Gilbert earl of Pembroke, who was now refuſed admittance at court. The earl, provoked at this affront, retired to the north, to ſhelter himſelf from the intrigues of his enemies, and concert meaſures with the diſcontented barons for their mutual ſafety. Nor did the earl of Leiceſter himſelf eſcape the effects of the king's capricious humour, for in a ſhort time after his return, he reviled him in the moſt opprobrious terms, branding him with the odious appellation of traitor, and excommunicated wretch, who had debauched his wife before marriage, and afterwards by bribery and corruption, obtained the pope's confirmation.

This indignity, offered to a nobleman of his rank, and in the preſence of the counteſs, who was the king's own ſiſter, alarmed them both to ſuch a degree, that they immediately retired to the continent. By this time, Otho, the pope's legate, had deviated from his original conduct, and ſo oppreſſed the churches and clergy, to gratify his inſatiable avarice, that the biſhops complained to the pope of his exactions; and though the pontiff had twice ſent letters of revocation to the cardinal, they were ſet aſide by the king, who conſidered Otho, as the chief ſupport of his adminiſtration.

A. D. 1240. The legate, by the royal favour, was emboldened to renew his exactions, who levied ſums from churches and monaſteries, under the title of procurations; and at length publiſhed a mandate, in the name of his holineſs, importing, that he was empowered not only to abſolve from their vow, all ſuch as had taken the croſs, but to compel them to purchaſe their redemption with money, on pain of excommunication. He likewiſe granted to the abbot and monks of Clugny, a tenth of the profits of all the benefices in England for the term of three years. But this impoſition was ſo repugnant to all rules of juſtice, that Henry, abject as he was, forbad the agents to collect it on pain of ſevere penalties. The pope, far from being intimidated by this repulſe, ſent orders for raiſing a fifth on all eccleſiaſtical revenues, as an aid againſt the emperor; and accordingly exacted it firſt from the Roman clergy, reſident in England, who relying on the pope's protection, were obliged to comply with this exorbitant demand. It was afterwards propoſed to the prelates in council, at Reading, and granted by the advice and example of Edmund, archbiſhop of Canterbury.

The pope had no ſooner received the immenſe ſums raiſed by the late exactions, than he ſent orders to Edmund, and the biſhops of London and Sarum, to reſerve three hundred of the beſt livings in England, for the benefit of the Roman clergy, on pain of being ſuſpended from the power of collating. Theſe benefices were deſigned for the children and relations of ſuch, as ſhould afford him their aſſiſtance againſt the emperor.

Edmund, incenſed at ſo flagrant an impoſition, and meeting with no redreſs from the king, retired to Burgundy, where he died, and was interred in the abbey of Pontigny. The pope and his emiſſaries continued to oppreſs, not only England, but Ireland, Wales, and Scotland, by methods, which plainly indicated, that the religion of thoſe days was little more than a maſk to vail all that was vile and diabolical. Nor did his holineſs reap the fruit of his rapacious impoſitions, for Otho, in his return to Rome with the French legate, was intercepted by the Emperor's allies, who ſtripped them of their whole acquiſitions.

A. D. 1241. The indulgence foreigners had met with in England, encouraged Peter de Savoy, one of the queen's uncles, to viſit the iſland, who, on his arrival, was created earl of Richmond, and ſolemnly knighted in the abbey of Weſtminſter. But Peter, perceiving how diſguſtful his preferments were to the Engliſh nobility, behaved with great moderation, and took all poſſible care to avoid giving them offence.

Soon after, his brother Boniface was raiſed to the ſee of Canterbury, though he could not be confirmed on account of the vacancy in the Roman ſee. About this period died, in a very advanced age, Llewellin, prince of Wales, leaving his principality to his ſon David, who had committed ſome depredations on the Engliſh territories. He had an illegitimate brother, elder than himſelf, named Griffin, who was extremely popular among the Welch, and thence the object of his jealouſy and hatred.

Griffin claimed part of his father's inheritance, to which he was entitled by the laws of his country; but David, inſtead of complying with his demand, committed him to cloſe priſon. Henry, at the inſtigation of his wife Senana, interpoſed his good offices in favour of Griffin; but theſe proving ineffectual, he advanced from Glouceſter, and entering Wales with a ſtrong army, compelled David not only to releaſe his brother, but to ſubmit to ſuch conditions as he thought proper to impoſe. But David, who knew Henry's foible, offered him a larger ſum that Senana had promiſed, obtained his intereſt, and Henry, to his eternal diſgrace, accepting the baſe and diſhonourable bribe, from the protector, became the perſecutor of Griffin, and committed him cloſe priſoner to the tower.

While Henry was degrading his birth and character, by acts of perfidy and baſeneſs, his brother Richard was gathering laurels in the plains of Paleſtine, where he acquired great reputation, for his courage, conduct and liberality. He fortified Aſcalon, recovered Jeruſalem, and concluded an advantageous truce with the Saracens for ten years.

Having thus obtained glory and renown, he ſet out on his return to England, and tarried two months at the imperial court, with his ſiſter the empreſs, who died in child-bed a few days after his departure.

Before he ſet out for the Holy Land, he had received the inveſtiture of the province of Poictou, though Fana poſſeſſed great part of it, by the conqueſts of Philip Auguſtus, and the province being thus divided between the two crowns, Lewis thought he had an equal right to beſtow the livery of it on his brother Alphonſo.

Henry determined to revenge this inſult, and engaged in the quarrel more eagerly, as it affected the intereſt of his mother, Iſabella, who had lately married the count de la Marche. This count repreſented to Henry, the facility of expelling the French from Poictou, and aſſured him, that the province itſelf would afford a ſufficient number of men for that purpoſe, provided he would defray the expence of their ſubſiſtence. Charmed with this project, the king aſſembled a parliament, and demanded a ſubſidy, adequate to the importance of the expedition.

A. D. 1242. But the aſſembly obſerved, that the war was entirely foreign to the Engliſh intereſt, and promoted wholly by the count de la Marche, and barons of Poictou, and that it was particularly improper at a juncture, when the people and nobility had been exhauſted of their ſubſtance, by the exactions of the government, and the Roman pontiff. The king alledged in his behalf, the ſhame that would reſult to Engliſhmen, from a deſertion of their ſovereign, at a juncture ſo critical, when both the voice of his allies, and the inhabitants of the country he claimed, loudly called upon him to aſſert the right of his family and crown. He alſo urged the glory that would redound to them and the ſoldiers from a ſucceſs in the expedition. But theſe arguments had no effect on the aſſembly. Henry, therefore, with the advice of the Roman agents, divided the province, and by that means, prevailed on a conſiderable number of the aſſembly to eſpouſe his intereſt.

Having obtained a majority, a thirtieth of all moveables was voted for the ſervice of this undertaking; but this fund being inſufficient, he levied a talliage on the cities, boroughs, and crown demeſnes in Ireland; and demanded an aid from the clergy of that kingdom. Having thus procured a ſupply of money, he ſummoned all his military tenants, to meet him with horſes and arms at Wincheſter, and in the mean time agreed to a match between his daughter Margaret, and Alexander, ſon to the king of Scotland, who in conſequence of this contract, undertook to preſerve the peace in the northern parts of England. William, archbiſhop of York, was nominated guardian of the realm, and a council appointed to aſſiſt him.

The public tranquility being thus ſecured, the king embarked at Portſmouth with his queen, his brother Richard, ſeven earls, three hundred knights, and thirty hogſheads of ſilver, and, after a ſpeedy paſſage, landed at Royane, a port of Saintonge, at the mouth of the river Gironde.

Lewis, apprized of Henry's deſign, had fitted out a fleet of thirty gallies, and aſſembled an army of four thouſand knights, twenty thouſand gentlemen, beſides a vaſt number of infantry. With theſe forces he invaded Poictou, where he reduced ſeveral places of the count de la Marche, and at length inveſted Fontenay. He was engaged in the ſiege of this fortreſs, when Henry, landing at Royane, ſent ambaſſadors to demand ſatisfaction for attacking the count da la Marche, whom he repreſented as an ally of England.

Lewis ſenſibly replied, that he was deſirous to maintain, and even prolong the ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities, but that Henry had no right to interpoſe between him and his rebellious ſubjects. This reply being deemed a refuſal, was followed by a formal declaration of war, and Henry advanced to Pons, where he was joined by the nobility of Gaſcony, with their vaſſals.

Thus reinforced, he marched to Saintes, but finding his forces ſtill much inferior in number to thoſe of the enemy, wrote to England for a ſupply of two hundred knights, and half that number of horſemen. Soon after he advanced to Toney, on the Charante, in order to check the progreſs of Lewis, who had reduced great part of the count de la Marche's caſtles. He then returned to Saintes, and endeavoured to hinder the French from advancing to Taillebourg, but Lewis, getting between the Engliſh and the town, the garriſon opened the gates to his forces. He then ordered his army to encamp without the gates, in a meadow.

Henry had in his army ſeveral brave and experienced officers, particularly his brother Richard, who made himſelf maſter of a ſtone bridge, over the Charente, ſo that the French army was obliged to paſs the attack in boats, and aſſault the bridge at the ſame time. The Engliſh ſuſtained the attack with great intrepidity, but overpowered by numbers, were at length driven from the bridge.

The French animated by this ſucceſs, forced the Engliſh from the field of battle, and obliged them to retreat to Saintes. Henry ſuſtained ſo great a loſs in this action, that he abandoned Saintes, and proceeded to Pons, where leaving a ſtrong garriſon, he made a haſty march to Blaye.

The count de la Marche, alarmed at the rapid progreſs of Lewis, diſpatched his eldeſt ſon to ſue for ſome tolerable conditions of peace. Lewis, retaining his uſual moderation, readily indulged him with a pardon, demanding only three of his caſtles, as pledges of his future fidelity.

Henry was wholly ignorant of this negociation, though the preſent ſituation of his affairs rendered an alliance with the count more neceſſary than ever.

Richard at length diſcovered the treaty, by means of a French knight, whoſe life he had ſaved in the Holy Land, and who was privy to the whole tranſaction. Henry was no ſooner informed of it, than he decamped, paſſed the Charente, and ſhut himſelf up in Bourdeaux.

Henry's affairs were now rendered deſperate, the earl of Marche, with ſeveral of his moſt important allies having deſerted his intereſt; one nobleman, Hertold de Mirebau, alone perſevered in the allegiance he had ſworn to Henry, and refuſed to deliver up his caſtle without his maſter's permiſſion; but as ruin would have been the inevitable conſequence of his reſiſtance, he obtained leave to make his ſubmiſſion, and the king of France was ſo charmed with his honour, that he permitted him alone, of all the barons in the oppoſition, to retain his eſtate and caſtle.

Lewis was now preparing to avail himſelf of Henry's loſſes and misfortunes, by attacking him in Gaſcony; but this expedition could not be rendered ſucceſsful, without many difficulties. Having advanced to the neighbourhood of Blaye, where the Engliſh army was encamped, the plague broke out in his army, and raged with ſuch violence, that he loſt upwards of twenty thouſand men, beſides fourſcore of his principal nobility, ſo that he was obliged to relinquiſh the purſuit of his conqueſts, and return to his own dominions.

A. D. 1243. Henry loitered the winter in Bourdeaux, among the Gaſcoigne nobility, in feaſting and riot; by which means he ſoon exhauſted his finances; ſo that he was obliged to write for a ſupply to the archbiſhop of York, whom at the ſame time he enjoined, to confiſcate the eſtates of certain noblemen, that had returned to England without his permiſſion.

The firſt part of his orders was punctually executed, and the money immediately remitted; but the latter he refuſed to obey, for fear of exciting a diſturbance in the kingdom. Henry had no ſooner received this ſupply, than he directed the archbiſhop, to demand the profits of a year's wool from the Ciſtertians, which they refuſed to grant; and the regent unwilling to uſe compulſion, obtained a conſiderable ſubſidy from the parliament, in order to diſengage the king entirely from the debts he had contracted. But this was ſquandered with his uſual prodigality. The prelate attempted to borrow money in the king's name, from individuals; but this practice produced ſuch diſcontent and clamour, that he gave the king to underſtand, all the reſources were ſtopped, and that there was an abſolute neceſſity for his immediate return.

Henry, deprived of all hopes of further remittances, prepared for his departure from Bourdeaux, and gave orders that all the Engliſh nobility ſhould aſſemble at Portſmouth for his reception. He then ratified the truce he had concluded with Lewis, and at his arrival in England, gave directions for a magnificent entry into London, as if he had returned from a conqueſt.

Henry, before he embarked in this expedition, had projected a match between his brother Richard and Sanchia, third daughter of the count de Provence. This alliance was generally diſapproved by the Engliſh, who foreſaw it would ſtrengthen the foreign intereſt, which was already too powerful. The contract was however adjuſted, and the young lady arriving, under the auſpices of her mother, the nuptials were ſolemnized at Weſtminſter with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence.

A. D. 1244. After the celebration of the nuptials, the king confirmed to Richard, the earldom of Cornwal, together with an annual ſtipend of five hundred pounds. The old counteſs, after borrowing of the king four thouſand marks for the uſe of her huſband, returned to the continent. Henry, by his profuſion, had reduced himſelf to the utmoſt neceſſity, therefore, to recruit his finances, he iſſued out writs, directing all his ſheriffs to enquire into all miſdemeanors and tranſgreſſions of the law, by widows and others, who had married without a licenſe; or thoſe who had encroached on the royal foreſts; and by this means a large ſum was raiſed. The Ciſtertians were obliged to pay the profit of one year's wool, and the Jews to part with moſt of their ſubſtance. But ſuch was his avarice and extravagance, that the ſums raiſed by theſe deſpotic meaſures, were inſufficient; he was therefore once more obliged to ſolicit a ſupply from parliament.

The prelates and laity retiring ſeparately to deliberate on the propoſal, came to a reſolution that no ſubſidy ſhould be granted but with their common conſent, and that a committee of twelve perſons ſhould be choſen, to concert meaſures for preventing all encroachments on the two charters for the future. They complained, that writs had been iſſued out of Chancery to the prejudice of their liberties; inſiſted on their right of nominating the chancellor and juſticiary; propoſed that four noblemen of the king's council ſhould be appointed conſervators of the liberty of the kingdom, with power to inſpect the treaſury, and the application of the public money; to ſummon a parliament as often as neceſſity ſhould require, and arbitrate in all differences between the king and his people.

They inſiſted on the revocation of all writs contrary to the cuſtom of the realm; that cenſures ſhould be publiſhed againſt all that oppoſed theſe regulations; that the chancellor and juſticiary, choſen by conſent of parliament, ſhould always be two of the four conſervators; that if the king ſhould deprive the chancellor of the ſeals, all writs ſigned by his ſucceſſor ſhould be null and void; that beſides the chancellor and juſticiary, two judges in the Common-pleas, two barons of the Exchequer, and a juſtice of the Jews, ſhould be nominated by parliament; and that all ſuſpected perſons ſhould be removed from about the king's perſon.

The king was alarmed at theſe demands, which were very incongruous with his notions of royal prerogative. But as this was an improper time to ſhew his reſentment, he evaded their propoſals with promiſes of amendment; and after having vainly endeavoured to perſuade them to a compliance, at laſt prorogued the aſſembly.

Innocent, who now filled the papal chair, ſent one Martin as nuncio into England, with powers exceeding thoſe of all his predeceſſors in extortion. His commiſſion was to procure a ſubſidy of ten thouſand marks from the clergy, to enable his holineſs to maintain the war againſt the emperor, who at the ſame time ſent ambaſſadors to England to vindicate his own conduct, and diſſuade the prelates from granting any contribution.

This nuncio had received orders to excommunicate all whom he ſhould find refractory to the papal commands, contained in the bull he carried with him; and that all the dependents on the ſee of Rome ſhould be provided with livings, worth at leaſt thirty marks a year. Martin perſiſted in his inſolent behaviour and monſtrous exactions, till at length the clamour againſt him became ſo loud and general, that Henry commanded him to depart the kingdom. Mean while the king having acquired the ſubſidies he demanded, made preparations for attacking Alexander, king of Scotland, who after the death of Iſabella had married the daughter of Enguerrand de Courcy, and thereby given great umbrage to Henry; at the ſame time he refuſed to pay homage for any part of the lands he held in Scotland.

Theſe meaſures ſo incenſed Henry, that he gave orders for aſſembling an army, and equip-ing a fleet, to invade Alexander's dominions by ſea and land. All the military tenants were ſummoned to attend him at Newcaſtle upon Tyne, and the king putting himſelf at their head, marched immediately againſt the Scottiſh army. At Pentland he found the enemy in battle array; and as the forces were nearly equal on both ſides, a bloody engagement muſt have enſued, had not the archbiſhop of York, with ſeveral prelates and noblemen interpoſed, and effected an accommodation, whereby the former peace was confirmed, together with a contract of marriage between Alexander's ſon, and Henry's eldeſt daughter.

Griffin, brother to the prince of Wales, weary of his long confinement in the Tower, attempted to make his eſcape; but the rope giving way, he fell headlong from the battlements, and immediately expired. David, during the impriſonment of his brother, had maintained an harmony with the Engliſh; leſt, by provoking Henry, he might have occaſioned the releaſe of Griffin, whoſe great popularity had excited his jealouſy.

This check being removed by the death of that prince, David aſſembled a body of troops, and in open violation of the treaty ſubſiſting between him and the king of England, committed great depredations on his territories. Henry, contrary to the advice of the nobility, had diſbanded the greateſt part of his army, and detached only three hundred horſe, under the command of Hubert-Fitz-Matthews, who was immediately routed by David.

The Welch prince, aſſured that Henry would employ his whole force againſt him, had ſolicited the aſſiſtance of the pope, offering to become a vaſſal to the Roman ſee, and pay his holineſs an annual tribute of five hundred marks, the ſum impoſed on him by the Engliſh monarch.

Innocent, though charmed with the propoſal, declined a determinate anſwer, till he ſhould have enquired into the merits of the cauſe; and particularly whether the late treaty was the effect of compulſion on the part of David, as he alledged. Accordingly, by commiſſion, he directed two Welch abbots to examine into the pretended complaint; and if David's allegation appeared to be founded on fact, to abſolve him from his oath, and annul the treaty. Elated with their commiſſion, the abbots ſummoned the king of England to appearance without deference to his dignity; an example of inſolence, equally provoking to Henry and his ſubjects, who had therefore reaſon to repent the diſmiſſion of the army. Determined to chaſtize this arrogance, Henry having levied a powerful army, ſummoned him, with all the nobility of north and ſouth Wales, to appear in the king's court at Weſtminſter, on the firſt Thurſday in Lent, there to do homage, and anſwer for their depredations.

A.D. 1245. David, alarmed at the ſpirit of the king and his council, endeavoured to amuſe them with a negociation which produced no effect. At a grand council aſſembled about Whitſuntide it was determined, that his majeſty ſhould command the army in perſon, and the military tenants of the crown be ſummoned to appear at a certain rendezvous.

About the middle of Auguſt, Henry began his march to North Wales, and penetrated without oppoſition to the river Conway, near which he built the ſtrong caſtle of Garinac, to check the excurſions of the enemy. This fort ſo embarraſſed the Welch, that they could draw no ſupplies from Cheſhire, while the Iriſh auxiliaries waſted the Iſle of Angleſey; and proclamation was made in all the Marches, that no proviſions or merchandize ſhould be carried into Wales on ſevere penalties; ſo that the ancient Britons were penned up in the mountainous counties of Caernarvon and Merioneth, and reduced to a ſtarving condition. In this melancholy ſtate they continued till the death of David, which happened in the beginning of the next year, when his dominions were divided between Llewellin and David Goch, the two ſons of Griffin.

Theſe princes, affected with the miſeries of their countrymen, concluded a treaty of peace with Henry, by which they engaged to furniſh England with a thouſand foot, and four and twenty horſe, well armed and diſciplined to ſerve in Wales and the Marches when required.

The barons immediately on their retnrn from the Welch expedition, applied themſelves to the conſultation of methods for delivering the nation from the tyranny of Rome, which, through the oppreſſion and exactions of the nuncio was grown inſupportable.

The nobility beheld, with grief and indignation, the treaſure of the nation exported to gratify the pope's avarice and ambition; and perceiving that the clergy were always wrought into compliance by the artifice of the legates, determined to put a ſtop to ſuch ſcandalous impoſitions. Without waiting for the ſanction of the king, they of their own authority diſpatched a knight in their name to the nuncio, requiring him to leave the kingdom. When Martin aſked him by whoſe authority he brought ſo inſolent a meſſage, he replied, by that of the whole nation; informing him at the ſame time that if he ſhould, after three days, be found in England, he muſt expect to be hewn in pieces.

The nuncio complained to the king; but meeting with no redreſs demanded a paſſport, and departed immediately to the general ſatisfaction of the people. The pontiff, on his return, enraged at the inſult offered to himſelf in the perſon of his nuncio, broke out into the following exclamation; "I ſee plainly I muſt make peace with the emperor, in order to humble theſe petty princes; for the great dragon being once appeaſed, we ſhall find no difficulty in cruſhing thoſe leſſer ſerpents."

Before the barons ſent the above peremptory meſſage to Martin, they had diſpatched ambaſſadors to the general council at Lyons, where the pope preſided in perſon. The purport of their commiſſion contained a narrative of the oppreſſions, both civil and eccleſiaſtic, under which England had laboured from the Italians, whoſe benefices exceeded the ordinary revenue of the crown, and the inſolence and exactions of his nuncio.

This charge was boldly enforced by the ſecretary, William Poweric, who loudly diſclaimed the tribute that had been paid, and the ſubmiſſion that had been made to the ſee of Rome, as having been extorted from the clergy without conſent of the barons and great council of the nation. To this charge the pope evaſively replied, that theſe matters, being of infinite conſequence, required deliberation. But the ambaſſadors, not content with this anſwer, inſiſted on immediate ſatisfaction; and the pope continuing to prevaricate, they departed from the aſſembly, after ſolemnly proteſting againſt future payments of the ſhameful tribute, or any money out of the revenues of churches, to which laymen preſented.

His holineſs politically diſſembled his reſentment at theſe proceedings; but finding his intereſts decline in England, he ſent over a bull, requiring the prelates to confirm the charter of ſubmiſſion made by John to the ſee of Rome. The prelates complied with this inſolent demand, to the aſtoniſhment and concern of the whole kingdom, and even Henry himſelf, who ſolemnly ſwore, "That however ſcandalouſly the biſhops behaved, yet he would, while he had breath, ſupport the liberties of his people." This year the male line of the illuſtrious family of Strongbow became extinct, by the death of Anſelm, who ſucceeded his brother Walter, and enjoyed the honours only a few weeks.

A. D. 1246. Innocent determined to reſent the inſolence of the Engliſh ambaſſadors, and the refractory behaviour of Henry. With this view he endeavoured to perſuade the king of France to expel that prince from his dominions, or at leaſt compel him to ſubmit to the papal authority. But Lewis objected to that propoſal, alledging his affinity to Henry, and the dictates of common juſtice. He, in his turn, preſſed the pope to a reconciliation with the emperor, which the pontiff declined, and afterwards hired ruffians to aſſaſſinate Frederic.

The Engliſh nation was now highly exaſperated with the pope, who nevertheleſs, deſpiſed their reſentment, and perſiſted in his actions. He demanded of the Engliſh prelates a number of knights to ſerve in the army of the church; and, by his ſole authority, granted the profits of all the vacant benefices within the province of Canterbury for one year, to archbiſhop Boniface. He levied ſix thouſand marks, aſſeſſed on the prelates by his nuncio, the twentieth part of all eccleſiaſtical revenues, according to a decree of the council of Lyons; one third of the income of all benefices, exceeding the yearly amount of one hundred marks; and a moiety of the prebends and livings of non-reſident canons and clergymen; exactions which, according to computation, amounted to eighty thouſand marks, a ſum thought equivalent to the whole ſpecie of the kingdom; and as this enormous ſum was to be extorted for three ſucceſſive years, it could not fail to involve the nation in the utmoſt diſtreſs. A parliament being ſummoned for the redreſs of public grievances, it was determined once more to renew their complaints to his holineſs. Accordingly, three letters of expoſtulation were diſpatched to the court of Rome, one by the king, one by the prelates, and the other by the barons; all which were committed to the charge of William de Poweric and Henry de la Mare, who had inſtructions to ſecond them with perſonal remonſtrances. But no means could check the arbitrary and rapacious career of Innocent, who proceeded with greater tyranny and deſpotiſm than ever. He claimed the perſonal eſtates of eccleſiaſtics who died inteſtate; all goods fraudulently acquired, provided the owner did not appear; all effects amaſſed by uſury, and all legacies granted for reſtitution and pious uſes; he appointed the Dominicans, on whom he had conferred privileges ſubverſive of all order and government, commiſſioners to levy theſe actions.

Henry had prohibited the levy of the ſix thouſand marks, and the payment of any talliage or contribution to the pope, till the return of the agents; but notwithſtanding this prohibition, it was collected by ſeveral biſhops, who were empowered by the pope to excommunicate all recuſants. At length the deputies returned; and, in a parliament held at Wincheſter, reported the ill ſucceſs of their negociation.

Innocent had treated them with contempt; and openly declared, that rather than relinquiſh the proſecution of his ſchemes, he would proceed to the ſame extremities with the king of England as he had done with the emperor.

The aſſembly, enraged at theſe menaces, perſuaded the king to renew the prohibition under the ſevereſt penalties; and this ſo incenſed the pope, that he immediately diſpatched orders to Canteloup, biſhop of Worceſter, to procure the payment of the contribution money to his nuncio at the new temple, on or before a certain day, on pain of ſuſpenſion and excommunication.

Henry at firſt ſeemed tenacious of the liberties of the nation; but was ſoon intimidated into a compliance by the menaces of this prelate and others, who threatened the kingdom with an interdict; eſpecially as his brother Richard had eſpouſed the intereſt of his holineſs, who had ſecured his aſſiſtance by a grant of money ariſing from the commutation of vows, made to engage in the cruſade.

Influenced, therefore, by theſe conſiderations, which were ſufficient to ſtagger the reſolution of a more courageous prince than Henry, he was obliged to ſubmit, and the people were delivered over as a prey to pontifical inſolence and rapacity. In vain did the abbots and clergy remonſtrate on theſe extortions in the enſuing parliament; for the ſpirit of the nation ſeemed to be wholly depreſſed by a popiſh faction, armed with the terrors of eccleſiaſtical cenſures, and abetted by the concurrence of the king's brother. The only reſource was, to repreſent, by new agents, the impoſſibility of the nation's ſuſtaining ſuch exorbitant burthens; but this repreſentation, as the former, was totally diſregarded.

A. D. 1247. The preſent poſture of Innocent's affairs, obliged him to abate ſomewhat of the rigour of his exactions, which he was deſirous of having attributed to his moderation.

The landgrave of Thuringia, in ſupport of whoſe pretenſions he had expended a great ſum, died of grief, occaſioned by the loſs of a pitched battle; but Innocent, enraged at the triumph of Frederic, determined to ſet up another competitor in the perſon of William, count of Holland.

In order to defray the expences of this new project, he ſent four legates into different countries to raiſe contributions; and diſpatched two Franciſcan Friars into England to aſk a ſupply for his holineſs, not authoritatively, but as mendicants.

Having by this diſſimulation obtained their point, they threw off the diſguiſe, and ſent circular letters to the biſhops, abbots, and monaſteries, demanding exorbitant ſums, which the prelates, however, refuſed to pay, without the conſent of parliament.

Incenſed at their refuſal, the pope ſent over Marino, one of his chaplains, to enforce the demand by legatine authority; from which the prelates appealed both to the pope and parliament; but meeting with no redreſs, were obliged to compound for a large ſum of money.

A. D. 1248. Henry's prodigality to foreigners had ſo reduced the ſtate of his finances, that he was obliged to renew his application to parliament, which met at Weſtminſter in the month of February; but when he demanded a ſubſidy, the barons upbraided him with profuſion to foreigners, and want of œconomy, and abſolutely refuſed to comply with his demand. They complained of his retaining vacant benefices, diſcouraging commerce, by loading it with heavy duties, and conferring the higheſt poſts of the kingdom on unworthy perſons. They therefore inſiſted on the demands they had made in a former ſeſſion, relative to the nomination of chancellor and juſticiary; and the king, finding his deſign impracticable, prorogued the aſſembly, in order to prepare himſelf againſt their next meeting.

During this interval he ſuffered himſelf to be wrought on by the inſinuations of his foreign favourites, at whoſe inſtigation he again attempted to intimidate the parliament. At the next aſſembly he inveighed againſt their inſolence, in daring to impoſe laws upon him to which they themſelves would never ſubmit; he obſerved, that every maſter of a private family choſe his own confidants and counſellors, and retained or diſmiſſed his domeſtics at pleaſure; while he, though a king, was treated as a ſlave by his own ſubjects; declaring, at the ſame time, that inſtead of changing his meaſures in conformity with their capricious humours, he was determined to rule in his own kingdom, and teach them their duty of obedience.

However, he promiſed to redreſs their grievances in general terms; and concluded with demanding an immediate ſubſidy, to enable him, at the end of the truce, to recover his lawful rights on the continent. The barons replied, with great compoſure, that as he was not diſpoſed to reform his conduct, they would not impoveriſh themſelves, to gratify the pride and avarice of foreigners, under the notion of imaginary conqueſts.

This reply defeating every view of Henry from that quarter, he diſmiſſed the aſſembly, leſt they ſhould reſolve on meaſures ſtill more diſagreeable. His coffers being now wholly exhauſted, he was obliged to ſell his plate and jewels, which were immediately purchaſed by the citizens of London, to the great mortification of the king, with whoſe demands they had generally refuſed to comply. As an inſtance of his reſentment, he inſtituted a new fair at Weſtminſter, during which he prohibited all trade in London; and inſtead of regarding the remonſtrances of the citizens on this ſubject, paſſed the Chriſtmas holidays in their city, and exacted from them an exorbitant new year's gift; nor was he ſatisfied with this impoſition, for he ſoon after extorted another preſent of two thouſand pounds ſterling.

A. D. 1249. The pernicious practice of cruſading ſtill prevailed in Europe. Lewis, king of France, was now acquiring great renown againſt the Saracens; but the pope, though patron of all cruſaders, found means to ſacrifice that prince, with all his army, to his own private revenge and reſentment.

This prince, in conjunction with Frederick, emperor of Germany, was eſteemed by the Pontiff a more dangerous enemy than either the Turk or Saracen; he therefore publiſhed a cruſade againſt the emperor, adding the ſame promiſes, pains, and penalties, as were commonly annexed to cruſades againſt the infidels.

This at once diſconcerted the ſchemes of Lewis; but many of the Engliſh nobility, diſſatisfied with their ſituation in their own country, diſdaining to ſerve againſt a chriſtian prince, took the croſs, and repaired to Lewis. This proceeding was equally diſagreeable to the pope and Henry, the latter of whom determined, therefore, to aſſume the croſs.

This cruſade ſeems to have been formed againſt the emperor; for the pope denounced his anathema againſt all the Engliſh nobility who refuſed to follow their own prince; and at the ſame time bulls were ſent from Rome, to ſtop thoſe who were preparing to join Lewis. But Henry had another motive for aſſuming the croſs; he conſidered it as the beſt expedient for paying his debts, as it would furniſh him with a pretence for aſking a ſubſidy from parliament for the purpoſes of the expedition.

The king's example was followed by five hundred knights, many of whom had diſpoſed of their eſtates to defray the expences of their voyage; but as the king was not in a condition to perform his vow, they were obliged to wait his departure.

While the expedition was deferred, Henry found himſelf involved in freſh difficulties. The army of French cruſaders having been defeated, and Lewis himſelf, with his two brothers, taken priſoners; the French, irritated with this reverſe of fortune, violently inveighed againſt the pope, as the author of this fatal event, in prohibiting the Engliſh from following Lewis, as ſo ſtrong a reinforcement would have rendered his army victorious.

A. D. 1251. Henry de Bathe, who was now high juſticiary, by a narrow, avaricious conduct, had acquired an immenſe fortune. This determined Henry to liſten to any accuſation againſt ſo wealthy a ſubject, that might infer treaſon and forfeiture of eſtate. Accordingly, the juſticiary being charged both with infidelity in his office, and treaſon, the cauſe was brought before the parliament, who acquitted him of both accuſations; but he was obliged to pay a very conſiderable ſum, before he could reinſtate himſelf in his Majeſty's favour.

Philip Lovel was ſeverely fined, on an accuſation of bribery from the Jews, from whom he had collected the talliage. In ſhort, every expedient was practiſed for raiſing money to ſupply the demands of an indigent king. The circumſtances of the Engliſh, notwithſtanding the exactions of papal and royal authority, were far ſuperior to thoſe of the other powers of Europe; the former having carried on a large and extenſive trade, while the latter were rent by domeſtic broils, or mad, ſuperſtitious, and unavailing cruſades. The city of London this year, in conſideration of five hundred marks, obtained the privilege of having her mayor ſworn before the barons of the Exchequer, and not before the king in perſon. Henry alſo granted them a renewed confirmation of their rights and privileges; and the citizens in return, ſwore an allegiance to prince Edward.

The nation alſo received ſome compenſation for its late expences by the reduction of part of Wales, and the payment of eleven hundred marks by Alen de la Touch, for the government of the parts reduced. Henry, being apprehenſive of a war with Alexander, king of Scotland, who had ſecured ſeveral places on the borders of England, aſſembled a numerous army, and immediately began his march towards the north; but before the commencement of hoſtilities, an embaſſy arrived with propoſals for an accomodation.

Theſe were readily accepted, and a match concluded, between Margaret, daughter of Henry, and young Alexander, who repaired to York, on a viſit to the Engliſh monarch, by whom he was knighted. The following day the marriage ceremony was performed with great ſolemnity in the preſence of Henry, and the queen mother of Scotland, attended by the chief nobility of both kingdoms. Alexander received a bond for five thouſand marks, as the portion of his wife, with whom he returned to his own country.

A. D. 1252. The tranquillity of England being thus ſecured, Henry applied his whole attention to the cruſade he had undertaken, fixing the time of his departure at Midſummer. He therefore convened all the prelates at Weſtminſter, and produced the pope's bull, enjoining them to pay a tenth of their revenue; but the prelates refuſed compliance, alledging, that they would not proceed to any determination without the two archbiſhops, who were then abſent. The pope, to prevent further delay, and puniſh the refractory behaviour of the clergy, furniſhed Henry with freſh bulls, granting him a twentieth of all eccleſiaſtical revenues, a tenth of all the lands belonging to the prelates, the cruſade commutation money, and the profits ariſing from ſtolen goods, uſury, and legacies for charitable uſes; at the ſame time he took the king and his dominions under his immediate protection.

Beſides the amount of theſe exactions, Henry laid a talliage on all the royal demeſnes; nor were even the late conqueſts in Wales exempted from impoſition. Having thus raiſed a ſufficient ſum, the king haſtened the preparations for his voyage, which was delayed by ſome diſturbances in Gaſcony; deputies arriving from that province complaining of the tyrannical government of the earl of Leiceſter. The earl, however, was continued in his office; and ſoon after, by his implacable fury and revenge he involved the province in a civil war, and then retired into France.

A. D. 1253. Henry therefore called a parliament at Weſtminſter, where he laid before them the ſtate of Gaſcony, and repreſented the neceſſity of vigorous meaſures in order to recover that province. After long debates the barons agreed to the ſcutage, and the prelates granted the tenths of their revenues, according to the pope's bull, which they had before rejected. But they objected to the king's over-ruling the election of biſhops and abbots, contrary to the firſt article of Magna Charta, and inſiſted on the redreſs of thoſe grievances.

The king acknowledged the juſtice of the complaint, and confeſſed, that on ſome occaſions he had extended the royal prerogative too far; that he determined a reverſion of conduct, and the moſt punctual obſervance of the charters. Accordingly, he aſſembled the lords ſpiritual and temporal, in Weſtminſter-hall, where every individual appeared with a lighted taper in his hand, the king himſelf ſtanding with his hand upon his breaſt, as a token of his ſincerity. Then the archbiſhop of Canterbury denounced a dreadful anathema againſt all thoſe, who ſhould directly or indirectly, oppoſe the execution of the charters, or violate, diminiſh, or alter, the laws and conſtitution of the kingdom.

This execration being denounced, the two charters were read with an audible voice, and confirmed by his majeſty, when each nobleman daſhed his taper on the ground, ſaying, "ſo let them be extinguiſhed and ſink in hell, who ſhall infringe the charters." But notwithſtanding the ſolemnity of this declaration the parliament was no ſooner diſſolved, than the king endeavoured to free himſelf from the ſalutary reſtraints, to which he had ſo voluntarily ſubmitted.

A. D. 1254. Henry now proceeded to Guienne, where, dreading the ſuperior conduct and capacity of Alphonſo, king of Caſtile, he effected an accommodation with that monarch; at which time a marriage was concluded between prince Edward, and Eleanor, half ſiſter to Alphonſo. The revolters of Gaſcony likewiſe ſubmitted, and tranquillity was reſtored to that province.

About the ſame period Lewis returned from Paleſtine, having purchaſed his liberty by the ſurrender of Damietta, which he had taken. Henry, on his return, made a magnificent entry into London, from the citizens of which he received a preſent of one hundred pounds, and a maſſy piece of plate, of excellent workmanſhip.

A. D. 1255. During the late expedition, the king had contracted a heavy debt, which was increaſed by an imprudent contract with pope Innocent, for the crown of Sicily, in favour of his ſecond ſon Edmund. In conſequence of which, he ſupplied the pontiff with all the money in his exchequer, as well as what he could extort from the Jews, who were grievouſly oppreſſed.

Soon after Innocent reſigned his breath, and was ſucceeded in the papal chair by Alexander IV. who, adopting the meaſures of his predeceſſors, gratified Edmund with the inveſtiture of the kingdom of Sicily, which was performed by the biſhop of Bologna, ſent over to England for that purpoſe. While the biſhop was on his way, Alexander's forces were defeated at Nocera by Monfroy, who by this victory, made himſelf maſter of Apulia, and was crowned king of the two Sicilies at Palermo. Though the biſhop was apprized of this unfortunate event, he concealed it from Henry, who ordered the ceremony of the inveſtiture to be performed with great magnificence, and vainly expected to exact a ſupply from his people, for the ſupport of this new dignity.

The parliament promiſed to grant the ſubſidy, on condition of the punctual obſervance of the two charters, and the right of appointing the lord high treaſurer, independent of the king's authority; but theſe conditions Henry rejected, and therefore prorogued the parliament.

In the mean time, Henry found his finances to be very inadequate to the debts he had contracted with the pope for the inveſtiture of the kingdom of Sicily. This debt, according to the pope's account, amounted to thirty-five thouſand five hundred marks of ſilver, beſides intereſt. In order to raiſe this ſum, the moſt iniquitous and oppreſſive meaſures were concerted by the pontiff and king, that ever ſtained the page of hiſtory.

A number of fictious bills were forwarded, owning the receipt of particular ſums of money, from certain merchants of Sienne and Florence; theſe the pope propoſed the Engliſh clergy ſhould ſubſcribe, for ſums proportioned to the benefices of each individual.

In order to execute this villainous project, Ruſtan, the pope's legate, aſſembled the clergy, and imparted to them the demand of his holineſs; but the prelates diſcovered a noble ſpirit of independence, and the biſhop of London, in particular, declared, that he would rather loſe his head, than ſubmit to ſuch tyranny and oppreſſion. He was ſeconded by the biſhop of Worceſter, and the aſſembly unanimouſly declared that the clergy of England diſdained popiſh ſlavery.

The nuncio complained to Henry of the refractory behaviour of the clergy, which he imputed to the inſtigation of the biſhop of London. Henry reprimanded the biſhop, aſſuring him that he ſhould feel the effects of his reſentment. The biſhop nobly replied, that he acknowledged the ſupremacy of the king and pope, but if they deprived him of his mitre, he would ſupply its place with a helmet.

A. D. 1256. Failing in this project, the pope propoſed another expedient, which he determined to carry into execution. He inſiſted on their paying the bills, according to the firſt calculations; but agreed to indulge them with the deduction of thoſe ſums from the tythes, which might in the ſequel, be granted to his majeſty, and with this deciſion, the clergy were at length obliged to acquieſce.

The king, during theſe diſputes between the pope and clergy, endeavoured to obtain from the barons the ſubſidy he had demanded, for placing Edmund upon the throne of Sicily; and the archbiſhop of Meſſina arrived from the pope, to enforce the inſtances of Henry with the parliament. But the eagerneſs of the pope defeated the purpoſe it was intended to promote; for the barons perceiving that the ſubſidy was to paſs through the hands of Alexander, whoſe integrity they much doubted, refuſed compliance, alledging the danger of the enterprize, and impoveriſhed ſtate of the kingdom. Again repulſed, the king renewed his application to the clergy, and with the aſſiſtance of the pope, extorted from them a continuance of the tythes, which were at firſt granted for three years only.

He likewiſe continued his exactions on the citizens of London, and other corporations of the kingdom, and even extended his acts of oppreſſion to to the Welch, whom as they were become his vaſſals, he conſidered as his ſubjects, and fleeced accordingly. But the Welch barons, who retained their ancient, free and independent ſpirit, refuſed the demands both of himſelf and the pope, and boldly declared, they would never be brought tamely to ſubmit to extortion and oppreſſion, but by dint of arms.

A. D. 1257. At this time many unfavourable circumſtances concurred to impoveriſh the nation. The emperor of Germany, and king of the Romans, being killed in a ſkirmiſh with the Friſons, the princes of the empire were divided in their choice of a ſucceſſor to that dignity; the majority, voted in favour of Richard, earl of Cornwal, and the reſt eſpouſed the intereſt of Alphonſo, king of Caſtile. The election of Richard, was very diſpleaſing to the king of France, ſituated between the two powers of England and Germany, which might unite, in order to recover the dominions belonging to their anceſtors.

Actuated by theſe conſiderations, Lewis fortified his frontiers and endeavoured to intercept the earl of Glouceſter, and John Manſel, provoſt of Beverly, whom Richard had ſent into Germany, to examine the ſtate of the country and genius of the people, before he ventured his perſon among them.

Richard having received a favourable account from his agents in Germany, and raiſed an immenſe ſum of money, embarked with a very ſplendid retinue at Yarmouth, and was, ſoon after his arrival at Aix-la-Chapelle, crowned king of the Romans, by Conrade, archbiſhop of Cologne. To add to the calamities under which the Engliſh now laboured, a war broke out with the Welch, and was carried on with as mnch ſpirit and reſolution by the latter, as negligence and miſconduct by the former.

The ancient Britons, alarmed at an attempt to introduce the Engliſh laws and cuſtoms into the conquered diſtricts, flew to their arms, and under the conduct of prince Llewellin, made ſeveral inroads into the Engliſh territories. The king irritated at the proſpect of loſing the only conqueſts he ever made, ſummoned his barons, and military tenants of the north, to attend him at Cheſter, and appointed thoſe of the weſtern counties, to rendezvous at Briſtol, intending to divide the forces of the enemy, by attacking them at once in different quarters.

At the ſame time he ordered a body of troops from Ireland, to land upon the iſland of Angleſey, in order to deprive the Welch of all ſupplies, which they might receive from thence. Theſe precautions being taken, the king entered North Wales with his army, and advancing to Gannock, continued there inactive till Michaelmas, in expectation of the forces from Ireland; while the weſtern diviſion, appointed to make a diverſion into South Wales, delayed the execution of their orders, on account of the abſence of their general, Richard de Clare, earl of Glouceſter, who was ſuſpected of holding a correſpondence with Llewellin; ſo that Henry, incapable of performing any action of importance, was obliged to return, after an inglorious campaign, for defraying the expence of which, he had levied a very conſiderable ſcutage.

Soon after Ruſtan, the pope's legate, arrived in England, with orders to excommunicate the king, unleſs he immediately undertook the projected conqueſt of Sicily; and Henry, incapable of ſuch an enterprize, diſpatched an embaſſy to Rome, in the name of his ſon Edmund, renouncing all claim to the crown of Sicily.

But the pope, deeming this renunciation inſufficient to accompliſh his deſigns, appointed a new nuncio, called Arlot, to mitigate the convention in favour of Henry, and incite him to impoſe farther exactions on the clergy. For this purpoſe the nuncio publiſhed a new bull, enjoining the prelates to pay the tythes granted to the king, on pain of excommunication, notwithſtanding all oppoſitions, appeals, or exemptions. Such a perſeverance in extortion, could not fail of exciting the reſentment of any people, who retained the leaſt ſenſe of injury or independence.

The clergy groaned under theſe intolerable burdens; the people, driven to deſpair by poverty and diſtreſs, burſt into general exclamations againſt the eternal impoſitions which exhauſted the wealth of the nation; and the nobility not only reſented the inſolence, avarice, and tyranny of the pope, but were incenſed at the weakneſs and partiality of the king, who had conferred on foreigners thoſe poſts which they had an undoubted right to enjoy.

A ſpirit of diſcontent generally prevailed, and the people began to deliberate on meaſures more ſevere than ever, in order to redreſs their grievances: their firſt reſolution being to expel the foreign counſellors, as the beſt expedient towards a reformation of the miniſtry. An opportunity for putting this deſign into execution ſoon offered; for Henry convoking a parliament, and, according to cuſtom, demanding a ſubſidy for carrying on the conqueſt of Sicily, inſtead of complying with his demand, they bitterly inveighed againſt his breach of promiſe, and all the abuſes of government. Notwithſtanding his endeavours to allay the reſentment, by an affectation of candour and ſincerity, they plainly declared their non-reliance on his word, and reſolution to rectify the abuſes of his government ſo effectually, as to obviate all future fears from his inconſtancy.

Alarmed at this peremptory declaration, he promiſed his hearty concurrence in every meaſure that tended to the intereſt of the nation; and even granted a writing, ſubſcribed by his own hand, by which he conſented to the nomination of four and twenty noblemen, choſen by himſelf, and the parliament to draw up the articles of reformation; and as a further proof of his ſincerity, ordered his ſon Edward to ſign the obligation.

Fear was the only motive of Henry's behaviour on this occaſion; for he perceived a confederacy formed againſt him by the moſt powerful nobility of the realm, ſome of whom were governed by private animoſity to his perſon, and others actuated by a deſire of retrenching the prerogatives of the crown.

On the third day of the ſeſſion they all appeared in the houſe, arrayed in armour, the ſight of which ſo much alarmed the king, that he aſked, if he was a priſoner: Roger Bigod replied in the negative; but at the ſame time declared their reſolution to expel all foreigners, and rectify the diſorders of the ſtate. This appearance and declaration terrified him into compliance with their propoſal; the execution of which was deferred till the next meeting, which the king appointed at Oxford.

A. D. 1258. During this interval the barons, diffident of his moſt ſolemn proteſtations, levied a body of forces, and at the time appointed repaired to Oxford, well armed and attended, and fully reſolved to execute their deſign. Having choſen the council of four and twenty, Simon de Mont was placed at the head of the twelve, elected by the barons.

The commiſſioners then began to deliberate on the ſubject of their meeting, and in a ſhort time the following articles were agreed to; That the king ſhould confirm the great charter he had ſo often ſworn to obſerve; that the office of high juſticiary ſhould be conferred on a perſon of talents and integrity; that the chancellor, treaſurer, judges, and other miniſters of ſtate, ſhould be choſen annually by the council of four and twenty; and that the parliament ſhould be aſſembled three times in the year, to enact laws for the benefit of the kingdoms.

Theſe articles being approved by parliament, were confirmed by the aſſent of the king, and called the Statutes or Proviſions of Oxford. But theſe ſalutary conſtitutions were warmly oppoſed, as the court party, even among the moſt powerful barons was very ſtrong, conſiſting of Henry, eldeſt ſon of Richard, king of the Romans; the earl of Warrenne, Amerde Valence, biſhop elect of Wincheſter, Geoffrey de Luſignan, and William de Valence.

The article enjoining the ſurrender of their caſtles, which was now inſerted in the ſtatutes, greatly affected theſe foreigners; as it inevitably ſubjected them to the reſentment of the Engliſh, who had been long exaſperated by their inſolence.

They hoped a mitigation of affairs might be effected; but the violent ſpirit of the Engliſh bore down all oppoſition; and ſeveral, who at firſt inclined to the king's party, were now encouraged to declare for the other, ſo that there was a conſiderable majority againſt the court. William de Valence put himſelf at the head of the royal party, while Simon de Montford, by virtue of election, acted for the other; both of them foreigners, both of them men of ſtrong paſſions, great parts, and greater ambition.

In this debate, Valence, in the name of his party, declared for the reſervation of his caſtles and his wardſhips; to which Montford replied, that he ſhould either reſign them, or loſe his head. The earl of Warrenne objected to articles ſo derogatory to the king's prerogative; and Henry, ſon of Richard, king of the Romans, proteſted againſt them, or any articles, that ſhould be made in the abſence of his father.

The earl of Leiceſter, ſtill inſolent and impetuous, informed the young prince, that his father's refuſal of compliance with the ſalutary meaſures of the barons, would be attended with the loſs of every foot of land he poſſeſſed in England. Hence the court party, perceiving the prevalence of their opponents, determined to ſeek their ſafety in flight, and agreed to rendezvous at Wincheſter, where they took refuge in the caſtle of Wolveſham.

The barons, apprized of their flight, flew to their arms, and purſued them to that city, where, without any formal adjournment, they reſumed their deliberations, and cloſed the buſineſs of the ſeſſion. As they could not, without violating the privileges of the church, attack the caſtle to which they had retired, they had recourſe to negociation, propoſing they ſhould quit the kingdom, and ſtay abroad till the abuſes of government ſhould be reformed; when the king ſhould be at liberty, with conſent of council, to permit their return. To this they readily conſented; and after having been ſtripped of about ſeven thouſand marks in ready money, were ſupplied with a ſafe conduct, and embarked at Dover for the continent.

The Engliſh barons alſo ſeized the ſums of money they had depoſited in ſeveral religious houſes, confiſcated their lands, and ſent agents to Rome to juſtify their own conduct. The barons having thus expelled the foreigners, bound themſelves by a ſolemn oath to maintain the ſtatutes of Oxford at the hazard of their lives and fortunes, and invited the citizens of London to join in their aſſociation; a propoſal which the Londoners readily embraced.

Simon de Montford, the king's brother-in-law, was ſtill the moſt violent of the anti-courtiers, and therefore conſidered by his majeſty as the principal cauſe of his preſent misfortunes. But notwithſtanding the danger of Henry's ſituation, he could not avoid declaring his ſentiments on that ſubject.

As he was one day going by water to the Tower, he was overtaken by a ſudden ſtorm, on which he ordered himſelf to be rowed aſhore immediately. He was received on landing by the earl of Leiceſter, who finding him in great perturbation at the danger he had juſt eſcaped, "Why ſhould your majeſty," ſaid Montford, "be afraid, ſince the ſtorm is over?" Henry replied, with a ſerious look, "Montford, I own I am greatly afraid of thunder and lightning; but by the head of God, I fear thee more than all the thunder and lightning in nature."

In the mean time the great intereſt of the king of the Romans would not ſuffer him tacitly to obſerve the fundamental alteratiion in the Engliſh conſtitution. He therefore declared his intentions of viſiting that kingdom, and loudly diſclaimed the conduct of the barons. Had not Henry been greatly depreſſed by the power of his own ſubjects, the reſentment of this prince might have recovered his authority; for the parliament, hearing of his intentions, and dreading the effects, not only of his intereſt, but their own diviſions, if he landed as a foe in the kingdom, they entered into ſerious deliberations how to divert him from his purpoſe. The biſhop of Wincheſter and others were ordered to treat with him, and gain what intelligence they could relative to his journey, and his continuance in England. They were alſo directed, at all events to declare, that he could not be admitted into the kingdom, without previouſly conforming to the new model of government, and taking an oath to that effect.

The king of the Romans, incenſed at theſe propoſals, ſwore by the throat of God he would never comply with them. But receiving advice that every meaſure was taken in England to prevent his landing, and that therefore all oppoſition would at preſent be vain, he complied with the barons demands, and made preparations for his journey.

A. D. 1259.

On the twenty-ſeventh of January he landed at Dover, and there took the oath, in preſence of the king, and a great number of barons aſſembled for his reception.

Having thus ſecured the king of the Romans, their next care was to eſtabliſh a ſolid peace with the king of France, whoſe countenance and ſupport might counterbalance any efforts made by the king and his friends for retrieving the prerogative, and Montford undertook to conduct the negociation. Accordingly that nobleman repaired to France; and in order to facilitate the deſign, propoſed to ſacrifice all Henry's rights to Normandy and Anjou.

Such a propoſal could not but be agreeable to Lewis, who readily agreed to the terms, and concluded a treaty, which Henry was obliged to ſign. That weak puſillanimous prince was compelled to viſit the French king at Abbeville, where, in an aſſembly of the ſtates of France, he diſclaimed all title to Normandy and Anjou; while Lewis ceded in his favour all the Limouſin and Perigord, together with all that he poſſeſſed on the other ſide the Garonne, on condition of his ſubmitting to do homage, and ſitting among the peers of France as duke of Guienne.

During Henry's abſence, the four and twenty governors of England effectually removed an abuſe of the court of Rome, of which the nation had long complained. All the beſt benefices in the kingdom were enjoyed by Italian prieſts, who, without reſiding on the ſpot, farmed their livings to the higheſt bidder. A proclamation was therefore iſſued, ordering all perſons who farmed benefices of foreigners, to depoſit the rents in the hands of certain receivers appointed for that purpoſe, on pain of having their houſes razed to the foundation.

A. D. 1260.

For ſome time the barons had acted with unanimity; but now many of them were offended at the great authority aſſumed by the earl of Leiceſter, who began to exerciſe a kind of ſovereign power over the four and twenty;

and the earl of Glouceſter endeavoured to form a party, to check his towering ambition. In order to this, he began to diſparage his conduct in private, by inſinuating, that he had entered into a negociation with prince Edward, whom he intended to raiſe to the Engliſh throne, even during the life of his father.

Henry, informed of this report while at St. Omer's, was ſo terrified, that he reſolved not to return to England, perſuaded that either his life or liberty would be in danger. But the young prince, hearing of his ſuſpicions, proved his own innocence as to the ſubject of the report, and thereby wholly removed his father's doubts and fears. Failing in this attempt, Glouceſter openly attacked Leiceſter; but finding that nobleman's intereſt too powerful to hope for ſucceſs, he prudently dropped the proſecution.

Theſe diſſentions furthered the deſigns of Henry, as they weakened the ſtrength of the barons. But his hopes were principally encouraged by the ſpirit of the common people and free tenants, who complained that the yoke of the barons was more grievous than that of the king, before the pretended reformation.

The king therefore determined to embrace the firſt opportunity of freeing himſelf from the ſtatutes of Oxford. In order to this he ſolicited of the pope, abſolution from the oath he had taken to obſerve the ſtatutes of Oxford. The pontiff readily granted the requeſt; but dying before the diſpenſation could be expedited, he was obliged to wait till the papal chair was filled by his ſucceſſor, Urban IV. who made no difficulty in complying with his demand.

Having obtained this diſpenſation, Henry determined to throw off the diſguiſe; and accordingly repaired to the parliament and declared, that as they had not complied with their promiſe made to him on his ſigning the ſtatutes of Oxford, he thought himſelf abſolved from the oath he had there taken; adding, that he would no longer ſuffer counſellors to be impoſed upon him, but was determined to aſſert the dignity of his prerogative. He then retired to the Tower, which he had previouſly ſecured, ſeized on all the money in the Mint, and publiſhed a proclamation, diſcarding the officers appointed by the four and twenty, and nominating others in their room. In ſhort, ſo vigorous and reſolute was his conduct, that he ſeemed determined to retrieve his independence.

Prince Edward, then reſident at Paris, on advice of theſe tranſactions returned to England, in order to prevent the dreadful conſequences of a civil war. Henry was confounded when he heard that his ſon was much diſpleaſed with his violating his oath; and his aſtoniſhment was not a little excited, when he underſtood, that unleſs he would voluntarily remove from his perſon the counſellors who adviſed him to oppoſe the parliament, they would effect that removal by compulſion.

Alarmed at this intelligence, the king relapſed into his uſual perplexity and irreſolution, not being able to determine what courſe was moſt proper to take for his ſecurity, took no notice of the meſſage, but remained in the Tower, apprehending that his perſon would not otherwiſe be ſafe.

A. D. 1262. As the nation was alarmed with the daily apprehenſion of a civil war, the king of the Romans offered his mediation, which being accepted, he prevailed on his brother to confirm the ſtatutes of Oxford; and, on the other hand, perſuaded the barons to relax in thoſe articles which were moſt diſagreeable to the king. The earl of Leiceſter, ſtill refractory, proteſted againſt the peace, and retired immediately to France.

This treaty ſeemed to portend the reſtoration of tranquillity; but the embers of diſcord ſtill glowed under the vail of peace, and ſoon burſt into a violent flame. After the ratification of the agreement, the king paſſed over to the continent to regulate the affairs of Guienne, and was ſeized with a dangerous diſorder at Bourdeaux, which detained him much longer than he intended.

During his abſence, Richard, earl of Glouceſter, died, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Gilbert. Leiceſter being now delivered from a powerful rival, renewed his cabals, and returned to England, where his preſence re-animated the barons, who had ſubſcribed the articles contrary to their inclinations.

The king, informed of theſe proceedings, embarked immediately for England, in order to anticipate the deſigns of the confederate barons; but before his arrival they had concerted meaſures for ſecuring themſelves from the effects of his inconſtancy. Accordingly on his arrival they preſented an addreſs, inſiſting on the confirmation of the Oxford ſtatutes, according to a late agreement, and threatening to uſe compulſive means in caſe of refuſal.

This peremptory language was dictated by the furious Leiceſter, in order to terrify the king into an immediate compliance with their demands. But his deſign in this was defeated; for the king, in his anſwer treated the malecontent barons as rebels, and threatened them with the ſevereſt penalties.

During his reſidence on the continent, Henry had engaged in his intereſt both the king of the Romans and prince Edward; the latter of whom, under pretence of aſſiſting at a tournament at Paris, had levied ſome foreign troops, and was leading them againſt Llewellin, prince of Wales, who renewed his incurſions into the Engliſh territories.

A. D. 1263. Edward, having repulſed the Welch, and reinforced the caſtle of Gannock, and other fortreſſes, returned to London; but being deſtitute of money to pay his forces, marched at the head of a ſtrong detachment to the houſe of the Templars, where he ſeized a conſiderable ſum of money, the property of the citizens, who had lodged it there as in a place of ſecurity.

This act of violence excited an univerſal clamour among the inhabitants; but the prince, regardleſs of their complaints, ordered it to be lodged in the caſtle of Windſor, which they did not think proper to beſiege.

The people, thus irritated, Leiceſter convened the barons at Oxford, where they unanimouſly reſolved to maintain the ſtatutes at the hazard of their lives, and choſe the earl for their general. Having raiſed a conſiderable body of forces, they ravaged the lands belonging to the royal party, and committed the moſt dreadful outrages where they met with the leaſt oppoſition.

The cities of Glouceſter and Worceſter ſubmitted to the earl of Leiceſter, who advanced about Midſummer towards London, with the royal ſtandard flying before him. Henry was now in the moſt deplorable circumſtances, deſtitute both of money and friends; and the city of London had declared for the barons, under the influence of the mayor, who was a firm adherent to Leiceſter.

The populace now formed themſelves into parties, determined to perſecute all foreigners; and prince Edward retired, with his French knights to Windſor, where he endeavoured to collect an army, in order to take the field againſt the barons.

The queen, diffident of her ſecurity in the Tower, attempted to follow her ſon by water; but as ſhe approached London-bridge, was inſulted in the moſt brutal manner by the populace, who, not content with reviling her in the moſt opprobrious terms, endeavoured to ſink her barge, by throwing down ſtones, as the rowers endeavoured to paſs through one of the arches; ſo that ſhe was obliged to return to the Tower, which ſhe reached with great danger and difficulty, and was thence conveyed by night to the palace of the biſhop of London, at St. Paul's, as a place of ſanctuary. The wealthy citizens were equally expoſed to the violence of the mob, who under pretence of ſearching for foreigners, broke open houſes, and plundered friends and foes, without diſtinction.

The king of the Romans, declaring for neither party, interpoſed his good offices to prevent the effuſion of human blood, and a negociation was ſet on foot, under the biſhops of London, Worceſter, and Lincoln, John de Arlington, and William de Wilton.

In the mean time the earl of Leiceſter engaged the cinque ports in his intereſt, and then advanced with his army towards London; when the king, dreading the conſequences of a ſiege, agreed to ſuch terms as the revolters thought proper to impoſe, and a treaty was concluded, importing, That the fortified places in the kingdom ſhould be put into the hands of the barons; that the ſtatutes of Oxford ſhould be inviolably obſerved; that all foreigners ſhould be baniſhed the kingdom, except ſuch as might be permitted to ſtay by the unanimous conſent of the barons; and that none but natural-born ſubjects, approved by the barons, ſhould be concerned in the adminiſtration of public affairs.

Thus the barons, elated by their ſucceſs, exceeded all bounds of moderation, and carried matters to the utmoſt extremity. A parliament was held about the middle of September, in which the ſtatutes of Oxford were confirmed, and the ſtate foreigners, either impriſoned or beneficed, taken into conſideration.

Boniface, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was then at Bologne, as being a foreigner, and was not only ſoliciting the concurrence of the court of France againſt the barons, but had excommunicated the two ſons of the earl of Leiceſter, a ſon of the earl of Hereford, and many other barons, who had annoyed eccleſiaſtical perſons.

Theſe proceedings induced the parliament to act with more moderation. The biſhop of Hereford, and Matthias de Bezile, governor of Glouceſter, were ſet at liberty, and the eccleſiaſtical depredations ordered to be made good. But the court of France, having now undertaken to act as umpire between the king and the earl of Leiceſter, the earl was accordingly ſummoned to appear before the French parliament, then held at Bologne, to which he, and Henry with his queen, repaired at the ſame time.

Lewis, at firſt, remonſtrated with great moderation, and exhorted the earl to leave his factious practices; but Montford anſwered, that though in obedience to his ſummons, he had attended the parliament, yet he did not apprehend, that what he and his peers had done were cognizable in a French court. Lewis finding him thus reſolute, was obliged to diſmiſs him, and he immediately returned to England, whither he was followed by Henry, whoſe queen thought it moſt expedient to remain at the court of France.

A parliament was held ſoon after Henry's return from France, wherein he propoſed terms of accommodation, which appeared equitable to all the diſintereſted part of the aſſembly; but being rejected by Leiceſter and his party, the major part plainly perceived that their conduct was actuated by factious motives.

Prince Henry, the Earl-mareſchal, John Baſſet, and ſeveral other noblemen, thought it inconſiſtent with their honour to remain any longer with Montford, and therefore joined prince Edward, determined to curb the inſolence of that faction, the fatal tendency of which was ſo amply evinced.

Their firſt united effort, was the ſurpriſal of Windſor caſtle, whither Henry immediately repairing, it was made the rendezvous of the royal party, and the garriſon reinforced by the king of the Romans, and earl of Warrenne.

From Windſor they repaired to Dover, in order to ſecure that important fortreſs, which was ſtill in the hands of the barons; but the governor refuſing them admittance, they viſited the other cinque ports, and having received the homage of their barons, returned to London about the beginning of December.

Prince Edward was then at Merton, watching the motions of the earl of Leiceſter, who had raiſed troops for the relief of Dover, if it ſhould be inveſted, and remained in poſſeſſion of London; where Henry had now a conſiderable party. Montford's troops were quartered about Southwark, and the adjacent places, but both parties remained inactive till Henry having joined his forces with thoſe of his ſon, found himſelf more powerful than Leiceſter, who, relying on his intereſt with the Londoners, thought himſelf ſecure. But one John de Giſors, a Norman, and partizan of Henry, found means to ſecure the key of the bridge-gate, while the earl was vigorouſly attacked in the front, by the ſuperior forces of Prince Edward.

Being repulſed, he found the bridge ſhut, and thoſe within unable or unwilling to give him relief; he was therefore preparing to make the beſt defence he could, when the common people of the city, who were his chief friends, iſſued in ſuch multitudes to his aſſiſtance, that they forced the gates of the bridge, ſo that the prince was obliged to retire, and pitch his tents in Lambeth-fields. A deciſive action was now daily expected, when by the interpoſition of the humane and moderate of both parties, a truce was concluded, and the diſpute left to the arbitration of the French king, the reference of which was confirmed by the oaths of the king, barons, and all the principal perſons concerned in the quarrel.

A. D. 1264.

Lewis, having heard the cauſe in an aſſembly of the ſtates at Amiens, decreed, that the ſtatutes of Oxford ſhould be annulled; that the king ſhould recover all his rights and prerogatives, and have the liberty of nominating all the great officers of ſtate, and that foreigners ſhould be deemed capable of holding poſts and dignities, as well as the Engliſh; but added a clauſe, importing, that his award ſhould have no effect to invalidate the privileges granted to the Engliſh before the parliament of Oxford.

The latter clauſe being conſidered by the barons as a manifeſt contradiction, the ſtatutes of Oxford having been enacted with the ſole deſign of confirming their privileges, furniſhed them with a pretence for rejecting the deciſion, and renewing hoſtilities.

Leiceſter, therefore, ſent his ſon with a conſiderable detachment, to ravage the lands of Roger de Mortimer, and being afterwards joined by Llewellin, they reduced the caſtle of Radnor. At the ſame time another party, under the command of Robert Ferrers, earl of Derby, ſtormed the caſtle of Worceſter and abandoned it to plunder.

To ſuppreſs theſe commotions, Edward advanced with his army, reduced ſeveral caſtles belonging to Humphrey de Bohum, and purſued the two Montfords to Glouceſter, where they ſued for a truce, which they obtained by the mediation of the biſhop of Worceſter; before the expiration of which another treaty was begun at Brackley, in the preſence of John de Valence, the French ambaſſador, but the parties differing about the articles, the negociation was dropped, and preparations for renewing the war were made both by the king and barons.

The city of London was ſubjected to the ravages of the populace, who broke open the houſes of the Jews, and plundered their effects, ſtripped them naked, and kept them in cuſtody ſeveral hours, and then maſſacred about five hundred of that unhappy people.

Henry now ſummoned his military tenants, and ordered thoſe ſcholars of Oxford, whoſe allegiance he doubted, to depart the city, which he intended as a rendezvous for his troops. Here he was joined by a very conſiderable body from the north, commanded by John Cummin, John Baliol, and ſeveral other noblemen. Having received intelligence, that the earl of Leiceſter and the Oxford ſcholars had retired to Northampton, ſummoned the town, and being denied admittance, took it by ſtorm. Sixteen barons and ſixty knights were taken priſoners, with a vaſt number of inferior rank, after a prodigious ſlaughter in the ſtreets.

This greatly weakened the intereſt of the barons, and was followed by the ſurrender of Leiceſter, Nottingham, and Tutbury; the royal army alſo over-run the counties of Derby and Stafford, ravaging all the lands belonging to the confederate barons.

In the mean time Montford, having ſecured and fortified the city of London, laid ſiege to the caſtle of Rocheſter, which was near ſurrendering when Henry, by haſty marches, advanced to its relief. Montford, finding himſelf incapable of coping with the king, raiſed the ſiege, and retired to London.

Henry now reduced the caſtle of Tunbridge, and advanced to Winchelſea, exacted from ſome of the barons of the cinque ports, the oath of allegiance, while the reſt put to ſea, and intercepted all ſupplies of proviſion, except thoſe intended for the uſe of the malecontents. From thence the king marched into Suſſex, and fixed his quarters in the convent of Lewes, while prince Edward took up his reſidence in the caſtle.

Montford, being now reinforced by a body of fifteen thouſand Londoners, determined to hazard a deciſive engagement, and accordingly advanced towards the king's encampment. He halted about the diſtance of two leagues from Lewes, and, in order to throw the odium of whatever miſchief might happen on Henry, ſent a letter to the king, written in the name of the whole party, containing the warmeſt profeſſions of their readineſs to ſubmit to his government, and defend his perſon. They alſo endeavoured, by private application to the king of the Romans, and prince Edward, to perſuade Henry to moderate terms, but all their attempts proved fruitleſs; for the king and his party ſet them at defiance, and treated their ſubmiſſion with contempt.

The barons renewed their application, by the biſhops of London and Worceſter, and even offered thirty thouſand pounds, as a reparation for the damages the royal party had ſuſtained; but as the confirmation of the ſtatutes of Oxford was ſtill inſiſted on, all applications were ſtill ineffectual, and both parties prepared to try the fortune of a battle. The royal army was formed in three diviſions; prince Edward commanded the right, Richard, king of the Romans, the left wing, and Henry himſelf remained in the center, which conſiſted of his houſhold troops, and the northern forces. Leiceſter had ranged his forces in four diviſions; the firſt was commanded by his ſon Henry, the ſecond by the earl of Glouceſter, the third by the general himſelf, and the fourth, conſiſting wholly of Londoners, by Nicholas Seagrave. Montford, perſuaded that the prince from whom he had moſt to dread, would charge the Londoners, affected a reliance on that corps, by drawing them up before the baggage, and his own chariot and ſtandard.

This device ſucceeded; prince Edward breathing revenge againſt the Londoners, for the inſult they had offered his mother, charged them with the utmoſt fury, made a terrible ſlaughter, demoliſhed Montford's chariot, and purſued them above four miles from the field of battle. The eagerneſs of the prince proved fatal to the royal cauſe; for the earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, now attacked the troops under the command of Henry, and the king of the Romans, and totally routed the left wing, where the king of the Romans, and two barons were taken priſoners.

The center wing made a gallant reſiſtance, being animated by the example of Philip Baſſet, who intrepidly maintained his poſt, till he was overpowered by numbers, after having received four and twenty wounds; the king himſelf was ſlightly hurt, and his horſe killed under him, before he retired to the priory of Lewes, where he fell into the hands of the enemy.

Thus the royal army was totally routed, when prince Edward returned from the purſuit, and his followers were ſtruck with ſuch conſternation, that the earl of Warrenne, William de Valence, Guy de Luſignan, and Hugh Bigod, fled with ſeven hundred men to Penſey, where they embarked for the continent.

This defection prevented prince Edward's firſt reſolution of falling on the victors, while they were diſperſed in the purſuit and pillage; it likewiſe afforded the earl of Leiceſter an opportunity of making him an eaſy prey, and he was taken priſoner without reſiſtance. This battle was fought at Lewes on the 14th of May.

Richard, king of the Romans, and prince Edward, were treated as common priſoners, the former being ſent with his ſon to the Tower of London, and the latter to Dover caſtle, without the leaſt regard to his birth or quality. In the mean time the barons concerted a new plan of government, to be authorized by a parliament, which they intended to aſſemble, in the king's name, about Whitſuntide.

But this ſtep was attended with many difficulties, as they did not chuſe to ſummon one of the oppoſite party, and foreſaw, that a parliament compoſed wholly of their own dependents, would be deemed deficient in point of legality. In order therefore to render it more general, they compelled the king to ſign commiſſions, appointing in every county, certain officers, or magiſtrates, under the title of conſervators, for preſerving the privileges of the people, and theſe being of the barons party, were inveſted with extenſive authority. The king then ſigned new writs to theſe conſervators, commanding them to appoint four knights in every ſhire, to ſit in the enſuing parliament; and from this æra, moſt writers date the origin of that right, which the commons enjoy of ſitting in the great council of the nation, ſince the Norman conqueſt.

Such a parliament would doubtleſs approve the plan of government, concerted by the barons, whereby it was reſolved, that the parliament ſhould nominate three commiſſioners of approved ſagacity and diſcretion, impowered to chooſe a council of nine noblemen, to whom the adminiſtration of public affairs ſhould be committed; but might be changed occaſionally, by the king, with the conſent of the barons; that if the commiſſioners ſhould diſagree touching the choice of counſellors, the diſpute ſhall be referred to the majority; that the deliberations of the nine, ſhall be executed with the approbation of ſix of the number; but if that could not be procured, the affairs ſhould be decided by the three great commiſſioners, with the conſent of the barons; and that the nomination of all officers, ſhould be at the diſpoſition of the nine counſellors; and laſtly, that theſe regulations ſhould prevail, till altered or annulled by parliament.

The earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, and the biſhop of Chicheſter, were the three commiſſioners who continued to govern the kingdom on this new model; having extorted the approbation of the king, and prince Edward, by threatening them both with impriſonment during life.

A. D. 1265. Now Leiceſter had reached the ſummit of his ambition. The hand of the king was made uſe of to authenticate the vileſt acts of oppreſſion, and even to aſſign over the royal demeſnes, to this inſolent race, whoſe ambition was as extravagant, as their avarice was boundleſs. The earl of Glouceſter, the principal inſtrument of Montford's preferment, was now ſet aſide, as no longer requiſite to promote his views.

The diſcarded earl obſerved his ſupercilious behaviour with indignation, but in ſilence; and as he was in every reſpect a nobleman of much better principles than any of the Montford race, perceived he had too far acquieſced with their proceedings. He therefore required Leiceſter to releaſe his priſoners, and render an account of the enormous ſums, which, contrary to the convention of Lewes, he had extorted, and applied entirely to his own uſe.

Receiving only an inſolent reply to theſe demands, he determined to embrace the firſt opportunity of atoning the miſeries he had aſſiſted to inflict; by reſtoring the royal family to their legal rights as ſoon as was convenient.

But Leiceſter, perceiving a change in Glouceſter's conduct, iſſued a proclamation, enjoining all who had taken arms againſt the eſtabliſhed government, to retire immediately to Ireland; however inſtead of obeying the order, they repaired to the eſtates of the earl of Glouceſter, who afforded them protection. In the mean time the enemies of Leiceſter ſo wrought on the minds of the people, by inſinuating that the cruelties he practiſed towards the royal family, plainly betrayed his pernicious deſigns; that he found it neceſſary to take ſome ſteps to exculpate himſelf from a charge ſo infamous.

For this reaſon he called a parliament, under pretence of conſulting meaſures for ſetting prince Edward at liberty; and at this aſſembly, every county was repreſented by two knights, and two burgeſſes appeared for every city and borough in the kingdom; and this ſeems to be the origin of the preſent Houſe of Commons.

Leiceſter, at the meeting of parliament, accuſed Glouceſter of having granted ſhelter and protection to the lords of the Welch marches, and demanded hoſtages for his fidelity; but the earl, inſtead of complying with his demand, quitted the aſſembly abruptly, and retired to the weſt, with a ſtrong body of his followers, among whom was John Giffard, one of the braveſt noblemen in England, whom Leiceſter had endeavoured to oppreſs.

However this defection, though alarming to Leiceſter, did not prevent the aſſembly from proceeding on the buſineſs for which they had been convened, which was the releaſe of prince Edward. The biſhops of London, Worceſter, and Chiceſter, drew up the conditions on which he was to be ſet at liberty, and the king was obliged to ſwear to the performance. The prince reſigned his palace at Weſtminſter to Peter de Montford, ceded his caſtle of Briſtol to the earl of Leiceſter, and promiſed in writing, to deliver up all his caſtles in the marches of Wales for three years to ſuch perſons as ſhould be nominated by the king's council, to perſuade or compel the noblemen of the marches to ſubmit to the preſent adminiſtration, to oppoſe the introduction of foreigners, to obſerve the agreement, on pain of forfeiting his eſtate, to give up the cuſtody of all his caſtles, for the term of five years, and to conſent that his couſin Henry ſhould be detained, till the end of the year, as an hoſtage for his behaviour, in caſe of an invaſion.

When this convention was ſigned and ratified, Edward was brought into Weſtminſter-hall, where the inſtrument was publicly read, and nine biſhops joined in excommunicating all perſons who ſhould preſume to violate the agreement. The prince was then declared free, and ſet at liberty, though, like his father, ſurrounded by a ſtrong guard, who had particular orders to watch his motions, by which means he was in reality as much in cuſtody as before this ſham liberation.

Matters now wore a different aſpect, for the diſpute was not as heretofore, between the king and his people, but between the nation and a faction. Glouceſter had openly aſſociated with the noblemen of the marches, and fortified his caſtles. This was a retreat to which all the noblemen who were diſguſted with the pride, inſolence, and tyranny of Leiceſter retired, and ſoon became ſo numerous, as to threaten the moſt dangerous oppoſition. To divert this ſtorm, he directed his ſon to proclaim a tournament at Northampton, to which all knights were invited without diſtinction. Leiceſter imagined that nothing could divert young Glouceſter from his favourite diverſion, at which it would be eaſy to take away his life, or at leaſt make him a priſoner. But Glouceſter, well acquainted with the perfidious temper of Montford, avoided the ſnare, and Leiceſter, enraged at this diſappointment, prevailed on the knights aſſembled at the tournament, to proceed immediately to the marches of Wales, in hopes of taking Glouceſter by ſurprize. That nobleman, ſtill ſuſpecting the treacherous deſign of Montford, had engaged with Mortimer, and other lords, for their mutual ſecurity. Leiceſter now taking with him the king and prince Edward, advanced towards the borders of Wales, and endeavoured to amuſe his rival, with the propoſal for an accommodation. Glouceſter, to further his deſigns, detained the meſſengers of Montford, and at the ſame time, concerted meaſures for the eſcape of prince Edward, aſſured that the preſence and influence of the heir apparent to the crown, would ſtrengthen his cauſe, for humbling the pride of Leiceſter.

As ſoon as he had communicated his intentions to his brother, Thomas de Clare, who attended Edward as a companion; that prince readily embraced the offer of retrieving his liberty, and promiſed to act according to the directions he received. Accordingly, the prince was next day mounted on a horſe remarkable for his fleetneſs, and repaired with his guards and attendants to divert himſelf in Widmarſh, near Hereford, where he had matches between them, till he had tired all their horſes; when a certain nobleman appearing on the aſcent of Turlington-hill, and waving his bonnet, according to appointment, the prince mounted his horſe, and bade adieu to his keepers, who purſued him for ſome time, till they ſaw him received by Roger de Mortimer, with a party of men who had concealed themſelves in a neighbouring wood, and now conducted him to the caſtle of Wigmore. The lords of the marches now took to their arms, reduced thoſe caſtles which they had formerly given up, and over-run all the country between Hereford and Cheſter.

The earl of Glouceſter at the ſame time took the field, at the head of his troops, and broke down all the bridges on the Severn, to prevent the incurſions of Leiceſter. The populace flocked from all quarters, to ſerve under the banner of prince Edward, who was now joined by John Giffard, at the head of a great number of horſe and foot, who followed the fortunes of that noble hero.

About this time he was reinforced by William de Valence, John, earl of Warrenne, and Hugh Bigod, who had lately landed in Pembrokeſhire, with a body of troops enliſted on the continent. Leiceſter was alarmed at the news of the prince's eſcape, though he at firſt believed he was fled into South Wales, in order to embark for France; but he was ſoon fatally convinced of his miſtake; for the prince having advanced at the head of a numerous army to Worceſter, found means to cut off his retreat into England. Thus alarmed, Montford ſummoned all the military tenants of the crown to meet the king at Glouceſter, with the utmoſt diſpatch; but before any body of the militia appeared in his behalf, prince Edward took both the city and caſtle of Glouceſter.

Then Leiceſter applied to Llewellin, prince of North Wales, who ravaged the lands of the earl of Glouceſter, in Glamorganſhire, and ſent a body of Welch troops to join Montford. Thus reinforced, he marched to Monmouth, whither he was followed by John Giffard, who offered to give him battle; but declining the engagement, he proceeded to Newport, where he expected a naval ſupply from Briſtol, in order to tranſport his army into England, finding it impracticable to croſs the Severn.

This reſource was ſoon cut off by the activity of the earl of Glouceſter, who had blocked up the Avon with a fleet of gallies, ſo that no veſſel could come to his aſſiſtance. In the mean time prince Edward advanced with his army to Newport, and waited for day-light to begin the attack. Thus baffled, Montford decamped ſilently at midnight, and retired into North Wales, where he marched over the mountains to Hereford, and there fixed his quarters, till he could find an opportunity of croſſing the Severn.

During this time he diſpatched orders to his ſon Simon, to relinquiſh the ſiege of Penſey-caſtle, and march immediately to his aſſiſtance. Simon, in obedience to his father, returned to London, where having aſſembled a ſtrong body of troops, he began his march for the banks of the Severn. In his route, he took Wincheſter by aſſault, was admitted without oppoſition into Oxford and Northampton, whence he proceeded to Kenilworth, where his army lay encamped in the moſt ſupine ſecurity.

A ſpy of Edward's informed that prince of their defenceleſs ſituation, who therefore advancing with the utmoſt expedition from Worceſter, ſurprized Montford's troops, and without reſiſtance took the greateſt part of them priſoners, amongſt whom were many noblemen, but Simon himſelf found means to eſcape.

When returned from this fortunate expedition, the prince found that Leiceſter had paſſed the Severn in his abſence, and retired to Eveſham, hoping to join his ſon the enſuing day. Edward therefore put his army in motion about ſun-ſet, ſpreading a report, that he intended to march to Bridgnorth, in order to deceive the ſpies of the enemy. Accordingly he took the road, but having marched two or three miles, he faced about, and reached Eveſham before ſun-riſing. But Montford diſcovering his approach, eluded his vigilance, though he took his troops at firſt for a reinforcement marched to his relief under the command of his ſon. But he was ſoon undeceived, for aſcending an eminence in the neighbourhood, he plainly perceived the banners of Glouceſter and Mortimer, and obſerving the troops march in a regular manner, cried out, "By the arm of St. James, they advance like well diſciplined troops; it was not from themſelves, but me, they learned that diſcipline. Lord have mercy upon our ſouls, for our bodies are doomed to deſtruction." But he did not abandon himſelf to unmanly deſpair, for being ſurrounded on all ſides, he drew up his men in a compact circle, and exhorted them to exert themſelves like men, whoſe lives and liberties were now at ſtake; at the ſame time he obliged the king to put on his armour, that he might not be known, and to expoſe himſelf in the front of the battle. The prince began the attack with ſuch impetuoſity, that the Welch, unable to ſuſtain the ſhock, fled with the utmoſt precipitation, and the greater part of them periſhed either in the ſtream of the Avon, or by the ſword.

Glouceſter at the ſame time charged in another quarter with equal intrepidity; but notwithſtanding the vigorous efforts of theſe two impetuous commanders, and the precipitate flight of the Welch, Leiceſter maintained the battle from two in the afternoon, till night, with incredible obſtinacy. The king was wounded in the ſhoulder, and in imminent danger of his life, when calling out he was Henry of Wincheſter their king, Adam de Mohaut ran to his protection.

The prince alſo, hearing his voice, ran immediately to the ſpot, and conducted him to a place of ſafety, and before he returned Leiceſter was ſlain. His horſe had been killed under him, and when he demanded quarter as he fought on foot, his adverſaries refuſed, declaring there was no quarter due to ſuch a traitor.

Henry ſoon followed the fate of his father, and his troops ſeeing their leaders ſlain, were ſo diſpirited, that they made no further reſiſtance; for by this time the juſticiary, Peter de Montford, William de Mandeville, Ralph Baſſet, John de Beauchamp, Guy de Bardolph, Roger de St. John, and all the barons had ſhared the ſame fate as the earl, except John Fitz John, Nicholas de Seagrave, Henry de Haſtings, Guy de Montford, Humphry de Bohun, junior, who were taken priſoners, with ſeven or eight others.

In this manner fell the earl of Leiceſter, and thus was diſſipated a conſpiracy, which, had Montford obtained the victory of that day, would have ſubverted the Engliſh laws and liberties; the body of the elder Montford was diſmembered as a traitor, but thoſe of the other barons, were by the monks of Eveſham interred.

The army of the confederates was totally ruined by this defeat, while the prince only loſt three officers of any note, whoſe names have periſhed through the negligence of writers. By this victory the king of the Romans, and the other illuſtrious captives of the king's party, who had been impriſoned ever ſince the fatal battle of Lewes, obtained their liberty. The Tower of London was ſurrendered by the widow of the juſticiary Hugh d'Eſpenſer, but the caſtle of Kenilworth was ſtill kept by Simon Montford, who releaſed the king of the Romans, that he might obtain the better terms for himſelf.

The king having returned from Eveſham to Worceſter, immediately revoked all the grants and other writings he had ſigned, to the prejudice of himſelf or the prince. The citizens of Hereford were pardoned, on payment of a large fine. The poſts which had been filled by the earl of Leiceſter, were declared vacant, and diſpoſed of by the king's order.

Theſe neceſſary precautions being taken, the king repaired to Wincheſter, where he called a parliament, in which the effects of the rebels were confiſcated to the crown, and a reſolution was entered on, to inveſt, and deſtroy the city of London, which had always favoured the intereſt of the malecontents.

When the citizens were informed of this determination, and alſo of their having been adjudged to have forfeited their privileges, they ſubmitted to the mercy of the king, who deprived the city of its chains, barricadoes, gates, magiſtrates, and charter, which the inhabitants were obliged to redeem with a large ſum of money; and Fitz-Thomas, the mayor, with ſeveral of the aſſociates were impriſoned, till they agreed to purchaſe their liberty with the greater part of their ſubſtance.

But the confederated barons were perſecuted with the utmoſt ſeverity; their effects being ſeized, and themſelves hunted about, till deſpair became their only refuge. The inhabitants of the Cinque Ports were ſo much exaſperated at Henry's ſevere treatment of the Londoners, that they fitted out a ſtrong fleet, with which they burnt the town of Portſmouth, and committed ſeveral acts of piracy, detrimental to the commerce and navigation of the kingdom.

Incenſed at theſe depredations, Henry determined to puniſh their inſolence; accordingly prince Edward marched againſt them, took the town of Winchelſea by aſſault, and hanged ſeveral of the moſt eminent inhabitants; and the other ports, alarmed at this ſeverity, ſubmitted, on promiſe of a general amneſty, and the confirmation of their privileges. At the ſame time the caſtle of Dover was ſurrendered by the garriſon on conditions very honorable.

Still Simon de Montford kept poſſeſſion of Kenilworth-caſtle, then accounted the ſtrongeſt fortification in Europe. The king of the Romans warmly ſolicited his pardon, declaring that he had ſaved his life at the hazard of his own, and ſet him at liberty without ranſom: but this grateful ſolicitation was ineffectual, for Montford was proſcribed as a rebel, and declared a traitor to his country.

Provoked at this ſeverity, he determined to aſſemble the remains of his father's army, and ſeize on the iſland of Axholm, in Lincolnſhire, where he fortified himſelf, and was ſoon joined by a conſiderable number of his father's friends.

Prince Edward, judging it abſolutely neceſſary to repel ſuch a body of enemies, marched thither at the head of his forces, and found the place well fortified by art and nature. But he carried on his attack with ſuch vigour, that the beſieged, after a reſolute defence, were obliged to ſurrender, on condition of their ſtanding to the award of prince Edward, and the king of the Romans, provided the ſentence did not extend to their lives, limbs, or perpetual impriſonment. Young Montford accordingly obtained pardon, and an annuity of five hundred marks granted him out of the Exchequer, on condition of his departing the kingdom.

A. D. 1266. In the mean time the queen, who had reſided two years in France, arrived in England, accompanied by Ottoboni, cardinal of St. Adrian, the pope's legate, armed with ſeveral bulls, confirming thoſe of his predeceſſor againſt Leiceſter and his adherents, whom he now excommunicated dead or living; he likewiſe laid an interdict on all lands, granted to Henry one year's tenth of the clergy's revenues, and ſummoned the biſhops of Worceſter, Chicheſter, Wincheſter, and London, to anſwer for their crimes in ſupporting Leiceſter in his rebellious proceedings, and diſregarding the cenſures denounced by the pope, againſt that arch rebel, and all his party.

The biſhop of Worceſter, on profeſſion of penitence, was abſolved, and died ſoon after; but the other three were ſent to Rome, in order to undergo ſuch puniſhment as his holineſs ſhould think proper to inflict. The caſtle of Kenilworth ſtill held out, and the garriſon inſolently cut off the hands of a royal herald, who was ſent to ſummon them to ſurrender.

The king, exaſperated at theſe proceedings, iſſued orders for aſſembling the whole force of the kingdom at Oxford, in order to reduce this caſtle. Having aſſembled the troops he advanced to Northampton, where he received advice that ſome rebel barons had ſurprized and plundered the city of Lincoln.

This intelligence obliged him to continue ſome time at Northampton, where he diſpatched prince Edward, with a body of troops, to recover Lincoln. But the rebellious contagion had ſpread farther than Henry perceived; the earl of Derby having taken up arms, was joined by John d'Ayville, and Bernard Wake. This event diſconcerted Henry's ſcheme for reducing the caſtle of Kenilworth, as he was obliged to diſpatch his ſon, at the head of a party, to reſtrain the incurſions of the garriſon, while he ſent Henry, ſon to the king of the Romans, to the north-weſt counties, now harraſſed and plundered by the earl of Derby and his aſſociates. Prince Henry ſurprized the rebels in Cheſterfield on Whitſun-eve, where, after cutting great part of them to pieces, he took the earl of Derby priſoner; but d'Ayville and Wake effected their eſcape.

Thus, while Henry was engaged againſt two parties of rebels, prince Edward was employed againſt a third, more dangerous than either, headed by the intrepid Adam Gurdon. This nobleman, diſguſted at the late ſevere meaſures of the government, ſcorned to ſubmit his property to the will of a rapacious court; and the renown he had acquired in the field under Montford, induced prince Edward to prefer the conqueſt of him alone, to a thouſand vulgar foes; nay, ſo emulous was he of his glory, that he gave orders, that when they ſaw Gurdon and himſelf engaged, no one ſhould interpoſe. The noble rebel lay between Alton and Farnham, attended by a handful of men; but theſe ſoldiers of fortune ſubſiſted on the contribution raiſed from the eſtates of the royal party. The acceſs to his camp, or rather retreat, was winding, gloomy, and unknown to all but himſelf and his followers. Edward watched his motions; and one day eſpying him in his return at the head of his party, attacked him hand to hand.

Now each party kept a reſpectful diſtance from their leader. Adam was animated by the honour of waging ſingle combat with the heir-apparent to the crown; and Edward, by the glory that would accrue from the conqueſt of ſo gallant a man. After a fierce and equal conteſt, Edward, fired with congenial valour, offered his antagoniſt life, fortune and freedom, in exchange for his friendſhip.

This generous propoſal Gurdon embraced, delivered his ſword to his prince, and ever after behaved with the utmoſt fidelity. But the caſtle of Kenilworth ſtill braved the attempts of Henry, and the Iſle of Ely afforded a ſecure retreat to the rebels.

Notwithſtanding the fortreſs was inveſted, the garriſon was ſo well provided, and made ſo gallant a reſiſtance, that there appeared no probable method of reducing it, but that of famine. As the cauſe of theſe troubles was the confiſcation of the eſtates of the rebels, and the beſtowing of them on the king's adherents, Henry called a parliament in the town of Kenilworth, to mitigate the ordinance that had been enacted on this ſubject; and it was decreed by a new law, called the Dictum de Kenilworth, that all forfeited eſtates ſhould be reſtored to the original proprietors, after a certain deduction for his majeſty's uſe, according to the nature of the treſpaſs, or crime of the owner.

But Henry de Haſtings, for his barbarity in cutting off the hands of the herald, was fined in a ſum equal to the revenue of his eſtate for ſeven years; and the earl of Derby, who had twice rebelled, was condemned to impriſonment for the ſame term, unleſs he choſe to throw himſelf on the king's mercy. Though this decree was publiſhed within the hearing of the garriſon of Kenilworth, they continued to defend the place with ſurprizing obſtinacy, till their proviſions beginning to fail, and the ſoldiers growing ſickly, they agreed to ſurrender the caſtle within forty days, if not relieved within that time, on condition of ſaving their lives, limbs, horſes, and armour. The propoſal being accepted, hoſtages were delivered; and, at the expiration of the term ſtipulated, the garriſon marched out, dreadful to behold, being withered and exhauſted with fatigue and famine; and their long confinement had occaſioned ſuch a ſtench, that the king's ſoldiers were almoſt ſuffocated when they firſt entered the caſtle. Thus ended a ſiege, as memorable as any recorded in the hiſtory of England.

The king conferred the command of the fortreſs on his younger ſon Edmund, whom he had already created earl of Lancaſter, and high-ſteward of England, and gave him the whole eſtate of the earl of Leiceſter. The reduction of Kenilworth, and proſpect of ſubduing the rebels in the Iſle of Ely, ſeemed to baniſh the remembrance of former misfortunes from the mind of Henry; and though Edward had ſolemnly ſworn to the earl of Glouceſter, when he eſpouſed his party, that he would uſe his utmoſt efforts to re-eſtabliſh the ancient laws of England, and drive the foreigners from the king's councils, he now ſeemed to prefer the reduction of the malecontents, to the performance of the articles to which he was bound ſo indiſpenſably.

Already extended was the royal prerogative beyond the limits which the law preſcribed; and there was the higheſt reaſon to believe, that the king, after totally ſubduing the rebels, would render himſelf abſolute; a calamity which Glouceſter thought himſelf obliged, by the duty he owed his country, to prevent. In order to this, he inſiſted that the malecontents ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of their eſtates, according to the Dictum de Kenilworth; but on Henry's refuſal of compliance, he retired to his own eſtate on the frontiers of Wales, engaged in a treaty with Llewellin, and ſome noblemen in the adjacent parts, and ſent promiſe of aſſiſtance to the revolters of Ely.

Offended by his abſence and military preparations, the court ſent meſſengers to demand the cauſe of his non-attendance. Glouceſter, with reſpect and ſubmiſſion, aſſured the meſſengers, that he would never carry arms againſt the king or his ſon, but in his own defence; and that the levies he was raiſing were deſtined againſt his enemy Mortimer. This anſwer appeaſed the king and parliament, who granted a ſubſidy for carrying on the war againſt the malecontents; and at the ſame time the legate importuned the clergy to grant the ſame aid to his holineſs; but the prelates juſtly diſdained a demand ſo unreaſonable.

A. D. 1267.

When the ſeſſion broke up, Henry took the field with his troops, and advancing into Cambridgeſhire, ſummoned the rebels of Ely to ſurrender; but relying on their own valour, and the advantage of their ſituation, they deſpiſed his menaces, and made ſo gallant a defence that his courage abated, and he determined to wait the arrival of prince Edward, who was then abſent on an expedition againſt John de Veſci, a northern baron, who had ſeized the caſtle of Alnwick, which the prince, at length, obliged him to ſurrender.

In the mean time Glouceſter put himſelf in motion, with the forces he had raiſed on his own eſtate, and in the principality of Wales, and marched with ſuch expedition, that he reached the neighbourhood of London, before the inhabitants had the leaſt intimation of his deſign. The magiſtrates, with the advice of the legate, afforded him admittance; and he remained quiet, till d'Ayville, arriving with a party of rebels from the north, and Robert de Willoughby with another from the Iſle of Ely, the draw-bridge was ordered to be drawn up, and the gates to be guarded for the defence of the citizens. But the earl, having found means to ſecure the intereſt of the greater part of the inhabitants, ſeized the gates, and gave admittance to the troops of the malecontents.

Now the populace choſe a new ſet of magiſtrates; bulwarks and barbicans were erected between the Tower and the city, and Glouceſter ſummoned the legate to ſurrender that fortreſs. At firſt he acted on the defenſive; but at length all communication being cut off, and the garriſon conſequently diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, he pronounced a general anathema on thoſe who diſturbed the public tranquillity, and laid an interdict on the churches of London.

Fruitleſs however was this ſeverity; and the legate, on receiving intelligence that the earl was preparing for a formal ſiege, ſurrendered at diſcretion. Glouceſter, having thus made himſelf maſter of the Tower, publiſhed a manifeſto, declaring he had taken up arms to prove equitable terms to the revolters, and that he ſhould not lay them down, till he had compelled both the king and prince Edward to perform the engagements which they had neglected as yet.

Henry, alarmed at theſe proceedings, diſpatched orders to his ſon to join him without delay; and this being effected, they advanced and took poſt at Stratford, within three miles of London. The earl of Glouceſter, who vainly flattered himſelf that the whole nation would flock to his ſtandard, was not a little ſurprized, when he found an almoſt general reſort to the army of the king.

To extricate himſelf from the danger in which he was involved, he had recourſe to the good offices of the king of the Romans, and lord Philip Baſſet, by whoſe mediation he obtained pardon for having taken up arms againſt his ſovereign. The earl then ſolicited and obtained the royal clemency in behalf of his friends and the city of London; but with regard to the rebels of Ely, his majeſty was inexorable.

A. D. 1268.

For a while England enjoyed tranquillity; but foreign frenzy ſucceeded civil commotion. A parliament was convoked at Northampton, in which the legate Ottoboni declared the pope's reſolution of publiſhing a cruſade throughout Chriſtendom; at the ſame time exhorted the Engliſh to aſſiſt in an expedition tending to the honour of God, and the advantage of religion.

The legate's exhortation ſucceeded; prince Edward, and his couſin Henry, received the croſs from the hands of the legate, and their example was followed by the earls of Glouceſter, Warrenne, Warwick, and Pembroke; above an hundred and twenty knights, and an infinite number of inferior quality. But the royal coffers being exhauſted, a talliage was laid on all cities, boroughs, and towns in his dominions; and Henry, to confirm the public tranquillity, ſummoned a parliament to meet at Marlborough, where a body of laws was enacted, and diſtinguiſhed by the title of, the Statutes of Marlborough.

By this time Charles, count of Anjou, had acquired poſſeſſion of the Sicilian throne, by a victory obtained over young Conradin, whom he cruelly put to death; and as the king of Tunis had paid an annual tribute to the emperor Frederic II. Charles claimed that right as king of the Two Sicilies, and accordingly demanded this tribute: but the Mahometan prince rejecting his propoſal with diſdain, he applied to his brother Lewis, perſuading him to invade his dominions; alledging, that an expedition againſt the Saracens of Barbary would be as acceptable to God, as a new cruſade againſt thoſe of Paleſtine.

Lewis, whoſe ſuperſtitious zeal overcame every ſuggeſtion of reaſon and common ſenſe, agreed to join the troops of his brother Charles in making a deſcent on the coaſt of Africa; and being deſirous of engaging prince Edward in the ſame enterprize, invited him to his court, where he communicated his deſign, and ſecured the prince's aſſociation, by a loan of thirty thouſand marks; in conſequence of which they adjuſted the particulars of the undertaking, and fixed their departure for the month of Auguſt the enſuing year. About this period the king of the Romans, who had lately married Beatrix de Falquemort, niece to Conrade, archbiſhop of Cologne, a lady celebrated for her beauties, both mental and perſonal, preſented her to king Henry.

The king ſoon after tranſlated the relics of the Confeſſor into a new ſhrine of ineſtimable value, erected in the abbey of Weſtminſter, which he had lately rebuilt. Prince Edward, in the mean time, was wholly occupied in making preparations for his departure.

The parliament, which was aſſembled on this occaſion, granted a twentieth of the moveables of the laity; a tenth of the eccleſiaſtical revenues; and all the debts of the Jews, not aſſigned to Chriſtians.

The earl of Glouceſter, diffident of the ſincerity of Edward's reconciliation, refuſed to take his ſeat in parliament; nor did he ſeem inclined to perform his vow of pilgrimage. Edward, fearful of leaving behind him ſo powerful and ambitious a nobleman, peremptorily inſiſted on his attending him to Paleſtine; and the earl as peremptorily refuſed to ſubject himſelf to any reſtriction, with regard to the time and manner of performing his vow.

A. D. 1270. Happily however this diſpute was compromiſed, by the interpoſition of the king of the Romans, to whoſe arbitration both parties ſubmitted. He accordingly determined, that the earl ſhould accompany prince Edward to the Holy Land, unleſs prevented by ſickneſs or ſome neceſſary avocation; that if on his arrival he would join the prince with his followers, he ſhould receive eight thouſand marks, and a ſhip for his paſſage; but, ſhould he chooſe to act by himſelf, the ſum ſhould be reduced to two thouſand marks, and be obliged to give ſecurity for applying it to the purpoſes of the cruſade.

By a bond, in the penalty of twenty thouſand marks, he alſo obliged himſelf to keep the peace in England, provided he was prevented from fulfilling his vow; and agreed to deliver his caſtles of Tunbridge and Henley into the hands of the king of the Romans, by way of ſecurity, till advice arrived of his landing in Paleſtine, when they were to be ſurrendered to his commiſſioners.

All the caſtles of importance, in order to ſecure the public peace, were committed to the care of governors, on whoſe fidelity the prince could depend. Robert, earl Ferrers, was ſet at liberty, and reſtored to the poſſeſſions of his eſtate, upon giving ſecurity for the payment of fifty thouſand pounds to prince Edmund, to whom it had been granted, when it was firſt forfeited by the rebellion of Robert.

Henry had indulged prince Edward with a grant of the Tower, and all his rights in the city of London, together with the duties on merchandize, which he farmed to a company of Italian merchants, and exacted ſome illegal cuſtoms from the citizens, whom he ſtill hated for their attachment to the barons, and the inſult they had offered to his mother. Nevertheleſs, at the inſtance of prince Edward he granted them a new charter, whereby all their ancient rights and privileges were confirmed; and the citizens, as a teſtimony of their gratitude for ſo ſignal a favour, preſented him with the ſum of five hundred marks, towards defraying the expences of the cruſade.

While the nation enjoyed an uninterrupted tranquillity, a parliament was ſummoned at Wincheſter, where the king, who had likewiſe taken the croſs, delivered it to prince Edward, and aſſigned to him the whole produce of the ſubſidy lately granted for the expedition. The guardianſhip of Edward's ſon was committed to Richard, king of the Romans; and the cuſtody of his lands to Walter Giffard, archbiſhop of York, Philip Baſſet, Roger de Mortimer, and Robert Wallerand.

Edward having taken every neceſſary precaution, ſet out for France, with his princeſs, his couſin Henry, William de Valence, Thomas de Clare, Roger de Clifford, and ſeveral other noblemen. Lewis had already landed near Tunis with an army of ſixty thouſand men, and taken the caſtle of Carthage; but deferred the ſiege of the capital till the arrival of his brother Charles, king of Sicily, whom he did not live to receive; for he died of the flux, in the arms of his ſon Philip the Hardy, who attended him in this expedition. Charles landed immediately after his deceaſe; and having routed the Tunians in ſeveral encounters, compelled their king to ſubmit to whatever terms he might impoſe. Edward, when he heard of the king's death, reſumed his firſt deſign of proceeding directly to Paleſtine; but being importuned by Philip to join him in Africa, he ſailed thither, and arrived at Tunis after the treaty was ſigned. This war being finiſhed, and the ſeaſon advanced, he determined to winter in Sicily; but ſent back his couſin Henry to manage the affairs of Gaſcony in his abſence, who did not live to reach that province, being aſſaſſinated in the church of the Franciſcans at Rome, by Simon and Guy de Montford, ſons to the late earl of Leiceſter.

A. D. 1271. Being now advanced in years, Henry avoided, as much as poſſible, the toils of government. About this time a diſpute aroſe between the inhabitants and monks of Norwich, concerning their privileges; when the populace attacked the monaſtery, ſet fire to the gates, burned an adjoining pariſh church, together with the almonry, priory, refectory, dormitory, and all the buildings in the outer court; then forcing the convent, murdered ſeveral monks in the cloiſters, inſulted and impriſoned the reſt, carried off the conſecrated veſſels, the church treaſure, veſtments, books, and all the moveables that eſcaped the conflagration.

A. D. 1272. A parliament was ſummoned by the king at St. Edmundſbury, to concert meaſures for puniſhing the authors of this maſſacre, who were already excommunicated by the biſhop of Norwich; and Henry, with the advice of his prelates and nobility, went thither and deprived the city of its liberties.

Richard, king of the Romans, who made a conſiderable figure in the hiſtory of this reign, died this year. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Edmund, as earl of Cornwall, who married Margaret, ſiſter to the earl of Glouceſter. By this match he ſtrengthened his family intereſt; and the flouriſhing condition in which his father left his eſtates and caſtles, rendered him a very powerful ſubject.

Great loſs attended Henry by the death of his brother Richard, who had aſſiſted him with his advice in all his emergencies, and contributed to the ſupport of his authority. His death muſt therefore have affected Henry, and co-operated with his other diſtemper; which increaſing daily, he ordered himſelf to be moved, by eaſy journies, to Weſtminſter, where, finding his end approaching, he ſent for the earl of Glouceſter, and inſiſted on his taking an oath to preſerve the peace of the kingdom, and exert his endeavours in ſupporting the intereſt of his ſon Edward.

Then taking a ſolemn farewell of his chief nobility, he departed this life on the twentieth of November, in the ſixty-ſixth year of his age, and fifty-ſeventh of his reign. His body, at his own requeſt, was interred near the ſhrine of Edward the Confeſſor, in Weſtminſter-Abbey, where his tomb is ſtill to be ſeen, with his ſtatue in braſs.

He had by his queen, Eleanor of Provence, nine children, five of whom died in their infancy, but four of them ſurvived him; namely, Edward, who ſucceeded him on the throne; Edmund, earl of Lancaſter; Margaret, married to Alexander III. king of Scots; and Beatrix, wife to John de Dreux, duke of Brittany.

Character of King Henry III.

King Henry's perſon was of the middle ſtature, ſtrong and compact; and the lid of one of his eyes hung over in ſo extraordinary a manner, that part of the ball was concealed. The moſt ſtriking outlines of his character were mean abilities, productive of an incapacity for government; hence he became as much a priſoner in the hands of his own favourites, as when detained a captive in the hands of his enemies. He was a ſlave to his paſſions; fickle, capricious, and violent in his temper. To which cauſes ought to be aſcribed, rather than to his arbitrary principles, all the diſturbances that happened in his reign; and from theſe ſources aroſe his attachment to foreign favourites; his negligence in obſerving his promiſes; his paſſive ſubmiſſion to the arbitrary will of his miniſters; his abject ſlavery to the court of Rome; his little courage, and leſs conduct; with that eaſy ſimplicity, adapted to a private ſtation, which continually induced him, for a preſent gratification, or a little preſent eaſe, to ſacrifice the more ſolid advantages ariſing from the truſt and confidence of his people. Greedy of money, but profuſe in his expences, he was perpetually employed in pillaging his ſubjects, or laviſhing his wealth upon worthleſs minions. Inſtead of accommodating himſelf to the embarraſſed ſituation in which he found his revenue had been left by the military expeditions of his uncle, the diſſipations of his father, and the uſurpation of the barons, he was tempted to levy money by irregular exactions, which, without enriching himſelf, diſguſted the whole nation. If he had few public virtues, he had alſo few perſonal vices. Addicted to no kinds of debauchery, we hear of neither his amours nor acts of intemperance. Gentle and merciful in his diſpoſition, he was never guilty of any act of cruelty; but contented himſelf with puniſhing the rebels in their effects, when he might have deluged the ſcaffold with their blood. He was of ſo eaſy a diſpoſition, as to be always governed by thoſe about his perſon. An extreme fondneſs for his flatterers and friends, precluded an affection for his people, whom he ſeemed to deſpiſe, as if they were only made to contribute to his pleaſure, by giving him unbounded ſupplies; thus making his arbitrary will, or rather that of his miniſters, the rule of his actions; which ſpread a general diſcontent among his ſubjects, and encouraged their leaders, from different motives, to riſe in defence of thoſe privileges they derived from their anceſtors. However, one truth may be drawn by way of inference, which ought ever to be thankfully acknowledged as a divine mercy by every Engliſh Proteſtant, that the people of this country have derived the moſt valuable bleſſings from their weakeſt ſovereigns. The envied liberties we now enjoy, are owing chiefly to the glorious ſtruggles of our forefathers in this and ſome ſucceeding reigns. The devotion of Henry III. has been highly extolled by ſome writers; upon what good ground we do not pretend to ſay. Being once engaged in a diſpute with Lewis of France, concerning the preference between ſermons and maſſes, he replied, in anſwer to what was urged in favour of the former, "I had rather have one hour's converſation with a friend, than hear twenty elaborate diſcourſes pronounced in his praiſe." We ſhall finiſh this picture with obſerving, that his ſlender talents and natural propenſities would have ſecured him that happineſs in a lower ſtation, of which thev deprived him when ſeated upon a throne.

EDWARD I.

Edward returns from Paleſtine, where he had performed ſeveral important actions—Is crowned in England with great pomp—His firſt acts of civil government—His military exploits, whereby Wales is ſubjected to the crown of England—Is umpire between Bruce and Baliol, two competitors for the crown of Scotland, and decides in favour of the latter—Reduces Scotland to the form of an Engliſh province—Engages in a war with France, and afterwards with Scotland—Raiſes money by ſeveral illegal means—Is forced to ſign the two charters—Obtains a bull from the pope, to abſolve him from his oath to obſerve them; and afterwards finally eſtabliſhes the ſame without compulſion—Diſputes between him and France referred to the pope—The Scots, headed by Wallace, again revolt—They are again ſubdued, and Wallace ſuffers as a traitor—A third attempt of the Scots to recover their liberty under Robert Bruce, who is put to flight—Death, family, and character of Edward.

A. D. 1272. EDWARD, ſurnamed Longſhanks, at the time of his father's death, was engaged in the holy wars. The Saracens were preparing to beſiege the city of Acon in Paleſtine, when the prince arrived to the relief of the place; and purſuing the enemy, obtained ſeveral ſplendid, though not deciſive victories over them. The rapid ſucceſs of his arms at length ſtruck the infidels with terror, and determined them to attempt the deſtruction of an intrepid warrior, againſt whom they deſpaired of maintaining a ſucceſsful oppoſition in the field. One of the followers of the Old Man of the Mountain, who were then called Aſſaſſins, having procured admittance to the prince, under colour of carrying on a negotiation, he took an opportunity when no one was in the room but Edward and himſelf, to aim a dagger at his breaſt. Edward, however, warded off the blow, though in ſo doing he was wounded in the arm; and perceiving the infidel about making a ſecond attempt, he ſtruck him ſo forcibly with his foot that he threw him on the ground; and then wreſting the dagger from his hand, he inſtantly plunged it in the barbarian's heart. But the wound Edward had received ſoon exhibited alarming ſymptoms, it having been given by a poiſoned weapon. The prince made his will, and waited the approach of death with a degree of compoſure truly heroic. But an Engliſh ſurgeon who attended him, upon the appearance of a mortification, tification, by making deep inciſions, and cutting away the mortified fleſh where he judged it to be neceſſary, reſtored his patient to perfect health in about fourteen days.

Some ſhort time after his recovery, Edward, convinced that it would be impoſſible with his handful of men to oppoſe, with any hopes of ſucceſs, the numerous armies of the Saracens, liſtened to the offers of peace tendered him by the ſultan of Babylon, with whom he concluded a peace for ten years, ten months, and ten days. After having ſigned this treaty, he embarked the remains of his little army, and paſſed over to Sicily. Here he received the news of his father's death. The ſorrow he expreſſed on that occaſion, demonſtrated at once his tenderneſs and filial affection. Advice arrived a few days after of the death of his infant ſon, who died at Acon in Paleſtine. This loſs, however, affected him much leſs than the former; and the king of Sicily expreſſing a ſurpriſe at this difference of ſentiment, Edward told him, that the loſs of a ſon he might hope to repair, but that of a father was irreparable.

In the mean time, the Engliſh nobility, immediately on the death of Henry, apprehending danger from delay, repaired to the high altar at Weſtminſter, where they ſwore allegiance to prince Edward; and then ſummoned a parliament to provide for the ſafety of the kingdom. The government was veſted in the hands of Walter Giffard, archbiſhop of York; the earl of Cornwall, ſon of Richard, king of the Romans; and Gilbert de Clare, earl of Glouceſter. Theſe guardians of the realm entered upon their high office, without being diſturbed with oppoſition from the people, or faction among themſelves. The military genius of Edward, his ſucceſs in ſubduing the inſurgents, his moderation in ſettling the kingdom, had procured him great eſteem, blended with affection, among all orders of men. The higheſt opinion was entertained of his merit; and all ranks among the people wiſhed earneſtly to ſee him on the throne of England.

A. D. 1273. As ſoon as Edward had paid the tribute of grief to the memory of his much lamented parent, he ſet out for England; and paſſing through Chalons in Burgundy, he was invited by the prince of that country to ſhew his dexterity at a tournament he was then preparing to celebrate. Edward, who excelled in thoſe martial exerciſes, did not decline the opportunity of diſtinguiſhing himſelf in that great aſſembly of nobles. But the engagement became a ſerious affair. Edward ſignalized his courage and addreſs in arms. The glory he acquired excited envy. Foiled in every attempt, the French knights were exaſperated, and made a furious attack upon the Engliſh. The French were, however, repulſed; yet not without a conſiderable effuſion of blood. This rencounter obtained the name of the Little Battle of Chalons. From Chalons, Edward proceeded to Paris, where he did homage to Philip for the dominions he held in France. From thence he marched to Guienne, and reſtored tranquillity to that province, which had for ſome time been in a diſtracted ſtate.

A. D. 1274. Affairs being now ſettled on the continent, he paſſed over into England, where he was received with the moſt joyful acclamations by his ſubjects, and ſolemnly crowned with a ſplendid magnificence at Weſtminſter, on the nineteenth of Auguſt, by Robert, archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the preſence of Alexander III. king of Scotland, the duke of Brittany, and all the Engliſh peers.

Edward began his reign with correcting thoſe diſorders which his father's looſe adminiſtration had introduced into all parts of the kingdom. He reſolved to diminiſh the power of the great, and to give protection to the inferior orders of the ſtate, by an exact diſtribution of juſtice, and a rigid execution of the laws. He cauſed ſeveral uſeful ſtatutes to be enacted, in a parliament held at Weſtminſter. He made ſtrict inquiries into the conduct of all the judges, and inferior magiſtrates, and diſplaced ſuch as were negligent or corrupt. Thus introducing juſtice and order in the room of oppreſſion and violence. The adulteration of the coin was one of the various diſorders to which the nation was ſubject, and the imputation of this crime fell upon the Jews; two hundred and eighty of whom were hanged in London alone, beſides thoſe who ſuffered in the other parts of the kingdom. By bribing the king's council in the latter end of the late reign, the Jews had been admitted to almoſt all the privileges of denizens. They purchaſed houſes, lands, and manors. Theſe, with the goods of great numbers of them were confiſcated and ſold. To prevent its being ſuſpected, that the guilt of the ſufferers chiefly conſiſted in their wealth, the king ordered a moiety of the money thus raiſed, to be diſtributed among ſuch as were willing to be converted to Chriſtianity; but very few of them were induced by this golden bribe to ſacrifice the religion of their fathers. Some time after, Edward, prompted by rapacity, reſolved to free the land entirely of that hated race, and with one graſp to ſeize all that belonged to them. He left them only money ſufficient to bear their expences into foreign countries: but the inhabitants of the cinque ports, filled with the avidity of their ſovereign, robbed them of this ſmall pittance, and even threw many of them into the ſea: a crime for which the king, who would be the ſole plunderer in his dominions, inflicted on them a capital puniſhment. It is ſaid, that no leſs than fifteen thouſand Jews were at this time ſtripped of their effects and baniſhed. The extreme exigences of the ſtate, in conjunction with the poverty of the crown, was probably the cauſe of this egregious tyranny exerciſed againſt the Jews. An evil which Edward alſo endeavoured to remove by more honourable expedients. He introduced a ſtrict frugality in the management of his revenue: he prevailed on his parliament to grant him a fifteenth of all moveables: he obtained from the pope a grant of the tenth of all eccleſiaſtical revenues for three years: he engaged the merchants to conſent to a perpetual tax of half a mark on every three hundred ſkins: he likewiſe iſſued commiſſions to ſearch into all encroachments on the royal demeſne. The commiſſioners, in the execution of their office, began to carry matters too far againſt the barons, by calling in queſtion titles to eſtates, which for ſeveral generations had deſcended from father to ſon. Earl Warrenne, a nobleman who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the royal cauſe during the late reign, being deſired to ſhew his title deeds, he drew his ſword, ſaying, that William the Baſtard had not conquered the kingdom for himſelf alone; that his anceſtor was a joint adventurer in the enterprize, and he was reſolved to maintain what had from that time remained unqueſtioned in his family. Edward, ſenſible of the danger of proceeding too far, very prudently deſiſted from making further inquiries of that kind.

A. D. 1276. The king now undertook an enterprize more ſuited to his active diſpoſition. Llewellin, prince of Wales, had, during the late reign, employed every expedient to promote the ſucceſs of the barons. Being at preſent cloſely connected with the Montford family, he refuſed to repair to the court of Edward and to pay him homage. The haughty ſpirit of the Engliſh monarch could not brook ſuch an inſult, and he determined to reduce to obedience this refractory vaſſal.

Llewellin kept up a ſecret correſpondence with his former friends, and in order to ſtrengthen his intereſt with them, paid his addreſſes to Eleanor, a daughter of the late earl of Leiceſter. The young lady, who was at France, where ſhe had taken refuge on the death of her father, embarked for Wales, under the care of her brother Aumeri; but being detained in her paſſage near the iſles of Scilly, the betrothed princeſs was ſent to the court of Edward, where ſhe was detained a priſoner of ſtate; but her brother was committed to Corf-Caſtle. Soon after, deputies arrived from Llewellin, offering to ranſom the princeſs, whom he aſſerted to be detained in violation of the law of nations. But Edward refuſed to ſet Eleanor at liberty, unleſs Llewellin would engage to make reparation for all devaſtations committed by him on the coaſt of England, and reſtore all the caſtles he had taken. Llewellin refuſed the conditions, and hoſtilities immediately commenced between them; but the operations of the firſt campaign were of little conſequence, neither Edward nor Llewellin heading their troops in perſon.

A. D. 1277. On the approach of ſummer, Edward led his army into Wales. As there was no proportion between the forces of Edward and thoſe of the Welſh, the latter retired to thoſe inacceſſible mountains, which had hitherto, during many ages, defended his predeceſſors againſt all the attempts of the Saxon and Norman conquerors; and he accordingly retreated to the hills of Snowden, determined to defend himſelf to the laſt extremity. But Edward, equally cautious as brave, entering by the North with a formidable army, penetrated into the heart of the country; and having carefully explored every road in his rout, and ſecured every paſs, approached the Welſh army in its laſt retreat. Deſtitute of magazines, cooped up in a narrow corner, both they and their cattle were expoſed to all the horrid attacks of famine; and Llewellin, without being able to make one effort for his independence, was at laſt obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion, and receive the terms impoſed on him by the victor. He bound himſelf to pay fifty thouſand pounds as a compenſation for damages; to do homage to the crown of England, in which all the barons of Wales, except four near Snowden, were to join; to relinquiſh the country between Cheſhire and the river Conway; to ſettle on his brother Roderic a thouſand marks a year, and five hundred on David; and to deliver ten hoſtages for ſecurity of his future ſubmiſſion. On Llewellin's performing the other articles, Edward remitted the payment of the fifty thouſand pounds, which, from the poverty of the country, he was probably unable to raiſe. Complaints however ſoon aroſe on the ſide of the vanquiſhed; their conquerors, inſolent on obtaining ſo eaſy a victory, oppreſſed the inhabitants of the diſtricts that were yielded to them: the lords of the Marches committed with impunity all kinds of violence on their Welſh neighbours; new and ſevere terms were impoſed on Llewellin; and Edward, when that prince attended him at Worceſter, exacted a promiſe, that he ſhould retain no perſon in his principality who might be diſagreeable to the Engliſh monarch: beſides theſe, other inſults were offered both to the Welſh and their prince, which raiſed their indignation, and made them determine rather to encounter every danger, than to ſubmit to ſuch oppreſſions. David alſo, Llewellin's brother, perceiving the abject ſtate to which his country was reduced, made peace with his brother, and promiſed to concur with him in defending the public liberty. Exaſperated at the unjuſt treatment of their haughty victors, the Welſh flew to arms, and Edward, not diſpleaſed with an opportunity of rendering his conqueſt abſolute, ſummoned all his military tenants, and advanced into Wales, with an army much too powerful to allow them any reaſonable hopes of conqueſt.

At firſt the Welſh, from the ſituation of their country, gained ſome advantages over Luke de Tony, one of Edward's captains, who with a detachment had paſſed the Menaw; but ſoon after Llewellin had the misfortune to be ſurpriſed by Mortimer, when a battle enſuing he was ſlain, with two thouſand of his men. His head, together with the news of the victory, were ſent to the king. We could wiſh for the credit of the Engliſh to omit recording, that Edward ordered the head to be ſent to London, where, with all the brutiſh inſolence of national rancour, it was conveyed as a pageant through the ſtreets, and at laſt crowned with a ſilver circle, in contempt of a prophetical tradition, which ſaid, that Llewellin's head ſhould ride down Cheapſide, encircled with a ſilver diadem. It was next placed upon a pillory, from whence it was conveyed to the Tower of London, crowned with ivy, in ridicule of the prophecy, which ſaid the crown of Brute ſhould be worn by Llewellin.

A. D. 1283. David, who ſucceeded him in the principality, was never able to collect an army ſufficient to face the Engliſh: he was chaſed from mountain to mountain; hunted from one retreat to another; obliged to uſe various diſguiſes in order to conceal himſelf; and was at laſt diſcovered in his lurking-place, having been betrayed by ſome of his domeſtics. About the end of the ſummer he was brought priſoner to Rothland-Caſtle, where the Engliſh monarch then reſided. Upon this occaſion Edward behaved with a cruelty that has ſtained his character. He ſent him to Shrewſbury in chains, brought him to trial before the peers of England, and cauſed this ſovereign prince, for defending by arms his own hereditary authority, and the liberty of his country, to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, as a traitor.

The Welſh, after this unjuſtifiable execution, made no further efforts to ſupport the fallen ſtate of their liberty. The nobility delivered up their caſtles, and the whole country was annexed to the crown of England. It is glorious for the memories of this brave people, that after ſo long a ſtruggle for freedom, they fell into dependence indeed, but not into ſlavery, and that their dependence bears rather the appearance of union with friends equally tenacious of freedom with themſelves. Edward now having ſettled the government of Wales, divided part of its lands among his barons. He ſent Rhees ap Vaughn, who had ſurrendered, a priſoner to the Tower; and built two caſtles, one at Aberconway, and another at Caernarvon. In order to reconcile the Welſh to his government, he left his queen, when near her time, in the caſtle of Caernarvon, where ſhe was delivered. Upon which event, having aſſembled the Welſh, he promiſed to give them a prince of unexceptionable character; a Welſhman by birth, and one who could ſpeak no other language. Having teſtified their joy with loud acclamations, the infant was produced, and inveſted in preſence of the people with the principality of Wales. Edward's eldeſt ſon, Alfonſo, dying ſoon after, the infant, prince Edward, became heir to the crown of England, and from this time Wales gave a title to the eldeſt ſon of the Britiſh kings.

A. D. 1286. The whole kingdom, after the ſettlement of Wales, being rendered completely tranquil, Edward paſſed over to the continent, in order to make peace between Alphonſo, king of Arragon, and Philip the Fair, who had lately ſucceeded his father, Philip the Hardy, in the poſſeſſion of the crown of France. He continued abroad about three years, and during the greater part of the time was employed in ſettling this intricate negotiation, tiation, which was at laſt happily terminated by the labours of the Engliſh monarch, whoſe virtues were revered in every part of Europe. On his return to England, he found that during his abſence many diſorders had prevailed from the corruption of the judges. In order to remedy thoſe abuſes, the king ſummoned a parliament, and brought them to a trial. Two only were found innocent. The proofs againſt the reſt were ſo clear, that they were all depoſed, and fined in large ſums to the amount of one hundred thouſand marks. The two judges, who were found on the ſtricteſt examination innocent, were John de Martingham, and Elias de Bokingham, both clergymen. While Edward was thus employed in regulating the diſorders that had crept into the ſtate, he loſt his beloved queen Eleanor, the fond partner of all his diſtreſſes in Paleſtine. She died at Hodeſby, in Lincolnſhire, on the twenty-ninth of November, leaving the king overwhelmed with the moſt poignant ſorrow. Her remains were carried to Weſtminſter, and interred with great funeral pomp. At every place where her body reſted, and where dirges were ſung for her ſoul, Edward cauſed ſtone croſſes, on which her arms were engraven, to be erected to her memory. Some of theſe, though greatly defaced, are ſtill remaining.

A. D. 1290. It will be neceſſary, as the affairs of Scotland form a very intereſting part in the tranſactions of this and ſome following reigns, to give here a conciſe account of the ſtate of that kingdom at this time.

In 1286 died Alexander III. who had married the ſiſter of Edward, by a fall from his horſe, at Kinghorn, without leaving any male iſſue, or any other deſcendant than Margaret, daughter of Eric, king of Norway, married to Margaret, daughter of Alexander, king of Scotland. This princeſs, who was commonly called the maid of Norway, though a female, an infant, and a foreigner, had through her grandfather's care, been acknowledged ſucceſſor by the ſtates of Scotland; and on the death of Alexander, the ſteps which had been previouſly taken appeared ſo juſt and prudent, that ſhe was acknowledged queen of Scotland, without any of thoſe diſorders in the kingdom, that might naturally have been apprehended to enſue. The biſhops of St. Andrew's and Glaſgow, the earls of Fife and Buchan, and James, ſteward of Scotland, who were appointed her guardians, entered peaceably on the adminiſtration; and the infant princeſs, under the protection of Edward, her great uncle, and Eric her father, who exerted themſelves on this occaſion, was firmly ſeated on the throne of Scotland. This event ſeemed of the utmoſt importance to Edward, who built upon it a project of uniting in his ſon, the whole iſland into one monarchy. To promote this great end, he intended a marriage between Margaret and the prince of Wales, his eldeſt ſon. The friendſhip which had for ſome years prevailed between the two nations, greatly facilitated this ſcheme, which appeared ſo favourable to the grandeur and happineſs of both kingdoms; and the ſtates of Scotland readily conſented, that their young queen ſhould be educated in Edward's court. Jealous however of the liberty and independency of their country, they took care, before they threw themſelves into the arms of ſo powerful a monarch, to ſtipulate the following conditions.

I. That the Scots ſhall enjoy all their privileges and immunities both eccleſiaſtical and civil; ſaving the rights of the king of England, or any other perſon on the Marches, or elſewhere.

II. That if Edward and Margaret ſhould die without iſſue of the body of Margaret, the kingdom ſhall revert, entire, free, abſolute, and independent, to the next immediate heir.

III. That in caſe of the death of prince Edward, without iſſue of the body of Margaret, her majeſty's perſon ſhall be remitted in like manner free and independent to Scotland.

IV. That no perſon, either of the clergy, or laity, ſhall be compelled to go out of the kingdom, to aſk leave to elect, or preſent thoſe they have elected; nor to do their homage, fealty, and ſervices; nor to proſecute law ſuits; nor in a word to perform any thing uſually done in Scotland.

V. That the kingdom of Scotland ſhall have its chancellor, officers of ſtate, courts of judicature, as before; and that a new ſeal ſhall be made and kept by the chancellor; but with the ordinary arms of Scotland, and the name of none but the queen of Scotland engraved upon it.

VI. That all the papers, records, privileges, and other documents of the royal dignity of the crown and kingdom of Scotland, ſhall be lodged in ſome ſecure place within the kingdom, at the pleaſure of the nobility, whoſe ſeals ſhall be appended to them, and there kept, till either the queen ſhall return to her own kingdom, or ſhall have heirs to ſucceed her.

VII. That all parliaments, when called to treat of matters concerning the ſtate or inhabitants of Scotland, ſhall be held within the limits of the kingdom.

VIII. That no duties, taxes, levies of men, &c. ſhall be exacted in Scotland, but ſuch as being uſual in former times, ſhall conſiſt with the common intereſt and good of the nation.

IX. That the king of England ſhall oblige himſelf and his heirs, in a bond of one hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, payable to the church of Rome, and to be applied to the ſupport of the cruſades in the Holy Land, to make reſtitution of the kingdom in the caſes aforeſaid; and that he ſhall conſent that the pope reſtrain him and his heirs, by excommunicating them, and interdicting their kingdom, to both the above reſtrictions, and payment of the ſaid ſum of money, if he or they do not ſtand to the premiſes.

X. That Edward, at his own expence, ſhall procure the pope to confirm theſe articles, within a year after the conſummation of the marriage; and alſo that within the ſame time, the bull of his holineſs ſhall be delivered to the eſtates of the kingdom of Scotland.

No two nations could have treated more on a footing of equality, than Scotland and England maintained, during the whole courſe of this tranſaction; and notwithſtanding Edward gave his aſſent to the article, reſpecting the future independency of the Scottiſh crown, with "a ſaving of his rights;" this reſerve gave no alarm to the nobility of Scotland, becauſe thoſe rights having been hitherto little heard of, had occaſioned no diſturbance, and becauſe the Scots had ſo near a proſpect of ſeeing them entirely abſorbed in the right of their ſovereignty.

A. D. 1291. When the above articles were ratified, the biſhop of Durham was appointed the queen's lieutenant in Scotland; and the earl of Warrenne, with the dean of York, two Scottiſh commiſſioners, embarked for Norway. In their return with the young princeſs, they were unfortunately overtaken by a dreadful ſtorm, and driven into an Iſle of the Orkneys, where ſhe died. Thus were all the hopes formed on this coalition fruſtrated, and Scotland involved in all the calamities which a diſputed ſucceſſion produces.

Robert Bruce and John Baliol, both deſcended in the female line from the brother of that William who had been taken priſoner by Henry II. were the principal competitors for the Scottiſh crown. Bruce was the ſon of one of the youngeſt daughters of the earl of Huntingdon, William's brother; and Baliol was the ſon of Devergilda, the only daughter of the eldeſt. The former was therefore one degree nearer the common ſtock; but the latter had a preferable title, according to the law of primogeniture. The Scots, who were at this time a groſs and ignorant people, were little qualified to diſcuſs the claims of theſe competitors. The parliament was divided; and if they had determined the diſpute by a plurality of voices, the competitors were ſo powerful, that there were little hopes of a ſubmiſſion to their deciſion; the animoſities of the parties would in all probability have been heightened, and the nation plunged into all the horrors of a civil war. It was therefore reſolved to refer the conteſt to the king of England, who had already ſhewn himſelf an able and impartial arbitrator in contentions between different princes of Europe, and was ſufficiently powerful to compel the unſucceſsful claimant to ſubmit to his ſentence. The claimants were now reduced to three, John Baliol, Robert Bruce, and John Haſtings; and their contentions made way for the execution of Edward's deſigns; who having his ambition fired, reſolved to lay hold of the preſent favourable opportunity of reviving the claims of the kings of England, to a feudal ſuperiority over Scotland, imagining that if this pretenſion was once ſubmitted to, the abſolute ſovereignty of that kingdom would ſoon follow. Edward pretended to act with the moſt cautious circumſpection in this buſineſs. He had taken a previous reſolution, yet, with a ſpecies of conſummate policy and artifice, he directed that proper inquiries ſhould be made into the validity of each claim, which might enable him to form a judgment on the queſtion: but to enforce his own proofs, he marched towards the borders of Scotland with a powerful army, and ſummoned the barons of that kingdom to meet him at Norham-Caſtle, ſituated on the ſouthern banks of the Tweed.

Though the barons were in the higheſt degree alarmed and diſguſted on receiving this ſummons, yet they did not think it would be prudent to diſpute the matter with a prince of Edward's power. They therefore met him at the time and place appointed, where he produced what he called his proofs of his own claims, in preference to thoſe of any other of the candidates; which grounds of his pretended ſuperiority, he had extracted from numerous records, kept in monaſteries down from the time of Edward the Elder. The Scotch parliament were ſo confounded at a claim of which they had hitherto formed no idea, and which they conceived to be founded in manifeſt injuſtice, that they remained ſilent. Their ſilence the king interpreted into a conſent to the legality of his demand; and having declared that he acted as ſovereign lord of Scotland, he addreſſed himſelf to the ſeveral competitors for the crown, demanding that they ſhould acknowledge his juſt claim. All the claimants over-awed by his preſence, and influenced by the fear of his power, behaved with the greateſt obſequiouſneſs. Robert Bruce was the firſt who recogniſed his right of ſuperiority over Scotland, and the reſt, when required, made a like acknowledgment with ſeeming willingneſs, though Baliol was the laſt who gave his aſſent. This being done, Edward gave orders, that Baliol, with thoſe who adhered to him, ſhould chooſe forty commiſſioners, and Bruce, with his adherents, forty more. The king added twenty-four Engliſhmen to theſe, and then directed theſe hundred and four commiſſioners to examine the cauſe, and make the report to him, promiſing to give his determination in the following year. At the ſame time he pretended, that it was neceſſary to have all the fortreſſes of Scotland put into his poſſeſſion, alleging, how vain it would be for him to pronounce any ſentence, without having power to enforce it. The demand was complied with both by the parliament and the claimants, and Edward returned to England.

A. D. 1292.

The titles of Baliol and Robert Bruce, whoſe claims appeared to be beſt founded among the competitors to the crown of Scotland (the number of whom ſome writers have aſſerted to have been twelve) were the ſubject of general diſquiſition, as well as of debate among the commiſſioners. The queſtion was ſimply this,

"Whether Baliol, who was deſcended from the eldeſt ſiſter, but further removed by one degree, was to be preferred before Bruce, who was actually the younger ſiſter's ſon?"

The ſentiments of the people of that age were much the ſame, reſpecting right of inheritance, as prevail at the preſent period throughout the greater part of Europe; ſo that the commiſſioners appointed to examine into this buſineſs, concurred in opinion with the moſt able lawyers, that the claim of Baliol was better founded than that of his competitors; on which Edward determined in favour of Baliol, and he was put in poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Scotland, and all its fortreſſes, which had before been ſurrendered to the king of England, to whom the new Scotch king ſwore allegiance and did homage.

Scarcely was the new king of Scotland ſeated on his throne, when he found, that he was more a vaſſal than a ſovereign; for Edward inſtead of exerting his rights of ſuperiority with moderation, encouraged all appeals to England; ſhewing hereby his determination of ſtretching his royal perogative to its utmoſt extent, and to enforce his whole authority at once, inſtead of reducing the Scotch to the Engliſh yoke by gentle gradations. He obliged Baliol himſelf, by ſix different ſummonſes, on trifling occaſions, to repair to London; denied him the privilege of defending his own cauſe by a procurator; and compelled him, as if he had been a private perſon, to appear at the bar of his parliament. By this treatment, Edward plainly intended to excite Baliol to take up arms againſt him, in order that he might ſeize upon his kingdom, under the colour of puniſhing him for his treaſon. The artifice in part ſucceeded; for Baliol, though a prince of gentle diſpoſition, was ſo highly incenſed, that he reſolved on his return to Scotland, at all hazards to free himſelf from the bondage under which he groaned, and a war ſoon after breaking out between England and France, he took that opportunity of attempting a recovery of his freedom.

A. D. 1293.

About this time an Engliſh and Norman ſhip met off the coaſt, near Bayonne, and both of them wanting water, their boats went to land, and the crews of each coming at the ſame time to the ſame ſpring, a quarrel aroſe about who ſhould have the water firſt. A Norman attempted to ſtab with his dagger an Engliſhman, who grappled with him and threw him down, when falling, as it is ſaid, on his own dagger, he was ſlain. Trifling as this ſcuffle may appear with reſpect to England and Normandy, it was ſufficient to kindle a bloody war, and involve a great part of Europe in the quarrel; for the Norman mariners carried their complaints to the French court, when Philip, without inquiring into the fact, or demanding redreſs, ordered them to take their revenge, and not trouble him any more about it. The Normans, thus encouraged, ſeized an Engliſh ſhip, and hanging ſeveral of the crew along with ſome dogs on the yard arm, in the preſence of their companions, diſmiſſed the veſſel, and told the mariners they might inform their countrymen, that vengeance was now taken for the blood of the Norman killed at Bayonne. When the news of this barbarous act, accompanied with ſuch deliberate inſult, reached the cinque ports, their mariners, highly enraged, without complaining to the king, retaliated in like manner upon all French veſſels without out diſtinction. On the other hand, the French attacked, in return, the ſhips of all Edward's ſubjects, either Engliſh or Gaſcon, while the ſovereigns taking no notice, ſeemed to continue indifferent ſpectators. The Engliſh entered into private aſſociations with the Iriſh and Dutch ſailors; the French with the Flemiſh and Genoeſe. The animoſity on both ſides becoming daily more violent and barbarous, a Norman fleet of two hundred ſail, ſteering to the ſouth for wine and other commodities, ſeized all the Engliſh ſhips they met with in their paſſage, plundered them of their cargoes, and hanged the ſeamen. The inhabitants of the Engliſh ſea-ports no ſooner heard this, than they fitted out a fleet of ſixty ſail, ſtronger and better manned, and waiting for the return of the enemy, ſunk, deſtroyed, or took the greateſt part of them. No quarter was given; and the Norman fleet being employed in tranſporting a conſiderable body of ſoldiers from the ſouth, the French are ſaid to have loſt on this occaſion twenty thouſand men. Philip the Fair now diſpatched an envoy to demand reparation, and Edward ſent to Philip the biſhop of London, to accommodate the quarrel; but the French being loſers, refuſed all the expedients that were offered; in conſequence of which the ſhips and cargoes of the merchants on both ſides were confiſcated; the Engliſh continued their depredations in the channel, and the Gaſcons on the weſtern coaſt of France. Philip cited Edward, as duke of Guienne, to appear in his court at Paris; and Edward ſent thither his brother Edmund, earl of Lancaſter, to prevent, if poſſible, the ravages of a bloody war. Jane, and Mary the queen dowager of France, pretended to interpoſe their good offices, telling Edmund, that the moſt difficult circumſtance to adjuſt, was the point of honour with Philip, he being affronted with the injuries committed againſt him, by his ſub-vaſſals in Guienne; but if the king of England would conſent to give him Seiſin and poſſeſſion of that province, he would eſteem his honour fully repaired, would engage to reſtore Guienne immediately, and be eaſily ſatisfied with reſpect to all other injuries. Edward was conſulted, who conſidering his deſign upon the Scots as a more important concern, and indulging his favourite paſſion for ſubduing that people, ſuffered himſelf to be deceived by ſo barefaced an artifice: he therefore ſent orders to his brother, to conclude and ſign a treaty with the two queens: Philip ſolemnly promiſed to execute his part of it; and recalled the citation, for the king's appearance in the court of France; but no ſooner was the French monarch in poſſeſſion of Guienne, than the citation was renewed; upon which Edward was condemned for non-appearance, and by a ſentence in form, Guienne was declared to be forfeited, and annexed to the crown of France.

So completely over-reached, Edward was equally aſhamed and enraged; having fallen into a ſnare, not unlike that he had ſpread for the unwary Scots. Senſible of the difficulty of recovering Guienne, where he had not kept a ſingle place in his hands, he endeavoured to compenſate for that loſs, by forming alliances with ſeveral European princes, who were to attack France on different ſides, and thus divide the forces of that kingdom. With this view he entered into a treaty with Adolphus of Naſſau, king of the Romans, Amadæus, count of Savoy, the archbiſhop of Cologne, the counts of Luxemburgh and Guelders, the duke of Brabant and count of Barre, who had married his two daughters Margaret and Eleanor: but theſe alliances proved extremely burdenſome, and of no ſervice. In the mean time, Philip took advantage of the growing jealouſy which ſubſiſted among the ſeveral powers of Europe, of Edward's greatneſs. He formed a ſecret alliance with John Baliol, king of Scotland; whereby that ſtrict union commenced, which, during many ages, was maintained by mutual intereſts and neceſſities, between the French and Scottiſh nations. Baliol confirmed this alliance by ſtipulating a marriage between his eldeſt ſon, and the daughter of Philip de Valois.

A. D. 1296.

The king knew well the difficulties of raiſing money on his ſubjects without their conſent, and therefore purſued the method pointed out by Leiceſter during the late reign. He ſummoned two deputies from every borough, in order to procure their leave to the levying of the neceſſary taxes on the people. "It is an excellent rule," ſaid Edward, in the preamble of his writ, "that what concerns all, ſhould be approved by all." A ſentiment worthy the conſideration of a Houſe of Commons in this more enlightened age. Nor did Edward ſtop here. He ſummoned alſo deputies from the inferior clergy, and theſe formed a lower houſe of convocation. They however refuſed to obey the king's writ, leſt it ſhould be conſtrued as an acknowledgment of their having ſubmitted to the authority of the temporal power. It was therefore agreed, that the king ſhould iſſue his writ to archbiſhops, who ſhould in conſequence ſummon the clergy. The king intended theſe deputies with the prelates, to have formed one eſtate of the kingdom; but this expedient rendered it neceſſary for the eccleſiaſtics to meet in two houſes of convocation, under their reſpective archbiſhops. The Engliſh parliament, for they might juſtly be now ſo called, being met, the barons and knights granted the king an eleventh of their moveables, the burgeſſes, a ſeventh, and the clergy, a tenth. Edward employed theſe ſupplies in making preparations againſt his northern neighbour. About this time he received intelligence of the treaty between Philip and Baliol; and though vexed at this concurrence of a French and Scottiſh war, he reſolved not to encourage his enemies by a puſillanimous behaviour, or by ſubmitting to their united efforts, without any vigorous exertions on his part. He therefore ſummoned Baliol to perform the duty of a vaſſal, and to ſend him a ſupply of forces againſt an invaſion from France, with which he was threatened. He next required that the fortreſſes of Berwick, Jedborough, and Roxborough, ſhould be put into his hands as a ſecurity during the war. He again cited Baliol to appear in an Engliſh parliament, ſummoned to meet at Newcaſtle; and when none of theſe ſucceſſive demands were complied with, he marched northward at the head of a powerful army, conſiſting of thirty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe. The Scottiſh nobility, who had very little reliance on the ſpirit and vigour of their prince, aſſigned him a council of twelve noblemen, in whoſe hands the ſovereignty was lodged; and who put the kingdom in the beſt poſture of defence the preſent diſtractions would admit. The Scotch army was more numerous than that of Edward's, being compoſed of forty thouſand infantry, and five hundred horſe, but they wanted both diſcipline and experience; and what was ſtill of more conſequence, diſſentions prevailed among the leaders. From theſe alarming appearances, ſeveral of the Scottiſh nobility, among whom were Robert Bruce, father and ſon, the earls of March and Angus, prognoſticated the ruin of their country, and made their ſubmiſſion to Edward, who now paſſed the Tweed at Coldſtream without oppoſition. Berwick was taken by aſſault, and above ſeven thouſand of the garriſon put to the ſword; the governor, Sir William Douglas was taken priſoner. Earl Warrenne was then diſpatched, at the head of ten thouſand men, to beſiege the caſtle of Dunbar, in defence of which the flower of the Scottiſh nobility ſtood up.

Senſible of the importance of this place, which, if taken, muſt lay their whole country open to the enemy, the Scots advanced with their main body, under the command of the earls of Buchan, Lenox, and Mar, in order to relieve it. Warrenne, not diſmayed by the great ſuperiority of the enemy, marched out to give them battle. The Scots could not ſupport the furious charge of the Engliſh: they were ſoon broke, and driven with great ſlaughter from the field. Above twenty thouſand are ſaid to have fallen by the ſwords of the Engliſh. Dunbar ſurrendered the next day to Edward, who then brought up the main body of his army, and purſued his conqueſts without any further oppoſition from Baliol's army. The caſtles of Roxborough, Edinburgh, and Sterling, ſubmitted after a feeble reſiſtance; and all the ſouthern parts of the kingdom were ſoon brought under ſubjection to the Engliſh. And in order to reduce with more facility the northern diviſions, whoſe inacceſſible ſituation ſeemed to promiſe more ſecurity, Edward ordered a ſtrong reinforcement of Welch and Iriſh, who being accuſtomed to a deſultory kind of war, were better qualified to purſue the Scots into the receſſes of their lakes and mountains. But the ſpirit of the nation was already broke by their misfortunes, and the timid Baliol, diſcontented with his own ſubjects, abandoned all thoſe reſources, which his people might yet have poſſeſſed in their extremity. He haſtened to make his ſubmiſſion to Edward, expreſſing the deepeſt ſenſe of his diſloyalty to his liege lord, and made a ſolemn and irrevocable reſignation of his crown into the hands of that monarch. Edward now marched northward towards Aberdeen and Elgin, without meeting an enemy. No Scotchman approached him, but to pay him ſubmiſſion and homage: even the turbulent highlanders, ever refractory to their own princes, endeavoured to give him early proofs of their obedience: and Edward having brought the whole kingdom to a ſeeming ſtate of tranquillity, returned to the ſouth with his army. There was at this time in the abbey of Scone, a famous ſtone, on which the kings of Scotland uſed to be ſeated during the ceremony of inauguration, and which was called by the vulgar, Jacob's pillow. Upon it are engraved the following Latin verſes:

Ni fallat fatum, Scoti hunc quocunq; locatum,
Invenient lapidem, regnare tenentur ibidem.

Tranſlation:

If truth there be in what old prophets ſay,
Where'er this ſtone is found, the Scots ſhall ſway.

The king having got this palladium of Scotland, to which popular ſuperſtition paid the higheſt veneration, into his poſſeſſion, he ordered it to be placed on a chair in the abbey of Weſtminſter, where it remains to the preſent day. At the ſame time he deſtroyed all thoſe records and monuments of antiquity, which might preſerve the memory of the independency of the kingdom, and refute the Engliſh claim of ſuperiority. The great ſeal of Baliol was broke, and that prince carried priſoner to London, and committed to cloſe cuſtody in the Tower. Two years afterwards he ſubmitted to a voluntary baniſhment into France, where, without making any further attempts for the recovery of his throne, he died in a private ſtation. Earl Warrenne was left governor of Scotland; Engliſhmen were appointed to all the chief places of truſt; and Edward, with his victorious army returned to England, flattering himſelf that he had attained the completion of his wiſhes, by the final reduction of Scotland.

Edward's ambitious ſpirit could not reſt ſatisfied even with ſuch a conſiderable acceſſion of power. He was mortified at finding his attempt to recover Guienne had not been equally ſucceſsful. He had ſent thither his brother, the earl of Lancaſter, with an army of ſeven thouſand men, who at firſt gained ſome advantages over the French at Bourdeaux; but being ſeized with a diſtemper, he died at Bayonne; and the command devolved on the earl of Lincoln, who was unable during the reſt of the campaign, to perform any thing worthy of notice. Edward finding the diſtance of Guienne rendered all his efforts againſt that province feeble and uncertain, reſolved to attack France in a more vulnerable quarter; and with this intent he married Elizabeth, his daughter, to John, earl of Holland; at the ſame time he entered into an alliance with Guy, earl of Flanders, ſtipulating to pay the ſum of twenty-five thouſand pounds, and propoſed with their united forces to invade the dominions of Philip. He flattered himſelf, that when he appeared at the head of the Engliſh, Dutch, and Flemiſh armies, reinforced by his German allies, he ſhould compel the French monarch to accept of a peace, on condition of his reſtoring Guienne. But in order to ſet this great machine in motion, conſiderable ſupplies were neceſſary; and Edward, without much difficulty, prevailed on the parliament to grant him a twelfth of all the moveables of the barons and knights; an eighth from all the boroughs; and likewiſe a fifth of the moveables of the church; but he met with an oppoſition from this quarter, at the head of which was the archbiſhop of Canterbury, whereby all his meaſures, for the preſent, were diſconcerted. Pope Boniface VIII. having ſucceeded Celeſtine, had reſolved to carry his dominions over the temporal power, to as great a height as any of his predeceſſors; and on aſcending the papal throne, had iſſued a bull, prohibiting all princes from levying taxes upon the clergy, without his conſent, and all clergymen from ſubmitting to them, under the penalty of excommunication, in caſe of diſobedience. When therefore a demand was made on the clergy of a fifth of their moveables, they ſheltered themſelves under this bull, and pleading conſcience, refuſed to comply. The king, on this repulſe, did not chooſe to proceed immediately to extremities; but after prohibiting all rent to be paid them, and cauſing their granaries to be locked up, appointed a new convocation to confer with him upon his demand. The king hoped a little reflection would have brought the clergy to obedience; but Robert de Winchelſea, archbiſhop of Canterbury, told him, in the name of the whole body, "That the clergy owed obedience to two ſovereigns, the one ſpiritual, the other temporal; but their duty bound them to a much ſtricter attachment to the former than the latter; nor could they comply in oppoſition to their ſpiritual ſovereign." Edward, though highly enraged, concealed his reſentment; but told them, that as they refuſed to aſſiſt the civil power, they were unworthy to receive any benefit from it; and he would therefore put them out of the protection of the laws. This was immediately put in execution. Orders were iſſued to the judges, to receive no cauſes which the clergy brought before them; to hear and determine ſuch only in which they were defendants; to do juſtice to every man againſt them, but to do them juſtice againſt no one. The clergy were ſoon reduced to a miſerable ſituation. The want of ſubſiſtence would not permit them to remain in their own houſes or convents; and if they went abroad to obtain ſupport, they were robbed of their horſes and clothes, inſulted by every ruffian, and unable to obtain redreſs from the moſt violent inſults. The primate himſelf was attacked on the highway, ſtripped of every thing about him, and reduced to the neceſſity of boarding with only a ſingle ſervant, in the houſe of a country clergyman. Meanwhile the king remained an indifferent ſpectator of all theſe acts of violence, and, conniving at his officers in any immediate injury on the prieſts, took ample vengeance on them for refuſing to comply with his demands. This politic, though harſh treatment, at laſt broke the ſpirits of the clergy. The whole province of York, which was moſt in danger from the Scots, had voted from the firſt a fifth of their moveables; and now the biſhops of Ely, Saliſbury, and ſome others, made a compoſition for the ſecular clergy within their ſees; and agreed, inſtead of paying a fifth, by which they would have diſobeyed the pope, to depoſit a ſum equivalent to it in a church appointed, from whence the king's officers took it. Many convents and clergymen made a payment of a like ſum, and received the king's protection; and very few eccleſiaſtics in the kingdom appeared willing, for the ſake of their religious privileges, to ſuffer this new ſpecies of perſecution.

The ſum, however, granted by parliament was not ſufficient to anſwer the king's neceſſities, and that raiſed by the clergy came in ſlowly. Edward, therefore, to obtain further ſupplies, had recourſe to the moſt arbitrary and oppreſſive meaſures. He limited the merchants in the quantity of wool allowed to be exported; and, at the ſame time, forced them to pay him a duty of forty ſhillings a ſack, which was computed to be much above the fifth of the value. He ſeized all the reſt of the wool, as well as all the leather in the kingdom, and diſpoſed of them for his own benefit. He required the ſheriffs of each county to ſupply him with two thouſand quarters of wheat, and as many of oats, which he permitted them to ſeize where they could find them. The cattle, and other articles neceſſary for ſupplying his army, were taken away without the conſent of their owners; and though he promiſed to pay an equivalent for all thoſe commodities he had plundered from the people, they ſaw but little probability of his ever performing his engagements. By ſuch illegal acts he ſhewed a diſregard to the principles of the feudal law, by which all the lands of his kingdom were held, in order to increaſe his army, and to enable him to ſupport that great effort which he propoſed to make againſt France; for he required the attendance of every proprietor of land, poſſeſſed of twenty pounds a year, even if he held not of the crown, nor, by the tenor of his eſtate, was obliged to perform any ſuch ſervice.

In ſpite of the great perſonal regard entertained in general for the king, theſe violent proceedings raiſed murmurs among all orders of men; and it was not long before ſome of the great nobility, jealous of their own privileges, gave both countenance and authority to theſe complaints. Edward having aſſembled an army on the ſea-coaſt, which he propoſed to ſend into Gaſcony, while he himſelf in perſon intended to invade Flanders, would have put thoſe forces under the command of Humphrey Bohun, earl of Hereford, the conſtable, and Roger Bigot, earl of Norfolk, marſhal of England. But theſe two noblemen refuſed to execute his orders, affirming, that they were only obliged by their office to attend his perſon in the wars. A violent altercation enſued; and Edward, in the height of his paſſion, addreſſing the conſtable, exclaimed, "Sir earl, be gone, you ſhall either go or hang." "By God, Sir king," replied Hereford, "I will neither go nor hang;" and immediately drew off, in company with the marſhal, and above thirty other conſiderable barons. The king, being thus oppoſed, laid aſide his deſign of an expedition againſt Guienne, and aſſembled the forces which he himſelf intended to take into Flanders. But the two earls, irritated by the conteſt, declared, that none of their anceſtors had ſerved in that country, and refuſed to perform the duty of their office in muſtering the army. Edward, now thinking it prudent to proceed with moderation, inſtead of attainting the earls, appointed Thomas de Berkley, and Geoffrey de Greyneville, to act as conſtable and marſhal. He then endeavoured to reconcile himſelf with the church; and taking the primate into favour, made him, in conjunction with Reginald de Grey, tutor to the prince, whom he intended to make guardian of the kingdom during his abſence. He even condeſcended to aſſemble a great number of the nobility in Weſtminſter-Hall, to whom he made an apology for his paſt conduct, pleading the urgent neceſſities of the crown; his extreme want of money; his engagements both from honour and intereſt to ſupport his allies abroad; promiſing, if he ever returned in ſafety, to redreſs all their grievances, and to make full ſatisfaction to his ſubjects for all their loſſes. Meanwhile he entreated them to ſuſpend their animoſities; to judge of him by his future conduct; to remain faithful to his government; and to preſerve their allegiance to his ſon, ſhould he be ſo unfortunate as to periſh in the preſent war.

By theſe prudent meaſures, the two earls were convinced, that it would be very imprudent in them to carry their reſentments further than they were warranted by the laws of their country. They therefore contented themſelves with drawing up a remonſtrance, which was preſented to the king at Winchelſea, when he was ready to embark for Flanders. Edward again promiſed them redreſs as ſoon as he returned to England; and added, that he hoped thoſe nobles who had declined leading his army, would make no attempts upon his crown or kingdom during his abſence. However, the barons were far from being ſatisfied with the king's verbal declarations; and he had hardly landed on the continent, before the conſtable and marſhal inſiſted on a confirmation both of the great charter, and the charter of the foreſts. Edward was very deſirous of putting it off till his return; but the parliament, which had been aſſembled at London by his order, joining with the diſcontented barons, and the two charters being ſent over to Flanders, the king confirmed them in preſence of all the prelates and nobility in his army: yet ſo great was his reluctance and reſentment on account of this compulſive act, that a ſhort time after he applied to the pope to abſolve him from his oath relative to this buſineſs.

A. D. 1298.

The king did not land in Flanders till the ſeaſon was too far advanced for executing any plan of importance. The earl of Flanders, who had joined in a league with Edward, ſoon experienced the reſentment of the French monarch. Liſle, St. Omer, Courtray, and Ypres, were already wreſted from him; and many more of the principal places in his dominions were threatened with the ſame fate. The arrival of Edward, indeed, put a ſtop to the ſucceſs of Philip; but the two kings, inſtead of venturing a deciſive battle, agreed to a truce for two years; and entered into mutual engagements of ſubmitting their differences to the arbitration of the holy ſee: yet as both monarchs were jealous of their prerogative, they took care to inſert in the reference, that they did not ſubmit their differences to his deciſion, from any right the pope might pretend by virtue of his pontifical character, but merely by their own conſent, as to a private perſon. The pope ſoon gave his ſentence, which ſeemed to have been dictated more by paſſion than cool judgment. He commanded not only a reſtitution of Guienne, but alſo the places that had been taken from the earl of Flanders. Philip was deſirous of comprehending John Baliol and the Scots in this treaty; but this was abſolutely refuſed by Edward. At laſt the two monarchs compromiſed the matters in diſpute, by making mutual ſacrifices to each other.

Edward abandoned his ally, the earl of Flanders; and Philip gave up the Scots. This is not the only time the intereſts of allies have been ſacrificed on the altar of ambition. The ſentence of Boniface was, however, regarded, and the treaty cemented by a double marriage; that of Edward with Margaret, Philip's ſiſter; and that of the prince of Wales with Iſabella, daughter of the French king.

During the interim, the affairs of Scotland took an unexpected turn. Edward had not been fortunate in the choice of thoſe in whoſe hands he had intruſted the civil adminiſtration. Warrenne, earl of Surrey, to whom the chief authority had been delegated, was, indeed, a man of prudence, virtue, and abilities; but his ill ſtate of health obliged him to return to England. At his departure the reigns of government were delivered to William de Ormeſby, chief juſticiary, and Creſſingham, the treaſurer. The former was diſtinguiſhed by the rigour and ſeverity of his temper; and the latter by his avarice. Perſons of ſuch characters were ill adapted to the taſk for which they were employed; and a very ſmall military force was at the command of theſe miniſters, to ſecure their precarious authority. Inſtead of making uſe of lenient meaſures to reconcile the Scots to the yoke, they treated them as a conquered people; and made them feel the full weight of the ſervitude under which they were oppreſſed. This exaſperated the whole nation; and the Scots reſolved on another effort for the recovery of their liberties.

One William Wallace, a gentleman of ſmall fortune, but deſcended from an ancient family, was the firſt who undertook the defence of his country. He was of gigantic ſtature; remarkable for heroic courage, and diſintereſted magnanimity; patient to a miracle under the extremes of hunger, heat, and cold; without inſolence when ſucceſsful; his genius always dictating the means of combating fortune, and his temperance always improving her favours. By his example he effected what he could not preſcribe by his power. The love of his country commanding his paſſions, though of themſelves impetuous; and his duty controlling his ambition, though naturally unbounded. He had retired to the woods, to avoid the vengeance of the government; and put himſelf at the head of a ſmall choſen band, who had fled from the tyranny of the Engliſh. The fame of his exploits increaſed the number of his followers, which daily ſwelled, and were indefatigable in haraſſing their oppreſſors. Wallace now put his little band in motion, with the view of attacking the governors; but Ormeſby and Creſſingham, appriſed of his intentions, fled into England. Elated at this ſucceſs, the Scots flew to arms; and likewiſe ſome of the principal barons, among whom were the biſhop of Glaſgow, the earl of Carrick, with the families of Stuart and Douglas, who openly countenanced Wallace's party.

The alarm ſoon ſeized Warrenne, earl of Surrey, who now endeavoured to recover by the celerity of his motions, what he had loſt by neglect. He entered Annandale, and came up with the Scottiſh army at Irvine, before they were ſufficiently formed. The number of his forces conſiſted of forty thouſand men. Many of the Scotch nobles, alarmed at their ſituation, and thinking it would be in vain to oppoſe the Engliſh, made their ſubmiſſion, and obtained a pardon. Nevertheleſs, Wallace, at the head of a choice body of followers, who had all bound themſelves by an oath never to lay down their arms till they had effected the liberty of their country, retired before the capitulation was ſigned, and poſſeſſed themſelves of an advantageous poſt above the monaſtery of Cambuſkenneth, in the neighbourhood of Stirling. Warrenne having continued his march, diſcovered the enemy on the oppoſite bank of the Forth; but at the ſame time perceived the danger of attacking them in this poſition, eſpecially as a bridge over the Forth was ſo narrow, as hardly to admit two men a-breaſt. Sir Richard Lundy, a Scotchman of birth and family, but a firm adherent to the Engliſh, deſired a party of five hundred horſe, and a proportional body of foot, might be put under his command, promiſing to paſs the river at a ford a few miles above, and to fall on the rear of the enemy, in order to divert their attention while the main body of the army paſſed the bridge. This prudent deſign was rejected by the continual ſolicitations of the impatient Creſſingham, who being actuated both by perſonal and national animoſities againſt the Scots, urged the earl of Surrey to attack them immediately; exclaiming loudly againſt all delays, as expenſive and diſhonourable. Warrenne, who conſidered theſe reflections as cenſures upon his own conduct, iſſued out his orders for the army to paſs the bridge. But he paid dear for his temerity. Wallace allowed ſuch a number of the Engliſh to paſs over as he was confident he could conquer; and then attacked them with ſuch fury, that they were all cut to pieces, or puſhed into the river, where they periſhed. Near five thouſand men fell in this action. Creſſingham was among the ſlain; whoſe memory being extremely odious to the Scots, they flayed his dead body, and made girths and ſaddles of his ſkin. Warrenne, after this defeat, finding the remains of his army, which had been ſpectators of the deſtruction of their countrymen, quite diſpirited, was obliged to march ſouthward, and retire into England.

Now Wallace was declared regent of the kingdom, during the captivity of Baliol, and the Scots flocked from all parts to join his ſtandard; when, finding that unfavourable ſeaſons, and the deſtructive ſword, had produced a famine in Scotland, he perſuaded his army to march into England, to which propoſal of their brave general they joyfully conſented; and the caſtles of Roxborough and Berwick, after a feeble reſiſtance, opened the Scots a free paſſage into Northumberland; on which Wallace, invading the northern counties during winter, laid every place waſte with fire and ſword; and having extended the fury of his ravages on all ſides without oppoſition, as far as the biſhopric of Durham, he marched back, loaded with ſpoils and crowned with honour, into his own country.

The king, informed of theſe events, haſtened his return to England, in order not only to wipe off this diſgrace by his activity and valour, but to recover Scotland, the ſovereignty of which he always conſidered as the chief glory of his reign. On his return, he endeavoured to appeaſe the murmurs of his people by conceſſions and promiſes. He ordered a ſtrict account of the quantity of corn, and other commodities which had been violently ſeized before his departure, to be taken, in order that the owners might receive ſatisfaction; he reſtored to the citizens of London the privilege of chooſing their own magiſtrates, which had been taken from them in the latter part of his father's reign; having aſſembled a parliament at York, he ſigned voluntarily the two charters, together with additional ſtatutes in favour of liberty, which he ordered to be read publickly for the ſatisfaction of the whole nation. This was done with great formality; and the biſhop of Carliſle denounced the ſentence of excommunication againſt all perſons who ſhould dare to violate the two great charters.

By theſe popular acts he became entire maſter of his ſubjects affections. They appeared to have but one heart; and flocking to his ſtandard, the king found himſelf at the head of one hundred thouſand fighting men. It was impoſſible for the Scots to oppoſe Edward, ſupported by ſuch an army, without a perfect union among themſelves; but this was far from being the caſe. Diviſions and envy had taken place among that unhappy people. The noblemen, deſcended from the royal line, inſtead of looking upon the patriotic virtues of Wallace with admiration, and joining in a glorious emulation in the ſervices of their country, threw out the moſt ungenerous reflections upon his conduct, and even charged him with a deſign of ſeizing the crown. They choſe rather to behold their country groaning under the yoke of perpetual bondage, than ſee themſelves eclipſed by a perſon of inferior birth. Wallace ſaw the fatal conſequences that muſt attend theſe diviſions. That brave man, dreading leſt inteſtine diſcords ſhould ruin the common cauſe, reſigned his authority; retaining only the command of his choſen followers, who, being accuſtomed to victory under his banner, refuſed to follow any other leader into the field. The liberty of his country, not a love of power, or the cravings of ambition, had called him from his private ſtation; and the real patriot willingly ſacrificed the latter to preſerve the former. On his reſignation, the chief command of the army devolved on the ſteward of Scotland, and Cummin of Badenoch, men of high rank, under whom the nobility more willingly reſolved to defend their country. The two commanders collecting their forces from every quarter, fixed their ſtation at Falkirk, where they propoſed to wait for the Engliſh; and Wallace was at the head of his own band, which acted under his command. The army of the Scots were compoſed of pikemen in the front, and the intervals between their three diviſions were interlined with archers. Dreading the advantage the Engliſh might obtain by the great ſuperiority of their cavalry, they endeavoured to ſecure their front by paliſadoes tied together with ropes.

Edward, when he arrived in ſight of the Scots, was pleaſed with having an opportunity of endeavouring to finiſh the war by one deciſive ſtroke; and having divided his army alſo into three bodies, led them to the attack. It was begun by the Engliſh archers, who poured a ſhower of arrows upon the enemy. The Scottiſh bowmen, unable to ſupport the fury of the Engliſh, were driven from the field of battle with great ſlaughter. The archers purſued their advantage; and pouring in their arrows among the pikemen threw them into diſorder, which was improved by the cavalry, and a general rout enſued, attended with the moſt dreadful ſlaughter.

Impoſſible it is to fix, with any certainty, the exact number that fell in this remarkable battle. Some hiſtorians make the amount not leſs than fifty, and others ſixty thouſand; but there are thoſe who have reduced the account to twenty thouſand. This may be affirmed with truth, that the Scots never ſuffered a greater loſs, nor ever experienced a defeat that ſeemed pregnant with more deſtructive conſequences. This memorable battle of Falkirk was fought on the twenty-ſecond of July, one thouſand two hundred and ninety-eight years after the birth of Chriſt.

Amidſt this general rout, Wallace, by his military ſkill and preſence of mind, kept his troops together; and having croſſed the Carron, which during the engagement lay in his rear, marched leiſurely along the bank of that ſmall river, which protected him from the enemy. Young Bruce, who had hitherto ſerved in the Engliſh army, appeared on the oppoſite ſide of the river; and, diſtinguiſhing the Scottiſh hero by the height of his ſtature, and his majeſtic port, called out and deſired a ſhort conference with him. He now repreſented to Wallace the fruitleſs and ruinous enterprize in which he was engaged; and endeavoured to perſuade him to bend at leaſt his inflexible ſpirit to the ſuperior merit and ſuperior fortune of Edward. He inſiſted on the unequal conteſt between a weak ſtate deprived of its head, and agitated by internal diſcord; and a powerful nation, conducted by the moſt martial monarch of the age, poſſeſſed of every reſource either for drawing out the war, or puſhing it with the utmoſt vigour. If the love of his country was the only motive for his perſeverance, his obſtinacy could have no other tendency than that of prolonging its miſery. If he carried his private views to grandeur and ambition, he would do well to reflect, that if even Edward ſhould withdraw his army, it ſufficiently appeared from paſt experience, that ſo many haughty nobles, proud of the pre-eminence of their family, would never ſubmit to perſonal merit, whoſe ſuperiority they were leſs inclined to regard as an object of admiration, than as a reproach and injury to themſelves. In anſwer to theſe exhortations Wallace replied, that if he had hitherto acted alone in the character of the champion of his country, it was only becauſe no ſecond, or, what he much rather wiſhed, no leader had yet appeared to place himſelf in that honourable ſtation: that the nobility alone were to blame, and particularly Bruce himſelf, who, uniting dignity of family to perſonal merit, had deſerted the poſt which the powerful calls of nature and fortune invited him to aſſume: that the Scots, with ſuch a leader, would, by their unanimity and concord, ſurmount the difficulties, great as they were, under which they at preſent laboured; and, notwithſtanding their late loſs, might hope to oppoſe, with ſucceſs, the utmoſt power and abilities of Edward: that heaven itſelf could not preſent a more glorious earthly prize before the view, either of ambition or virtue, than the joining in one object, the defence of national independence with the acquiſition of royalty; and that as the intereſt of his country could never be promoted with the ſacrifice of liberty, he himſelf was fully reſolved to prolong, to the utmoſt of his power, not her miſery, but her freedom; and was deſirous that his own life, as well as the exiſtence of the nation, might be brought to a period, when they could no otherwiſe be preſerved than by receiving the chains of a haughty conqueror. Theſe ſentiments made a deep impreſſion on the generous mind of Bruce. They were inſtantly conveyed from the breaſt of one hero to that of the other. Repenting of his engagements with Edward, he directed his attention to the honourable path Wallace had pointed out to him, and ſecretly reſolved to lay hold of the firſt opportunity of embracing the cauſe of his oppreſſed country.

The Scots, enraged at their late defeat, ſtill maintained the conteſt for liberty; but being fully ſenſible of the great inferiority of their ſtrength, they endeavoured to procure aſſiſtance from France; yet in vain they implored the protection of Lewis, who had abandoned them to the fury of their conqueror by his late treaty. However, they were more ſucceſsful in their application to Boniface. That pontiff, who ſeemed determined to carry the power of the papal chair to the moſt extravagant height, wrote a letter to Edward; in which, aſter confuting the pretenſions of that monarch to the ſuperiority of Scotland, advanced claims ſtill more abſurd in their room. He aſſerted, with a ſingular degree of confidence, that he, the pope, was true liege lord of Scotland; that his right was derived from the moſt remote antiquity. Edward, aſtoniſhed and offended, was at firſt diſpoſed to treat the pontiff's letter with contempt; but fearing the blind zeal of the people might occaſion diſorders in the nation, and interrupt his deſigns upon Scotland, he wrote an anſwer to the pope's epiſtle, wherein he advanced claims at leaſt as chimerical as thoſe of his holineſs. He deduced the ſuperiority of England over Scotland from the time of Brutus the Trojan, who, he ſaid, firſt founded the Britiſh monarchy in the days of Eli and Samuel. He laid it down as a fact, confirmed by ancient records, that the kings of England had often made grants of Scotland to their ſubjects, and had dethroned their monarchs as vaſſals when they rebelled againſt them. He recited, with great oſtentation, the homage which William had done to Henry II. but mentioned not the abolition of that extorted deed by Richard I. Theſe pretenſions, abſurd as they were, one hundred and four barons, aſſembled at Lincoln, confirmed. They alſo agreed to ſend them to Boniface; but took particular care to prevent this act from affording the ſmalleſt pretext for his holineſs to make it the foundation of any claim to a ſuperiority over England. They therefore annexed a poſitive declaration, that though they were willing to ſubmit theſe proofs to him as a man, they did not authorize him to act the part of a judge. "The crown of England," added they, "is free, nor will we ſuffer even the king himſelf to relinquiſh its independency." A ſentiment which ſhould be engraven on the memory, and cheriſhed among the immutable laws of nature in the breaſt of every true-born Briton.

A. D. 1303. Though Edward had obtained ſo complete a victory as that of Falkirk, the reduction of Scotland was far from being perfected. After the Engliſh army had reduced the ſouthern provinces, the want of proviſions obliged them to retire in 1299, and to leave the northern counties in the hands of the natives. Wallace continued at the head of a conſiderable party; and freſh forces joining them, they made incurſions into the ſouthern counties, which Edward imagined he had ſubdued. An army was now formed under Cummin, who had been appointed regent on the reſignation of Wallace. Theſe marched to Bigger, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh. John de Seagrave, whom Edward had left guardian of Scotland, aſſembled all the Engliſh forces in that kingdom to oppoſe the Scotch; but perceiving it would be difficult to procure the neceſſary quantity of proviſions for their ſubſiſtence in a body, he ſeparated them into three diviſions: the firſt was commanded by himſelf in perſon; the ſecond by his brother; and the third by Sir Robert Neville. The regent, taking advantage of this ſeparation, advanced, under cover of the night, to attack Seagrave's diviſion, which lay at Roſlin, about ſixteen miles from the Scottiſh camp. When dawn appeared, the Engliſh diſcovered Cummin's forces in full march to attack them; but it was too late to make the neceſſary preparations; ſo that the Scots fell upon them before they could form in order of battle, and obtained an eaſy victory; a few only eſcaped by flying to the ſecond diviſion, informing them at once of their defeat, and the approach of the enemy. The commander inſtantly drew up his men, and led them on directly to revenge the death of their countrymen. The Scots, elated with the victory they had lately acquired, ruſhed upon them with great intrepidity; and the Engliſh, animated by an eagerneſs of revenge, maintained a brave reſiſtance. The conteſt was bloody, but terminated in favour of the Scots, who broke the Engliſh, and chaſed them to the third diviſion, which was advancing in a haſty march to ſupport their companions. The Scots, already exhauſted by fatigue, and their ranks conſiderably thinned by the two former actions, would willingly have declined the engagement. They pleaded the exceſſive labours they had already undergone; they pointed to their wounds; and deſired to retire while it was yet in their power. Cummin, who knew that a retreat was now impoſſible, reminded them of the glorious cauſe for which they were fighting, the tyranny of the Engliſh, the glory of their anceſtors, and the diſgrace of ſlavery. Tranſported with renewed vigour by the perſuaſive arguments of their general, and the followers of the camp arming themſelves with the weapons of their ſlaughtered enemies, they ſtood boldly the ſhock of a third engagement, and with the utmoſt difficulty obtained the victory. The event was not, however, inglorious to Neville; for he reſcued Seagrave, who had been taken priſoner in the firſt action, and retreated, though driven off the field, in excellent order. Thus the Scots obtained three victories in one day, the fame of which, added to the favourable diſpoſition of the people, ſoon enabled the regent to take all the fortreſſes in the ſouth.

Now, the arduous undertaking of the conqueſt of Scotland was to be performed over again by Edward, and he prepared for it with the utmoſt vigour. His forces being aſſembled at Roxborough, he advanced into the heart of that kingdom at the head of an army, againſt which the Scots were unable to make any reſiſtance. A powerful fleet at the ſame time coaſted the ſhores, and ſupplied the army with neceſſary proviſions. The enemy had no other reſource than to fly for ſafety to the mountainous parts of their country; while Edward marched ſecurely to the utmoſt boundaries of the iſland, laying waſte the country wherever he came. The only oppoſition he met with was from two or three caſtles: even the intrepid Wallace, though he watched narrowly the motions of the Engliſh army, found few opportunities for diſplaying his valour. Stirling-Caſtle, indeed, reſiſted during the whole winter; nor capitulated till the month of July in the following year. Edward's fourth expedition, and third conqueſt of Scotland, was completed by the capture of this fortreſs.

A. D. 1305. There remained, however, one obſtacle to be removed before the monarchy of Scotland could be ſaid to be aboliſhed. The gallant Wallace was yet unconquered. A few of his faithful adherents attended him from mountain to mountain, ſtill maintaining that independence which was their boaſt and pride, the great object of their purſuit, and their final hope, ſhould victory attend their arms. But their hopes were blaſted by one baſe act of treachery. Edward had iſſued a general pardon to all who had carried arms againſt him. The publication of this cauſed a conſiderable deſertion in the hitherto faithful band of Wallace; in conſequence whereof, he was obliged to wander from one part of the country to another, in order to keep himſelf concealed from the vigilant eyes of his enemies. At laſt that brave patriot, that true friend of his country, who determined, amidſt univerſal ſlavery, to maintain his freedom, was betrayed into the hands of Edward by Sir John Monteith, his pretended friend, whom he had informed of the place in which he concealed himſelf. The king, whoſe natural bravery ought to have induced him to reſpect that quality in an enemy, ſubmitted to the dictates of barbarous policy; and with a view of over-awing the Scots by an example of unjuſt ſeverity, ordered him to be conducted in chains to London. The undaunted hero, worthy of a better fate, proceeded thither through prodigious crowds, aſſembled to gaze on the man who had filled the whole country with terror. The day after his arrival in London, he was brought to trial in Weſtminſter-Hall, where he was placed upon an elevated ſeat, and was crowned with laurel, which he truly deſerved in honour of his merit, by way of (diſgraceful meanneſs in his judges!) deriſion and inſult. On his being accuſed of treaſon, he pleaded not guilty; affirming, it was equally abſurd and unjuſt to charge him with being a traitor to a prince, whoſe ſovereignty he had never acknowledged: that he was a free-born native of an independent nation; and as he had never ſworn fealty to Edward, he was not ſubject to the laws of England. But this plea being over-ruled by the court, he was found guilty, and ſentenced to be executed as a traitor. This ſevere ſentence was carried into full execution; and after this brave man had ſuffered, the divided parts of his body were hung up in four of the principal cities of England. Here let us pauſe awhile, and bewail the fall of this unfortunate patriot. Surely one tear from the humane heart and pitying eye, will not be thought too great a tribute, by every generous Briton, over the fate of an honourable Scotchman, whoſe only crime ſeems to have been a brave and determined oppoſition to one, whom he deemed a rapacious invader of his country's liberty.

A. D. 1306. Edward's political ſacrifice of the injured ſufferer, did not anſwer the purpoſe for which it was deſigned. The Scots, already diſguſted at the innovations introduced into their laws and government by the ſword of their conqueror, were now exaſperated by the injuſtice and cruelty exerciſed upon Wallace. All the envy, which during his life-time had attended that gallant leader, being now buried in his grave, he was univerſally regarded as the champion of Scotland, and the patron of her expiring independence. The people, ſtimulated by reſentment, were every where diſpoſed to take arms againſt the Engliſh government; and it was not long before a more fortunate leader appeared, who, after ſome ſtruggles, conducted them to victory and freedom. This leader was Robert Bruce, the ſon of that Robert who had been one of the competitors for the crown, and who had, at his father's death, ſucceeded to all his pretenſions; and the deceaſe of John Baliol in France, about the ſame time, together with the captivity of Edward, his eldeſt ſon, ſeemed to open an extenſive field to the genius and ambition of this young nobleman. He had obſerved that the Scots, when the right to the crown had failed in the males of the ancient royal family, had been divided into nearly equal parties between the houſes of Baliol and Bruce, and that a concurrence of circumſtances had tended to wean them from the former. He therefore hoped that the Scots, who from want of a leader had been ſo long expoſed to the oppreſſions of their enemies, would unanimouſly reſort to his ſtandard, and ſeat him on the vacant throne. This young nobleman opened his mind to Cummin, with whom he was ſtrictly intimate, and found him, as he imagined, to be of the ſame ſentiments. But on the departure of Bruce, who attended Edward to London, Cummin, who had either diſſembled with him, or from reflecting more coolly, reſolved to make a merit of betraying him, revealed the ſecret to the king. Edward did not, however, immediately commit Bruce to priſon, becauſe he intended to ſeize, at the ſame time, his three brothers, who reſided in Scotland; and contented himſelf with ſetting ſpies upon him, who were ordered to watch ſtrictly all his motions. A nobleman in Edward's court, Bruce's intimate friend, was informed of his danger; but not daring, while he was encompaſſed with ſo many watchful eyes, to hold converſation with him, he had recourſe to a device, which he hoped would give him ſufficient warning of his danger. He ſent him by a ſervant a purſe of gold, and a pair of gilt ſpurs, which he pretended to have borrowed of him, truſting in his friend's ſagacity to diſcover the meaning. Bruce took the hint, and contrived the means of his eſcape. In a few days he arrived at Dumfries, in Annandale, and had the happineſs to find there a great number of the nobility of Scotland, and among the reſt John Cummin, his treacherous friend. He informed them that he was come to live or die with them, in defence of the liberty of his country, and hoped, with their aſſiſtance, to redeem the Scots from the indignities they had ſo long ſuffered, under the tyranny of their imperious maſters; that the ſacrifice of the juſt claims of his family, was the firſt injury which had prepared the way for the ſlavery that enſued; and by reſuming them, he afforded the joyful proſpect of recovering their ancient and hereditary independence, from the fraudulent uſurper: that all their paſt misfortunes had ſolely proceeded from their diſunion; and they would ſoon appear formidable to their enemies, if they would now follow the ſtandard of their lawful prince, who knew no medium between death and victory: that their valour and their mountains, which, during ſo many ages, had protected their liberty from all the efforts of the Roman empire, would ſtill, if they were worthy of their generous anceſtors, be ſufficient to defend them againſt the Engliſh tyrant: that it did not become men, born to the moſt ancient independence known in Europe, to ſubmit to the will of any maſters; but that it was doubly fatal to receive thoſe, who being irritated with the higheſt animoſity, would never think themſelves ſecure in their uſurped dominion, till they had exterminated all the ancient inhabitants; and that being reduced to this dreadful extremity, it were better for them to die at once, like brave men, with ſwords in their hands, than always to dread, and at laſt undergo, the fate of the brave but unfortunate Wallace, whoſe merit, in the generous defence of his country, was at laſt rewarded by the hands of an Engliſh executioner. The manly ſentiments contained in this ſpeech, which was delivered with all the ſtriking advantages of oratory, aſſiſted with a noble deportment, and all the winning graces of youth, rouſed in the minds of his audience the principles of revenge; who declared their reſolution of ſeconding his patriotic deſigns, and aſſerting the undoubted rights of the nation, againſt their common oppreſſors. Cummin alone, who had ſecretly taken his meaſures with the king, oppoſed this general determination; endeavouring to ſet before them the folly of an attempt, pregnant with deſtruction, being againſt the power of England, governed by a prince of uncommon abilities; he added, that nothing but the moſt rigorous puniſhment could be expected, if they again broke their oaths of fealty, and ſhook off their allegiance to the victorious Edward. Theſe inſinuations were little reliſhed by Bruce and his adherents. He had already been informed of Cummin's treachery, and ſaw the certain failure of all his ſchemes from the oppoſition of ſo powerful a leader. He was therefore determined to remove this obſtacle to his ambition at the expence of his virtue. Accordingly he followed Cummin on the diſſolution of the aſſembly; attacked him in the cloiſters of the Grey-Friars, ran him through the body, and left him for dead. Sir Thomas Kirkpatric, one of Bruce's friends, aſking him ſoon after if the traitor was ſlain; "I believe ſo," replied Bruce. "And is that a matter," replied Kirkpatric, "to be left to conjecture? I will ſecure him." Then drawing his dagger, he ran to the altar, and ſtabbed Cummin to the heart. Hence the family of Kirkpatric took for the creſt of their arms, which they ſtill wear, a hand with a bloody dagger, with this motto, "I will ſecure him." This deed of violence, which was then conſidered as a noble achievement of patriotic virtue, revived the ſpirit of the nation. Bruce and his adherents, who were now more than ever objects of Edward's reſentment, had only the alternative to conquer or periſh. They now ſaw that ſucceſs muſt depend alone on their determined valour. The Scots embraced with ardour the pleaſing hopes of recovering their liberty. The Engliſh were again driven out of the kingdom, except thoſe who had taken refuge in places of ſtrength; and Bruce was ſolemnly crowned, by the biſhop of St. Andrews, king of Scotland, in the abbey of Scone.

Though Edward was far advanced in life, he felt his boſom glow with an ardent deſire of revenge. He diſpatched Aymer de Valence, earl of Pembroke, with the lords Robert Clifford and Henry Piercy, at the head of a body of forces, to protect the few remaining friends of his government in Scotland, while he himſelf prepared to ſupport them with the whole force of his army. Bruce had collected a conſiderable number of raw, undiſciplined troops, who were encamped at Methven, in Perthſhire, without ſuſpecting the approach of an enemy. Pembroke ſurpriſed them in the night; and the Scots were completely routed. Bruce made a moſt gallant reſiſtance; was thrice thrown from his horſe, and as often remounted by the good conduct of Sir Simon Frazer; but at length was obliged to retreat, with a few of his adherents, and take ſhelter in the Weſtern Iſles. Several perſons of diſtinction, who were taken priſoners, were immediately executed as traitors, among whom are numbered Frazer, the earl of Athol, and Sir Chriſtopher Seton.

Some ſhort time after this event, Edward arrived in Scotland, to triumph, not to conquer; for the poor natives in general ſubmitted to him, and he had little to do but to puniſh their ſuperiors. He therefore divided his army into two bodies, ſending one to the north, under the command of the prince of Wales, aſſiſted by the earls of Lancaſter and Hereford. Theſe took Bruce's caſtle at Kildommy, where they made priſoners his queen and ſiſter, with many of his principal followers. After this expedition, the prince and his father met at Perth, and all Scotland was once more reduced under the power of Edward; yet no ſubmiſſions could appeaſe his hatred of thoſe who had made any reſiſtance. The executions he ordered were numberleſs. His reſentment even drove him to unmanly fury. Lady Mary Campbell, ſiſter to Bruce, and the counteſs of Buchan, he encloſed in wooden cages, and hung over the walls, the one at Roxborough, and the other at Berwick, as a ſpectacle for the rude populace. However, Edward, notwithſtanding ſo many ſacrifices were daily offered to his ambition, was very uneaſy on account of Bruce. This prince lay concealed for ſome time in the iſle of Raughrin; whence he ſent Sir James Douglas and Sir Robert Boid to acquaint his friends that he was ſtill alive: and theſe taking up arms, he ſecretly put himſelf at their head, and cut off a convoy intended for an Engliſh corps in that county. His followers being by this exploit equipped with arms, and furniſhed with proviſions, he attacked the caſtle of Tunberry, which he took, and obliged lord Piercy, who commanded in thoſe parts, to retire to the ſouthward. This action was performed by a body of only four hundred men. The king was now at Carliſle, when he ordered Thomas and Alexander, two of Bruce's brothers, who were taken in an attempt to invade Galloway, to be executed. He was exaſperated to find his ſchemes diſconcerted by a handful of wretches, miſerable in every reſpect that can render life deſirable, except in the love of liberty and heroic actions. He could not think of the re-appearance of Bruce, but with the greateſt uneaſineſs: his reflections preyed upon his ſpirits, and the pain they cauſed daily increaſed. The affairs of Scotland were much altered ſince the time he had formed the laſt ſcheme for its eſtabliſhment. Severity and lenity had been equally ineffectual; and neither power nor policy could extinguiſh the ſpark which ever exiſts in minds leſs fearful of death than dependence. In vain was every corner of the two kingdoms filled with ſanguinary executions, or dreadful impriſonments. The ſhackled bodies and mangled limbs of the Scots inſpired their unſubmitting countrymen with revenge inſtead of terror; and late as the ſeaſon was, the king found it neceſſary to order the earl of Pembroke and lord Lorn, with a body of veterans, to advance in ſearch of Bruce and his followers.

Beſides theſe painful mortifications, there was an affliction in his own family, which afforded Edward an affecting proof, that happineſs will not frequently attend the ſteps of policy, wiſdom, power, and human greatneſs. He beheld, with concern, the profligacy of his ſon, the prince of Wales, who was entirely guided by Gaveſton, his young Gaſcon favourite. Edward had ſeveral times endeavoured in vain to break the infamous connection, and to reclaim his ſon, ſometimes by paternal admonitions, at others by puniſhments bordering on ſeverity. But a freſh inſult being now offered to the biſhop of Cheſter, the king reſolved to proceed in a legal manner againſt the favourite, and it was determined that Piers Gaveſton ſhould, in three months, embark for France, and never more return to England, without the king's permiſſion or command; at the ſame time he ordered him a penſion of one hundred marks a year, on condition that both he and the prince ſhould ſolemnly ſwear to obſerve the ſentence pronounced againſt the former.

A. D. 1307.

Now Bruce, bleſſed with a genius that taught him to improve under afflictions, and to riſe ſtill greater from defeat, perceiving that the force of the enemy was far ſuperior to his own, intrenched himſelf on the brow of a hill; but obſerving the highlanders, under lord Lorn, fetching a compaſs round the eminence, by which he muſt ſoon have been ſurrounded, he divided his little army into three bodies, and ordered them to march different ways, but all to rendezvous, by a certain time, in the wood of Glantroule, near Cumnock. This retreat being happily performed, Bruce found his army conſiderably increaſed by the acceſſion of new friends, and he obtained ſeveral advantages over the enemy, though his whole force did not exceed a thouſand men. With theſe, however, he knew ſo well how to chooſe his ground, and watch his opportunity, that he defeated the earl of Pembroke, and attacked a party under the earl of Glouceſter, with ſo much reſolution, that after a bloody diſpute, that nobleman was obliged to ſhut himſelf up in the caſtle of Ayre, till he ſhould be relieved by Edward. This gleam of ſucceſs raiſed the Scots from deſpair. The fire of freedom ran from breaſt to breaſt, and Bruce, in a ſhort time, found his army increaſed to ſeveral thouſands, by which he became a dangerous, becauſe a deſperate enemy.

Edward, in the mean time, made preparations for invading Scotland, with more fury than ever. He reſolved to give no quarter to the Scots; but lived not to carry his cruel purpoſe into execution. He had for ſome time been afflicted with a dyſentery, which had weakened him exceedingly; yet his eagerneſs to finiſh the reduction of Scotland ſuffered him not to continue at Carliſle. His army being aſſembled, he cauſed himſelf to be removed by eaſy journeys, unable to march above two miles a day. Arriving at a place called Burgh, upon the ſands in Cumberland, he found nature too weak to proceed any further. He took to his bed; and his dying ejaculations, if we may credit a cotemporary writer, were worthy of a repentant Chriſtian.

Having enjoined his ſon and ſucceſſor, with his laſt breath, to proſecute the enterprize, and never to deſiſt till Scotland was ſubdued, he expired on the ſeventh of July, in the ſixty-ninth year of his age, and the thirty-fifth of his reign, exceedingly reſpected and beloved by his people.

He had by his firſt wife, Eleanor of Caſtile, four ſons; but Edward his heir and ſucceſſor was the only one who ſurvived him. He had likewiſe by the ſame conſort eleven daughters, ſix of whom died in their infancy. Eleanor was married to Henry, duke of Bar; Joan to Gilbert Clare, earl of Glouceſter, and afterwards to Ralph de Monthermez; Margaret to John, duke of Brabant; Elizabeth to John, earl of Holland, and afterwards to Humphrey de Bohun, earl of Hereford; Mary was a nun at Ambreſbury. By his ſecond wife, Margaret of France, he had two ſons, Thomas earl of Norfolk, Edmund earl of Kent, and a daughter named Eleanor, who died in her infancy.

During this reign, Matthew of Weſtminſter, a Benedictine monk, compiled his Hiſtory of England, to whoſe labours ſubſequent hiſtorians have been greatly indebted.

The tribute paid to Rome, of a thouſand marks a year, to which John had ſubjected the kingdom, in doing homage to the pope, had ſince his time been regularly paid; but the vaſſalage was conſtantly denied; and that court, for fear of giving offence, had not much inſiſted on it. This money was not called by the name of tribute, but that of cenſus. Edward paid it always with great reluctance; having ſuffered it at one time to be in arrear for ſix years, and at another for eleven.

During ſome former reigns the taxes had partly conſiſted of ſcutages, or ſums to exempt the vaſſals of the crown from their attendance in military ſervices, and partly in ſuch a proportion of moveables as the parliament thought fit to grant: but in this reign ſcutages were entirely dropped, and the king, in lieu thereof, had, from time to time, duties upon exportations and importations; the moſt conſiderable of which was generally laid by parliament upon wool.

Impartial Character of EDWARD I.

This prince was well qualified to captivate the populace by his exterior appearance, being upon the whole, notwithſtanding the remarkable length and ſlenderneſs of his legs, of a graceful perſon and dignified aſpect; having regular features, with ſtrong piercing black eyes. But his ſolid underſtanding, and thoſe political virtues, which greatly overbalanced his private and public vices, were of that caſt, as could not fail to gain him the approbation of all men of ſenſe. Endued alike with perſonal bravery and political courage, he had the ſpirit to undertake, and reſolution to accompliſh, ſome of the moſt difficult and dangerous enterprizes that ever were attempted by any Engliſh monarch. The projects which he formed were more regularly conducted and more conducive to the ſolid intereſt of his kingdom, than thoſe undertaken in any preceding reign. He reſtored authority to the government, diſordered by the weakneſs of his father; he maintained the laws againſt the efforts of his turbulent barons; he fully annexed to his crown the principality of Wales; and he took the wiſeſt and moſt ſpirited meaſures for reducing Scotland to a like condition. The equity of his attempts upon that kingdom has been juſtly queſtioned; but when it is remembered, that the union of the two kingdoms muſt have been attended with the moſt ſolid advantages to both, we ſhall perhaps be more inclined to praiſe, than cenſure his conduct. At the ſame time it muſt be confeſſed, that if his character ſhould be thought exceptionable in this particular, his country obtained the moſt permanent benefits from his heroic virtues; and he was conſidered all over Europe as the flower of chivalry. Nor was he leſs famous for his civil than his military abilities. The improvements he made in the Engliſh law were ſo great, that he received the appellation of the Engliſh Juſtinian; as under him the civil policy of England was not only purged from the pollutions of former reigns, but refined, enlarged, and confirmed. The numerous ſtatutes paſſed in his reign, relating to the chief points of juriſprudence, became conſtant and durable laws, that ſtill ſubſiſt; while the regular order maintained in this government, brought the judges to a certainty in their determinations. Sir Matthew Hale, on mentioning the ſudden improvements of the Engliſh laws in the time of Edward I. aſſerts, that till his days they had not received any conſiderable amendments. He aboliſhed the office of juſticiary, who he thought poſſeſſed too much power; and divided the court of Exchequer into four diſtinct courts, which managed each its reſpective branch of buſineſs. He firſt eſtabliſhed the office of juſtice of the peace; repreſſed robberies and diſorders of every kind; and encouraged trade, by giving merchants an eaſy method of recovering their debts. He reduced by wiſe expedients the exorbitant power of eccleſiaſtical authority, and treated the function according to merit of character. Their poſſeſſions were unalienable, and perpetually augmenting: he therefore prevented them from making new acquiſitions by the ſtatute of mortmain. But what will ever render the name of this prince dear to the Engliſh, was his eſtabliſhing the Houſe of Commons, by ſummoning two deputies from every borough, conformable to the example of the earl of Leiceſter. By this means the boroughs became of importance to the ſtate; and the mechanics and tradeſmen, whom the feudal ſyſtem had placed in a deſpicable point of view, acquired the honour of being one of the branches of the legiſlature; trade was encouraged, and men of property thought it no diſgrace to engage in the commerce of their country. With this pleaſing ſcene we could wiſh to cloſe the hiſtory of this great monarch. A painter might here take the liberty of drawing a veil over his foibles; but it is the duty of an impartial hiſtorian, to weigh even the character of an Edward, in the balance of ſtrict juſtice; and we muſt confeſs, that in the beginning and latter end of his reign, his amiable qualities and beneficient actions were ſullied by ambition, reſentment, and cruelty. To extend his power ſeems to have been his grand ſpring of action, without regard to the juſtice of means, or the effect of cauſes. Theſe are too evident from his bloody and expenſive war with Scotland; his ſeverities towards Llewellin and Wallace, heroes, whoſe laudable efforts againſt ſlavery and dependence, muſt endear their names to the lateſt poſterity; and his rigid treatment of all who oppoſed his will, or obſtructed his arbitrary deſigns. Yet theſe blemiſhes appear what ſhadows are to lights, appendages in every good picture, and which ſerve as foils, to ſet off his more ſtriking virtues. If his acts of tyranny and oppreſſion draw our attention on one ſide; let us on the other behold his penetration, diſcernment, ſoundneſs of judgment, perſonal valour, refined policy, and circumſpection of conduct. Let us view him introducing a new face of things by the wiſdom and vigour of his government. Above all, let us behold this prince as laying the foundation for that ſpecies of government, which is ſtill the glory and boaſt of this iſland, and we cannot with-hold from him that reſpect and cordial eſteem, with which his ſubjects treated him, and of which he was moſt juſtly deſerving.

A. D. 1307. EDWARD II. ſurnamed Caernarvon, from the place of his birth, was, on his acceſſion, about twenty-three years of age. He aſcended the throne of his illuſtrious father, at a time when public affairs wore a moſt pleaſing aſpect; when harmony univerſally prevailed: for the people were fond of the ſon, through the veneration in which they held the memory of his beloved parent. They had formed the moſt flattering expectations of enjoying both tranquillity and happineſs under the government of their young prince; but they ſoon perceived, that all their hopes were built on a chimerical foundation, and that the pleaſing proſpect was merely deluſive; for this Edward was born to obey, not to govern; and wanting both the abilities and ſpirit of his father, he was unable to ſupport the regal authority over a proud and turbulent nobility. A ſceptre ſwayed in ſuch feeble hands could but become contemptible. His father, on his death bed, had charged him to purſue the enterprize againſt Scotland with the utmoſt vigour. "Carry my aſhes before you," ſaid he to his ſon, "the rebels will never be able to ſupport the ſight of them." But Edward's ruling paſſion was far from being of the heroic kind. Being at Carliſle, he ordered a rendezvous of his troops, who were ſtill on their march, at Dumfries, in Scotland, where they made a gallant appearance; yet this was not done with a view of carrying his father's deſigns into execution; for he had advanced but a little way into that kingdom, when he returned with precipitation, and diſbanded his forces. Nor was this the only inſtance in which Edward violated his filial engagements; for immediately on his return from Scotland, he recalled his favourite Gaveſton, and, even before his arrival, preſented him with the earldom of Cornwall, which would have been a ſufficient proviſion for a prince of the blood. Piers Gaveſton was a Gaſcon knight, diſtinguiſhed by the elegance of his perſon, a fine mien, an eaſy carriage, which conſtituted his chief merit; yet with theſe qualifications, accompanied with lively ſallies of wit, he gained an entire aſcendency over the weak mind of young Edward, while his vices threatened the deſtruction of the ſtate. On his arrival, one of our writers ſays, the king ignobly careſſed him, with all the ardour of love that nature directs to a female beauty. However this may be, it is certain, the king appeared to covet the poſſeſſion of royalty for no other reaſon than that he might ſhower down his favours on this worthleſs minion. Honour, faith, promiſes, intereſt, and even decency, vaniſhed before this inſolent foreigner. He cauſed him to be married to his own niece, the earl of Glouceſter's ſiſter; and among other favours, he made him a preſent of thirty-two thouſand pounds, which the late king had allotted for the ſupport of a hundred and forty knights, who had engaged to carry his heart to Jeruſalem. By his advice Edward removed from their offices the chancellor, treaſurer, judges, and barons of the Exchequer, and filled their places with his followers. Langton, biſhop of Litchfield, was impriſoned, and the temporalities of his ſee ſequeſtered; while Gaveſton, being appointed great chamberlain and ſecretary of ſtate, as prime miniſter, governed the kingdom.

Now Edward ſummoned a parliament at Northampton, to regulate his father's funeral, together with his own marriage and coronation. A ſubſidy was granted for defraying expences; and an order was made, that the baſe coin which would not paſs in the late reign, ſhould be current all over the kingdom. The body of the late king, which had been carried to Waltham-Abbey, was now removed to Weſtminſter-Abbey, where it was buried with the uſual ceremonies, and a plain ſtone monument, erected to his memory, is to be ſeen to this day. Theſe rites performed, Gaveſton, before the king's departure for France, was appointed guardian of the realm, with full powers to diſpoſe of all vacant places and benefices. It is no wonder that the barons ſhould be offended at the favours thus laviſhed on a foreigner of inferior birth; who inſtead of endeavouring by his moderation to diſarm envy, diſplayed with the utmoſt oſtentation his power and influence. He was vain-glorious, profuſe, and rapacious. Hence his enemies daily multiplied, and nothing was wanting but time to cement their union to his ruin.

Edward, after a ſhort paſſage, landed at Bologne, where, having A. D. 1308. done homage to the king of France for Guienne and Ponthieu, his marriage with the princeſs Iſabella was ſolemnized with great ſplendor, in preſence of Philip, king of France; Lewis, king of Navarre; Charles, king of Sicily, and the king of the Romans. On his return to England with his queen, their coronation was performed in Weſtminſter-Abbey, by the biſhops of Saliſbury, Wincheſter, and Chicheſter, commiſſioned by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was prevented by ſickneſs from attending at the ceremony. But a difficulty aroſe, previous to its performance, which greatly alarmed Edward. The barons, incenſed at the inſolence of his favourite, who affected to treat them with the moſt mortifying contempt, refuſed to aſſiſt at the coronation, unleſs Gaveſton was baniſhed the kingdom. Edward promiſed to redreſs all their grievances, provided they would not force him to delay the ceremony; and the barons, in return, agreed to ſuſpend their reſentment. But the minion was ſo far from profiting by theſe national marks of diſguſt to his perſon and conduct, that he appeared with the moſt oſtentatious pomp in the proceſſion, in which he carried the crown of St. Edward before the king. The ceremony was no ſooner over, than the king renewed all the proofs of that fond attachment to his unworthy favourite, who became intoxicated with power, and looked down on the nobility with ſupercilious contempt. Nor did even the queen eſcape the attacks of his pointed ridicule. Iſabella, finding that not only her huſband's capacity required that he he ſhould be governed, but that his temper inclined him to it, thought ſhe was beſt entitled to the office; and harboured in her breaſt a mortal hatred to the man who had ſupplanted her. She was therefore glad to ſee the nobles uniting againſt Gaveſton; while he, perceiving that ſhe hated him, inſulted her in a moſt wanton manner.

The king's couſin-german, Thomas, earl of Lancaſter, one of the moſt opulent and powerful ſubjects in England, became head of that party of the nobles who deſired the depreſſion of this arrogant minion. The aſſociated barons bound themſelves by a ſolemn oath never to deſert each other, till the deteſted object of their hatred was baniſhed the kingdom. A parliament having been ſummoned at Weſtminſter, Lancaſter and his party, determined not to miſs ſo favourable an opportunity, came thither with an armed retinue; inſiſted on the baniſhment of Gaveſton; and demanded, that he ſhould abjure the realm before Midſummer; even the biſhops, in caſe of his refuſal, pronounced him excommunicated. Edward found it would be in vain to reſiſt, and therefore complied with their demands; but inſtead of ſending him to Gaſcony, the place of his birth, as the barons expected, the king appointed him lord-lieutenant of Ireland; attended him as far as Briſtol when he ſet out for his new government; and conferred on him lands and honours both in England and Gaſcony.

The king was inconſolable for the loſs of his favourite, and had recourſe to every expedient that might have a tendency to ſoften the barons, and pave the way for his return. In order to this, he conferred the high office of hereditary ſteward upon the earl of Lancaſter: the earl of Lincoln was bought off by other conceſſions, and earl Warrenne was mollified by civilities, promiſes, and valuable grants; ſo that Gaveſton's inſolence being no longer apparent, became leſs the object of general reſentment; and the king, finding matters ſufficiently prepared to anſwer his purpoſe, applied to the court of Rome, and obtained a diſpenſation from that oath which the barons had compelled Gaveſton to take, that he would for ever abjure the realm. By theſe lenient applications the anger of the nobles was appeaſed, and the whole aſſociation receded from their reſolution, except Guy, earl of Warwick. Edward, having obtained the completion of his wiſhes, recalled his abſent darling; and went as far as Cheſter to receive him, on his firſt landing from Ireland. He flew into his arms with tranſports of joy; and, having a little before gained the formal conſent of the barons in parliament for his re-eſtabliſhment, ſet no bounds to his extravagant fondneſs and infamous careſſes. This unmanly conduct of the king, rekindled the ſparks of popular odium againſt Gaveſton; who, forgetting every thing that was paſt in the embraces of his ſovereign, and blind to thoſe cauſes which had excited the reſentment of the barons againſt him, reſumed his wonted oſtentation and inſolence; and with a view to ſecure a ſtrong party in his favour, diveſted many people of their places, beſtowing them on his adherents; by which means he incurred the implacable hatred of thoſe whom he had deprived of their poſts, without gaining any real advantage, or ſtrengthening his own intereſt. His preſumptuous behaviour revived the animoſities of his enemies, who vowed revenge, particularly the earl of Lancaſter, from ſome private injury he had received; yet Gaveſton affected to contemn their reſentment, and the firſt noblemen in the kingdom were not exempted from the laſh of his ſatirical remarks.

A. D. 1310. Accordingly the barons, enraged at his public miſconduct and perſonal ridicule, re-united their councils for his deſtruction; and the king, dreading the conſequences of this union, renewed his proclamation, prohibiting the barons from coming to parliament in armour. This precept they obeyed; but at a parliament ſummoned to meet at Weſtminſter, they appeared with numerous retinues all armed, reſolving to compel the king to redreſs the grievances of the nation. With this view they propoſed to elect twelve perſons, who ſhould, till the term of Michaelmas in the following year, have authority to enact ordinances for the regulation of the king's houſehold, and for the government of the kingdom; and that the ordinances ſhould thenceforth, and for ever, have the force of laws; alſo, that the ordainers ſhould be allowed to form aſſociations for their ſtrict and regular obſervance. The king at firſt ſcrupled to grant their petition, which was indeed equivalent to a command, and a plain indication that he was utterly incapable of holding the reins of empire himſelf; but the barons threatening to proceed to extremities, he thought it moſt prudent to ſubmit; and iſſued a commiſſion, empowering the prelates, earls, and barons, to elect proper perſons for making the propoſed regulations. Theſe ordinances required ſheriffs to be men of property; aboliſhed the practice of iſſuing privy-ſeals for the ſuſpenſion of juſtice; prohibited the adulteration of coin; reſtrained the practice of purveyance; excluded foreigners from the office of farming the revenue; revoked all the grants of the crown; and ordered all payments to be made regularly into the Exchequer. By theſe it was enacted, that the church ſhould enjoy her privileges; that the two great charters ſhould be obſerved; that no prizes ſhould be taken by the king's officers without the owner's conſent; that none ſhould be intruſted with certain offices, but ſuch whoſe lands were ſufficient to anſwer for their actions; that parliaments ſhould be held annually; that all perſons proſecuted unjuſtly, and acquitted, ſhould be entitled to damages; that none ſhould be appealed maliciouſly, or outlawed in counties where they had no lands or tenements; that they ſhould neither forfeit their eſtates, nor loſe their lives, provided they ſurrendered themſelves to ſtand trial; that pardons for robbery, and other felonies, ſhould not be granted without good reaſon, but deemed void, unleſs agreeable to the king's oath, the courſe of law, and the cuſtom of the kingdom; that the king ſhould not leave the realm, nor declare war againſt any prince or potentate, without the conſent of the barons; that on his quitting the kingdom without their conſent, a guardian of the realm ſhould be appointed by the parliament, who ſhould alſo nominate the chief officers of ſtate, of the houſehold, of the revenue, in a word, all perſons employed under the crown, in any part of his majeſty's dominions; that the power of making war, or aſſembling the military tenants of the crown, ſhould no longer be ſolely veſted in the king, nor be exerciſed without the conſent of the nobility. That (which particularly grieved the king) all evil counſellors ſhould be removed from the king's perſon, particularly Henry de Beaumont, and his ſiſter the lady Veſey, who had obtained grants from the king, diſhonourable to the dignity and prejudicial to the prerogatives of the crown. That whereas Piers Gaveſton had given evil counſel to his majeſty; removed all perſons of integrity and abilities from the public offices, and ſupplied their places with his own worthleſs creatures; embezzled the king's treaſure; impoveriſhed the realm, by obtaining unreaſonable grants, and procuring blank charters, which he filled up according to his own pleaſure; protected robbers, arrogated to himſelf regal power and dignity, and formed combinations inconſiſtent with the law of the land; he ſhould, for theſe miſdemeanors, abjure the realm for ever, before the firſt of November; and if found in any part of his majeſty's dominions after that day, ſhould be treated as a public enemy. That al perſons in office ſhould take an oath to obſerve theſe ordinances; and that one biſhop, two earls, and as many barons, ſhould be choſe in every parliament to receive complaints againſt the king's miniſters, and others who ſhould violate theſe laws, and to puniſh offenders at diſcretion. The commiſſion concluded with declaring, that all this was done for the glory of God, the ſecurity of the church, and the advantage of the whole nation. In return for the royal condeſcenſion, the barons ſigned a declaration, in which they acknowledged that they owed theſe conceſſions to the royal bounty; promiſed that they ſhould never be drawn into precedent; and engaged that the power of the ordainers ſhould expire at the time ſtipulated. Edward, after allowing a parliamentary ſanction to be given to the above articles, ſecretly proteſted againſt them; declaring, that ſuch as ſhould be found prejudicial to either the king or his kingdom, were to be held as not ratified and confirmed; and the parliament was no ſooner diſſolved, than, repairing to York, where he was no longer under the control of the barons, he repealed the article relative to the exile of his favourite, as being unjuſt, and contrary to his coronation oath. After this imprudent act, he invited Gaveſton to return from Flanders, whither he had retired, declaring that he had been illegally baniſhed, and openly reſtored him to his former authority and credit. The barons, exaſperated at the king's having thus violated his engagements, renewed their confederacies againſt his odious favourite with redoubled zeal. The earl of Lancaſter was at their head: Guy, earl of Warwick, joined the confederacy with great warmth: Aymer de Valence, earl of Pembroke, and Humphry Bohun, earl of Hereford, the conſtable, added to it a great acceſſion of power and intereſt; even earl Warrenne, who had hitherto ſupported the royal cauſe, joined the diſcontented barons; and Robert de Winchelſea, archbiſhop of Canterbury, being of the ſame party, both the clergy and the people were united in the ſupport of the ſame common cauſe. The earl of Lancaſter inſtantly raiſing an army, marched to York, from whence Edward had removed to Newcaſtle: he then marched thither in purſuit of him; and the king had but juſt time to make his eſcape to Tinmouth, where he embarked on board a ſhip, and with his favourite arrived at Scarborough. In this fortreſs he depoſited the object of his affections: which, being well ſupplied with proviſions, was thought impregnable. Edward now proceeded by ſea; and landing at Knareſborough, went to York, in hopes of levying an army ſufficient to ſupport him againſt his enemies forces.

A. D. 1312. While the king, who found the people not inclined to join his ſtandard, was thus employed, Pembroke opportunely laid ſiege to the caſtle of Scarborough. Gaveſton, ſenſible of the bad condition of his garriſon, and want of proviſions, was obliged to capitulate on the nineteenth of May, having firſt ſtipulated that he ſhould remain in Pembroke's hands for two months, during which time means ſhould be uſed for bringing about an accommodation; but if the terms propoſed by the barons ſhould not be accepted, the caſtle ſhould be reſtored to him in the ſame condition as when he ſurrendered it. Pembroke having now the public enemy in his power, conducted him to the caſtle of Dedington, near Banbury, where he left him, probably by conſent of the confederates, with a feeble guard, under pretence of preſſing buſineſs. But, before he returned, Gaveſton was carried off by the earl of Warwick, who, together with the earls of Lancaſter, Arundel, and Hereford, in violation of their engagements, cauſed him to be beheaded by the hands of a common executioner, on the firſt of July. Edward having received the news of this affecting event, burſt into the moſt violent tranſports of grief, and ſuffered ſuch agitations as muſt have endangered his life, had not his mind been ſupported by determinations of revenge. His anguiſh became loud and impetuous; he denounced vengeance againſt the murderers of his beloved Gaveſton; and inſtantly made preparations for war in all parts of the kingdom. Having ſummoned a parliament to meet in Auguſt, he repaired to Dover, where he fortified the caſtle, received the oath of allegiance from the barons of the cinque ports, and then returning to London, aſſembled a conſiderable body of forces. But the barons, proclaiming tournaments in different counties, levied ſuch a number of troops as exceeded the royal army. The earl of Lancaſter at their head advanced towards London; and a civil war muſt have followed, had not the earls of Richmond and Glouceſter, with the pope's nuncio, and the French ambaſſador, interpoſed their good offices. A treaty was ſet on foot by their mediation, and a ſafe conduct granted to the earl of Hereford, and the lords Clifford and Botetourt, to appear at court, in order to treat about an accommodation. About this time the queen being delivered at Windſor of her eldeſt ſon Edward, the king was ſo elated, that he ſeemed to have forgot the loſs of Gaveſton. He ſent to inform the barons, that he would conſent to any thing they could reaſonably aſk. They demanded, that all the ordinances, without exception, ſhould be confirmed; and that a full pardon ſhould be granted for the murder of that traitor Gaveſton, for thus they called him. Edward at firſt rejected this condition; but the treaty was at laſt concluded on the following terms: that the barons ſhould come before the king in Weſtminſter-Hall, and aſk pardon on their knees; that all Gaveſton's effects, which had been ſeized at Newcaſtle, ſhould be reſtored; that they and their adherents ſhould have a full pardon for every thing that was paſt, under the ſanction of parliament; that a like pardon ſhould be granted to that unhappy favourite's friends and adherents; and that a ſupply ſhould be granted for carrying on a war with Scotland, immediately after the pacification.

A. D. 1314. The king and his barons being now happily reconciled, it was determined to ſend a powerful force againſt the Scots, who, taking advantage of the troubles in England, had made inroads into the northern counties, and committed the moſt dreadful ravages. The whole military force of the kingdom was aſſembled; and Edward put himſelf at the head of a powerful army, which, according to Scottiſh writers, amounted to an hundred thouſand men. Bruce, whoſe army was inferior in numbers, endeavoured to ſupply by art, what he wanted in ſtrength. He choſe the field of battle with the utmoſt prudence; and made the neceſſary preparations for receiving the Engliſh. He poſted his army at Bannock-burn, about two miles from Stirling, having a hill on his right flank, and a moraſs on his left. In the front of his camp ran a ſmall river, the banks of which, and the bed of the ſtream, he filled with ſharp ſtakes; and cauſed the ſame to be placed in deep pits, which were dug a little beyond the oppoſite bank, covering them over with turf. The van of the Engliſh army reached the neighbourhood of the Scottiſh camp in the evening of the twenty-fourth of June, and a ſmart ſkirmiſh enſued between two parties of cavalry. The Engliſh were led by Henry de Bohun, a younger brother of the earl of Hereford, and the Scots by Bruce in perſon. The conteſt was very bloody; and decided at laſt in favour of the Scots by the valour of Bruce, who riding up to Bohun, cleft his head with a battle-axe, in ſight of both armies. The Engliſh retreated, and night put a ſtop to the reinforcements which were marching to their relief; otherwiſe the action had become general. As ſoon as the morning appeared, each ſide prepared for the dreadful conflict. The wings, compoſed of cavalry, were commanded by the earls of Glouceſter and Hereford, and the king himſelf led the centre or main body. Bruce drew up his forces, conſiſting chiefly of foot, in three lines, and a body of reſerve. The centre was commanded by himſelf; the right wing by his brother Edward; the left by Randolph, and the body of reſerve by Sir James Douglas. When the Engliſh army was on the point of engaging, a diſpute happened between the earls of Glouceſter and Hereford, with regard to making the firſt attack upon the enemy. The former claimed this poſt of honour by cuſtom, and the latter as conſtable of England; but the earl of Glouceſter, impatient of control, ſprung forward to the charge, and fell into the covered pits, by which imprudent ſally of youth his whole ſquadron was thrown into confuſion, many of the horſes being ſtaked in a terrible manner, and he himſelf periſhed. Several of the concealed trenches had been diſcovered during the ſkirmiſh in the evening, and the king, in order to prevent a ſimilar misfortune, gave orders for a body of infantry to take a circuit round the moraſs, and to attack the main of the Scottiſh army in flank; and during the confuſion of that unexpected attack, the cavalry were to have forded a paſſage of the river, and fallen on the embarraſſed enemy ſword in hand.

The Engliſh archers, notwithſtanding this diſaſter, advanced againſt the right wing of the enemy, and galled them ſo effectually with their arrows, that they began to give way; which Sir James Douglas perceiving, he fell ſuddenly upon the rear of the Engliſh with ſuch impetuoſity, that they were routed with great ſlaughter. Meanwhile the centre, commanded by Edward, moved on againſt the main body of the Scots, and met with a warm reception from Bruce, who fought in the front of the line with amazing valour. The Engliſh were diſheartened by the great loſs they had ſuſtained; when they obſerved, on the heights towards their left, what they imagined to be another army marching leiſurely to ſurround them. This was nothing more than a number of waggoners and ſumpter boys, whom Bruce had ſupplied with military ſtandards, which at a diſtance gave them the appearance of a numerous body of forces. The Engliſh, ſtruck with a panic, fled with the utmoſt precipitation, and Bruce obtained a complete victory. Edward was hurried off from the field of battle by his attendants to Stirling-Caſtle; but the governor refuſing him admittance, he fled to Dunbar, where he was cordially received by Patric, earl of Marche, an old and faithful adherent of his family. In this obſtinate action great numbers of the Engliſh were killed, as well in the purſuit as the field; and more would have ſhared the ſame fate, had not the Scots been particularly attentive to the plunder, which is ſaid to have amounted to the value of two hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. Forty principal barons, with a multitude of knights, were taken priſoners; and the number of ſlain, according to Scottiſh hiſtorians, amounted to ſeven hundred lords, knights, and eſquires; but according to other accounts, there were about one hundred and fifty-four killed of the former, and near twenty thouſand of the latter. Of the Scots, between four and five thouſand were ſlain in the field of battle. Bruce treated all his priſoners with the greateſt humanity. He ſent the bodies of the earl of Glouceſter and lord Clifford to the Engliſh monarch; he diſmiſſed lord Monthermer, for whom he had a particular friendſhip, without ranſom; he exchanged the earl of Hereford and other noblemen, for his wife, his daughter, and ſiſter, the earl of Mar, and the biſhop of Glaſgow; and he cauſed the ſlain in battle to be decently interred. Edward, diffident of his ſecurity at Dunbar, embarked on board a ſmall veſſel and landed at Berwick, whence he repaired to York, and convened a parliament to take the ſtate of the nation into conſideration.

Bruce being now fixed on the throne by this deciſive battle of Bannock-burn, the independency of Scotland was ſecured; but Edward, inſtead of calling forth the united force of the whole nation to vindicate its honour, trampled upon it ſtill more by attaching himſelf to a new favourite. This was Hugh le d'Eſpenſer, or Spencer, a young man deſcended from a noble family, and an Engliſhman by birth. He poſſeſſed all the exterior accompliſhments of perſon and addreſs, neceſſary to engage the affections of Edward; but wanted that prudence and moderation which alone could have ſupported him, when ſurrounded by dangerous enemies. He was at firſt forced upon the king by the earl of Lancaſter, as chamberlain of the houſehold, in which capacity he ſo ingratiated himſelf with Edward by his obſequious behaviour, that he gained the ſame aſcendency over him, which Gaveſton had formerly poſſeſſed. His father, who had alſo acquired a conſiderable ſhare in the adminiſtration, was venerable for his age; and during his whole life had been reſpected for his wiſdom, his valour, and his intrepidity. Young Spencer had no ſooner ſucceeded Gaveſton in the king's affection, than he began to exerciſe a moſt arbitrary ſway in the direction of public affairs, and from a dependent, became the rival of Lancaſter. He had married Eleanor, one of the co-heireſſes of Gilbert de Clare, earl of Glouceſter, and in right of this lady enjoyed the greateſt part of Glamorganſhire. But his ambition and avarice induced him to encroach on the ſhares of the other ſiſters, and even uſurp the lands of other proprietors. He ſeized the caſtle of Newport from Hugh de Audley, who had married one of his ſiſters-in-law, and afterwards compelled him to grant a conveyance confirming his poſſeſſion; he likewiſe prevailed on the king to reſume the grants of ſome caſtles he had beſtowed on Roger de Mortimer, and appropriated them to himſelf. But the moſt exceptionable part of his conduct was his diſpute with John de Mowbray, who had married Aliva, daughter of William de Barouſe, lord of Gower. By a ſpecial deed, this nobleman had granted the lands and honours of Gower to his daughter Aliva, and his ſon-in-law Mowbray, and to their heirs, with the remainder to Humphrey de Bohun, earl of Hereford, and his heirs. By virtue of this grant, Mowbray took poſſeſſion, without any licence from the king, of whom it was held in capite; and young Spencer made uſe of this pretence to obtain judgment, by which the lands were forfeited.

Provoked at this violation of their privileges, the lords of the Marches were determined to humble the pride of this over-bearing minion. The earls of Lancaſter and Hereford, Audley, Roger de Clifford, the two Mortimers, with many others, flew to arms, and demanded peremptorily the baniſhment of the two Spencers. The king refuſed to comply; upon which they marched to London, and preſented to parliament an accuſation againſt his two miniſters and favourites. The Spencers were condemned to baniſhment, without a ſingle crime being proved againſt them; and upon their ſubmitting quietly to their ſentence, the barons diſbanding their army, ſeparated to their ſeveral caſtles. But the patient acquieſcence of Edward, to the demands of his turbulent ſubjects, ſo weakened his authority, that others thought they might deſpiſe it without impunity.

A. D. 1321. As the queen had occaſion to paſs by Leeds in Kent, belonging to lord Badleſmere, ſhe diſpatched one of her ſervants to acquaint him of her intention of lodging there that night, but ſhe was refuſed admittance, and ſome of her attendants were killed. This inſult upon a princeſs, who was herſelf an enemy to the Spencers, not one of the confederates juſtified, and the king aſſembled an army to puniſh the offender. He took his caſtle, and put the governor, with ſeveral of the garriſon to the ſword. Having now ſome forces on foot, Edward ventured to recal his favourites, and reſolved at the ſame time to attack their enemies. He therefore haſtily advanced to the Marches of Wales, and found them entirely unprepared for reſiſtance. Many of the barons in thoſe parts ſtrove to appeaſe him by ſubmiſſion, on which he ſeized their caſtles, and cauſed their perſons to be committed to cuſtody. Lancaſter, in order to prevent the total ruin of his party, ſummoned his vaſſals, declaring he had entered into an alliance with the king of Scotland, and had received a promiſe of a reinforcement, under the command of Randolph, earl of Murray, and Sir James Douglas. Being ſoon after joined by the earl of Hereford, he advanced with all his forces againſt the king, who having aſſembled an army of thirty thouſand men, was much ſuperior to his enemies in number. Young Spencer now returned to England, and preſented a petition, ſetting forth the illegality of the ſentence pronounced againſt him, and offered to vindicate his innocence againſt all oppoſition. He was therefore committed to cloſe cuſtody, and his eſtate taken into the royal protection, till the affair ſhould be decided by a judicial proceſs. His petition was referred to the inſpection of the prelates belonging to the province of Canterbury, who condemned the ſentence as illegal and unjuſt; upon which Hugh was ſet at liberty, and admitted into the king's council again.

A. D. 1322. Encouraged by the hope of a powerful aſſiſtance, the earl of Lancaſter took poſt at Burton upon Trent, in order to defend the paſſage of that river; and to prevent Edward croſſing it, a ſtrong party was placed on the bridge, which they maintained three days ſucceſſively againſt the attacks of the royal army. At length the king forded the river; and Lancaſter reſolving to give him battle, advanced with great confidence and alacrity; but on perceiving the vaſt ſuperiority in point of numbers, he was intimidated, and retreated towards Borough-Bridge, in order, if poſſible, to reach the borders of Scotland. But Sir Andrew Harcla, governor of Carliſle, ſuſpecting his deſign, poſted himſelf with a body of troops to diſpute his paſſage over the river Eure, ſo that Lancaſter found himſelf reduced to the wretched alternative of venturing an engagement, or of ſurrendering himſelf a priſoner to Harcla. He choſe the former; but the earl of Hereford being ſlain in the firſt charge, and Sir Roger de Clifford dangerouſly wounded, the reſt of the troops fled with great precipitation, and Lancaſter was taken priſoner, with about one hundred barons and knights. The next day, after having been removed from York to his own caſtle, which had ſurrendered to the king without oppoſition, he was arraigned in the caſtle-hall before the earls of Richmond, Pembroke, and ſeveral others, who found him guilty of appearing in arms againſt the king, and condemned him to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, but the ſentence was afterwards changed, in conſideration of his being a prince of the blood. This noble earl now experienced the ſame indignities which had before been practiſed upon Gaveſton. He was dreſſed in mean apparel, placed upon a mean horſe without a bridle, and a hood upon his head. In this ignominious manner he was conducted to an eminence in the neighbourhood of Pomfret, amidſt the ſcoffs of the rabble, and there beheaded, on the twenty-third of March. Thus fell Thomas, earl of Lancaſter, one of the moſt powerful barons of the kingdom. Lord Badleſmere, the principal promoter of this inſurrection, Gifford, Cheney, Fleming, and about eighteen others, were afterwards executed at Canterbury, Windſor, Glouceſter, and London, in terrorem, for a terror to the country: many were confined in priſon, and others fled from the kingdom. The king's friends were rewarded out of their eſtates. Harcla, in particular, received for his ſervices a large grant, with the earldom of Carliſle. He ſoon after forfeited his eſtate, with his life, for carrying on a treaſonable correſpondence with the king of Scotland. But the greateſt part of the forfeitures to the crown were ſeized by young Spencer, whoſe rapacity had no bounds. Hence many of the barons were much diſpleaſed at ſo partial a diviſion of the ſpoils; and the envy againſt the king's minion roſe to a greater height than ever, which was increaſed by his uſual inſolence, inflamed by ſucceſs, which impelled him to commit many acts of violence and injuſtice. He thus became ſtill more the object of popular averſion, and all the relatives of the attainted barons vowed ſecretly revenge, which conſtituted the ſource of future convulſions. Things being in this ſtate of confuſion, there could be little room to hope for ſucceſs in foreign wars; whence Edward, having made another fruitleſs attempt upon Scotland, found it neceſſary to conclude a peace of thirteen years. And though Bruce's title to the crown was not acknowledged in that treaty, he was ſatisfied with ſecuring the poſſeſſion of it for ſo long a time. He had bravely repelled all the attacks of England; had carried the war both into that kingdom and into Ireland; and his throne was firmly eſtabliſhed, not only by force of arms, but in the affection of his people; yet he muſt naturally feel ſome inquietude, while at war with a kingdom, which, however divided by faction, was greatly ſuperior both in riches and in number of people. At the ſame time, this truce was the more ſeaſonable to England, as the nation was then threatened with the danger of entering into a war with France.

A. D. 1325. It happened that Charles the Fair, third ſon, and the third ſucceſſor of Philip the Fair, ſummoned Edward to do him homage for his province of Guienne. Spencer, who ſaw all the conſequences that might attend his own authority during the king's abſence, would not conſent to his departure. It was likewiſe the unanimous opinion of parliament, that it was improper for the king to go abroad in perſon, but that ambaſſadors ſhould be ſent to the court of France, requeſting that the homage might be delayed to a more convenient time. Charles refuſed to poſtpone the ceremony, and ſent a body of troops to attack Guienne. In this dilemma, the fertile imagination of Iſabella furniſhed her with an expedient for removing all difficulties, and putting it in her power to be revenged on the younger Spencer, whom ſhe deteſted as a rival in the affection of her conſort. She propoſed that the king ſhould reſign the ſovereignty of Guienne to his ſon, and that the prince ſhould be ſent to Paris, to perform the required duties of a vaſſal. This device concealed a ſnare imperceptible by the Engliſh council; Edward and Spencer were charmed with the queen's contrivance, and the young prince was ſoon after ſent to Paris. Iſabella had now gained her point, and determined, by accompanying her ſon, to make uſe of her good fortune by procuring the deſtruction of her enemies. Edward and his minion were ſoon convinced of the egregious blunder they had committed, in truſting the heir-apparent to the crown in the hands of an ambitious woman. Iſabella, on her arrival in France, had found there a great number of fugitives, who had belonged to the earl of Lancaſter's party, and mutual hatred of Spencer ſoon created a ſecret friendſhip between them, and that princeſs. Among the reſt was Roger Mortimer, a powerful baron of the Welſh Marches, one of the leaders of the late rebellion, who had fortunately made his eſcape out of priſon to France. This young nobleman, with the graces of perſon and addreſs, in a ſhort time engaged the affections of the queen, who ſacrificed to a vitious paſſion every ſentiment of honour and fidelity to her huſband. The exiled barons daily reſorted to her court, where Mortimer lived with her in the utmoſt intimacy. Edward, informed of this intrigue, ordered the queen to return; but in anſwer, ſhe declared her reſolution of continuing in France, till the Spencers ſhould be baniſhed England with infamy and diſgrace. This declaration covered her intrigues with a veil of decency, and procured her popularity among the Engliſh.

A. D. 1326. When every lenient method was tried in vain, to bring the queen to a ſenſe of her duty, reſource was had to the pope, who readily engaged in the cauſe of the injured Edward. His holineſs wrote a very preſſing letter to the king of France, inſiſting, even on pain of excommunication, that the queen of England ſhould be ſent back to her huſband. Charles was ſo affected by this menace of the pontiff, and much more by the ſhameful commerce carried on between Mortimer and his ſiſter, that he was determined to ſupport her openly no longer. Having for ſome time expected this event, Iſabella had formed an alliance with William, count of Hainault and Holland, to whoſe daughter ſhe had contracted her ſon, the prince of Wales; who in return promiſed her an aſylum in his dominions, and to aſſiſt her with a body of troops. She retired therefore directly into Hainault, where ſhe was received with the ſtrongeſt marks of kindneſs and reſpect. The utmoſt diſpatch, and every probable expedient were now uſed for raiſing a body of forces to attend the queen and the young prince to England. Three thouſand men were now enliſted in her ſervice, placed under the command of John, the count of Hainault's brother. With theſe ſhe ſailed from Dort, and landed without the leaſt oppoſition on the coaſt of Suffolk, with the earl of Kent, who accompanied her, on the twenty-fourth of September. Soon after her landing, ſhe was joined by the earls of Norfolk and Leiceſter, two princes of the blood, with all their followers. The biſhops of Lincoln, Hereford, and Ely, added not only the authority of their characters, but brought with them their vaſſals; and even Robert de Watteville, whom the king had ſent to oppoſe her in Suffolk, ſurrendered up to her all his forces. Iſabella, to give the greater appearance of juſtice to her cauſe, renewed her declaration, that her only purpoſe was to deliver the king and nation from the tyranny of the Spencers, and of chancellor Baldoc, their creature. This proclamation had the deſired effect: it allured the populace, and the barons thought themſelves ſecure by having the prince in her army.

The king at this time was at London, where he made a vain attempt on the citizens to eſpouſe his cauſe. Perceiving that no reliance could be placed on their loyalty, he ſet out for the weſtern parts of England, flattering himſelf that he ſhould there meet with better ſucceſs; that his ſubjects, in ſuch an obſcure corner, would commiſerate his diſtreſs, and ſupport their king againſt the unnatural rebellion of an implacable woman. Edward had no ſooner left London, than popular rage broke out with the utmoſt violence againſt his miniſters. The outrageous mob not only plundered but murdered thoſe who were moſt obnoxious to them; among theſe was the biſhop of Exeter, whom they ſeized as he was paſſing through the ſtreets, beheaded him and threw his body into the Thames. They gained poſſeſſion of the Tower by ſurpriſe, and then agreed to ſhew no mercy to thoſe who ſhould dare to oppoſe the prince and queen Iſabella. The ſame ſpirit ſpread throughout England, and filled the few perſons with the utmoſt terror who ſtill adhered to the unfortunate king.

John de Hainault, with the earl of Kent, at the head of the foreign forces, purſued the king to Briſtol, and inveſted the caſtle, which the elder Spencer, who had been left governor thereof, would have defended to the laſt extremity; but the garriſon, infected with the diſloyalty of the times, mutinying againſt him, delivered him up to his enemies. Not the leaſt reſpect was paid to this venerable nobleman. All his former ſervices, with his virtues, were alike forgotten; and though near ninety years of age, he was condemned without trial, and hanged on a gibbet; after which his body was cut to pieces and thrown to the dogs. Thus were ſacrificed to the unjuſt reſentment of a ferocious nobility, the laws both human and divine, and all the common dictates of humanity.

The king, purſuant to his reſolution, had embarked for Ireland, but being driven back by contrary winds, he endeavoured to conceal himſelf in the Welſh mountains. However, by the force of all-powerful gold, the difficulty of diſcovering his retreat was ſoon removed; and the king was taken at Caerfilly, in Glamorganſhire, with the younger Spencer, Baldoc the chancellor, and a few domeſtics; all the reſt of his ſycophant courtiers having deſerted him in the midſt of his misfortunes. The king was committed to the care of the earl of Leiceſter, and confined in Kenilworth-Caſtle. His favourite, the young Spencer, was executed without any form of trial, with the moſt ſhocking circumſtances of barbarity and inſult. Chancellor Baldoc, being a prieſt, was ſent to the biſhop of Hereford's palace in London, where he was aſſaulted by the populace, who uſed him with unſpeakable cruelty, in conſequence of which he ſoon after expired, having been previouſly confined in Newgate.

A. D. 1327. At this time a parliament was ſummoned to meet at Weſtminſter, and on the day appointed the houſe was ſurrounded by the people, inveighing againſt the king and his adherents. The biſhop of Hereford having declared aloud, that the queen could not again cohabit with Edward, without the moſt imminent danger of her life, put the queſtion, Whether they would have the father or the ſon for their king? Deſiring them to conſider the alternative of their choice, and give their anſwer the following day in the afternoon. When they were aſſembled, the few adherents of the king, over-awed by the clamours without doors, and the influence of faction within, kept a profound ſilence; and on repetition of the queſtion, it was reſolved that young Edward ſhould be raiſed to the throne; accordingly the lords did homage to him; after which he was conducted into Weſtminſter-Hall, and preſented to the multitude as their ſovereign, the archbiſhop addreſſing them in the words of the old adage, Vox populi, vox Dei eſt, "The voice of the people is the voice of God;" and the biſhop of Hereford harangued them to the ſame purpoſe. Silence being commanded, the prince was proclaimed king, and his inauguration ſolemnized. Some of the prelates refuſing to ſwear fealty, they were forcibly conveyed by the mob to Guildhall, and there compelled not only to take the oath, but ſolemnly promiſe to maintain and defend the privileges of the city of London. But it was not ſufficient for the queen to have ſeized the perſon of the king, it was alſo thought by her neceſſary, that he ſhould reſign his ſceptre. As young Edward's authority could not be eſtabliſhed while his father remained unimpeached, it was reſolved formally to depoſe that unfortunate monarch. To this end, writs were iſſued to return eight and forty members from North and South Wales, in order to ſtrengthen Mortimer's party. On the ſeſſion of parliament, ſix articles of impeachment were drawn up by the biſhop of Wincheſter, againſt the friendleſs king, importing his incapacity for government, apparent from his being biaſſed by wicked miniſters, to his own diſhonour and the prejudice of his ſubjects; his purſuit of objects unworthy of his dignity; his neglect of adminiſtration; his want of military capacity, from whence reſulted the loſs of Scotland, together with the territories in Gaſcony and Ireland; his diſtreſſing the moſt holy church, by proſecuting and impriſoning eccleſiaſtics; and finally, the tendency of his general conduct to the utter deſtruction of the kingdom. Theſe articles having been read in preſence of the prince, ſeated on the throne, it was reſolved, that young Edward ſhould aſſume the reins of government, and that Edward II. ſhould no longer be ſtyled king of England, but Edward of Caernarvon, the king's father. When the ſentence was paſſed, the queen ſhed a few ſtrained tears, and even affected to ſwoon at the declaration of her huſband's depoſition: the young prince alſo, as he had been tutored, refuſed accepting the crown without his father's conſent. To obviate this objection, the parliament deputed three biſhops, two earls, with the ſame number of barons, abbots, and juſtices, to go to Kenilworth, and acquaint the king with their reſolution. The biſhops of Hereford and Lincoln were ſent to converſe with him before the deputies arrived, in order to prepare him for the approaching change of his condition. They adviſed him, after many profeſſions of regard and attachment, to reſign voluntarily his crown, aſſuring him, on a compliance, of the moſt honourable treatment, and of the bad effects which would inevitably reſult from a refuſal, as the parliament were determined, in that caſe, to exclude all his children from the ſucceſſion, and place a ſtranger on the throne of his anceſtors. This inſinuation awakened all the fondneſs of a father in the ſoul of the unfortunate Edward; he pauſed, he ſhed tears to the remembrance of his fallen ſtate, conſented to admit the deputies, and retired to his chamber. When they entered, the commiſſioners proceeded to read the articles of impeachment, and demanded his immediate reſignation. Edward, deeply affected with the thought of being hurled from the ſummit of human grandeur, was unable to ſtand the ſhock: his ſpirits forſook him, and he had fallen to the ground, had not the biſhop of Lincoln ſupported him in this dreadful moment of conflicting paſſions. On the recovery of his ſpirits, ſenſible that arguments and remonſtrances would now be ineffectual, thanking them for the honour done his ſon, the timid Edward proceeded to the ceremony of reſignation, by delivering to the commiſſioners the crown, ſceptre, and other enſigns of royalty, which had been brought thither for that purpoſe; and Sir William Truſſel, who acted as procurator for the parliament, renounced in their name all future allegiance and homage. The deputies, on their return to London, having made their report to parliament, Iſabella revived from her hypocritical dejection, and the prince agreed to his own elevation. Accordingly the uſual proclamation at an acceſſion was made throughout England; and the prince, after having been knighted, was crowned on Sunday the fifth of February, by Walter, archbiſhop of Canterbury, in preſence of all the principal nobility.

Theſe atrocious acts of violence could not fail in opening the eyes of a deluded people. The perfidy and infidelity of the queen, her impudent hypocriſy, her more infamous commerce with Mortimer, changed the current of popular odium. Iſabella and her paramour were regarded with horror, while the fate of Edward was generally deplored. A ſcene of majeſty in diſtreſs attracted the pity, the compaſſion, the tears of every humane heart. Leiceſter, now earl of Lancaſter, felt all the power of tender ſympathy, and therefore treated his priſoner with reſpectful kindneſs. The queen and her adherents knew the power, and dreaded the effects, of Engliſh compaſſion. They foreſaw all the fatal conſequences to themſelves, ſhould Edward be reſtored to the ſeat of power. They could but know their own black deeds of guilt; yet were not eaſy without adding the horrid crime of premeditated murder to their black catalogue. They therefore removed Edward from Kenilworth to Berkley-Caſtle, in Glouceſterſhire, where he was committed to the care of Sir John Gurney and John de Montravers, who treated him with cruelty and inſolence; but the goodneſs of Edward's conſtitution ſupported him under theſe afflictions, till orders arrived from the queen and Mortimer to finiſh the inhuman tragedy. Theſe deteſtable wretches, in compliance with the orders of their more deteſtable abettors, hurried him about from one caſtle to another, in order to elude his friends endeavours for his releaſe, and in the courſe of theſe migrations, treated him with the moſt barbarous indignities. They contrived horrid noiſes to prevent his natural repoſe; they compelled him to eat the moſt diſguſtful food; they lodged him in a damp tower, not only expoſed to the inclemencies of the weather, but alſo the ſtench of human carcaſes, piled on the roof of his chamber: the wretched apartment in which he lay, was generally overflowed with water, and he was ſubjected to perpetual inſults from the meaneſt ſlaves, who were encouraged to treat him in that unworthy manner. It is ſaid, that one day, when the king was to be ſhaved, they ordered dirty water to be brought for that purpoſe from a ditch, when deſiring that it might be changed, and being refuſed this poor requeſt, he burſt into tears, and ſaid, that in ſpite of them he would be ſhaved with warm water. The queen and Mortimer, who were the inſtigators of theſe inhuman tortures, finding them ineffectual, and apprehenſive of condign puniſhment, ſhould the truth reach the ears of young Edward, reſolved to anticipate ſuch a diſcovery by the immediate murder of the old king, for which a moſt execrable expedient was contrived. The two villains, to whom the unhappy Edward was committed, having received their orders, entered his chamber at midnight, and the ruffians who attended them, held him down with a table, which they threw upon him, and thruſt into his fundament a red-hot iron, inſerting it through a horn, in order to prevent any external marks of violence upon his perſon. But the guards and ſervants were ſufficiently appriſed of the bloody deed, by the ſcreams with which the king, in ſuch unutterable agonies, filled the caſtle. Theſe proclaimed to the world the infernal practices of an adulterous woman and her vile lover; and though no wound or blemiſh appeared on the ſkin, the muſcles of the face were ſo diſtorted as plainly to ſhew the exquiſite agonies he had undergone. Thus periſhed this weak and unhappy prince, on the twenty-firſt of September, in the forty-third year of his age, and twentieth of his reign. His body was interred in the abbey of St. Peter, in Glouceſter, and no inquiry made.

The executioners, Montravers and Gurney, were the ſubjects of general deteſtation; and when the queen loſt her power, and a revolution took place in favour of her ſon, they were obliged to provide for their ſafety by flight. At length Gurney, being ſeized at Marſeilles, was put on board a ſhip, in order to be carried to England; but by ſecret orders was executed at ſea. Montravers, after having been ſeveral years in Germany, found means to perform ſervices for Edward III. on account of which a pardon was granted him.

Edward II. by his queen Iſabella of France, had two ſons and two daughters, namely, Edward, his eldeſt ſon and ſucceſſor; John, created afterwards earl of Cornwall, who died young at Perth; Jane, married to David Bruce, king of Scotland; and Eleanor, eſpouſed to Reginald, count of Guelders.

England was afflicted during this reign with a moſt grievous famine. The parliament alſo endeavoured to regulate the price of proviſions. Two pounds eight ſhillings of our preſent money for the beſt ox not fed with corn; if fed with corn, three pounds twelve ſhillings. A fat hog of two years old, ten ſhillings; a fat wether, unſhorn, five ſhillings; if ſhorn, three ſhillings and ſixpence; a fat gooſe, ſeven-pence halfpenny; a fat capon ſixpence; a fat hen, three-pence; two chickens, three-pence; four pigeons, three-pence; two dozen of eggs three-pence.

Impartial Character of EDWARD II.

Edward II. is ſaid to have reſembled his father in the lineaments of his face, as well as in the exact elegance and ſymmetry of ſhape; having a majeſtic and noble ſtature, and a deportment altogether engaging and agreeable; and he followed his example in a ſtrict obſervance of conjugal duties, to which he met with a very ungrateful return, in the vitious profligacy of an adulterous abandoned woman: but the qualifications of his mind bore no kind of proportion to his bodily perfections; for he was deficient in foreſight, in judgment, and in courage. His mental debility urged him to a conduct that had all the appearance of infatuation. Being a ſlave to his own paſſions, he too readily committed to others the weight of that government which he had neither the ability nor inclination to ſupport. Of a warm and benevolent heart, he was ſtrongly inclined to friendſhip; of weak and narrow intellects, he had not diſcernment to chooſe a friend; of a lazy and indolent diſpoſition, he took up with the firſt that chance threw in his way; and when he had fixed his choice, he could never be perſuaded to withdraw his attachment. The grand ſource of that univerſal contempt which he incurred, was an ill-founded and obſtinate affection for favourites. This incorrigible paſſion, prompted him to ſuch a ſuſpicious deportment, accompanied with thoſe arbitrary meaſures of his miniſters, as rouſed the ſpirit of a free people, which, inflamed by the intrigues of an infamous queen, involved him, his minions, and all their adherents, in one common ruin. To theſe cauſes have been attributed all the calamities that befel him in his life, and the untimely death to which he was at laſt brought. Hence a ſtriking example is left on record to ſucceeding princes, of the dire effects of gratifying private paſſions, in oppoſition to the will or intereſt of the public; while at the ſame time is exhibited, in glowing colours, the fatal conſequences of relying on the guidance of any one individual, in the important affairs of government. If the ſtrong attachment of Edward to Gaveſton was not the reſult of unnatural inclination, of which it is our duty to acknowledge, not the leaſt ſhadow of poſitive proof is to be found in the records of authentic hiſtory; yet it will be acknowledged, he might have placed his regard on more deſerving objects; at leaſt, he might have avoided thoſe weak expreſſions of womaniſh fondneſs, which laid the ground of vulgar ſuſpicion, and an imputation of other crimes, of which his favourites were alone guilty. His tragical death ought not to be aſcribed to the barons; for Mortimer and the queen only could have ſuch reaſons, as to involve themſelves in ſo black a crime. Had theſe wretches ſuffered the degraded monarch to live, he probably might have excuſed the parliament having excluded him from the throne; and happy would it have been for him, could he have been allowed to deſcend into a private ſtation, which, being of a harmleſs diſpoſition, he was beſt qualified to fill; but viewed in the glaſs of truth, under the character of a prince, we cannot but conclude, that he was deſtitute of all thoſe noble endowments of mind that are neceſſary for guiding the wheels of government, and to form only the outlines of an Engliſh monarch.

A. D. 1327. EDWARD III. ſurnamed of Windſor, being raiſed to the throne during his minority, the parliament appointed a regency, conſiſting of five biſhops, three earls, and four barons, to ſuperintend the adminiſtration of public affairs; and the earl of Lancaſter reſtored to the dignity of high ſteward, was intruſted with the guardianſhip of the king's perſon. But the chief authority was engroſſed by Iſabella, queen dowager, and her favourite Mortimer. The laſt, having obtained a reverſal of his ſentence, was reſtored to his lands and honours, to which were added the eſtates of the earls of Arundel and Winton, in North Wales. The queen, likewiſe, obtained from parliament a grant of twenty thouſand pounds, to pay her debts, and the ſame ſum as an annual jointure, together with all the treaſures of the two Spencers, the earl of Arundel, and of Baldoc, the chancellor. The French ſubjects were all releaſed, and their effects reſtored; hoſtilities ceaſed in Guienne; and peace was eſtabliſhed between France and England. Public rejoicings were made on this occaſion, which were interrupted by advice from the frontiers, that a body of Scots had made an attempt to ſurpriſe the caſtle of Norham, though without ſucceſs; for by the vigilance of Sir Robert Mannors, the governor, they were obliged to retire with conſiderable loſs. The Engliſh regency endeavoured in vain to procure a peace; Bruce being determined, though bending under the weight of years and infirmities, to take advantage of Edward's minority, and the unſettled ſtate of the kingdom. He was ſoon at the head of a numerous army, aſſiſted by his two moſt experienced generals, Murray and Douglas. Theſe gallant officers had been long bred in the field of military action. Their forces were trained in the ſame ſchool, inured to the ſame hardſhips, and perfectly qualified, from their manner of life, for a deſultory war. The whole equipage of the troops, except a body of about four thouſand cavalry, well armed, conſiſted of a bag of oatmeal, as a ſupply in caſe of neceſſity, which each ſoldier carried behind him, together with a thin plate of iron, upon which he baked his cakes. But his ordinary ſubſiſtence was the cattle which he ſeized, in cooking which he was remarkably expeditious: after flaying the animal, the Scots placed the ſkin upon ſome ſtakes, hanging looſe in the form of a bag, which, thus ſuſpended, ſerved them as a cauldron for the boiling their victuals. Soldiers like theſe, wholly unincumbered, who could attack or retreat from their enemy at pleaſure, were well adapted to carry their ravages into the northern counties. To chaſtiſe their inſolence, and check their progreſs, the Engliſh miniſtry aſſembled an army of near ſixty thouſand men. Edward, glowing with military ardour, even in theſe his early years, placed himſelf at their head, and marched without delay from Durham in ſearch of the enemy. He ſet out in the middle of July, ſuppoſing they might be ſomewhere between Durham and Carliſle; but he could perceive no ſigns of an enemy. The flame and ſmoke of burning villages pointed out plainly the place where they were encamped; yet upon haſtily marching thither, he found them gone, and by new marks of devaſtation, diſcovered that they had moved to a diſtant place. Having for ſome time haraſſed his army in this fruitleſs ſearch, he advanced to the northward, and croſſed the Tyne, with a reſolution of waiting for them in their return homewards, and of taking ample vengeance on them for all their depredations. But their frequent incurſions had ſo much waſted the country, that it was impoſſible for him to obtain ſubſiſtence for his army; and he was obliged to change his operations and return to the ſouth. All track of the enemy was now loſt; and though he promiſed to any one who ſhould bring him an account of their motions, a reward of one hundred pounds a year, he remained for ſeveral days inactive, from his not knowing where to find them. At length he received intelligence, that they were encamped on a declivity of a hill, beyond the river Were. Edward advanced againſt the enemy; when approaching them, he found they had choſen their ground with ſuch judgment, that it would be the utmoſt raſhneſs to croſs the river in their front, and attack them in their preſent ſituation. The young king, impatient for revenge and glory, challenged them, if they dared, to meet him in the open field. This bravado, Douglas could ill brook, and was inclined to accept the challenge; but he was overruled by Murray, who returned in anſwer to Edward, "That he never, in any of his operations, took the advice of an enemy." The king therefore kept his preſent ſtation, oppoſite to the Scots, expecting that he ſhould be able to reduce them by famine, having received intimation that their proviſions were nearly expended. This being really the caſe, the Scots decamped at midnight, marched ſome miles higher up the river, and encamped on the brow of another hill, flanked by a wood. The Engliſh no ſooner were informed of their retreat, than they followed them, ſtill keeping on the north ſide of the river, and poſted themſelves on another hill, oppoſite to that which the Scots poſſeſſed. While the two armies lay in this poſition, an incident happened which had almoſt proved fatal to the Engliſh. Douglas having got the word, and an exact delineation of the Engliſh camp, entered it ſecretly in the night, with a body of two hundred reſolute ſoldiers, and advanced as far as the royal tent, with a deſign of ſurpriſing and carrying off the perſon of the king; but in that critical moment, the chaplain and chamberlain, who ſacrificed their lives to his ſafety, alarming the guards, Douglas was immediately ſurrounded, and eſcaped with much difficulty, by cutting a paſſage through thoſe who oppoſed him. The Scottiſh army decamped ſoon after in the dead of night, and having marched with the utmoſt expedition, by the way of Carliſle, they reached their own country without further loſs. Edward, on entering the place where the Scots had encamped, found only ſix Engliſhmen, whom the enemy, after having broke their legs, had tied to trees, in order to prevent their carrying any intelligence to their countrymen.

The king was much chagrined at his being thus diſappointed in his firſt campaign; and knowing it would be in vain to purſue the enemy, he retired to York, where he diſbanded the greateſt part of his forces. However, the marks of bravery he had diſcovered in this enterprize, were extremely pleaſing to his troops, and regarded by the nation as ſure indications of an illuſtrious reign. The general cenſure fell upon Mortimer, who was now an object of public deteſtation; and every meaſure purſued by him only tended to increaſe the hatred of the people againſt him and Iſabella the queen.

Now a parliament having been ſummoned at Lincoln, the king received a ſupply for the proſecution of the Scottiſh war, and to defray the expences of his marriage with Philippa, ſecond daughter of William, count of Holland and Hainault. This princeſs arrived in England with a very ſplendid retinue. When approaching London, ſhe was met by the mayor and aldermen in their formalities, who expreſſed their affection for their ſovereign by a ſervice of plate; and a ſolemn proceſſion of the clergy introduced her into the city. From thence ſhe ſet out for York, where the king then reſided, and the nuptials were ſolemnized with conſiderable ſplendour.

The queen's favourite, who at this time uſurped the whole of ſovereign authority, had taken no care to ſecure for himſelf a place in the council of regency, nor did he, in any public meaſures, conſult either with the princes of the blood or with the nobility; hence all the envy which had attended Gaveſton and the two Spencers, now fell on the deteſted Mortimer. He ſaw his danger; and ſenſible of the increaſing hatred of the people, thought it neceſſary to ſecure a peace upon any terms. His commiſſioners, therefore, with thoſe appointed by Bruce, began their conferences at Newcaſtle. As the claim of England to the government of Scotland was the principal cauſe that excited the animoſities between both nations, Mortimer conſented to reſign this pretenſion, and to acknowledge Robert an independent ſovereign: in return for which, Robert ſtipulated to pay thirty thouſand marks to England. Thus a treaty was concluded, and even ratified by parliament, on ſuch terms, which Bruce, at any other juncture, could never have obtained, after a ſeries of ſucceſs. It excited univerſal clamour in the kingdom. The people expreſſed their reſentment in the ſtrongeſt terms. They declared openly that ſuch a peace was neither honourable nor neceſſary; that thoſe who concluded it had baſely ſacrificed both the blood and treaſure of the nation to private views; and that the queen, who under pretence of her late huſband's incapacity, had uſurped his authority, ſufficiently diſcovered how unable ſhe herſelf was to hold the reins of government. Nor did Mortimer, who treated his ſuperiors with the moſt ſupercilious contempt, eſcape the ſhafts of public diſpleaſure. The barons were highly incenſed at the arrogance of this inſolent upſtart. Lancaſter, Norfolk, and Kent, formed a confederacy for their mutual ſafety; with whom were united the new archbiſhop of Canterbury, with the prelates of London and Weſtminſter; theſe held private conferences at London, reſolving to exhibit articles of impeachment againſt the favourite; to inquire into the king's death, and to demand a reſumption of the forfeited eſtates granted to the queen-mother and her minion, to the great detriment of the royal revenue. Mortimer, ſuſpecting their deſigns againſt him, on ſummoning them to parliament, ſtrictly prohibited them, in the king's name, from coming with an armed force. The three earls, when they drew near the city of Saliſbury, where the parliament was appointed to meet, found, that though in obedience to the king's command, they had brought with them only their uſual retinue, Mortimer and his partizans were attended with all their followers in arms; and, apprehending ſome dangerous deſigns againſt their perſons, they turned back, aſſembled their vaſſals, and were returning with an army to take vengeance on Mortimer; but Kent and Norfolk deſerting the common cauſe, Lancaſter was obliged to ſubmit, and, by the interpoſition of the prelates, the quarrel ſeemed to be for the preſent appeaſed. It was agreed, that all grievances ſhould be redreſſed, and all errors corrected, in the enſuing parliament, which, however, the king found an excuſe to poſtpone. He had been ſummoned by Philip de Valois, then reigning king of France, to do homage for the dominions he held of that crown. Accordingly he ſailed

A. D. 1329. from Dover in May, and, having performed the ceremony of homage at Amiens, returned to England in June. During his abſence died that brave commander and ſteady patriot Robert Bruce, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, and twenty-third of his reign; the tranſactions of which have convinced poſterity how perfectly he underſtood the art of war, the true intereſts of his country, and the genius of his people. Through his inſtructions his generals acquired their martial and political knowledge; yet all they could do after his death, could not be compared to the glory which preceded it.

A. D. 1330. All who preſumed to blame Mortimer's conduct, or oppoſe his meaſures, met his proſecution: he even rendered the king inacceſſible to any but his own adherents, and prevented the earl of Lancaſter himſelf, who had been intruſted with the care of Edward's perſon, from conferring with him on the affairs of the nation. The earl of Kent, for his bold oppoſition to unconſtitutional meaſures, was marked for deſtruction by that vileſt of miniſters. The ſimplicity of this upright nobleman, rendered it eaſy to practice upon him; therefore Mortimer and his emiſſaries perſuaded him, that his brother king Edward was ſtill alive, and confined ſecretly in priſon. The earl, too readily giving credit to their inſinuations, formed the deſign of reſtoring him to liberty, and replacing him on the throne. With this intent, having carried on his preparations for ſome time, he was at length impeached by Mortimer of high treaſon before the parliament, where none but the miniſter's friends attended, and was condemned to loſe his head. The principal author of this tragedy, with the queen-dowager his abettor, fearing the young king would be unwilling to have his uncle ſuffer, hurried on the affecting cataſtrophe; but ſo deteſtable did this barbarous ſentence appear in the eyes of the public, that not a man could be found abandoned enough to ſtrike the blow; for the day after his ſentence, when the earl was brought upon the ſcaffold, the common executioner refuſed to perform his office, ſo much was he beloved by the people; nor could any one be found to ſupply his place till the evening, when the ſentence was executed by a felon from the Marſhalſea, who received a free pardon for all the robberies and other offences he had committed, as a reward for his ſervice.

A crime, however, ſo infamous as that of murder, could not remain long unpuniſhed. The earth would not cover the victim's blood; and this laſt inhuman action filled up the meaſure of Mortimer's iniquities, and rendered him univerſally deteſted. All parties forgetting their former animoſities, conſpired the deſtruction of this inſolent and perfidious miniſter. Nor did this object of the people's abhorrence eſcape the diſcerning eye of Edward, who had expreſſed great concern for the death of his uncle, and did not now conceal his averſion to the baſe inſtrument of that earl's untimely end. The king was now in the eighteenth year of his age, extremely diſſatisfied at being held in bondage by the haughty Mortimer. This reverſe of affection was no ſooner known, than thoſe who had acceſs to his majeſty vied with each other in divulging the particulars of his abandoned life, and arbitrary proceedings. But Edward, though determined to deprive Mortimer of his power, yet, being encompaſſed by that miniſter's emiſſaries, found it neceſſary to uſe the utmoſt caution and ſecrecy in his endeavours to bring him to exemplary puniſhment. He imparted his deſign to lord Montacute; and that nobleman engaged the lords Clifford and Molins, Sir John Nevil, of Hornby, Ufford, and others, who all promiſed their aſſiſtance; and it was reſolved to ſeize Mortimer during the ſeſſion of parliament, which was ſummoned to meet at Nottingham. To effect this it was propoſed, that the king ſhould occupy the caſtle of Nottingham, wherein the queen-mother and Mortimer lodged; but on their arrival, they found the caſtle already filled with the attendants of Iſabella and her favourite, one or two apartments only being left for the king, and a few of his train. This caſtle was ſituated upon a rock which was inacceſſible; all other parts were ſtrictly guarded; the gates were locked up every evening, and the keys carried to the queen; hence it appeared ſufficiently evident, that it would be impoſſible to execute their purpoſe without the aſſiſtance of Sir William Eland, the governor of the caſtle. Lord Montacute was therefore ſent to ſound, and gain him over to their party. This was effected with great facility, that gentleman joyfully embracing an opportunity of teſtifying at once his affection for the perſon of his ſovereign, and his abhorrence of thoſe, who, by their infamous conduct, had brought their country to the brink of deſtruction. By his direction, the king's aſſociates were admitted through a ſubterraneous paſſage, which had been contrived for privately conveying proviſions and ſtores into that fortreſs. The entrance was level with the meadows, and a way winded up through the rock to the caſtle. The above nobleman, conducted by Eland, proceeded after him in ſearch of their prey; and ſuddenly entering the chamber adjoining to the queen's apartment, they found Mortimer, with the biſhop of London, and others of his party, in cloſe conſultation; and after having ſlain Sir Hugh Turpliton and Richard de Monmouth, who drew their ſwords in Mortimer's defence, took him priſoner. The queen hearing the noiſe, and readily gueſſing the nature of the buſineſs, called aloud in French to the king, whom ſhe ſuppoſed to be at their head, "Fair ſon! Fair ſon! have pity on the gentle Mortimer." But receiving no anſwer to her entreaties, ſhe ruſhed into the room, and earneſtly entreated them to do no injury to his perſon, for he was a worthy knight, her dear friend, and well-beloved couſin. They, however, took him away, and conveyed him from the caſtle through the ſame paſſage by which they aſcended, which to this day is known by the name of Mortimer's hole. This exploit was conducted with ſuch diſpatch and privacy, that the guards were not alarmed, and the people of the town knew nothing of the tranſaction till the next morning, when two of Mortimer's ſons, and ſeveral of his adherents, were apprehended by the royaliſts. All the priſoners were committed to the Tower of London; and the king iſſued a proclamation, ſignifying that he had taken the government into his own hands, and would redreſs the grievances of the people. He then repaired to Leiceſter, where he iſſued writs for a new parliament to meet at Weſtminſter, where all perſons who had received injuries from the late adminiſtration were invited, in order to obtain ſatisfaction. At this parliament, articles of impeachment were exhibited againſt Roger de Mortimer, who was accuſed of ſetting the queen-dowager at variance with her huſband; of procuring exorbitant grants to the prejudice of the royal revenue; of embezzling the king's jewels and treaſures; of conſpiring to deſtroy his majeſty's beſt friends; of obtaining pardon for two hundred Iriſhmen, who had baſely murdered many of the king's liege ſubjects; of aſſuming the regal power, and uſurping the adminiſtration; of inſulting the prelates, aſſembled in the parliament at Saliſbury; of perſuading to march, in an hoſtile manner, againſt the earl of Lancaſter, and other peers, who had tarried at Wincheſter; of impoſing exceſſive fines on that nobleman and others, contrary to the capitulation of Bedford; of having procured the death of the late king; of having deceived the earl of Kent into a conſpiracy to reſtore that prince; of ſecreting, for his own uſe, twenty thouſand marks of the money paid by the king of Scotland; and of having repaired to parliament with an armed force, diſturbed their deliberations, and threatened ſeveral members with death. Theſe facts were ſo notorious, that without examining witneſſes, or hearing his defence, he was found guilty of high treaſon, and condemned, as a traitor, to be hanged, drawn, and quartered: which ſentence was executed, on the twenty-ninth of November, at a place called the Elmes, about a mile from London, where his body hung two days on a common gibbet; an awful example, to warn future favourites not to deſpiſe public juſtice, which ſooner or later will lay her iron hand upon them, when, by an abuſe of power they run counter to the principles of good government, and are only intent upon the gratification of their private paſſions. The noblemen who had aſſiſted in ſeizing Mortimer, were rewarded; the attainder of the earl of Kent reverſed; and Richard, earl of Arundel, reſtored to the honours and poſſeſſions of his father. The queen-dowager was confined to her houſe at Riſings, in the neighbourhood of London, and her revenue reduced to four thouſand pounds a year. She never recovered the leaſt degree of power or authority in the ſtate, though the king conſtantly viſited her once or twice a year during her life.

A. D. 1331. No ſooner had Edward aſſumed the reins of government, than he applied himſelf to redreſs all grievances, that had ariſen either from the want of authority in the crown, or the late abuſes of it. All who were put in office by Mortimer were diſcharged, and others put in their places. The king iſſued writs to the judges, enjoining them to adminiſter impartial juſtice, without paying the leaſt regard to any arbitrary orders ſent from the miniſtry. The kingdom was infeſted with numerous bands of robbers, who, taking advantage of the late commotions, had ſet the power of the magiſtrates at defiance, and exerciſed, with impunity, their lawleſs depredations. They were even openly protected by the great barons, who employed them againſt their enemies. It was therefore previouſly neceſſary to deſtroy this alarming connection, before the evil could be removed. Edward therefore exacted a ſolemn promiſe from his barons, aſſembled in parliament, to break off all connections with ſuch malefactors, as a diſgrace to nobility. He alſo iſſued a proclamation, forbidding all jeſts and tournaments, which ſerved as a plauſible pretence for aſſembling armed men, to the diſturbance of public tranquillity, and the terror of peaceable inhabitants. After taking theſe public meaſures, he marched in perſon againſt the banditti, and, by his courage and activity, the more powerful troops were broken; many were taken and executed; and great numbers fled to the continent for ſafety. The miniſters of juſtice followed the royal example. They were indefatigable in diſcovering, and ſtrict in puniſhing criminals. By theſe ſalutary methods the diſeaſe was removed, and travellers paſſed without moleſtation from one part of the kingdom to the other.

We may here fix the period of England's miſeries, from the guilt of rebellion, regicide, and unnatural murder; as well as the date of her glory, from kingdoms conquered, ſovereigns captives, and nations relieved, always ſupported by a juſt and equitable adminiſtration at home. The ſatiſfaction ariſing from the proceedings of the late parliament to all kinds of people, made Edward ſenſible of the importance of his always living in amity with his barons and repreſentatives of the people. He ſaw that he had been directed wiſely in putting a ſtop to all ſanguinary proſecutions. This induced all parties to concur in ſupporting his government; nor was he afraid of meeting his people in parliament, like the generality of his predeceſſors.

Thus having eſtabliſhed authority at home, the government of Edward became once more formidable to its neighbours. The brave Robert Bruce, whoſe death we have noticed in due place, left his ſon David, a minor, under the guardianſhip of Randolph, the brave earl of Murray. In the late treaty with England it had been ſtipulated, that both the Engliſh, who inherited eſtates in Scotland before the commencement of the wars, and the Scotch nobility, who enjoyed lands in England, ſhould be reſtored to their reſpective poſſeſſions: but though Edward had nearly executed his part of this article, Robert, obſerving that the lands claimed by Engliſhmen were more numerous and valuable than the others, was either unwilling to admit ſo many ſecret enemies into his country, or found it difficult to wreſt from his own followers the poſſeſſions they had obtained as the reward of their dangers and fatigues, and therefore protracted the performance of his part of the ſtipulation. The Engliſh barons thus diſappointed, reſolved to obtain what they had a right to demand; and having great influence in the north, their diſcontent was ſufficient to ſhake the throne of a young prince, who was yet too young to ſway a ſceptre. Edward Baliol, ſon of John, who was crowned king of Scotland, had for ſome time after his father's deceaſe, been detained as a priſoner in England; but having obtained his liberty, he went to France, and reſided on a patrimonial eſtate he poſſeſſed in Normandy, without the leaſt thought of laying claim to the crown of Scotland. He was univerſally conſidered as a private perſon, and had been committed to priſon, on being accuſed of a private offence. Lord Beaumont, who in right of his wife had a claim to the earldom of Buchan in Scotland, found him in this ſituation; and having prevailed on the king of France to reſtore him to liberty, brought him over to England, deeming him a proper inſtrument for his purpoſe.

The Engliſh nobles, on his arrival, reſolved to vindicate their rights by force of arms, and applied for aſſiſtance to Edward; but he had ſufficient reaſons which prevented his openly countenancing their deſigns; for in the treaty with Scotland he had been made to enter into a bond to pay the pope twenty thouſand pounds, if he violated the peace within four years; and that time not being elapſed, he made no doubt but that his holineſs would demand the penalty. Beſides, on every demand which had been made of reſtitution to the Engliſh barons, the regent of Scotland had always acknowledged the juſtice of their claim, and founded the delay on plauſible pretences. The king therefore reſolved to make uſe of the ſame artifice, and not proceed to open violence. He ſecretly encouraged the undertaking of Baliol, conniving at his levying forces in the north, and countenancing thoſe nobles who were willing to join him. Two thouſand five hundred men were raiſed by Umfreville, earl of Angus; the lords Talbot, Moubray, Stafford, Beaumont, Ferrers, Fitz-Warren, and Wake, and the command given to Baliol. As they ſuppoſed the frontiers would be guarded, they reſolved to proceed by ſea; and A. D. 1332. embarking at Ravenſpur in the beginning of Auguſt, reached the coaſt of Fife. Scotland was at this time in a very feeble condition. Murray had lately paid the debt of nature; and lord Douglas, diſdaining a life of indolence, had paſſed over into Spain, where he was ſlain in a battle againſt the Moors. Donald, earl of Marre, who was of inferior abilities, had ſucceeded him in the regency: and the young king was unable to defend a throne, which all the abilities of his father were neceſſary to acquire and maintain. The Engliſh fleet no ſooner appeared, than Sir Alexander Seyton, at the head of the Fifeſhire militia, oppoſed their landing; but he was routed and ſlain with nine hundred of his followers. Baliol advanced to Dumferling, where he ſeized a magazine of arms, which he diſtributed among thoſe who joined his banner in Scotland. Theſe were only a ſmall number of his partizans, the Scotch being greatly prejudiced againſt a prince ſupported by the Engliſh. Reviewing his little army, he found they fell ſhort of three thouſand men; whereas the regent had encamped at Gladſmuir with forty thouſand; while an advanced guard poſted themſelves by the ſide of the river Erne, to diſpute the paſſage with the Engliſh. Truſting to their great ſuperiority of numbers, and the depth of the river, they lay in a very ſupine manner; a circumſtance which induced Baliol to ford the river in the night, at a place called Dupling. Having ſucceeded in this attempt, he ſurpriſed and attacked the enemy with ſuch impetuoſity, that they were routed before the morning. The earl of Marre, who lay at a diſtance with the main army, was for reducing the Engliſh by famine; but Robert, earl of Carrick, naturally headſtrong and impetuous, treated his propoſal as the effect of treachery or cowardice. In conſequence of which theſe ferocious chiefs ruſhed forward to charge the Engliſh with the utmoſt precipitation, while their men ran after them in great diſorder, not regarding ſome broken ground, which threw their ranks alſo into diſorder. Men and horſes tumbled over one another; and the ſecond diviſion preſſing upon the firſt, threw the whole into confuſion. Baliol, to prevent their rallying, immediately advanced with his troops, who chaſed them off the field with a terrible ſlaughter. Above twelve thouſand Scots fell in this engagement; among whom were the regent himſelf; the earl of Carrick, a natural ſon of the late king; the earls of Athol and Monteith; and the lords Hay, Keith, and Lindſey; yet the loſs of the Engliſh was very inconſiderable; about thirty men being the report.

Fluſhed with this ſucceſs, Baliol advanced to Perth, which he entered without oppoſition. Finding this place well ſtored with proviſions, he repaired the fortifications. The neceſſity of this precaution ſoon appeared; for it was ſcarcely executed, when he found himſelf beſieged by Patrick Dunbar, earl of March, and Sir Archibald Douglas, with his army, which being recruited, amounted again to forty thouſand men, who were determined to block up Baliol, and reduce him by famine. To effect this, orders were diſpatched to John Crabbe, a Flemiſh ſailor, to deſtroy the Engliſh fleet, ſtationed at the mouth of the Tay, for the convenience of ſupplying the army with proviſions. Crabbe attacked them; but inſtead of demoliſhing the enemy, all his own veſſels were either burnt or taken. The Scottiſh generals now perceived it would be in vain to continue the blockade of Perth; retiring therefore from the ſiege, they diſbanded their forces for want of pay and ſubſiſtence; and the kingdom was, in effect, ſubdued by a handful of men. Intimidated by the ſucceſs of the Engliſh arms, nor leſs by the loſs they had ſuſtained, the Scots gave over all further thoughts of reſiſtance, and Baliol was crowned king of Scotland, at Scone, on the twenty-ſeventh of September. A. D. 1332. David the late king, with Jane, ſiſter to Edward, his betrothed wife, retired to France, where they were graciouſly received by Philip. A truce was alſo propoſed to Baliol, to which he readily conſented, in order that he might aſſemble a parliament, with a view of having his title recognized by the nation at large.

Notwithſtanding this truce, Baliol, A. D. 1333. after he had diſmiſſed the greateſt part of his army, was attacked ſuddenly, and routed, near Anan, by Sir Archibald Douglas. John Baliol, his brother, was ſlain, and he himſelf was obliged to fly into England, driven from his throne by as ſudden a revolution as that by which he had obtained it. During the ſhort time Baliol enjoyed his crown, perceiving it would be impoſſible for him to retain it without the protection of Edward, he ſent ſecretly to that prince, offering to pay him homage, and to marry his ſiſter Jane, provided a diſpenſation from the pope could be obtained, her nuptials with David Bruce not having yet been conſummated. Edward had willingly accepted the offer; and now, ambitious of gaining his ſuperiority over Scotland, which he had loſt by the treachery of Mortimer, openly declared for Baliol, and made preparations to reinſtate him by force in his loſt ſeat of power. The Scots, elated with their late ſucceſs, had made incurſions into Cumberland; which furniſhed Edward with a ſufficient pretence for recommencing hoſtilities againſt them.

Accordingly he ſent orders for this purpoſe to Sir Anthony Lacy, who defeated the invaders, and compelled them to return with great precipitation to their own country.

Edward in the mean time having appointed a rendezvous of his army at Newcaſtle-upon-Tyne, opened the campaign in the beginning of May, with the ſiege of Berwick, where he commanded in perſon. That place being conſidered, as it is now, the key of Scotland, Douglas furniſhed it with a ſtrong garriſon, under the joint command of Sir William Keith, and Patrick Dunbar, earl of March, governor of the caſtle. Theſe gallant officers made a brave defence. The ſiege continued near two months; when great part of the fortifications being demoliſhed, the garriſon agreed to capitulate if not relieved in five days. Theſe terms were no ſooner made known to the Scottiſh army, which was preparing to invade Northumberland, than Sir Archibald Douglas, in compliance with the requeſt of the garriſon, marched to the foot of Halidown-Hill, a little to the north of Berwick, in ſight of the Engliſh army; where he drew up his forces in four diviſions, commanded by the principal nobility of Scotland. The Engliſh were poſted upon an eminence. They were alſo drawn up in four ſeparate bodies, and flanked with archers. In this poſition Edward waited the attack of the enemy, who, on the thirteenth of July, began to aſcend the hill with great intrepidity; but the ſteepneſs of the aſcent, the weight of their armour, the inceſſant ſhowers of arrows diſcharged from the bows of the Engliſh, and the large ſtones rolled down upon them, ſoon checked their career. They halted; and their general, being that moment transfixed with an arrow, fell lifeleſs to the ground. Diſmay, confuſion, and diſorder, now ran through the ranks of the Scottiſh army. Edward, taking advantage of this favourable opportunity, ordered lord D'Arcy, at the head of a body of light armed infantry, to charge them in flank, while he himſelf attacked their front with a choice brigade of veterans. The Scottiſh knights, to render the action more deſperate, had diſmounted from their horſes; but the impetuous attack of the Engliſh, led on by their brave ſovereign, was more than equal match for their furious valour. Incapable either of making reſiſtance, or of having recourſe to flight, being ſurrounded on all hands, a horrible carnage enſued; the remainder who eſcaped the ſword, ſought their ſafety in flight; but little quarter being given in the purſuit, all the principal nobility were either ſlain or taken priſoners. The loſs of the Scots, according to the moſt probable computation, amounted to thirty thouſand; while on the part of the Engliſh, it is ſaid, only one knight, one eſquire, and thirteen privates, fell in this memorable action. The town of Berwick ſurrendered next day, according to agreement, and Edward executed all the articles of capitulation with great punctuality. The Scottiſh inhabitants had time granted them to remove their effects; but thoſe who took the oaths of allegiance to the king of England were permitted to ſtay. Patrick Dunbar entered into Edward's ſervice, who, in conjunction with Henry lord Piercy, was intruſted with the guardianſhip of Lothian and Galloway; the crown of Berwick upon Tweed was annexed to the crown of England; and Edward, leaving a conſiderable body of forces with the new king of Scotland, to complete its reduction, returned to England. It was impoſſible for the Scots, in their preſent unhappy ſtate, to oppoſe the power of Baliol. Their chief nobility loſt, their army diſſipated, their king in France, their regent ſlain, what could they attempt with any proſpect of ſucceſs? Submiſſion was their only reſource. When therefore Baliol marched through the whole country, all the caſtles, except Dumbarton, Urquhart, and two or three others, ſurrendered at the firſt ſummons, though ſuppoſed to be impregnable.

A. D. 1334.

About February, a parliament aſſembled, in conſequence of writs from Baliol, at Edinburgh, when he was acknowledged king; the ſuperiority of England over Scotland was alſo ſolemnly confirmed, and Berwick, Dunbar, Roxburgh, Edinburgh, and all the ſouth-eaſt counties of Scotland, were declared to be for ever annexed to the crown of England. To theſe humbling conditions the Scots were obliged to ſubmit, but at the ſame time they were ſwearing fealty, determined, the firſt opportunity that offered, to break through theſe, and their bonds and allegiance, while the conduct of the king greatly ſtrengthened both their reſolution and reſentment: for David, earl of Athol, the lords Beaumont and Talbot, were put in poſſeſſion of the eſtates they claimed in Scotland; Henry de Piercy was gratified with the caſtle of Lochban, which belonged to the earl of Murray; and grants were made to other Engliſh noblemen, at the expence of Scottiſh proprietors. Theſe impolitic meaſures rendered the perſons thus deprived of their poſſeſſions, deſperate, and implacable enemies to Baliol; nor could the Scots in general eſteem a prince, who had ſhamefully reſigned that independence, to maintain which ſo much blood and treaſure had been expended. The Engliſh troops, therefore, were no ſooner returned to their own country than they flew to arms. Sir Andrew Murray was elected regent, who defeated Baliol in ſeveral ſkirmiſhes. In the mean time application had been made for ſuccours to Philip, king of France, who ſent a body of troops to their aſſiſtance; by which means all the northern parts of Scotland were over-run and reduced.

A. D. 1335.

Thus Baliol being again brought into moſt diſtreſſful circumſtances, Edward was obliged to aſſemble an army and march into Scotland to his relief. Having entered by the way of Berwick, he made a conſiderable progreſs, without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition. At his approach the enemy abandoned all the plains, and retired to the mountains and faſtneſſes of their country. Several ſkirmiſhes, however, happened between the Scots, and ſtraggling parties of the Engliſh; in one of which the late created regent was taken priſoner. During Edward's ſtay at Perth, he detached a body of forces, under the command of his brother, John of Eltham, and Sir Anthony Lacy, to ravage the weſtern counties, which were moſtly inhabited by the adherents of Bruce. The Scots, who thought themſelves ſufficiently ſtrong to face a part of the Engliſh army, preſented their whole force in order of battle. A bloody engagement enſued; victory was for ſome time doubtful; but at laſt declared in favour of the Engliſh; and a great number of Scots periſhed in the field of battle. The friends of Bruce were ſo intimidated by this defeat, that they determined to ſubmit to Edward. Accordingly a treaty was concluded on the following terms: "That the Scottiſh noblemen ſhould have the benefit of a general amneſty; that they ſhould enjoy their lands, honours, and offices in Scotland, and be reſtored to thoſe of their Engliſh poſſeſſions that had been forfeited; that the kirk and boroughs ſhould enjoy all their privileges; that none but natives ſhould be put into public offices, except in ſome particular caſes, where their king, Baliol, might ſee reaſon to exert his prerogative in behalf of perſons of a different nation: to which were added by ſome of Bruce's party, who at firſt refuſed to accede to this treaty; that Edward Baliol ſhould enjoy the crown of Scotland during his natural life, but on his demiſe, David Bruce ſhould ſucceed him on the throne, and in the interim be maintained honourably at London. An end being thus apparently put to hoſtilities, Edward ordered the fortifications of Perth to be repaired, and the caſtles of Edinburgh and Stirling to be rebuilt. He alſo appointed the earl of Athol guardian of the northern part of the kingdom, and returned to England at the head of the greater part of his army.

Yet the Scots, notwithſtanding they had ſigned the above articles of their ſubmiſſion, were ſtill further than ever from being broken, or ſubdued; nor did they wait long for a plauſible pretence and opportunity of ſhaking off a yoke, to which neceſſity alone had compelled them to ſubmit. The earl of Athol, whoſe talents were ill adapted to govern ſuch a turbulent ſet of people, inſtead of applying ſoothing lenients, treated them with rigour; and imprudently beſieged the caſtle of Kildrummy, which ſtill refuſed to open its gates, and wherein the regent's wife had for ſecurity ſhut herſelf up. The earl of Marche and Sir William Douglas haſtened immediately to the relief of that fortreſs, fell upon the beſiegers with the utmoſt impetuoſity, and routed them with great ſlaughter. The earl of Athol himſelf was one among the numerous ſlain. The ſtandard of war was now again diſplayed; but before any further hoſtilities were committed, by the mediation of his holineſs and the king of France, a ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities was agreed to till the ninth of May in the enſuing year, which truce was conſidered as a prelude to a general peace.

A. D. 1336. At Newcaſtle, conferences were opened in the ſpring, whither Sir William Douglas, Sir William Keith, and Robert Louther, repaired, on the faith of a ſafe conduct, which was alſo granted to ſix other commiſſioners of the ſame nation, deputed by David Bruce, to aſſiſt at the negotiation. The commiſſioners, in 1336, entered upon buſineſs; but the French envoys, agreeable to the inſtructions they had received from their court, under the diſguiſe of mediators, ſtarted ſuch difficulties as they knew would render the negotiation ineffectual. Philip had already ſupplied the Scots with a conſiderable aſſiſtance both of men and money. He now publicly declared, that he would never abandon the cauſe of Bruce, but ſupport him to the utmoſt of his power. Elated by theſe promiſes, and exaſperated againſt the invaders of their country, the Scottiſh deputies inſiſted on ſuch exorbitant terms, that the treaty was broken off, and both ſides reſolved to renew hoſtilities immediately after the expiration of the truce. Edward, foreſeeing the reſult, had continued his military preparations, and had been very careful to conciliate the affections of his ſubjects, by ſeveral popular acts; whereby he ſo endeared himſelf to his people, both clergy and laity, that they readily granted him large ſubſidies for ſupporting the conqueſts he had made in Scotland, and finally to reduce that nation under the Engliſh government. Thus ſupplied, he ordered his military tenants to repair to the north, and conferred the chief command of his army on Henry, ſon to the old earl of Lancaſter. Having received advice, that Murray, the regent, had reduced the caſtles of St. Andrew's and Bothwel, he repaired immediately to Berwick, where being joined by a body of troops, he proceeded to Perth. Juſt before his arrival, the enemy made a deſperate aſſault upon Stirling-Caſtle, in which attack Sir William Keith was ſlain; but being repulſed in this attempt, with great loſs, and hearing of Edward's approach, they abandoned that enterprize, as well as the ſiege of Lochendoris, and retired to their faſtneſſes to avoid a battle.

Edward continued his march through Athol to Inverneſs, and thence by Elgin, through the ſhire of Murray, which he laid deſolate. The town of Aberdeen was reduced to aſhes; and having proceeded northward to the extremity of Scotland, he returned to Perth, having left the country a wild and dreary waſte. The king now repaired to England, and ſummoned a parliament on the twenty-third of September, to meet at Nottingham, where ſeveral ſalutary laws were enacted; after which he returned to Scotland, where his preſence was again required. On his departure, the regent had taken the field, and reduced ſeveral caſtles which Edward had fortified; and his brother John, whom he left with Baliol to command his forces, died at Perth during his abſence. Murray, on the king's approach, retired to the foreſt of Platon, where he continued in the ſeaſon of winter; ſo that Edward's military exploits amounted to no more than burning and waſting the open country: while the Scots, encouraged amidſt their misfortunes, by promiſes of relief from France, ſupported their ſpirits; and a war being likely to break out between England and that kingdom, they had reaſon to believe, that this would prove a great diverſion in their favour. Nor did Edward neglect any neceſſary precautions in preparing for this expected event. He commiſſioned Geoffrey de Say, one of his admirals, to equip a ſtrong fleet, and aſſert his dominion of the Engliſh ſea, which his predeceſſor had always maintained, and in particular to deſtroy the gallies of France, ſhould they attempt to approach the coaſts of England or Scotland.

A. D. 1337. As we are now entering upon a period of hiſtory, productive of very ſtriking events, it will be neceſſary to give a particular account of the ſources from whence they ſprung. During the ſpace of nine hundred years France had been governed by males only, and none in the female line had ever reigned on that throne. Of the late kings, Philip the Fair, on his demiſe, left three ſons, Lewis Hutin, Philip the Long, and Charles the Fair, and one daughter, who was Iſabella, the preſent queen dowager of England. Lewis Hutin, at his death, left one daughter, which he had by Margaret, ſiſter to Eudes, duke of Burgundy, and the queen being at the ſame time pregnant, Philip the Long, his younger brother, was appointed regent till it might be known whether ſhe ſhould be delivered of a ſon or daughter. The child was a male; but living only a few days, Philip the Long was proclaimed king. The duke of Burgundy oppoſed his ſucceſſion, avowing the right of his niece to the crown of France; upon which the ſtates of that kingdom excluded her by a ſolemn act; and at the ſame time excluded all females for ever from ſucceſſion to the throne of France. On the demiſe of Philip, who left three daughters, his brother, Charles the Fair, without the leaſt diſpute from a ſingle claimant, ſucceeded to the crown. The reign of this prince was equally ſhort with that of his predeceſſor, and at his death, Charles left only one daughter; but the queen being pregnant, the next male heir was appointed regent, with a declared right of ſucceſſion, ſhould the child prove a female. This regent was Philip de Valois, couſin-german to the deceaſed king, who was the ſon of Charles de Valois, brother of Philip the Fair. The queen being delivered of a daughter, the regency ended, and Philip de Valois, the preſent reigning monarch, was unanimouſly ſeated on the throne. Hence it is evident, that through a long ſeries of years, the French would not permit their crown to deſcend to a female; from an opinion derived originally from a maxim in the Salic law (being a law of an ancient tribe among the Franks); though the clauſe in that law does not, according to our beſt antiquaries, bear the ſenſe generally underſtood.

Notwithſtanding the excluſion of females had taken place in France, and the cuſtom was eſtabliſhed by a long chain of precedents, Edward ſtill imagined, that in right of his mother he had a juſt claim to the crown of France, in oppoſition to the cuſtom of excluding females, which had acquired equal authority with the moſt expreſs and poſitive law. To ſhew the futility of this pretenſion it was urged, that each of the laſt three kings of France had daughters who were ſtill alive, and who, ſuppoſing his claim to be well founded, ſtood before him in the order of ſucceſſion. In anſwer to which, Edward, who was more of an able general than a learned civilian, was under the neceſſity of aſſerting, that though Iſabella his mother, who was, on account of her ſex, incapable of ſucceeding, he himſelf, who inherited through her, was liable to no ſuch objection; not conſidering, that allowing the validity of this plea, yet it was more favourable to Charles, king of Navarre, who was deſcended from the daughter of Lewis Hutin, and immediate ſucceſſor of Philip the Fair. Indeed his claim was ſo thoroughly diſavowed by all France, that to inſiſt upon it, was pretending to make a conqueſt of that kingdom. This Edward ſeriouſly intended; and was determined to attack France, and to wreſt the ſceptre from the hand of Philip de Valois, which he ſtill declared belonged to him, as the ſon of Iſabella, ſiſter to Charles the Fair. In this reſolution he was encouraged by Robert d'Artois, deſcended from the blood royal of France, who having been condemned in conſequence of a forgery he had committed, took refuge in England. Inſpired with a moſt implacable deſire of revenge againſt Philip, by whom he had been deprived of his dominions, and proſecuted with the utmoſt violence, Robert now endeavoured to ſtimulate Edward to declare war againſt France, in favour of his title to that crown; and the king was more eaſily prevailed upon to liſten to his ſuggeſtions, from his having reaſon to complain of Philip's conduct with regard to Guienne, and from that monarch's having not only given protection to David Bruce, but openly aſſiſted the Scots in their ſtruggles for independence. Philip was no ſooner informed of the council given by Robert d'Artois, than he iſſued a ſentence of felony againſt him; which declared every vaſſal, within or without the realm, involved in the ſame predicament, who ſhould give countenance to that traitor. This menace wanted no comment; and a war with France now ſeemed inevitable. The French, indeed, had made incurſions into Guienne, ſeized ſeveral caſtles, and threatened that province with a ſpeedy reduction.

Accordingly, Edward ſummoning a parliament during Lent, laid before them the nature of his differences with Philip, and the ſteps he had taken toward an accommodation; and the nation in general ſeemed very deſirous of revenging the hoſtilities which the French had committed: whereupon the biſhop of Lincoln, with the earls of Saliſbury and Huntingdon, were appointed to finiſh the progreſs Edward had made in contracting foreign alliances; in order to divert the arms of the French monarch from Guienne, and at the ſame time to attack his dominions with a proſpect of ſucceſs. Accordingly, treaties were concluded, both in the low countries and on the frontiers of Germany, with the count of Hainault, the duke of Brabant, the archbiſhop of Cologne, the duke of Guilders, the marquis of Juliers, the count of Namure, with ſome others, who engaged to furniſh the king with a ſtipulated number of troops, which were to be maintained at the expence of England. The acceſſion of Flanders was alone wanting to render this confederacy ſufficiently formidable, which Edward procured by an extraordinary addreſs. The Flemings, by cultivating arts and manufactures, began to emerge from that ſtate of vaſſalage in which the common people had been univerſally involved in the feudal ſyſtem. By commerce they acquired riches, and by riches obtained a ſhare of independence. They had driven the earl of Flanders into France, and put themſelves under a leader of their own choice, one Jacob Ardevelt, a brewer of Ghent, who governed them with unlimited authority. To him Edward applied, and never courted the aſſiſtance of any ally with ſo much aſſiduity as he did that of this Flemiſh merchant. Ardevelt, on the other hand, proud of theſe advances from the king of England, and perceiving that the Flemings were inclined to form connections with the Engliſh, from whom they received the materials of their woollen manufactures, readily embraced Edward's intereſt, and invited him over into the Netherlands. About the ſame time Edward received from the emperor, Lewis of Bavaria, the title of "Vicar of the Empire," that he might have a right to command the princes of Germany; and to remove the ſcruples of the Flemings, who were vaſſals of France, aſſumed the title of king of France, and challenged their aſſiſtance for dethroning Philip de Valois, who had uſurped his kingdom.

A. D. 1338.

About the beginning of February, a parliament was ſummoned, from whom the king obtained a conſiderable ſubſidy for carrying on the war. He then borrowed a large ſum of money for preſent uſe, and equipped an armament with the utmoſt expedition. Having committed the guardianſhip of the kingdom to his eldeſt ſon Edward, and after taking proper precautions for ſecuring the peace during his abſence, he embarked at Orewell, on the ſeventeenth of July, with a fleet of three hundred ſail, accompanied by his principal nobility, and, after an eaſy paſſage, arrived at Antwerp. But finding that his allies were not ready to take the field, his military operations were deferred to the enſuing year. Edward, intending to paſs the winter in Brabant, ſent for his queen to Antwerp, where, in the month of November, ſhe was delivered of a third ſon, named Lionel, who was afterwards created duke of Clarence. Philip had made prodigious preparations againſt the Engliſh, and his allies were more powerful; whereas thoſe of Edward were at once very ſlow in their motions, and irreſolute in their meaſures, having no object in view but his money, which was now nearly expended.

A. D. 1339.

So great a loſs of time was very prejudicial to Edward's finances, who was now obliged to borrow large ſums at exorbitant intereſt, and even pawn his queen's jewels for ſecurity. His operations were ſo retarded by this and other difficulties, that he could not take the field till the twentieth of September, when he marched againſt the French army, with which Philip lay encamped in the neighbourhood of Peronne. The two monarchs continued a week within ſix miles of each other; and on Wedneſday the twentieth of October, Edward ſent a herald to Philip, deſiring him to appoint a day for a general engagement. The French king having pitched upon the following Friday, both armies were drawn out early in the morning, in order of battle, the Engliſh and their allies not exceeding fifty thouſand men, and the enemy amounting to almoſt double that number. After having ſtood facing each other the whole day, both ſeeming to decline an engagement, they retired to their reſpective camps, and appeared again the next morning in the ſame diſpoſition. In the afternoon the French retreated to their quarters, which they fortified with trenches and the boughs of trees; while Edward wheeled off to a more convenient ſituation, and informed Philip by meſſage, that he would wait for him all Sunday. The French king was deſirous of engaging, but his council repreſenting the imprudence of riſking his crown on the iſſue of a battle, with an enemy, whom the ſeaſon would ſoon compel to withdraw his forces, having fortified his frontier towns, he returned to Paris; and Edward, informed of his retreat, permitted the Germans to retire, while he with his own troops withdrew to Bruſſels. Thus ended a fruitleſs campaign, in the preparations for which Edward had contracted a debt of three hundred thouſand pounds, and anticipated moſt of his revenue; but he had too much ſpirit to be diſcouraged by the firſt difficulties of an enterprize, and was therefore anxious by more ſucceſsful exploits to retrieve his honour.

During his abſence at this time from England, Sir Anthony Murray, guardian of Scotland, reduced all the fortreſſes on the north ſide of the Tay, and defeated a party of four thouſand Engliſh, commanded by lord Henry Montford, who loſt his life in the engagement. The earl of Dunbar having taken the field with Murray, his caſtle was beſieged on all ſides by lords Henry Plantagenet, Angus, and Arundel, and gallantly defended by the earl's counteſs, who receiving a reinforcement ſoon after Montfort's defeat, the Engliſh noblemen raiſed the ſiege, in order to advance to the relief of their countrymen. They accordingly ſent two large detachments from the main army by different routes, under the command of William Talbot and lord Richard Montague, who were defeated at Panmuir, in Angus, and Talbot taken priſoner. The caſtles of Edinburgh, Stirling, and Coupar, were now the only places of conſequence remaining in the hands of Baliol. On the firſt of theſe Sir William Douglas had made an unſucceſsful attempt; ſoon after which, Bruce's party ſuſtained an almoſt irreparable loſs, in the death of their guardian, in which office he was ſucceeded by Robert Stuart, who was connected with David by the ties of blood. He reduced the town of Perth; and William Bullock, governor of the caſtle of Coupar, betraying his truſt, gave the Scots poſſeſſion of that fortreſs.

Now Edward determined to form a cloſe connection with the Flemings, and therefore promiſed to reſtore them to the poſſeſſion of Liſle, Douay, and Bethune, provided they would cordially engage in his intereſt, and the twenty-third of January enſuing, was, by mutual conſent, appointed for ratifying the agreement. With the ſame view, he alſo formally took upon him the title of king of France, and quartered the French with the Engliſh arms, aſſuming the motto, Dieu et mon droit; "God and my right;" alluding to his deſign of ſupporting his pretenſions to the crown of that kingdom. This bold ſtep induced all the Flemings, as one man, to declare in his favour. He now called a council of allies, when the operations on opening of the next campaign were ſettled; and having entered into engagements with the duke of Brabant, to ſtay in the low countries till the war was finiſhed, he now offered ſufficient reaſons for his paſſing over into England; and promiſing, on his word of honour, to return in perſon, the duke conſented to his going.

A. D. 1340. On his arrival in England, writs were iſſued for aſſembling a parliament at Weſtminſter, who ſhewed an uncommon alacrity in aſſiſting their ſovereign; for Edward obtained an unuſual grant, for two years, of the ninth ſheaf, lamb, and fleece, on the eſtates of the nobles; and from the burgeſſes, a ninth of their moveables, at their true value. They alſo granted a duty of forty ſhillings on each pack of wool exported; the ſame on every three hundred woolfells, and on every laſt of leather, for the ſame term of years. But being ſenſible this ſupply would come in ſlowly, they agreed, that twenty thouſand packs of wool ſhould be immediately granted, and their value deducted from the ninths which were afterwards to be raiſed. To this generoſity they added a becoming attention to their own independency; for to obviate any conſequences that might accrue from Edward's title of king of France, they declared, that they owed him no obedience as king of France, and that the two kingdoms ſhould for ever remain diſtinct and ſeparate. As this was a matter of too great importance for Edward to neglect, he publiſhed a full, ample, and ſatisfactory declaration on that ſubject. Theſe tokens of affection on the part of his people, juſtly merited a grateful return from Edward; accordingly he granted a full remiſſion of all debts due to the crown, and of all proſecutions of foreſt treſpaſſes: to which he added a confirmation of the two charters, and of the franchiſes of the boroughs; with ſeveral wholeſome regulations for redreſſing the grievances of his people.

Edward was preparing for his ſecond expedition againſt France, when advice was received from the duke of Guelders, that Philip had aſſembled a powerful fleet to intercept him in his paſſage. Orders were therefore given by his two chief admirals, Morley and Crab, for collecting the whole naval force of his kingdom, to the number of two hundred and ſixty ſail. This fleet was well manned with the utmoſt diſpatch; and Edward embarked for the continent, attended by a conſiderable body of land forces, and the principal nobility of England, ſetting ſail from Orewell on the thirteenth of June. A few days after their departure, the French fleet was diſcovered lying at anchor in the harbour of Sluys, to the number of four hundred ſail, and manned with forty thouſand men. In the morning of Midſummer-Day, they had advanced about a mile without the harbour, and appeared drawn up in three ſquadrons. Upon which, the king's admirals made the ſame diſpoſition, ſtationing the largeſt ſhips in the firſt diviſion, provided with archers and men at arms. The ſecond were ordered to keep at ſome diſtance to windward, and prevent the firſt from being encloſed by the enemy; and the third was reſerved for the protection of the tranſports, loaded with baggage and warlike implements. The line being thus formed, they hauled upon a wind, in order to gain the weather-gage; then bearing down upon the enemy, a fierce and bloody action enſued, which laſted from ten in the morning till ſeven at night. The ſhips engaged yard-arm to yard-arm with incredible fury, and the nobles and brave knights exerted all their martial abilities in order to ſignalize themſelves under the eye of their ſovereign, who animated them by his own example. The Engliſh archers, who excelled all Europe in their profeſſional ſkill, made terrible ſlaughter among the French and Genoeſe; while the men at arms, boarding their veſſels, attacked them with ſuch fury, that multitudes leaped into the ſea, to avoid the horrors of the aſſault. The firſt diviſion of the French was now nearly defeated, and the ſecond thrown into great confuſion. In this critical moment, the Flemings ſailed out of their ports and joined the Engliſh. This reinforcement determined the fortune of the day. Falling in with the ſhattered ſquadrons of the enemy, they bore down the feeble remains of oppoſition; and victory, in all her glory, was ſeen triumphing by the ſide of Edward. Two French admirals, with upwards of twenty thouſand men, were ſlain, and two hundred and thirty of their largeſt ſhips taken. The king was ſlightly wounded in the thigh, and his loſs, it is ſaid, amounted to about four thouſand men, who fell in this memorable naval engagement. He paſſed the night on board his ſhip, and landed the next day at Sluys, whence he marched to Ghent, where, to render his joy complete, he found his queen juſt delivered of a ſon, called John, who was created duke of Lancaſter ſoon after.

A victory ſo great, increaſed both the renown and authority of Edward among his allies, who aſſembled their forces with great expedition; whereby he was enabled to advance to the frontiers of France, at the head of above one hundred thouſand men, chiefly foreigners. Beſides theſe, the Flemings, who amounted to fifty thouſand men, under the command of Robert d'Artois, laid ſiege to St. Omer's; but being chiefly compoſed of manufacturers and tradeſmen, unacquainted with war, they were routed by a ſally from the garriſon, and ſeized with ſuch a panic, that they diſperſed, and never ventured to appear again in the field. In the mean time, Edward with his army had laid ſiege to Tournay, then reputed one of the moſt conſiderable cities in Flanders. It contained above ſixty thouſand inhabitants, and was defended by a garriſon commanded by the braveſt of the French nobility, who were reſolved to periſh under the ruins of the city, rather than open its gates to the enemy, notwithſtanding that enemy was Edward III. This brave prince, finding that every aſſault proved unſucceſsful, turned the ſiege into a blockade, in hopes of reducing the city by famine. At the end of ten weeks, Philip advanced within a few leagues of the Engliſh army, not with an intention of bringing on a deciſive action, but of being ready to aſſiſt the garriſon, whenever a favourable opportunity might offer. Edward, exaſperated at the ſmall progreſs he had made in this ſiege, ſent an herald to Philip, challenging him to decide their quarrel either by ſingle combat, or by fighting with one hundred men on each ſide, or by a general engagement. Philip replied, that he ſhould find means to drive his vaſſal out of his kingdom; that it did not become him to challenge his liege lord; that the duel was propoſed on very unequal terms, by offering to hazard only his own perſon; but if Edward would put the kingdom of England into the ſtake, the challenge ſhould be accepted.

In this ſituation lay the two armies, and a general action was daily expected; but Tournay, for want of proviſions, being reduced to great diſtreſs, Jane, counteſs dowager of Hainault, endeavoured to produce a reconciliation between them. This princeſs was ſiſter to Philip, and mother-in-law to Edward. She had retired to a convent; but left her retreat to employ her good offices, with a view of putting an end to the animoſities between perſons ſo nearly related to her and to each other: yet her zeal could only effect a ſhort truce, which left both parties in poſſeſſion of their preſent acquiſitions, and put a ſtop to all further hoſtilities on the ſide of the Netherlands, Guienne, and Scotland, till the following Midſummer. Soon after, the king of France prevailed on the emperor to revoke the title of imperial vicar, which he had conferred on Edward; whoſe allies alſo, diſappointed in their expectations, gradually withdrew from the confederacy; and that prince, not a little embarraſſed by a heavy load of debts, was obliged to return to England in haſte.

About the latter end of November, after a dangerous paſſage of three days, in a ſmall veſſel, he landed with his queen at the Tower of London, which he found unguarded. He was ſo irritated with the ill ſucceſs of his military operations, and ſo much vexed and affronted by his foreign creditors, that he returned in a very ill humour, which ſpent itſelf upon all thoſe whom he thought merited his diſpleaſure. He committed to priſon the conſtable of the Tower, with all his ſubalterns, for their negligence. The biſhops of Chicheſter and Litchfield he turned out of their employments of chancellor and treaſurer: Sir John St. Paul, keeper of the privy-ſeal, the ſheriffs, the collectors of the taxes, and other officers of the revenue, were impriſoned, and a commiſſion iſſued to inquire into their defaults, for which they were ſeverely puniſhed; for the king attributed the bad ſucceſs of his expedition partly to their negligence. The primate, fearing the effects of his anger, retired to Canterbury, and took refuge under the privileges of his order. He accordingly convened a meeting of the clergy in that cathedral, and pronounced a general ſentence of excommunication againſt all who, on any pretence, exerciſed violence on the perſon or goods of clergymen, or accuſed a prelate of treaſon, or any other crime, in order to make him incur the king's diſpleaſure. The clergy, thus headed by the primate, now formed themſelves into a regular combination againſt the king; and the archbiſhop, in a letter, went ſo far as to aſſert, that there were two powers by which the world was governed, the holy pontifical apoſtolic dignity, and the royal ſubordinate authority; that the clerical was evidently the ſupreme, ſince prieſts were to anſwer for the conduct of kings themſelves at the divine tribunal. They were the ſpiritual fathers of all the faithful, and among the reſt of kings and princes; and, by a heavenly charter, were entitled to cenſure their tranſgreſſions, and to guide their actions. Edward little reliſhed theſe obſervations, ſo diametrically repugnant to his prerogative; and determined the primate ſhould feel the weight of his reſentment. He therefore ſent Nicholas de Cantaloup, with a public notary, to the archbiſhop, to warn that prelate to take care of his bonds, and either diſcharge them immediately, or croſs the ſea to Flanders, and reſide in that country till the money ſhould be paid. In the mean time he ſummoned the metropolitan to court, to render an account of the conduct of thoſe to whom he had intruſted the management of the public revenue. Stratford excuſed himſelf from appearing at court, where he ſhould be expoſed to the malice of his enemies; and ſaid, he would conſider the other part of his majeſty's propoſal. Upon this, an information was preferred againſt him in the court of Exchequer, before which he was ſummoned to appear; but he refuſed to plead before any other juriſdiction than that of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, aſſembled in parliament, to a charge of ſuch importance.

A. D. 1341.

On the meeting of parliament, the primate was not permitted to take his ſeat, till he put in an anſwer to the charge exhibited againſt him in the Exchequer. This being performed, he was admitted to his place; and on taking his ſeat declared, that he would not have preſumed to have appeared there, but for the honour of his ſovereign, and the good of the kingdom; and that he was willing to ſubmit to a parliamentary inquiry into his conduct, as one of his majeſty's principal miniſters. The whole aſſembly applauded this reſolution; and at the ſame time reſolving to ſet legal bounds to the royal prerogatives, they required a new confirmation of the great charter. They alſo framed a bill, whereby it was enacted, that the peers of the realm ſhould not be proceeded againſt and puniſhed, but by the judgment of their peers aſſembled in parliament; that the more important offices ſhould be filled by the king, with the conſent of his council and barons; that every ſeſſion theſe offices ſhould be reſumed by him, and the miniſters who filled them reduced to private perſons; that they ſhould in that condition anſwer before the parliament, to any accuſations brought againſt them; and that if they were any ways found guilty, they ſhould finally be diſpoſſeſſed of their dignities, and more ſufficient perſons be ſubſtituted in their place. Having obtained this important act, the parliament voted for the king's preſſing wants twenty thouſand ſacks of wool. Edward was no ſooner poſſeſſed of this ſupply, than he iſſued an edict, in which he aſſerted, that the ſtatute had been enacted contrary to law, and was prejudicial to the prerogatives of the crown which he had ſworn to defend; that he only diſſembled when he ſeemed to ratify it, but that he had had never, in his own breaſt, given it his aſſent: he therefore annuls it, though he profeſſes himſelf willing and determined to obſerve ſuch of its articles as were formerly law. This arbitrary exertion of regal power, left all the laws at the king's mercy; yet future parliaments took not the leaſt notice of it; and two years after Edward recovered ſuch influence, as to obtain a legal repeal of thoſe parts of the act which he moſt of all diſapproved of.

Though Edward, by thus temporizing, had extricated himſelf from ſome of his moſt preſſing difficulties, yet his preſent circumſtances, in many reſpects, were far from being agreeable. His claims on France and Scotland had involved him in a very expenſive war; his want of money had made him loſe moſt of his foreign mercenaries; he was deeply involved in debt, for which he was obliged to pay extravagant intereſt; while none of his military operations had been attended with the leaſt degree of honour or profit to the nation, except his naval victory; and, as an addition to theſe perplexing circumſtances, he received advice, that his German allies had deſerted his intereſt; but his aſpiring genius proved at laſt equal to his great undertakings; and an unexpected event about this time happened, which furniſhed him with an opportunity of attacking Philip in the very centre of his dominions, with much leſs expence, and a greater probability of ſucceſs. John III. duke of Brittany, declining through age and infirmities, was ſolicitous to prevent thoſe diſorders, to which his ſubjects, at his death, might be expoſed by a diſputed ſucceſſion. Having no iſſue, and intending to leave his duchy to a daughter of his brother the count de Ponthievre, he reſolved to marry her to Charles de Blois, a prince who in his judgment appeared capable of repelling any attempts that might be made to diſturb the tranquillity of his country. As his family had inherited by a female ſucceſſion, he preferred the title of Ponthievre's daughter to that of the count of Montfort, his brother by a ſecond daughter. However, he would not take this important ſtep without conſulting his ſubjects, who willingly concurring in his choice, the marriage was concluded, when all his vaſſals ſwore fealty to Charles and his ſpouſe, as their future ſovereigns; among which number was the count de Montfort himſelf: yet on the death of his brother John, forgetting both his conceſſion and his oath, he engaged many of the moſt conſiderable barons to acknowledge his authority, and made himſelf maſter of Rennes, Nantes, Breſt, Hennebonne, and other important fortreſſes of the duchy; while Charles de Blois was ſoliciting the inveſtiture of the ſame at the court of France. Montfort was ſenſible he ſhould not be able to ſupport his pretended right, unleſs aſſiſted by ſome powerfull ally; and therefore made a voyage to England, under pretence of eſtabliſhing his claim to the earldom of Richmond, which devolved to him on the death of his brother. Here he made Edward an offer of acknowledging, and of maintaining, by a ſtrict alliance, his title to the crown of France, propoſing, at the ſame time, to do him homage as his liege lord. Edward, who immediately perceived all the advantages that might reſult from this offer, ſpeedily concluded a treaty with Montfort; and though their pleas, in regard to the preference of ſucceſſion by a male or female were directly oppoſite, yet their immediate intereſts formed between them a ſtrict connection.

The latter having returned to the continent, and thinking his treaty with Edward a profound ſecret, ventured to appear at Paris, with an intent of defending his cauſe before the peers. But he was ſoon convinced of the imprudent ſtep he had taken. Philip, at his firſt audience, told him plainly, that he had no right to the duchy; and reproached him for entering into an alliance with a prince, the profeſſed enemy of France; but he excuſed his viſit to the Engliſh court under the pretence abovementioned; and with reſpect to the duchy, he expreſſed his willingneſs to ſtand an impartial trial, and ſubmit to the judgment of his peers. Philip promiſed the trial ſhould be brought on in a fortnight; but commanded him in the interim to keep within the walls of Paris. From this injunction, Montfort concluded he had every thing to fear from the juſtice of Philip, and took a reſolution to effect an eſcape, while he had it in his power. Accordingly, diſguiſing himſelf in the habit of a burgher, he quitted Paris early in the morning, and reached Brittany in ſafety. The king, when informed of his eſcape, in a tranſport of rage inſtantly confiſcated the earldom of Montfort; at the ſame time, by his ſole authority, he ordered the parliament of Paris, without proceeding through cuſtomary forms, to adjudge Brittany to Charles de Blois, whom, in order to execute the ſentence, he ſupplied with a numerous army, under the command of his eldeſt ſon John of Normandy. Montfort, unable to face the French forces in the field, ſhut himſelf up in Nantes; which, being beſieged, was, by the treachery of the inhabitants, delivered up to the enemy, and Montfort accordingly conducted to the caſtle of Louvre as a priſoner.

A. D. 1342.

Probably this event would have determined the fate of Brittany, had not Jane of Flanders, counteſs of Montfort, came forward to ſupport the ſinking fortunes of her family. Affected with the captivity of her huſband, ſhe quitted thoſe domeſtic cares which had hitherto employed her thoughts; and having aſſembled the inhabitants of Rennes, then the place of her reſidence, ſhe preſented herſelf before them with her infant ſon in her arms, recommending to their care the illuſtrious orphan, the only remaining male of their ancient princes, by whom they had been governed with parental indulgence. She laid before them the reſources that would ariſe from the alliance that had been formed with England. She earneſtly entreated them to make one vigorous effort againſt an uſurper, impoſed on them by an armed force, who in return would ſacrifice the ancient liberties of Brittany to his protector; and ſhe aſſured them, that in ſo juſt a cauſe ſhe was willing to run all hazards. Deeply affected by her addreſs, the inhabitants and ſoldiers promiſed to ſupport her with their lives and fortunes. All the other fortified towns in the duchy took the ſame reſolution; and the utmoſt diſpatch was uſed to furniſh them with every thing neceſſary for making a reſolute defence againſt the enemy. The counteſs ſent her infant ſon to England, both as a place of ſafety, and to engage the king to embrace the intereſts of her family with the greater zeal, from his having ſuch a pledge in his poſſeſſion: after which ſhe repaired to Hennebonne, the ſtrongeſt fortreſs in Brittany, reſolving there to wait for the ſuccours from Edward, which were ſhortly expected.

Anxious to obtain ſo important a fortreſs as Hennebonne, and ſtill more to take the counteſs priſoner, Charles de Blois inveſted the place with a large army, which was defended by the counteſs in perſon, with a bravery that would have done honour to the beſt general of the age. The French were repulſed in every attack, and perpetually harraſſed by ſallies from the caſtle. The counteſs was foremoſt in every danger, and headed her troops with undaunted intrepidity. One day, obſerving that the beſiegers in making an aſſault, had neglected to ſecure a diſtant quarter of their camp, ſhe ſallied out with two hundred cavalry, and ſet fire to their tents, baggage, and magazines. Preparing to return, ſhe found herſelf intercepted by a detachment from the main body of the enemy. Inſtantly taking her reſolution, ſhe ordered her men to make the beſt of their way to Breſt, where ſhe would ſoon meet them. At the time appointed, ſhe met at the place of rendezvous; increaſed her eſcort to five hundred men, returned to Hennebonne, and cutting her way through part of the enemy's camp, entered the town amidſt the ſhouts and acclamations of the garriſon. However, the repeated attacks of the beſiegers having at length made ſeveral breaches in the walls, a general aſſault was hourly expected; in which the garriſon, diminiſhed in their numbers, and extremely weakened, would probably have been overpowered. In this diſtreſſed ſituation, it was thought neceſſary to offer terms of capitulation; and the biſhop of Leon was actually ſent for that purpoſe to the camp of Charles de Blois; but the counteſs, who in theſe truly afflicting moments had aſcended a tower of the fortreſs, and with earneſt impatience was looking with languid eyes towards the ſea, obſerved a fleet of ſhips at a diſtance, bending their courſe toward her longing wiſhes. Immediately with rapturous joy, ſcarcely articulate, ſhe exclaimed, "Behold the ſuccours! The Engliſh ſuccours! No capitulation." This fleet, which Edward had ſent for the relief of Hennebonne, had long been detained by contrary winds; which, when the French ſaw enter the harbour, they were confounded, and laid aſide their deſign of making a general aſſault. This reinforcement conſiſted of a body of men at arms, and ſix thouſand archers, commanded by Sir Walter Manny, a brave Engliſh officer. The courage of the garriſon was now revived; they readily joined the Engliſh in a ſally, drove the beſiegers from their poſts, and obliged them to retire in haſte and confuſion.

In ſpite of all this ſucceſs, the counteſs was not able to take the field, being overpowered by numbers. She therefore repaired to England, to ſolicit more effectual ſuccours. Edward granted her a conſiderable reinforcement, under the command of Robert d'Artois, and the earl of Northampton. The counteſs herſelf returned in this fleet, which was attacked by a French ſquadron, commanded by prince Lewis of Spain. The brave heroine behaved with her uſual valour, and the action continued till night put an end to the conteſt. A violent ſtorm ſeparated the two fleets, but the Engliſh reached Brittany in ſafety. The firſt attempt made by Robert was againſt Vannes, which he carried by aſſault, but was dangerouſly wounded; and, during his confinement, a party in the intereſt of Charles attacked and took the place by ſurpriſe. Robert died of his wounds ſoon after, in his paſſage to England.

Now Edward having with laudable zeal undertaken to defend in perſon the counteſs of Montfort, aſſembled his army, embarked at Sandwich on the fifth of October, and, after a paſſage of two days, landed at Breſt. He formed three important ſieges at the ſame time; but by attempting too much, miſcarried in all. The duke of Normandy, with forty thouſand men, encamped in the vicinity of the Engliſh, and cut off their proviſions. In this dangerous ſituation, Edward liſtened to the mediation of the pope's legate, and a truce for three years was concluded on the following terms: that Vannes ſhould be ſequeſtered, till the expiration of the truce, in the hands of two cardinals, to be diſpoſed of by them in ſuch manner as they may think proper; that the Flemings ſhould be abſolved from the cenſures which the pope, at the inſtigation of the king of France, had denounced againſt them; that the places taken on both ſides ſhould remain in the hands of the preſent poſſeſſors, and the priſoners be ſet at liberty, on paying their ranſoms: that the allies, both of France and England, ſhould be included in this treaty; and that the two kings ſhould exert their endeavours to prevent hoſtilities in Brittany, France, and Guienne.

When theſe articles were ratified, Edward embarked for England, and having eſcaped in a long and dangerous paſſage, landed at Weymouth on the ſecond of March, A. D. 1343. from whence he proceeded immediately to London. Neither of the monarchs were diſpoſed to obſerve the truce. Philip, whoſe coffers were nearly emptied, was deſirous of procuring the departure of Edward; and the motive of Edward was that of extricating himſelf from a very dangerous ſituation. It is no wonder, therefore, that the ſmalleſt incident was laid hold of as a pretence for recommencing hoſtilities. Soon after the king's arrival in London, a parliament was ſummoned to deliberate on the truce, as well as to take cognizance of the ſtate of the government, and provide for the ſafety of the nation. Theſe points were debated by the lords ſpiritual and temporal in the White-Chamber, while the knights of ſhires and burgeſſes took them under conſideration in the Painted-Chamber of the palace; and this is the firſt clear diſtinction we find on record between the two houſes, as it is at preſent maintained. Having maturely conſidered the ſubject, they voted the truce honourable, and recommended a treaty of peace as a deſirable object, provided it could be procured upon equitable terms; otherwiſe they propoſed to ſupport the arms of their ſovereign to the utmoſt of their ability.

Conferences were to be opened at A. D. 1344. Avignon, in the preſence of the pope, about the beginning of Lent; but were deferred on account of ſome infringements of the truce in Brittany, for which Philip delayed giving proper ſatisfaction. Theſe conferences in the end proved ineffectual; for the Engliſh commiſſioners inſiſted, as a preliminary on their maſter's right to the crown of France, and Philip declared, that Edward ſhould never hold one foot of land in France; but what he might poſſeſs in vaſſalage. In vain his holineſs endeavoured to prevail on both parties to relax in their pretenſions; they were equally obſtinate; and their mutual diſguſt being inflamed with perſonal rancour, all thoughts of a ſolid peace vaniſhed. Edward complained loudly of Philip's conduct, in having ſeized as many of the friends of Montfort as fell into his hands; of whom ſome were confined in loathſome priſons, and others put to death. But his treatment of Oliver de Cliſſon, a gallant and brave officer, rendered his name odious. Cliſſon had been taken priſoner during the courſe of the war, and exchanged by Edward for lord Stafford, at the ſolicitation of his brother Amaury, who happened to be in the ſervice of the counteſs of Montfort. The preference given on this occaſion to Oliver over John de Leon, who was alſo his priſoner, and the circumſtance of his being attached to Montfort, excited the jealouſy of Philip, who was naturally cruel and ſuſpicious. He imagined that Oliver had entered into ſome engagement with Edward, and on this mere ſurmiſe ordered him to be apprehended; which was no ſooner done, than the unfortunate nobleman, without any form of trial, was beheaded, and his body hung on a gibbet at Paris. Not a lioneſs, deprived of her whelps, could be more enraged, than the brave king of England was at this unjuſt tranſaction. The inhabitants of Brittany were ſo exaſperated, that they declared to a man for Montfort, and expelled the pope's garriſon out of Vannes. This confirming Philip in his cruel ſuſpicions, he now cauſed ſeveral other noblemen of Brittany to be apprehended, and put them to death in the ſame infamous manner. Incenſed at theſe repeated acts of cruelty, Edward gave orders for beheading John de Leon, by way of repriſal, but was diverted from his intention by his couſin, the earl of Derby, who repreſented the iniquity of depriving an innocent perſon of life for the fault of another. Edward therefore ſending for his priſoner, generouſly gave him his liberty, bidding him go to Philip de Valois, upbraid him with his tyrannical behaviour, and tell him that Edward would not ſtain his reputation by imitating ſo bad an example; but, by the aſſiſtance of almighty God, he would ſeverely puniſh the author of ſuch unparalleled barbarity: that having broke the truce, by the execution of ſo many brave men, the king of England renounced it, and conſidered him now as a general enemy.

He alſo complained of Philip's behaviour with great emotion to his parliament, whom he conſulted on all occaſions; and they, entering cordially into his quarrel, granted him ſupplies for the renewal of the war. The counties were to pay a fifteenth for two years, boroughs a tenth, and the clergy agreed to give a tenth for three years. Enabled by theſe ſupplies to complete his military preparations, he ſent Henry, earl of Derby, the earl of Lancaſter's ſon, to commence hoſtilities in Guienne. This officer was one of the moſt accompliſhed noblemen in the Engliſh court; intrepid and humane, beloved by his friends, and dreaded by his enemies. Not ſatisfied with defending that province, he attacked the count de Liſle, the French general, at Bergerac, drove him from his intrenchments, and took the place. This ſucceſs animated the Engliſh; they made continual conqueſts with great rapidity, till they had reduced the greater part of Perigord.

A. D. 1345. However, while the earl of Derby was at Bourdeaux, the count de Liſle aſſembled an army of ten or twelve thouſand men, inveſted Auberoche, which had lately fallen into the hands of the Engliſh. Derby haſtened to relieve the place; and reached Liſbourn. Here he halted all day, waiting the arrival of a reinforcement under the earl of Pembroke, and proceeded on his march in the night; ſo that in the morning he reached a wood two leagues diſtant from Auberoche. In this ſituation he continued the beſt part of the day, ſtill waiting for the expected reinforcement; when, deſpairing of their arrival, he liſtened to the advice of Sir Walter de Manny, who propoſed to ſurpriſe the French at ſupper-time. His advice was followed with ſuch ſecrecy and ſucceſs, that the Engliſh entered one quarter of the French camp without reſiſtance; the enemy, ſeized with a panic, fled; and the counts de Liſle, Perigord, and Valentois, were taken priſoners in their tents, before they had time to recover their ſurpriſe. The confuſion was not however general; for while one quarter was filled with diſorder, the other, where the count de Cominges commanded, fled to arms, and advanced againſt the enemy. The Engliſh attacked them with incredible fury, and the engagement became very bloody; when the garriſon, alarmed by hearing the trumpets ſound a general charge, and diſcovering by the light of the dawn the Engliſh enſigns, ſallied out, attacked the French in flank, and had the honour of deciding the fate of the battle. Above ſeven thouſand fell in the action, and twelve hundred were taken priſoners, among whom were nine counts, and three hundred perſons of diſtinction. After this victory, the earl made a rapid progreſs in ſubduing the remaining French provinces. Monſegar, Villa Francke, Aiguillon, Angouleme, and Reole, with other places and fortreſſes, fell into his hands. Having put his army into winter quarters, he embarked for England, where he was honourably received. In June he returned to the continent, when he reduced every town and caſtle he inveſted, except Blaye, on which he made ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts. At length, the ſeaſon being far advanced, he put an end to his operations, and repaired to Bourdeaux. John de Montfort, about this time, having been confined almoſt four years, found means to make his eſcape, and paſſing over to England, where his wife then reſided, ſo affected the king with a recital of his treatment, that he determined to declare war with France immediately.

In the beginning of June, Montfort having done homage to Edward, as king of France, for Brittany, repaired thither, with a conſiderable body of forces, under the command of the earls of Northampton and Oxford, whereby he was enabled to reduce Dinan, and encouraged to inveſt Corentin, lately taken by Charles de Blois; but this competitor advancing with a numerous army, Montfort was obliged to raiſe the ſiege, and retired to Hennebonne, where he died of a fever. The earl of Northampton again took the field, defeated Charles in a pitched battle near Morlaix, and ſtormed Roche-derien; but leaving the affairs of Brittany to Sir Thomas Dogworth, he returned to London on the approach of winter.

A. D. 1346. As ſoon as the French court was ſupplied with money, Philip made great preparations to oppoſe the ſucceſsful arms of the Engliſh. He collected a numerous army, the command of which he committed to his ſon, the duke of Normandy, aſſiſted by the duke of Burgundy; who marched to Guienne, which obliged the earl of Derby to ſtand on the defenſive. The duke of Normandy opened the campaign with the ſiege of Angouleme; the garriſon of which made a noble defence, but were at laſt reduced to great extremities. Lord Norwich, the governor, ſaw the impoſſibility of defending the place much longer; but being unwilling to ſurrender at diſcretion, had recourſe to ſtratagem, which ſaved his garriſon from being made priſoners of war. Aſcending the ramparts, he deſired a parley with the duke of Normandy. His requeſt was granted. When the duke approached the walls, Norwich requeſted a ceſſation of arms on the day following, which was the feaſt of the Virgin, to whom they both paid great devotion. The duke readily agreed to the propoſal; and the governor having ordered his forces to prepare their baggage, marched out the next day early in the morning, advancing towards the French camp; who, ſuppoſing they were to be attacked, flew to arms; but Norwich by a meſſenger reminded the duke of their agreement. "I ſee," replied the prince, "the governor has outwitted me; but let us be content with taking the place." The duke of Normandy, after having obtained additional ſucceſs in other attempts, inveſted Aiguillon, which, having a ſtrong fortreſs and a brave garriſon, commanded by the earl of Pembroke, it ſeemed impoſſible to take by aſſault; he therefore propoſed to reduce it by famine; but was called to defend a diſtant part of the kingdom, againſt the ſucceſsful ravages of the Engliſh, before he could effect this deſign.

Underſtanding from the earl of Derby the danger to which Guienne was expoſed, Edward equipped a very powerful armament, and appointed a general rendezvous at Portſmouth, on Midlent Sunday; but part of his fleet being diſperſed by a ſtorm, his departure was deferred till the middle of May, when he was prevented from putting to ſea by contrary winds. During this interval, the king was perſuaded to change his deſigns and plan of operations. Geoffrey d'Harcourt, who was obliged by the ill treatment of Philip to fly from his native country, and ſeek an aſylum in England, had long maintained, that in the preſent circumſtances of affairs, an expedition to Normandy would probably be attended with greater ſucceſs than one to Guienne; that the northern provinces would be found almoſt deſtitute of military force, the troops being drawn to the ſouth; that they were filled with flouriſhing cities, which would enrich the Engliſh by their plunder; and the neighbourhood of the capital would render every victory of importance. Theſe reaſons, to which Edward had before given little attention, now made great impreſſion on his mind; and by reflecting on the diſappointments he had met with in his intended voyage to Guienne, he altered his firſt intentions, and reſolved to follow the advice of Geoffrey; he therefore ordered his courſe for Normandy, and ſailing from St. Helen's, with a fleet conſiſting of a thouſand ſail, landed on the twelfth of July at la Hogue.

Edward's army conſiſted of four thouſand men at arms, ten thouſand Welſh infantry, ten thouſand archers, and ſix thouſand Iriſh. The Iriſh and Welſh were light troops, fitter for doing execution in a purſuit, or in ſcouring the country, than for ſolid action. The only ſteady and regular forces were the men at arms; but theſe being cavalry, were not equal to good infantry in the ſhock of a battle. Edward, on his landing, created the earl of Arundel conſtable of the army, and the earls of Warwick and Harcourt marſhals. Here he beſtowed the honour of knighthood on his eldeſt ſon, Edward, prince of Wales, ſurnamed the Black Prince, from the colour of his armour, now only ſixteen years of age; and the ſame honour he conferred on ſeveral young nobility. The king then ſent back the greater part of his fleet; and ordered the earl of Huntingdon, who commanded the reſt, to cruize along the coaſt, and deſtroy all the veſſels which the king of France had equipped in different ports, for an invaſion of England. This ſervice effectually performed, and having traverſed the ſea coaſts, he returned to la Hogue, in order to attend the motions of the army. In the mean time Edward refreſhed his troops, after their long confinement on board, and having divided them into three bodies, advanced towards Valougnes, and thence to Carentan, which opened its gates at his approach, St. Lo, Monteburg, and other places in the Contenton were plundered without reſiſtance; and continuing his march, he arrived in the neighbourhood of Caen, the capital of lower Normandy. Philip, anxious to preſerve this rich and populous city, ſent for its defence the count d'Eu, conſtable of France, and count Tankerville, at the head of a conſiderable body of forces. The townſmen, encouraged by the reinforcements they had received, ſallied out upon the Engliſh. The conſequence was what might naturally be expected, when undiſciplined multitudes attack a regular army, they were totally defeated; Tankerville and d'Eu were taken priſoners; the victors with the vanquiſhed entered the city together, and a dreadful ſlaughter enſued, without diſtinction of age or ſex; all fell a ſacrifice to the edge of the ſword. But Edward, deſirous of ſparing both his ſoldiers and the ſpoil, obliged the inhabitants to lay down their arms, ordering his troops at the ſame time to plunder with more regularity and leſs hazard. The pillage continued three days; Edward reſerving for his own ſhare, the plate, jewels, ſilk, fine cloth, and fine linen; the remainder he beſtowed on his army; which was ſhipped, an immenſe booty, on board the fleet, lying at the mouth of the Orne, and the whole was ſent to England, with three hundred of the richeſt citizens, the king expecting to raiſe an additional profit from their ranſom.

Caen's diſtreſs, but more eſpecially the conſideration of its vicinity to Paris, threw all France into inexpreſſible conſternation; which was heightened by the march of Edward to Rouen, the capital of Normandy. Philip, not a little alarmed, appointed a general rendezvous of all his military power at Paris; from whence he proceeded for Rouen, breaking down all the bridges upon the Seine, between Paris and that city, in order to prevent the Engliſh from croſſing that river. Edward, hoping to take advantage of the general conſternation, continued his route along the banks of the Seine, on the other ſide of which he ſaw Philip poſted with a numerous army, in ſuch a manner as to render a paſſage impracticable. To effect this, Edward laid the whole country towards Paris waſte, deſtroying every town and village he met with on his way. Some of his light troops extended their ravages even to the gates of Paris, and the royal palace of St. Germain, with Ruelle, Nanterre, Vernon, Mullien, and Pont l'Arch, were reduced to aſhes within ſight of the capital. Yet theſe devaſtations could not provoke the wary French monarch to an engagement; whoſe deſign, Edward now perceived, was to encloſe him, in hopes of attacking him on all ſides to advantage. To prevent this, he advanced further up the Seine; but by a countermarch ſuddenly returned back to Poiſſy, which the French had quitted, in order to attend his motions; and having, with incredible celerity repaired the bridge, he cut to pieces a body of Picard militia left to guard it, paſſed over with his army, and advanced by quick marches towards Flanders. In his rout, he burnt the ſuburbs of Beauvais; and defeated, with great ſlaughter, the townſmen of Amiens, who were haſtening to reinforce the army of their ſovereign. But on approaching the river Somme, he found himſelf under the ſame difficulties as before, all the bridges being either broken down or ſtrongly guarded; Godemar de Faye, with twelve thouſand men, appeared on the oppoſite ſide; and Philip was approaching him with an army of above one hundred thouſand men. In this perplexing ſituation, Edward offered a reward to any perſon who ſhould inform him of a paſſage over the Somme; on which a peaſant diſcovered a ford below Abbeville, where the bottom was ſound, and the ſtream not more than a foot in depth at low water. This diſcovery was very pleaſing to the Engliſh army: they decamped at midnight, and reached the ford about ſun-riſing the next morning, a little before the tide of flood made up the river. The place anſwered exactly the deſcription given of it by the peaſant: but they found the paſſage guarded by Godemar de Faye, who was ſtationed on the oppoſite bank. Neceſſity directed the conduct of the Engliſh; but the king, who in the day of battle always maintained a remarkable coolneſs, acted in this dangerous attempt with the ſame preſence of mind as when drawing up his battalions in the abſence of an enemy. He ordered his archers to line the bank of the river, and to ply the foe inceſſantly with arrows; while, with calm intrepidity, he entered the river at the head of his third diviſion, calling out, "Let all who love me, follow my example." The French made a brave oppoſition; but the Engliſh were not to be intimidated by their moſt ſanguine efforts; animated by the preſence of their ſovereign, they returned their charge with double fury, cut in pieces the flower of their troops, and obliged the reſt to have recourſe to flight for ſafety. So narrow was Edward's eſcape, by his celerity and prudence, that Philip, with his vaſt army, arrived at the ford, while the rearguard of the Engliſh were paſſing; but the riſing of the tide ſtopped his career, and it is impoſſible to expreſs his vexation, when he beheld his victorious invaders purſuing with the utmoſt tranquillity their march.

Edward, having determined to form the ſiege of Calais, purſued that rout by ſlow marches, and halted the firſt night at the caſtle of Noyelle, whence he ſent detachments to burn Crotoye, and other towns in its neighbourhood. Next day he arrived at Creſſy. Here, being informed that Philip was purſuing him, as one whom he imagined fled before his arms; and perceiving the danger of expoſing his rear to the frequent attacks of the French cavalry, ſhould he proceed over the plains of Picardy; theſe weighty conſiderations made him form a reſolution of waiting for the enemy, and venturing a general engagement. With this fixed determination, he encamped on an eminence with a wood in his rear, placing the baggage waggons in his flanks, to ſecure them from the attacks of the enemy. Having reviewed his army, he held a council of war, who agreed unanimouſly with him in opinion. Their reſolution gave the king a particular pleaſure, as he had now an opportunity, by one glorious action, of recovering the earldom of Ponthieu, the inheritance of queen Eleanor, his grandmother. He could not diſſemble his ſatiſfaction; and concluded a ſpeech with theſe remarkable words, "God defend my right," which he made in the council.

Auguſt the twenty-fifth, Edward after having diſpoſed his army in moſt excellent order, waited with great tranquillity for the arrival of the enemy, hoping that their eagerneſs to prevent his retreat, would hurry them on to ſome raſh and ill concerted meaſures; in which conjecture he was not miſtaken. He paſſed the night ſecurely with his officers, whom he magnificently entertained, and, during their repaſt, diſcovered an unuſal gaiety of ſpirit. Early in the morning the king ſent for his ſon, the Black Prince, and ordered the army to be drawn up on the place appointed for the battle. The ground lay on the declivity of a hill, on the eaſt ſide of a large foreſt, having the river Maye, and the village of Creſſy, or Crecy on the left, and an intrenchment, with the baggage waggons already mentioned in the rear. He now divided his army, conſiſting of thirty thouſand men, into three lines. The firſt was commanded by the prince of Wales, or the Black Prince, having under him the earls of Warwick, Oxford, and Harcourt, the lords Stafford, Chandois, Delaware, Holland, Cobham, and other perſons of diſtinction. At the head of the ſecond line were the earls of Arundel and Northampton, with the lords Willoughby, Roos, Baſſet, Moulton, and Sir Lewis Tufton. Theſe two lines were formed in ſuch a manner as to ſupport each other; and the ſecond out-flanking the firſt, prevented its being ſurrounded by the enemy on the left, which was defended by a ſemicircular intrenchment terminating in the village of Creſſy. The third diviſion was commanded by the king in perſon, placed on the brow of the hill behind the other two lines. It conſiſted of ſeven hundred men at arms, ſix thouſand archers, and five thouſand three hundred billmen, under the command of the lords Mowbray, Mortimer, Dugworth, Sir Hugh Haſtings, and other brave officers. In this poſition Edward propoſed either to ſuccour occaſionally his other diviſions; to puſh any advantage againſt the enemy; or, in caſe of any misfortune, to ſecure a retreat. The behaviour of the king, and his gallant ſon the prince of Wales, expreſſed a calm intrepidity of invincible courage and manly reſignation. Edward, attended by two field marſhalls, rode from rank to rank to animate his men. His appearance and addreſs diffuſed a martial ardour throughout his army; and the reſolution apparent in his countenance ſeemed to preſage approaching victory. He then ordered his men at arms to diſmount, that the horſes might not be fatigued ſhould an action commence, and his ſoldiers to be refreſhed with a plentiful meal; after which they laid down in their ranks on the graſs to repoſe, that they might be freſh and vigorous at the enemy's approach.

In the mean time the French king, entirely confiding in the ſuperiority of his numbers, imagined every thing depended on forcing the Engliſh to a battle; and that, if he could once reach the enemy in their retreat, victory on his ſide muſt inevitably follow. He had made a haſty march from Abbeville in great diſorder; and after having advanced near two leagues, ſome officers whom he had ſent before to reconnoitre, returned with intelligence, that they had ſeen the Engliſh drawn up in admirable good order, and were waiting for his arrival with the greateſt tranquillity. The count de Balche, one of the beſt ſoldiers in Philip's army, adviſed him to defer the combat till the next day, when his men would be recovered from their fatigue, and might be diſpoſed in better order than their preſent precipitate march had permitted them to obſerve. Philip was convinced of the propriety of this remark, but the impatience of his nobility to attack the enemy rendered it of no effect. One diviſion preſſed upon another; orders to halt were not ſeaſonably conveyed to them all; the whole body was too large to be managed; thus they arrived very imperfectly formed into three lines, and already fatigued, within ſight of the enemy. The firſt line, conſiſting of fifteen thouſand Genoeſe croſs-bowmen, were commanded by Anthony Doria, and Charles Grimaldi; the ſecond was headed by count d'Alencon, brother to the king; and Philip commanded the third in perſon. Beſides the French monarch, there were three crowned heads preſent; the king of Bohemia, the king of the Romans, and the king of Majorca; together with all the great vaſſals of the crown of France. The army conſiſted of above one hundred and twenty thouſand men, more than four times the number of Edward's.

The Engliſh were far from being daunted at the ſight of ſuch a prodigious multitude; and Edward urged every motive that might have a tendency to inflame their natural valour: he pointed out to them the neceſſity to which they were at preſent reduced, and the certain deſtruction which awaited them, if, in their preſent ſituation, encloſed on all ſides in an enemy's country, they truſted to any thing but their own valour, or gave the French an opportunity of taking revenge for the many indignities they had lately received. He reminded them of the acknowledged ſuperiority they had hitherto maintained over all the detachments of the French army who had fallen in their way, and aſſured them, that the greater numbers of the enemy which at preſent menaced them with deſtruction, were more than compenſated by the order in which he had placed his own troops, and the reſolution he expected from them. He told them, that he requeſted nothing more than their imitating his own example, and that of the Black Prince; and as the honour, the lives, the liberties of all were now expoſed to the ſame danger, he was confident they would make one common effort to extricate themſelves from ſurrounding difficulties, and that their united courage would give him a glorious victory. Beſides this, and other neceſſary incentives, ſome hiſtorians have obſerved, particularly John Villani, that Edward placed ſome pieces of artillery in his front. This invention was at this time known in France as well as in England; but Philip, in his haſte to overtake the enemy, had probably left his behind him; and all his other movements diſcovered the ſame precipitation and imprudence.

When the enemy approached, the Engliſh kept their ranks firm and immoveable. The battle was begun by the Genoeſe croſs-bowmen; but a ſudden ſhower having fallen a little before the engagement, their bow ſtrings were relaxed, and their arrows fell ſhort of their intended mark. The ſame misfortune had not attended the bows of the Engliſh archers; who drew them from their caſes in which they were preſerved, and inſtantly poured ſuch a dreadful ſhower of arrows, that the Genoeſe, unable to endure the ſtorm, fell back upon the duke of Alencon's cavalry, and were put into diſorder. A ſecond well aimed diſcharge threw them into the utmoſt diſmay. The duke, enraged at their cowardice, commanded his troops to put them to the ſword. At this inſtant, the Black Prince ordered ſome batallions of guards to advance, who charging them at that juncture, cauſed great confuſion in the firſt and ſecond lines of the French; but the duke of Alencon having diſengaged himſelf from the Genoeſe, and making a circuit with his cavalry, flanked the firſt battalion of Engliſh archers, and from their ſuperior numbers began to ſurround them. The earls of Northampton and Arundel now advanced with their line to ſupport their prince, who, ardent in his firſt feats of arms, ſet an example of bravery that was imitated by all his ſoldiers. However, the aſſiſtance thus afforded the prince, had eventually almoſt proved his ruin; for Philip, by that motion of the Engliſh, found an opening, at which he poured in a freſh body of troops to his brother's aid, who fell on the flank of the archers with ſuch fury, that they were obliged to open their ranks, and thus expoſe the prince to imminent danger. This being perceived by the earl of Warwick, he ſent a meſſenger to the king, with intreaties that he would diſpatch ſuccours for the relief of the Black Prince, who was now attacked both in front and rear. "Is he ſlain or wounded?" ſaid the king with great compoſure. Being anſwered in the negative, "Return to my ſon," added he, "and tell him, I reſerve the honour of the day for his bravery. I am confident that he will ſhew himſelf worthy of the honour of knighthood which I ſo lately conferred upon him: I ſhall not intermeddle: let my boy win his ſpurs by his own valour." This anſwer, when delivered to the prince in the hearing of his followers, inſpired the whole battalion with freſh courage. They cloſed their ranks, and attacked their aſſailants with redoubled vigour. Their whole line of cavalry being ſurrounded, were routed; the count of Alencon was among the ſlain; the men were killed or diſmounted; and no quarter being allowed by the victors to the vanquiſhed, the Welch infantry, ruſhing into the throng with their long knives, cut the throats of all who had fallen.

Now Philip advanced with the rear; but he found two lines of his army already defeated; yet the battle was again renewed with great obſtinacy. The French monarch, his ſon Charles, with a great number of auxiliary princes, animating their ſoldiers to heroic deeds both by words and example: but the impetuoſity of the Black Prince bore down all oppoſition. Elated with the ſucceſs he had already obtained, and inſpired by his father's meſſage, he redoubled his efforts, nobly braving every attempt of the enemy: lances, ſpears, arrows, and ſwords, were indiſcriminately mixed: kings, princes, peers, generals, knights and common ſoldiers, ſhared the ſame fate, forming one promiſcuous frightful heap of ſlain. In vain did Philip attempt to adjuſt the confuſion that reigned in his own line; in vain he endeavoured to reanimate his drooping ſoldiers; their courage anſwered not that of their leader: he gave ſignal proofs of his capacity as a general; his valour was undaunted; but his efforts were too late. Having had his horſe killed under him, he was remounted; and though left almoſt alone, was reſolved to maintain the combat; when John of Hainault ſeizing the reins of his bridle, turned about his horſe, and led him off from the field of battle. The blind king of Bohemia, whoſe ambition had embroiled the greateſt part of Europe, enquiring about the fate of the day, was told, that the French would no longer face the Engliſh; that a great number of nobles were ſlain; that Charles had been put to flight, being dangerouſly wounded; that the Engliſh had made a dreadful ſlaughter; and that Philip himſelf, who was alſo wounded, had retired from the field of battle. Upon this information, he ordered the reins of his bridle to be tied on each ſide to the horſes of two gentlemen of his train, and that they ſhould lead him againſt the young warrior. Having exchanged two or three random ſtrokes, he fell, with his attendants, at the feet of the conqueror. Their dead bodies were afterwards found, with their horſes ſtanding by them. He wore on his creſt three oſtrich feathers, with this motto in German, ICH DIEN, I ſerve, which the Black Prince, and ſucceeding princes of Wales adopted, in remembrance of this unrivalled day.

Now Victory, to cloſe the bloody tranſactions of this important day, blew her trumpet by the ſide of Edward; the ſtandard of France was beaten down; a horrid carnage attended with a general flight enſued; nor did the ſlaughter ceaſe, till darkneſs put an end to the deſperate conteſt. Edward, ſeeing the glorious work accompliſhed, deſcended from the hill, and running into the arms of the prince embraced him tenderly, ſaying, "My brave ſon, God grant you may perſevere in the courſe you have ſo gloriouſly begun! You are my ſon; for nobly have you acquitted yourſelf this day; well do you deſerve that crown to which you was born." The prince made no other reply than a low obeiſance, conſiſtent with that modeſty and moderation, which were without example in thoſe days. There fell in this memorable action, which was fought on the twenty ſixth of Auguſt, and continued from three o'clock in the afternoon, till the evening, John, king of Bohemia; James, king of Majorca; Ralph, duke of Lorrain; the counts of Alencon, Flanders, Blois, Vaudemont, Harcourt, Aumale, St. Pol, and ſeveral dukes of Bourbon and Lorrain; alſo by a moderate computation four-and-twenty barons, twelve hundred knights, fifteen hundred gentlemen, four thouſand men at arms, with thirty thouſand infantry: as the loſs of the Engliſh did not exceed three knights, with very few of inferior rank; ſo great is the ſuperiority of prudence and conduct, over numbers and temerity!

Philip attended by only five knights and ſixty followers, was conducted to the caſtle of la Braye, about a league from Creſſy, where, having taken ſome refreſhment, he ſet out at midnight, and arrived ſafe at Amiens. Edward, who paſſed the night on the field of battle, ſent a detachment of two thouſand archers on horſeback, with five hundred lancemen, to ſcour the adjacent country. Theſe fell in, during a miſt, with a large party of the country militia, who, not knowing the fate of the day, were advancing to join Philip; but the Engliſh ſoon defeated them. A more conſiderable body of French, under the command of the archbiſhop of Rouen, and the grand prior of France, who were both ſlain, ſhared the ſame fate. In the mean time the king ordered ſome French ſtandards to be erected on the neighbouring eminences as a decoy to the enemy, and all who were allured to reſort to thoſe falſe ſignals, were put to the ſword without mercy. This unneceſſary ſeverity, and his orders iſſued before the battle to give no quarter, are repreſented by ſome as circumſtances that have tarniſhed the glory of this victory. In excuſe it is alledged, that the French king had given ſimilar orders to allow no quarter to the Engliſh; but the moſt probable reaſon aſſigned may be, that Edward, in his ſituation, tion, thought it dangerous to be encumbered with priſoners. But if Edward refuſed mercy to the living, he treated the dead and wounded with great humanity; ordering the latter to be taken care of, and conſecrated the bloody ſpot for the burial of the former, attending in perſon the funeral of the nobility. The body of the king of Bohemia was ſent to his family.

Though Edward drew the moſt ſolid advantages from the battle of Creſſy, he was not ſo elated as to imagine himſelf in a condition to make a total conqueſt of France; he only propoſed to ſecure an eaſy entrance into that kingdom, which might afterwards open a way to the accompliſhment of future projects. He knew the great diſtance of Guienne; he had experienced the difficulty of penetrating on the ſide of the Low Countries, where he had loſt all influence ſince the death of Ardevelt, who had been dragged into the ſtreet, and cut to pieces by his enraged countrymen: having therefore continued three days on the field of battle, he led his victorious army to the gates of Calais, and inveſted that place on the third of September. It was governed by John de Vienne, a valiant knight of Burgundy, who knowing the place to be well ſupplied with plenty of ſtores, encouraged the garriſon to make a reſolute defence. Hence Edward being ſenſible it would be in vain to attempt gaining the town by ſtorm, propoſed to reduce it by famine. With this determination, having choſen a ſecure ſtation for his camp, he drew a circumvallation of entrenchments, cauſing huts to be erected for his ſoldiers; and furniſhed his army with all conveniences neceſſary to endure the rigour of the ſeaſon in their winter quarters. The governor, perceiving his intention, expelled above ſeventeen hundred uſeleſs mouths out of the town, whom the king ſuffered generouſly to paſs through his camp without moleſtation, and even ſupplied them with money to defray the expences of their journey. During this famous ſiege, many events happened to the honour of the Engliſh arms: and upon an impartial view of the whole period it will be found, that few years are recorded in the annals of hiſtory more glorious to England, than that which we have treated of in this reign.

As the duke of Normandy had been recalled from Guienne, on the landing of Edward in that province, no army was left to oppoſe the progreſs of the earl of Derby: nor did this able general fail to improve ſo favourable an opportunity. He took Maribeau and Luſignan by aſſault. Taillebourg, St. Jean d'Angeli, and Poictiers ſurrendered at the firſt ſummons. Theſe acquiſitions opened him a free paſſage into the adjacent provinces, and he extended his incurſions to the banks of the Loire, ſpreading devaſtation through all that part of the French dominions. The counteſs of Montfort continued alſo to diſplay her heroic virtues in Brittany. Charles de Blois having inveſted the fortreſs of Roche de Rien, at the head of a conſiderable army; that place was of too much importance for the counteſs to ſuffer it to fall into the hands of the enemy, without attempting its relief. She therefore put herſelf at the head of her forces; and having received a reinforcement of Engliſh troops under the command of Sir Thomas Dagworth, attacked the French during the night, routed the whole army, and took Charles de Blois priſoner. This miſfortune drew the counteſs of Blois from obſcurity, in whoſe right her huſband claimed the duchy of Brittany. She now took upon herſelf the government, and rivalled the counteſs of Montfort, her antagoniſt, both in the field and the cabinet. While theſe heroic ladies thus diſtinguiſhed themſelves, another princeſs of ſtill higher rank appeared in the liſt of theſe female champions.

A. D. 1342. Having for a long time defended their liberties againſt the Engliſh, the Scots recalled David Bruce their king. At the inſtigation of Philip, they now took the opportunity, during the abſence of Edward, to ravage the northern counties of England, which they entered with an army of fifty thouſand men, levying the moſt oppreſſive contributions, and committing the moſt dreadful diſorders in their march, which extended to the gates of Durham. Upon this occaſion queen Philippa ſet out for the north, and having collected an army of twelve thouſand men, led them againſt the Scottiſh invaders. Her army was divided into four bodies; the firſt commanded by lord Piercy; the ſecond by the archbiſhop of York and lord Neville; the third by the biſhop of Lincoln and lord Mowbray; and the fourth by Baliol in perſon. In this order they advanced towards Nevill's croſs, near the City of Durham, where the army of Bruce lay encamped. A great number of perſons ſerved as volunteers on this occaſion, partly to expreſs their loyalty in the king's abſence, and partly to diſtinguiſh themſelves under the eye of the queen, who riding through the ranks, exhorted them to do their duty, and to be revenged on thoſe barbarous invaders.

The Scots drew up their army in three lines. The firſt conſiſting of French auxiliaries, and the flower of the Scottiſh nobility, was commanded by the king in perſon; the ſecond by Robert, high ſteward of Scotland, and the earl of Marche, and the third by the earls of Murray and Douglas. The Scots had often been unfortunate in their pitched battles, fought with the Engliſh, but never did they receive a more fatal overthrow than that which they at preſent experienced.

On the ſeventeenth of October the battle was begun, by a body of croſs-bow men, who ſerved in the diviſion under Robert; but they were ſoon routed by the more experienced Engliſh archers. Robert perceived the ſuperiority of the latter, and preſſed on furiouſly with his men at arms, to begin a cloſe fight with the detachment under lord Piercy. The Engliſh archers opened immediately to the right and left, to let the enemy paſs, but cloſing again, galled them dreadfully with their arrows in flank, while they were engaged in front with the Engliſh infantry. Robert however maintained the fight with the greateſt obſtinacy; and it was for ſome time doubtful on whoſe ſide victory would declare. Baliol ſaw the furious conteſt, and led up his diviſion to the aſſiſtance of lord Piercy. The Scots now fighting an unequal combat, gave way, and betook themſelves to flight. Baliol, who was not deficient in military abilities, inſtead of purſuing the fugitives, wheeled ſuddenly about, and fell with the utmoſt impetuoſity on the flank of the diviſion commanded by the king. David fought with unqueſtionable bravery, and aſſiſted by his barons, made a noble ſtand againſt the Engliſh; but their ſuperior numbers, and military diſcipline, which was almoſt arrived to its zenith in that age, ſoon broke the whole diviſion, put them to flight, and took the king himſelf priſoner. The third diviſion, under the earls of Murray and Douglas, ſtill ſtood firm; till the whole force of the Engliſh was brought up in the attack, when they were alſo obliged to follow the flying remains of their ſcattered army. Murray was ſlain in endeavouring to rally his men, and Douglas was ſent to accompany his royal maſter. The field of battle was now in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh; and this victory might have determined the fate of Scotland, had not Robert rallied his men, and retreated in ſuch good order, that the fugitives had time to join him, and form a body which the victors did not think proper to purſue. This deciſive action proved equally to the honour of the queen, and the advantage of the nation. Fifteen thouſand, or according to ſome hiſtorians, twenty thouſand of the Scots were ſlain; among theſe, Sir Thomas Charteris, chancellor; Edward Keith, earl marſhal; and the lord Chamberlain, the earls of Sutherland, Monteith, Fiſe, Carrick, Murray, and Strathem, lord Douglas, the king, with ſeveral noblemen and perſons of diſtinction, were in the liſt of priſoners. Thirty-ſix of theſe, with David their king, were ſecured in the Tower of London, and Philippa paſſed over to the Engliſh camp before Calais, where ſhe was received with all the honours due to her rank her merit, her glorius ſucceſs and the prudence of her meaſures.

A. D. 1347. The blockade of Calais was conducted with no leſs circumſpection, than it was defended with vigilance and bravery by the townſmen and garriſon. Philip after the ſiege had continued near twelve months, being made acquainted with their diſtreſſed condition, approached the Engliſh with an army, which, according to the writers of that age, amounted to two hundred thouſand men. But he ſoon perceived it would be madneſs to attack them, without running on inevitable deſtruction, Edward having ſecured his camp with moraſſes, and exceeding ſtrong intrenchments; the French monarch therefore had recourſe to negociation. He offered to cede Guienne, together with the earldom of Ponthieu. Theſe offers were rejected. Whereupon he challenged the king of England, to decide their quarrel in the open field. This was alſo refuſed, Edward being too prudent to riſk the whole upon the uncertainty of a ſingle combat. Thus diſappointed in all his views, to render ignominy complete, the French monarch left the victors to purſue their conqueſts, and diſbanded his numerous forces. The garriſon being left without hope of relief, almoſt wholly deſtitute of proviſions, reduced to the laſt extremity, deſired to capitulate. John de Vienne, fully convinced of the neceſſity of ſurrendering, appeared upon the walls, and having made ſignal to the Engliſh centinels, deſired a parley. Edward ſent to him Sir Walter Manny, whom the governor thus addreſſed, "Brave knight, I have been intruſted by my ſovereign with the command of this city. You have beſieged me almoſt a year; and I have endeavoured, as well as thoſe under me, to do our duty. You are acquainted with our preſent condition, periſhing with hunger, and without hopes of relief: I am therefore willing to ſurrender, and deſire, as the ſole condition, to inſure the lives and liberties of thoſe brave men, who have ſo long ſhared with me every danger and fatigue." Sir Walter informed the governor in anſwer, that he was well acquainted with his royal maſter's reſolution reſpecting this matter, and knew he would inſiſt on his ſurrendering at diſcretion; nor would he accept the profered ſurrender on any other terms, than that the inhabitants, who had exaſperated Edward by their obſtinate reſiſtance, ſhould be ranſomed or puniſhed at pleaſure. "Is this," replied Vienne, "the treatment brave men are entitled to? Would not your maſter have expected the ſame conduct from an Engliſh knight with whom he had intruſted the defence of a citadel? The inhabitants of Calais have done nothing more than their duty, which ſhould pleaſe rather than offend the king of England, eſpecially ſo gallant a prince as Edward. But I will inform you, Sir, that if it is our fate to be devoted, we will not periſh unrevenged; and that we are not yet reduced to ſuch an abject ſtate, as ſhall prevent our ſelling our lives at a high price to the victors. Nature and humanity plead againſt ſuch unjuſt extremities; and I expect that you, Sir, will interpoſe your good offices in our behalf." Manny, ſtruck with the juſtneſs of theſe ſentiments, repreſented to the king, the dreadful conſequences that might reſult from ſo dangerous a precedent, ſhould he treat the inhabitants of Calais with unuſual rigour, which could not fail of increaſing the miſeries of war, already ſufficiently ſevere. At length Edward was perſuaded to mitigate the rigour of his proſcription, and inſiſted only, that ſix of the moſt ſubſtantial citizens ſhould be ſent to him, to be diſpoſed of according to his pleaſure; that they ſhould repair to his camp, carrying the keys of the city in their hands, with ropes about their necks, bare headed and bare footed, on which terms he conſented to indulge the reſt with a pardon. When theſe hard conditions were reported to the inhabitants of Calais, they were ſeized with a general conſternation and horror. The ſacrifice of ſix of their fellow citizens to certain deſtruction, for bravely diſtinguiſhing themſelves in the common cauſe, appeared even more ſevere than the general puniſhment, with which Edward had before threatened them. At laſt Euſtace de St. Piere, with a ſpirit worthy of an old Roman, ſtepped forward, and declared his willingneſs to ſuffer death for the preſervation of his fellow citizens. His generous example was followed by three of his relations; a fifth, a ſixth, preſented themſelves to ſuffer the ſame fate. Theſe ſelf-devoted victims appeared, in the manner preſcribed, before Edward, marching through a melancholy croud of weeping friends. When they reached the Engliſh camp, they laid the keys at his feet. The king, more inclined to ſtrike terror than to carry his threats into execution, ordered the ſix burghers to be beheaded. The remonſtrances of his courtiers could not divert him from his purpoſe; but the voice of conjugal affection pleaded more ſtrongly in their behalf. The queen, then pregnant, fell on her knees, and with all the tender eloquence of love, implored their forgiveneſs. Edward could not withſtand the pleadings of ſuch a powerful mediatrix. Overcome by her tears, he relented; forgave the patriotic citizens; and after regaling them plentifully, ſuffered them to return to their diſconſolate relations. Edward, being now maſter of Calais, took every precaution in his power to ſecure his conqueſt. He knew that it would be impoſſible for him ever to make the inhabitants real friends to his government, and therefore obliged them all to leave the town, and repeopled it from England. This policy preſerved the place from reverting to the government of a French monarch for ſeveral centuries.

A. D. 1348. Edward by the mediation of the pope, concluded a truce with Philip; but the terms were very ill obſerved, and he was very near loſing Calais, the ſole fruit of his victories, by the governor being corrupted. Aimery de Pavia, brave, but a ſtranger to every principle of honour, was intruſted with the command of this important place. Geoffrey de Charny, governor of St. Omer's, found means to open a negociation with Aimery, who for the ſum of twenty thouſand golden crowns, promiſed to admit a certain number of French troops into the town; and the moſt proper methods were taken to ſecure ſucceſs. Aimery's ſecretary informed Edward of this treachery, who ſummoned the governor to London; where having charged him with his crime, he promiſed him his life on condition of his turning the contrivance to the deſtruction of the enemy; and the Italian readily agreed to this double treachery. A day being appointed for the admiſſion of the French, Edward with about a thouſand men, under the command of Sir Walter Manny, departed ſecretly from London, taking with him the prince of Wales; and arrived at Calais the evening before the treacherous deſign was intended to be carried into execution. Having prepared for the reception of the enemy, Charny, the French general, no ſooner appeared, than a choſen band, which he had ſelected, was admitted at one of the poſterns by the governor, who received the ſtipulated ſum, and promiſed he would inſtantly open the great gate to the troops who were waiting without. All the French who had entered were immediately taken priſoners, while Charny was waiting with impatience for the ſignal to enter the town in triumph. At length the great gate opened, and the Engliſh ruſhed out under the banner of Sir Walter Manny, both Edward and the prince of Wales ſerving as volunteers. Charny was aſtoniſhed, but behaved with great bravery, and a bloody conteſt enſued. He drew up his men in a ſquare battalion, and maintained the fight till the break of day with the greateſt intrepidity. The king, who fought as a private man, obſerving a French gentleman fighting with ſingular valour, was ſtrongly inclined to engage with him in ſingle combat; ſtepping forth from his rank, he challenged Ribeaumont, whom he knew by name, and a ſharp encounter enſued. Edward was twice ſtaggered by the Frenchman, and as often recovered himſelf with ſurpriſing agility. Their blows were redoubled with equal fury on both ſides, and the victory remained long undecided, till Ribeaumont calling out to his antagoniſt, ſaid, "Sir knight, I yield myſelf your priſoner," delivering at the ſame time his ſword to the king. Charny, in the mean time, maintained the fight with great obſtinacy; but perceiving his retreat cut off by a detachment from the town, he ſurrendered at diſcretion. All the officers were conducted to Calais, where they were treated with great courteſy, being admitted to ſup with the prince of Wales and the Engliſh nobility. After ſupper the king entered the apartment, converſing familiarly with different priſoners, and in an obliging manner addreſſed himſelf to Charny, whom he reproached not for his treachery. He beſtowed the higheſt praiſes on Ribeaumont, whom he called the moſt valorous knight with whom he had ever been acquainted; and acknowledged, that he had never been in ſuch danger as when engaged in combat with him; then taking a ſtring of pearls which he himſelf wore, and throwing it over Ribeaumont's head, "Sir Euſtace," ſaid he, "I make you this preſent as a teſtimony of my eſteem for your bravery, and deſire you to wear it a year for my ſake. I know that you are amorous, and take delight in the company of the ladies. Let them all know from whom you received this preſent. You are no longer a priſoner; I acquit you of your ranſom; and to-morrow you are at liberty to diſpoſe of yourſelf as you pleaſe."

A. D. 1349. In all likelihood the regard which Edward ſhewed to the brave Ribeaumont, was the occaſion of the inſtitution of the ancient order of the garter, which took place about this time. Authors are not agreed about this particular. Some think, according to a vulgar notion, it took its riſe from an affair of gallantry. They ſay, that Edward's miſtreſs, the counteſs of Saliſbury, happening to drop her garter while ſhe was dancing at a court-ball, the king picked it up, and obſerving ſome of his courtiers to ſmile, as if he had not obtained this favour merely by accident, he cried out, Honi ſoit qui mal y penſe, i. e. "Evil to him who evil thinks;" adding, that many who now laughed at the garter, ſhould be proud to have the honour of wearing it; that in order to make good his word, and perpetuate the memory of this event, he inſtituted the order of the garter, retaining the words above mentioned for the motto, and chooſing the garter for the badge of the order. Others ſuppoſed it owed its origin to an affair of a military nature. They pretend that Edward having revived the order of the round table, originally eſtabliſhed by prince Arthur, ſuch numbers of foreign warriors crowded to his court, as excited the jealouſy of the French king, with whom he was then at war; and who, in order to counterbalance the advantage accruing to his adverſary from this circumſtance, inſtituted an order of his own, which ſoon procured him a like number of warriors; but that monarch abuſing the confidence repoſed in him, and violating the laws of hoſpitality, ſeized ſeveral lords of the Engliſh party, who came among others to aſſiſt at the feſtival. That Edward, informed of this proceeding, conſcious of the rectitude of his own intentions, and provoked at the perfidious conduct of his rival, cried out, Honi ſoit qui mal y penſe, and converted the round table into the order of the garter. That he choſe this badge in particular, either becauſe in the battle of Creſſy he had given garter for the word; or becauſe on that occaſion he had ordered his garter to be fixed to the end of a lance, as the ſignal for engaging; or, according to others, becauſe Richard I. at the ſiege of Acres in Paleſtine, intending to aſſault the place, diſtributed among ſome of his principal officers, certain leather ſtrings to be tied about their legs, the better to diſtinguiſh them from the enemy. The only concluſion we are able to draw from theſe conjectural plauſibilities, is, that Edward, in imitation of ſome other orders of the ſame honorary kind, both military and religious, eſtabliſhed in different parts of Europe, inſtituted that of the garter, probably as a token or pledge of regard, which he entertained for ſome particular perſon, blue, which is the colour of the garter, having been always reputed the emblem of friendſhip and fidelity. This order conſiſted at firſt of twenty-five perſons, beſides the ſovereign, and ſtill continues to be no leſs honourable than when its inſtitution took place.

This feſtivity and other rejoicings having terminated, Edward, after depriving Aimery of his government, which he conferred on Sir John Beauchamp, returned to England, where he amply rewarded his brave followers, and companions in his late heroic achievements.

A. D. 1349. Edward's return to his court was with inexpreſſible pomp, and he was received too as a being of a ſuperior nature. He had then many illuſtrious captives, beſides the king of Scotland, Charles de Blois, and the conſtable of France; and as he had a natural turn for magnificence, the winter was ſpent in grand tournaments, to which all his priſoners were invited. This gave them a very favourable idea of the Engliſh monarch, who appeared as amiable in peace as he had been terrible in war. Indeed England now ſeemed to have attained her meridian of power. But the prodigious extenſion of commerce, the incredible influx of riches, joined to the natural plenty of the ſeaſons, introduced luxury, and threatened to revenge on the victors the cauſe of France. Refinements in the methods of living, dreſs, and furniture, became common. The plain ſide-boards, hitherto adorned with veſſels and other utenſils of wood, now glittered with gold and ſilver plate; and the native charms of the Engliſh ladies were heightened with the reflected rays of jewels and embroidery. But this was not all, it was an age of heroines. The queen of England, the counteſs of Montfort, and the lady of Charles de Blois, with many other of the moſt exalted ranks, had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the field; and thence private ladies affected, by an aukward imitation, diſtinctions foreign to their ſex. This prepoſterous cuſtom was encouraged by the manners of the court, the moſt ſplendid that had been ſeen during many ages in Europe. But the plague, which ſoon after broke out in ſeveral parts, brought them back to a juſt ſenſe of what they owed to their own ſex, and to their duty. This dreadful viſitation of God firſt appeared in the northern parts of Aſia; and after ſpreading all over that country, continued its deſtructive progreſs from one end of Europe to the other. It then fell upon the weſtern parts of England, from whence it proceeded to London, and raged with unremitting fury near two years; ſo that hardly one tenth of the inhabitants ſurvived. Above fifty thouſand perſons periſhed in the capital only. This ſevere ſcourge of providence rendered it neceſſary for the kings of France and England to prolong the truce concluded at Calais; neither the French or Engliſh being in a condition to renew hoſtilities. But the Scots, taking advantage of the peſtilence, renewed their ravages in the northern parts of England, and carried back the contagion, together with a large booty, into their own country, where it made terrible devaſtation.

A. D. 1350.

Philip de Valois, king of France, died about this time, without being able to reſtore the affairs of France, which Edward by his victories had thrown into extreme confuſion. He was ſucceeded by his ſon John, diſtinguiſhed by his many virtues, particularly a ſcrupulous honour and fidelity. His kingdom was filled with domeſtic commotions, and he wanted thoſe virtues of a public nature, which the turbulence of the times, and the ſituation of his affairs required. His relation, Charles king of Navarre, ſurnamed the Bad, threw the kingdom of France into diſorder, by aſſaſſinations and perfidy. He entered into a private treaty with the Engliſh, and even ſeduced the dauphin to engage in his intrigues; but that prince being at laſt convinced of the folly of ſuch deſtructive connections, invited the king of Navarre, and the noblemen of his party, to an entertainment at Rouen, where they were all betrayed into the hands of John; this treachery, however, proved not deciſive in maintaining the royal authority.

A jubilee being proclaimed at Rome, the pope complained that hoſtilities prevented the paſſage of the devotees, who were deſirous of reſorting thither. But Edward, to prevent his people from being fleeced of their money by popiſh pageantry, reſtricted his ſubjects from repairing to Rome. This prohibition ſo incenſed the pope, that he even proceeded to threats; but Edward, deſpiſing his remonſtrances, not only repeated his former injunction, but commanded all his ſubjects beyond ſea, on forfeiture of life and fortune, to return home immediately.

The Spaniards being ſpirited up by the king of France to make captures among the Engliſh veſſels, they took and deſtroyed a conſiderable number, trading for wine to Bayonne. Elated by this ſucceſs, they aſpired to more important deſigns, and equipped a powerful armament, with which they intended to make a deſcent upon England. The chief command was veſted in Charles de la Cerda, who ſailed up the Britiſh channel as far as Sluys in Flanders, deſtroying all the Engliſh veſſels that came in his way. Edward, being informed of his proceedings, aſſembled a fleet of fifty ſail, to intercept him in his return; and embarked at Sandwich with the Black Prince, the earls of Warwick, Northampton, Saliſbury, and a ſtrong body of Engliſh archers. The two fleets no ſooner came within ſight of each other, than a furious engagement commenced, off Winchelſea and Rye, on the twenty-ninth of Auguſt. Though the Spaniards had a great advantage in the ſize of their ſhips, the Engliſh bowmen plied them with arrows ſo effectually, that they could not ſtand their decks, and, after an obſtinate reſiſtance, were entirely defeated. So humbled were they by this defeat, that they ſued for a truce of twenty years, which Edward for the benefit of commerce granted.

A. D. 1351.

At this time, the plague being greatly abated, the ſpirit of war revived, which ſeemed to have lain dormant under that calamitous affliction. The truces between France and England were only obſerved as far as ſubſervient to their reſpective intereſts, and now the French had formed a kind of blockade round Calais, by poſſeſſing themſelves of all the roads leading to that town, and cutting off the garriſon's communication with the adjacent country. The Engliſh governor, Sir John Beauchamp, determined to ſcour the country with a body of troops, conſiſting of five hundred. In one of his excurſions he was attacked by a ſuperior number of French; and though he behaved with the utmoſt bravery, yet being oppoſed by freſh numbers, he was at laſt ſurrounded and taken priſoner, and loſt the greateſt part of the detachment, notwithſtanding he killed the French commander with his own hand. He was ſucceeded in the government of Calais by Sir Robert Herle, who in revenge for the captivity of his predeceſſor, over-ran the frontiers of Picardy and Artois. Hoſtilities now roſe to ſuch a height, that Edward ſent over the duke of Lancaſter, to carry on the war, which was continued with various ſucceſs for ſome time. Such was the ſtate of the diſpute, when hoſtilities again ſubſided by the renewal of the truce, in the negotiation at Calais, where it was agreed, that the governors of frontier places ſhould take an oath to ſee it obſerved with punctuality: yet, notwithſtanding this precaution, acts of hoſtility were again commenced. The marſhal de Neſle was detached with a body of forces, to aſſiſt the partizans of Charles de Blois, and being joined by many noblemen of Brittany, formed a conſiderable army, with which he attacked Sir Walter Bentley, in the plains of Mairon, Though far ſuperior to the Engliſh in number, he met with ſo warm a reception, that his forces were routed, and himſelf, with fourſcore knights, five hundred gentlemen, and ſome thouſands of common ſoldiers, were left dead on the ſpot, and ſeveral noblemen taken priſoners.

A. D. 1352.

A. D. 1353.

A dreadful famine now threatened England, but the people were ſeaſonably ſupplied with corn from Holland and Hainault, and by Edward's ſubjects in Ireland. At the ſame time the conferences for a definitive treaty were again opened, and the archbiſhop of Canterbury, with the duke of Lancaſter, were appointed to meet the French commiſſioners near Guiſnes. The treaty advanced ſo far, that Edward conſented to reſign his title to the crown of France, on condition that the duchy of Guienne, and province of Ponthieu, ſhould be reſtored to him as independent ſovereignties, and that the French ſhould cede to him the lands he had conquered around Calais, and the ſuperiority of Flanders; but theſe propoſals being rejected, both parties prepared to decide the diſpute by battle.

A. D. 1354.

Still the pope laboured to effect a reconciliation between the two contending powers, but his intentions were fruſtrated by the French plenipotentiaries, who declared, that every gentleman in France would ſooner loſe his life, than conſent to a ſeparation of Guienne from the crown of that kingdom; the whole reſult therefore of the pope's negotiation was a prolongation of the peace till Midſummer. This truce being expired, the duke of Lancaſter was appointed lieutenant for the king in Brittany; and the Black Prince, accompanied by the earls of Warwick, Oxford, Saliſbury, Suffolk, and other perſons of diſtinction, embarked with a numerous army at Plymouth, landed at Bourdeaux, and was joined by the moſt conſiderable part of the Gaſcon nobility: In conſequence of this junction, he began his march towards Armagnac, which, together with Aſtarac, Cominges, la Riviere, he ravaged, plundering the inhabitants, and laying the villages and towns in aſhes. From thence he proceeded to Thoulouſe, where the French army, exceeding his own in number, computed at threeſcore thouſand men, lay encamped, camped, under the command of the counts of Armagnac and Foix, the prince of Orange, the conſtable of Bourbon, and the marſhal de Clermont. Having attempted in vain to bring them to battle, he paſſed the Garonne above the city, deſtroyed all the fine towns in the neighbourhood, and entirely ruined one of the moſt fertile countries in France. Having received intelligence that the French were poſted behind the Sauve, as if they intended to diſpute his paſſage, the Black Prince repaired thither; but on his approach, the enemy retired to Gimont, though not ſo expeditiouſly, but that the van of the Engliſh intercepted part of their rear, which was cut to pieces. He arrived before the place with his whole army in the evening, and drew up his forces in order of battle; but the enemy had marched off in the night, leaving a ſtrong garriſon in the town, which being well provided for making an obſtinate defence, young Edward thought proper to decline the ſiege. Returning therefore to Bourdeaux, he put his troops into winter quarters.

The prince of Wales's ſucceſs in France diſpoſed his father to ſupport him again in the invaſion of that kingdom. Accordingly he ordered a rendezvous of his military tenants to be held at Sandwich, and landed the latter end of October at Calais, where he was joined by a thouſand men at arms from Flanders. He had under him his ſon Lionel, Henry duke of Lancaſter, and a great number of barons from the north; the border having been ſecured by a treaty granted to the Scots at their own deſire.

A. D. 1355. November the ſecond he advanced to St. Omer, where king John was poſted. That prince retiring from thence, he followed him to Heſdin; but finding there was not the leaſt proſpect of bringing him to an engagement, and winter being near, the king returned to Calais, where he diſmiſſed his foreign troops, and paſſed over to England, in order to oppoſe a threatened invaſion of the Scots. That nation, in violation of the truce, had ſurpriſed Berwick, and raiſed an army, in order to ravage the northern provinces. Edward, advancing as far as Haddington, burnt the towns and villages without ſeeing the face of an enemy, for the Scots had retired to their faſtneſſes, after having removed all their proviſions from the low lands, that the Engliſh might not find any ſubſiſtence. This precaution obliged Edward to retire to Roxburgh. Here Baliol, now grown old, and overwhelmed with infirmities, reſigned his title to the crown of Scotland in favour of the Engliſh monarch, who, in conſideration of this ceſſion, granted him a penſion of two thouſand pounds for life, paid all his debts, and preſented him with five thouſand marks, as a recompence for his faithful ſervices.

A. D, 1356. In the month of July the Black Prince, encouraged by his late proſperous campaign, took the field at the head of two thouſand men at arms, ſix thouſand archers, and four thouſand infantry. The ſucceſs of this young warrior is at this day aſtoniſhing. He waſted Quercy, the Limoſin, and Auvergne, entered Berry, and took Vierzon by aſſault. Here he received the firſt intelligence, that the king of France was poſted at Chartres, with a prodigious army, collected from all parts of the kingdom. John, ſuſpecting that Edward intended to paſs the Loire, and join the duke of Lancaſter, who commanded a body of troops in Normandy, had diſpoſed his army in ſuch a manner as to guard all the towns and paſſages on that river. Young Edward perceived it was impracticable to advance, and therefore reſolved to retreat to Bourdeaux. John, penetrating into his views, in order to intercept him, croſſed the Loire, and marched with ſuch expedition, that he overtook him in the neighbourhood of Poictiers. Young Edward, ſenſible that it was impoſſible for him to continue his retreat, prepared for a battle, with all the courage and ſpirit of a hero, and with all the prudence of an old experienced commander. He poſted his handful of men in a place of difficult acceſs, where neither the enemies cavalry could attempt to pierce, nor their infantry attack him, without great diſadvantage. At the end of a narrow lane, the only avenue by which the French could advance, he placed a ſquare battallion of the flower of the Engliſh archers; nor could the enemy avail themſelves of their vaſt ſuperiority of numbers till that corps was broken. Yet notwithſtanding this prudent arrangement, he was ſo ſtraitened for want of proviſions, that a few days muſt have ſtarved him into a ſurrender; but the French, confiding in their own valour, and numbers, demanded a battle with ſo much eagerneſs, that John did not think it prudent to check their ardour. He divided his army into three bodies: the firſt, and moſt advanced, was commanded by his brother, the duke of Orleans; the ſecond, poſted on the left, was under the direction of the dauphin, aſſiſted by his brothers Lewis and John; while the king in perſon, accompanied by his youngeſt ſon Philip, commanded the third diviſion, or body of reſerve. It was propoſed to begin the attack by a ſquadron of three hundred horſe, dreſſed in complete armour, who were to be ſupported by all the reſt of the army diſmounted, the German curiaſiers excepted.

The cardinal of Perigord, juſt before the charge was ſounded, interpoſed his good offices, to prevent any further effuſion of blood; deſiring that he might be allowed to repair to the Engliſh camp, where he did not doubt of being able to perſuade the prince of Wales to ſurrender. John conſented, and the cardinal found young Edward ſenſible of the critical ſituation of his affairs, and willing to agree to any terms conſiſtent with his own honour and that of England. He offered to purchaſe a retreat to Bourdeaux, by reſigning all the conqueſts he had made, during this and the former campaign, and for the ſpace of ſeven years not to ſerve againſt France. This propoſal was haughtily rejected by John, who peremptorily inſiſted, that the prince himſelf, together with one hundred of the chief nobility in his army, ſhould ſurrender themſelves priſoners; on which conditions he promiſed a ſafe retreat to the Engliſh army. The Black Prince, with a true greatneſs of mind, which would have done honour to an old Roman, rejected the propoſal diſdainfully, declaring, that England ſhould never be conſtrained to pay the price of his ranſom, and that he would rather ſacrifice his life, than conſent to ſuch infamous demands. This reſolute anſwer put an end to all thoughts of an accommodation. The ſword was to determine the important conteſt, and the next morning was to be the period of the lives of thouſands. No advantage was omitted by the Black Prince. He employed the night in ſtrengthening the poſt he had ſo judiciouſly choſen, with new intrenchments; and detached a body of choſen men under the command of John de Greilly, with orders to make a compaſs round the hill, and keep himſelf concealed till the battle ſhould begin, and then to fall upon the French rear. He divided his troops into three diſtinct bodies, but ranged in ſo compact a manner, that they ſeemed to form only a ſquare battalion: the front was defended by a number of ditches and hedges; and the flanks were ſecured on one ſide by a ſteep hill, and on the other by a moraſs. The earl of Warwick was ſtationed on the ſide of the hill, with the troops which compoſed the van; the rear, commanded by the earls of Suffolk and Saliſbury, was poſted behind a hedge, about a ſtone's throw from the lane through which the French muſt march to the attack. At the end of the lane was a pretty large gap, where young Edward took his poſt at the head of the main body, which extended itſelf among the vines and buſhes; the weaker part of the field being by the carriages and baggage-waggons incloſed.

At nine in the morning the ſelect body of men at arms entered the lane with great intrepidity; but were ſo galled by the Engliſh archers, who lined the hedges on each ſide of their paſſage, that one half of them fell before they reached the front of Edward's main body, when they were cut to pieces by an advanced party, commanded by lord Audley. The marſhals Clermont and Andrehen, who with a body of cavalry had advanced cloſe behind the men at arms to ſupport them, were greatly incommoded by the bodies of the ſlain, while the archers plied them without intermiſſion. When they had penetrated to the rear of the Engliſh, they met with ſo warm a reception from the earls of Warwick, Saliſbury, and Suffolk, at the head of a detachment from the rear, that Clermont was killed on the ſpot, and Andrehen obliged to ſurrender himſelf priſoner; the fate of theſe noblemen, and the carnage that enſued, ſo terrified their followers, that they fled with the utmoſt precipitation. The firſt body of the French being thus routed, the dauphin advanced to the charge, though his men were greatly diſpirited; but they had no ſooner begun the attack, than John de Grielly, ſallying from his ambuſh, fell with the utmoſt impetuoſity upon their rear, and threw them into terrible diſorder; the Engliſh archers plied them with arrows, while another body of infantry, with ſwords and battle axes, ruſhed upon them, and made a moſt dreadful ſlaughter. Bodenai, St. Venant, and Landas, to whom had been committed the care of the dauphin, carried him off, and thus ſet the example of a precipitate flight. The duke of Orleans, who had not been engaged, being ſeized with a like panic, followed the ſame rout. Lord Chandois then calling out to the Black Prince, that the day was won, the young hero inſtantly charged the diviſion under the king with great fury. The king was in the vigour of manhood, the prince in the flower of youth; the former armed with a battle axe, the latter with a ſword; both achieving feats of valour; the one preſſed forward for the prize of glory, the other exerted his utmoſt efforts, to retrieve by his valour what he had loſt by his imprudence. The ſtruggle was violent, the conteſt long and doubtful, the laſt ſcene blood and ſlaughter. All that had paſſed before ſeemed only an exerciſe of arms, in compariſon of what now enſued. The reſolution of the Engliſh was oppoſed to the raging fury of the French; their projected ſpears checked that fury, and well aimed arrows thinned the ranks of the enemy. The Black Prince, with unſpeakable courage, fell on a body of German cavalry, placed in the front. The diſpute was warmly maintained; nor did the Germans give ground till their three leaders, with the conſtable of France, were ſlain. Being left without a commander, they fled from the field of battle, leaving their ſovereign, with his young ſon Philip, expoſed to all the fury of the enemy. John now ſaw himſelf reduced to a ſmall batallion of faithful friends, who were continually leſſened by the ſwords of the Engliſh. Every moment the ranks were thinned around him: his nobles, one after another, fell by his ſide; his ſon, ſcarce fourteen years of age, received a wound while fighting with great bravery by the ſide of his father. John himſelf, who could wield his ſword but faintly, might eaſily have been ſlain, but every one was emulous of ſo noble a prize, and therefore, as they approached called out to him to ſurrender, and offered him quarter; but, unwilling to yield himſelf a priſoner to any perſon of inferior rank, he called out, "Where is my couſin, the prince of Wales, to him only I will yield." Being informed that Edward was in another part of the field, he ſtill perſiſted obſtinately to defend himſelf, and ſeveral who attempted to ſeize him paid for their raſhneſs. At length Sir Dennis de Morbec, a knight of Artois, making his way through a crowd of aſſailants, requeſted John to yield himſelf his priſoner; and the king, after being aſſured he was a knight, threw him his gauntlet, as a ſignal of ſurrender. His ſon was made priſoner alſo.

The Black Prince, who had been carried to ſome diſtance in purſuit of the enemy, finding the field clear, ordered a tent to be pitched, and was repoſing himſelf after the toils of the battle. He was at the ſame time very anxious to know the fate of the king of France. Having ſent the earl of Warwick to bring him intelligence, that nobleman came happily in time to ſave the life of the captive king. The Engliſh had taken him by violence from Morbec; but the Gaſcons claimed as their right the honour of detaining him; and ſome brutal ſoldiers threatened to put him to death, rather than deliver him up. Both parties were overawed by the preſence of Warwick, who, approaching the monarch with the greateſt marks of reſpect, offered to conduct him to Prince Edward. The behaviour of this noble perſonage was even, if poſſible, ſuperior to the abilities and bravery he had diſcovered in the time of action. Inſtead of indulging a ſupercilious pride, too commonly the attendant of youthful warriors, he came from his tent to meet the captive king, with all the marks of a ſincere regard. Though only twenty-ſeven years of age, and elated by as extraordinary an inſtance of ſucceſs as ever crowned the arms of any commander, he ſympathized tenderly with his miſfortunes; he paid him the tribute of praiſe due to his valour, and aſcribed his own victory to the blind chance of war, or to a ſuperior Being, whoſe providence controuls all the efforts of human power and prudence. He ordered a magnificent repaſt to be prepared for him in his tent, and, with the ſweeteſt affability, he even waited upon his royal priſoner, as if he himſelf had been one of his retinue; and when preſſed by the French monarch to ſit down, he declared, with all the marks of genuine modeſty, "That it was not for a ſubject like him to ſit in the preſence of royal majeſty." The French noblemen, who had been invited to the entertainment, were ſtruck with reverential awe at this inſtance of magnificence and true greatneſs of ſoul; and lamented the fate of their country, in being expoſed to the reſentment of an enemy of ſuch diſtinguiſhed abilities. He was indeed a ſhining example of moderation and humanity, and exhibited a ſublime ſympathy, rarely attendant on conqueſt. Even the elder Edward, brave as he was, degraded himſelf by the mean uſes he made of his victory, and their mercenary tendency; but the younger was truly great, without vanity, in conciliating the affection of his very priſoners.

By the battle of Poictiers was this memorable victory obtained, on the nineteenth of September, without the loſs of one perſon of diſtinction among the Engliſh; whereas the principal noblemen of France fell in the conteſt. Two dukes, nineteen counts, five thouſand men at arms, and about eight thouſand infantry, are ſaid to have been killed on the ſide of the French. Two thouſand men at arms were taken priſoners; among whom, beſides John, king of France, were three princes of the blood, the archbiſhop of Sens, the counts of Eſtampes, Vaudemont, and many other perſons of note.

Edward's kind and generous conduct towards his noble priſoners was imitated by the whole army, who treated even the moſt inferior among them with tenderneſs and humanity. The ſpoils taken in in the French camp were ſo great, that the meaneſt individual in the Engliſh army found himſelf placed beyond the reach of want during the remainder of his life. Indeed the ranſoms of the illuſtrious priſoners alone, were more than ſufficient for that purpoſe; though theſe were very moderate. The extent of the fortunes of all were conſidered; and no more was exacted from them than they could eaſily ſpare; nor were they without ſufficient means to ſupport their rank and families.

After a ſolemn thankſgiving in the Engliſh camp for their late victory, the moſt noble prince of Wales marched with his army to Bourdeaux; while the dauphin, haſtening to Paris, aſſembled the ſtates of the kingdom to concert meaſures for its defence, and to procure their aſſiſtance towards the ranſom of their ſovereign; but inſtead of complying with his requeſt, they entered into ſteps for humbling the power of the crown; and John, informed of their proceedings, deſired his ſon not to conſent to their inſolent demands, aſſuring him, that he had rather continue the priſoner of an honourable enemy, than live a ſlave to his own ſubjects.

A. D. 1357.

Pope Innocent VI, affected with the captivity of the French king, ſent the two cardinals, Perigord and St. Vital to Bourdeaux, to mediate a peace; but failing in their negociations, they confined their requeſts to the obtaining a truce for two years. The Black Prince, ſincerely diſpoſed to heal the wounds both nations had received, readily joined his endeavours with thoſe of the legates; and wrote over to the king in ſuch preſſing terms, that his father ſent him full powers to act as he thought moſt conducive to his own honour, and the good of his country. The prince heſitated not a moment. He ſigned the peace at Bourdeaux, on the twenty-third of March, and then embarked with his noble priſoners, having ranſomed all his own men of the captors, for England; and landed on the twenty fifth of May at Sandwich in Kent.

He was received in every place through which he paſſed with the greateſt expreſſions of joy; but he refuſed many of the honours that were intended for him, deſiring that they might be transferred, with every mark of attention and civility, to the French monarch. At Southwark he was met by a thouſand of the principal citizens on horſeback; and the mayor diſplayed, on this occaſion, all the pomp of the city. The entry was very magnificent, and the proceſſion was attended by an innumerable concourſe of people of all ranks. John, attired in his royal robes, was mounted on a ſtately white courſer, remarkable for its ſize and beauty, as well as for the richneſs of its trappings. The Black Prince rode on the left hand of his priſoner, in his ordinary dreſs, on a ſmall black palfry, diſcovering, in the whole of his deportment, a ſtudious deſire to avoid every mark of diſtinction. The ſtreets through which they paſſed were adorned with plate, tapeſtry, trophies of war, colours, armour, fountains of wine, and temporary triumphal arches; a ſight infinitely more glorious than the vain parade of a Roman triumph, when the ear of folly was ſaluted with the rattling of chains, and the eye of pity oppreſſed with the dejected looks of enſlaved captives. The proceſſion laſted from three in the morning till noon. When arrived at Weſtminſter-hall, where the king of England ſat on his throne, ſurrounded by a ſplendid circle of nobles, he advanced a few ſteps to receive from the prince his royal priſoner, whom Edward addreſſed with the ſame reſpect as if he had been a neighbouring prince, who had come voluntarily to pay him a friendly viſit; and John in captivity received the honours of a king, which were refuſed him when ſeated on a throne. The French monarch behaved with ſo much propriety on this occaſion, as to ſhew himſelf truly deſerving the generous civilities that were ſhewn him; with which his nobles appeared much affected.

Immediately after this ceremony, the two cardinals arrived from the pope, to obtain, if poſſible, a definitive treaty; but finding Edward averſe to the terms propoſed, they demanded the arrears of the tribute that had been formerly paid to the ſee of Rome; but the king refuſed a compliance therewith, and plainly told them, that as he held his crown of God alone, he would never pay tribute to any power on earth. Awed by this bold declaration, they dropped the ſubject; and after having raiſed large contributions from the clergy, applied themſelves to obtain the liberty of David Bruce, king of Scotland. This prince had been now eleven years a captive in England, his ſubjects having refuſed to pay his ranſom. Edward, moved by the entreaties of the two cardinals, but eſpecially by the ſolicitations of his ſiſter, the queen-conſort of Scotland, agreed to a negociation for ſetting her huſband at liberty. The conferences were opened at Berwick, where it was ſtipulated in the treaty, that David ſhould be ſet at liberty, on condition of giving hoſtages for the payment of one hundred thouſand marks ſterling, to be diſcharged in ten years by equal payments; and till the whole debt ſhould be liquidated it was alſo agreed, that a truce ſhould ſubſiſt and be inviolably obſerved by both nations. This treaty being ratified, David returned to his kingdom.

The captivity of John produced in France an almoſt total diſſolution of civil authority; and occaſioned the moſt horrible and deſtructive confuſions. The dauphin, who was now eighteen years of age, naturally aſſumed the royal power; but though he had an excellent capacity, he had neither ſufficient experience nor authority to defend a ſtate, aſſailed at once by foreign powers, and ſhaken by internal faction. During this diſtracted ſtate of affairs in France, Edward chiefly employed himſelf in negociations with his priſoner; and John ſigned terms of peace, in which he conſented to reſtore all the provinces that had been poſſeſſed by Henry II. and his two ſons; and to annex them for ever to the crown of England, without any obligation of fealty or homage. But this treaty was rejected by the dauphin and the ſtates of France; and Edward, incenſed at their refuſal, threatened to viſit the dauphin at Paris on the expiration of the truce. His reſolution reſpecting an invaſion of France was no ſooner divulged, than a prodigious number of adventurers flocked to his ſtandard; and he croſſed the ſea to Calais with a very formidable armament, attended by the Black Prince, three other ſons, and a great number of nobility, on the twenty-eighth of October. A. D. 1359. Edward began his march from Calais on the fourth of November, at the head of one hundred thouſand men. This force the dauphin thought irreſiſtible, and he determined not to hazard a deciſive action. Leaving therefore the open country expoſed to the fury of the enemy, he employed himſelf in putting all the conſiderable towns in a poſture of defence: while Edward, in ſpite of deep roads and rainy weather, continued his progreſs through Artois and Picardy, till he reached Rheims in Champagne, where the kings of France were uſually crowned. Here he propoſed to be inveſted with the royal diadem of France, and the biſhops of London and Durham attended him to perform the ceremony; but finding the place well ſecured, he ſpent three months in a blockade without effect, and was obliged at laſt to raiſe the ſiege.

A. D. 1360.

Early in the ſpring, Edward conducted his army into Burgundy when the duke, in order to preſerve his country from farther ravages, agreed to pay him one hundred thouſand nobles. He then directed his march towards the Nivernois, which eſcaped by a like compoſition. The Brie and the Gatinois he plundered with the utmoſt cruelty; and after a long deſtructive march, of ſome prejudice to his own troops, he appeared before the gates of Paris, burnt the ſuburbs, and fixed his head-quarters at Bourg-la-Reine. Here the king ſent a defiance to the dauphin, challenging him to battle: but this was rejected, the dauphin being too prudent to change his plan of operations; for Paris was in no danger either of an aſſault or a blockade; and Edward, being in the heart of a country he had waſted, was obliged to ſpread his troops into the provinces of Maine, Beauſe, and the Chartraine, which were abandoned to the fury of their devaſtations.

While the war was carried on in this deſtructive manner, the negotiations for peace were not interrupted; yet as the king ſteadily inſiſted on the full execution of the treaty he had made with John at London, which was as obſtinately rejected by the dauphin, there appeared little proſpect of an accommodation; but, by the repreſentations of the duke of Lancaſter, more moderate terms were introduced at the conferences between the Engliſh and French carried on at Bretigni in the Chartraine; and a peace was concluded on May the eighth, on the following conditions; that the king of England ſhoud renounce his pretenſions to the crown of France, and to the provinces of Normandy, Maine, Touraine, and Anjou; and ſhould receive in exchange the provinces of Poictou, Xantongue, Perigord, the Limoſin, Agenois, Quercy, Bigone, Gauze, Angoumois, and Rovergne: that he ſhould enjoy theſe territories in the fulleſt manner, and without any feudal ſubjection or homage, together with Calais, and the ſovereignty of Guienne: that the diſpute between Charles de Blois and John de Montfort, with regard to the duchy of Brittany, ſhould be candidly diſcuſſed and referred to arbitration, under the ſanction of both kings; but if their good offices proved ineffectual, neither ſhould take any part in the quarrel, though the ſovereignty of Brittany ſhould be reſtored to the king of France, and John de Montfort to the poſſeſſion of all his eſtates in that kingdom: that the king of France ſhould renounce his alliance with the Scots, and Edward his connections with the Flemings. Forty hoſtages, among whom were two ſons of the French king, the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, offered themſelves voluntary ſureties for the execution of theſe conditions. All points of difference being thus adjuſted, king John went over to Calais in July, and in October king Edward repaired thither, to receive the firſt payment of the ranſom, which amounted to ſix hundred thouſand gold crowns; but France had been ſo grievouſly exhauſted, that not above two thirds of the ſum could be raiſed, and hoſtages were delivered for payment of the remainder at Candlemas. The dauphin and his council repairing to Bologne, conferences were held on the late treaty; and by the conſent of all parties ſome clauſes of it were altered, and the whole was ratified by both kings at Calais, on the twenty-fourth of October. The next day John ſet out for Bologne, and Edward accompanied him about a mile from Calais, when they parted with demonſtrations of mutual eſteem; for the good diſpoſition of John rendered him ſo ſenſible of the generous treatment he had received in England, as entirely obliterated the memory of his rival's aſcendency over him. Notwithſtanding the terms of the late peace were very rigorous, John was poſſeſſed of ſuch integrity, that he reſolved to execute them at all hazards, and to employ every expedient in order to ſatisfy a monarch, who, though he had been his greateſt political enemy, had treated him with the utmoſt humanity and ſingular reſpect.

A. D. 1361.

This important buſineſs of a treaty between the two kingdoms being happily concluded, Edward returned to England in November, where the peace was celebrated with all kinds of rejoicings; and the articles ſoon after being laid before both houſes of parliament, were unanimouſly approved. But the great joy ariſing from this pleaſing event, was ſoon damped by the fatal conſequences of a dreadful plague which broke out at this period, and ſwept away great numbers, among whom were the lords Seymour, Mowbray, and other perſons of high diſtinction; but no one was ſo much regretted by the public as Henry, duke of Lancaſter, who was univerſally eſteemed and beloved for his many amiable qualities. His only ſurviving ſiſter became his heir, and had been ſome time married to John of Ghent, Edward's fourth ſon, who, in right of his brother-in-law, was ſoon after created duke of Lancaſter.

In order to reconcile his new ſubjects to the Engliſh government, Edward determined to put them under the immediate juriſdiction of the heir-apparent. Accordingly he conveyed his French dominions to his ſon, by executing a deed of aſſignment; and the Black Prince prepared for his embarkation. He had married his couſin, Joan of Kent, the young and beautiful relict of the late earl of Holland. This princeſs was daughter of Edmund, earl of Kent, who had been beheaded, in the beginning of the preſent reign; and for her exquiſite beauty ſhe was generally known by the appellation of the Fair Maid of Kent. The noble hero who had raiſed the honour of the Engliſh to ſo exalted a pitch, was now created prince of Aquitaine. He ſoon after croſſed the ſea, and fixed his reſidence at Bourdeaux, where he kept a ſplendid court, beloved and reſpected by all his ſubjects, who thought themſelves peculiarly happy in being governed by ſo great and generous a prince.

A. D. 1363.

The king of France, notwithſtanding his earneſt deſire of fulfilling his late engagements in the treaty with England, found inſurmountable difficulties from the unwillingneſs of thoſe who were to evacuate the places ceded to Edward, ſo that his two ſons, who were left as hoſtages, began to be tired of their confinement; and gave the king to underſtand, that they could contribute towards the removal of thoſe difficulties, if permitted to repair to Calais, where they ſhould be near the ſeat of negociation; they were therefore ſent thither, and allowed to ride about the country on their parole; but their endeavours proving ineffectual, the duke of Anjou ungenerouſly abuſed his liberty, and eſcaped to Paris. John ſeverely reprimanded him for this diſhonourable behaviour: he even determined to atone for the fault of his ſon, by going over to England in perſon, and by attempting to remove the obſtacles which impeded the full execution of the treaty. His council in vain endeavoured to diſſuade him from his deſign; his purpoſe was fixed, and every argument loſt its force. "If juſtice, honour, and good faith," ſaid he, "were baniſhed from the reſt of the world, they ought to be found in the breaſts of kings." This noble way of thinking, incompatible with the common maxims of policy, kept him fixed to his purpoſe: accordingly he embarked for England, where he met with a cordial reception, which his heroic integrity juſtly merited; and the kings of Scotland and Cyprus being then in London, Edward's court ſhone with reſplendent luſtre. John reſided at his former place of abode the Savoy, where, where, in the ſpring he fell ſick, and died on the eighth of April, in the fifty ſixth year of his age. During his reign, the crown of France had acquired conſiderable acceſſions, by obtaining the provinces of Dauphiny and Burgundy: but the latter province John diſmembered from the crown, by beſtowing it on his favourite ſon Philip, which afterwards proved the ſource of many calamities to France.

Charles, the dauphin, ſucceeded John in the throne, and contrary to the practices of the great princes of that age, reſolved never to appear at the head of his armies; and he is ſaid to be the firſt king in Europe that ſhewed the ſuperiority of judgement, foreſight, and policy, to raſh and precipitate courage. He began his reign with turning his arms againſt the king of Navarre, who was defeated by his general Bertrand de Gueſclin, a gentleman of Brittany, and obliged his enemy to accept of moderate terms of peace. But the chief obſtacle Charles met with in the ſettlement of the ſtate, proceeded from enemies of an inferior kind, who were rendered eminent for their crimes, and dangerous from their numbers. The numerous adventurers who had followed Edward's fortunes, having, after the treaty of Bretigni diſperſed into ſeveral provinces, and obtained the poſſeſſion of ſtrong fortreſſes, refuſed to lay down their arms. They aſſociated themſelves with bands of robbers, who were inured to violence and rapine; and under the name of Companions and companies, became the terror of the people. Theſe banditti were commanded by ſome Engliſh and Gaſcon gentlemen, particularly Sir Hugh Calverly, Sir Matthew Gournay, the chevalier Vert, and others, and their numbers, amounting to near forty thouſand, carried the appearance of regular armies. Several pitched battles were fought by theſe leaders with the troops of France, in which they were victorious; and in one of theſe, James de Bourbon, a prince of the blood, was ſlain. Charles, in the diſtracted ſtate of his kingdom, not being able to redreſs ſo enormous a grievance, was led by policy to ſend them into foreign countries.

Peter, king of Caſtile, ſurnamed the Cruel, had incurred the univerſal hatred of his ſubjects, by filling, not only his own family, but the whole kingdom with murders and bloodſhed: his nobles daily fell victims to his ſuſpicions: from groundleſs jealouſy, he put to death ſeveral of his natural brothers; hence, as his enemies increaſed, they became the occaſion of freſh barbarities. Inſtigated by his miſtreſs, he threw into priſon Blanche de Bourbon his wife, the queen of France's ſiſter, whom he ſoon after diſpatched by poiſon, in order to marry his ſtrumpet. In conſequence of this, Henry, count de Traſtamare, roſe in arms againſt Peter; but, failing in his attempt, fled to France, where he was protected by Charles. Here he propoſed to enliſt the companies into his ſervice, not doubting but that by their aſſiſtance, added to his brother's arms, he ſhould ſoon be able to expel the tyrant from his throne. The French king, pleaſed with the propoſal, readily conſented, and ordered Gueſclin to conclude a treaty with thoſe banditti. Gueſclin quickly completed his levies; and being appointed their commander, took the field. He conducted his army to Avignon, the reſidence of the pope, and demanded, ſword in hand, not only an abſolution for his ſoldiers, but the ſum of two hundred thouſand livres. His holineſs readily promiſed the firſt; but making ſome difficulty with reſpect to the money, the general anſwered, "I believe that my fellows may make a ſhift to do without your abſolution, but the money is abſolutely neceſſary." His holineſs having obliged the inhabitants to pay one hundred thouſand livres, offered it to Gueſclin. He, however, refuſed to accept it. "I have no intention," ſaid he, "to oppreſs the innocent people. His holineſs and his cardinals alone can eaſily ſpare me that ſum out of their pockets. I therefore inſiſt on this money being reſtored to the owners; and ſhould they hereafter be compelled to pay, or be defrauded of it, I will return from the other ſide the Pyrenees, and oblige you to make reſtitution." The pope, knowing it would be in vain to contend with the ſword, paid him the ſum demanded out of his own treaſury; and the army, being enriched by the bleſſings and ſpoils of the church, continued their march, and ſoon drove the king of Caſtile from his dominions; while Henry aſſumed the title of king of Caſtile, and was acknowledged as ſuch throughout the whole kingdom. Peter having retired into Guienne, implored the protection of the Black Prince, who heartily engaged in his reſtoration; raiſed all the money he could borrow; and even melted down his own plate for the ſervice.

A. D. 1366.

A. D. 1367.

Had the prince reflected on the unworthineſs of the perſon who ſolicited his aſſiſtance, he would probably have refuſed his requeſt; but conſidering, perhaps, only on this occaſion the honour of reſtoring a dethroned monarch, or, being weary of an inactive life, having obtained his father's conſent, he levied an army, and ſet out upon this expedition. Being joined by the banditti, and a conſiderable force from England, he began his march about the latter end of February, and advanced to Caſtile, where he attacked and routed Henry's army in ſeveral engagements; and after a complete victory, obtained at Naſara, re-eſtabliſhed the tyrant on the Caſtilian throne. Peter threw himſelf at the prince of Wales's feet, and thanked him for reſtoring him to his kingdom; but that hero raiſing him up, ſaid, it was to God alone he was indebted for the victory, and not to him, who was only a weak inſtrument in his hand; yet, notwithſtanding this appearance of gratitude, Peter deceived his benefactor, when he had no longer any need of his aſſiſtance. The prince reminding him of the money due to the troops, the Caſtilian pleaded inability, and dallied with him till the heats of Spain became exceſſive; when Edward, perceiving that his men daily periſhed by ſickneſs, was under the neceſſity of returning to Bourdeaux, where he was received in triumph amidſt the acclamations of his people. During his late campaign, the Black Prince, beſides a very dangerous diſorder, had contracted an enormous debt, which Peter ungenerouſly refuſed to pay. This obliged him to tranſgreſs the bounds of prudent policy. He impoſed on the French an unuſual and heavy tax, which was ſo diſagreeable to them, that many of their barons repaired to Paris, and there entered an appeal againſt the proceedings of the Black Prince, before the king of France as ſovereign lord. The king of France, who had been long deſirous of this, ſummoned the prince to appear in his court, to anſwer their complaints. Exaſperated at ſuch an inſolent and unjuſt citation, Edward anſwered, with all the ſpirit of an offended warrior, that he might expect his appearance at Paris, but it ſhould be with a helmet on his head, and a retinue of ſixty thouſand men. Charles was not, however, to be intimidated. He knew the declining years of Edward; the languiſhing ſtate of the prince of Wales's health; and the extreme animoſity which the inhabitants of the conquered provinces had expreſſed againſt the Engliſh, would act powerfully in his favour. He, therefore, reſolving to come to an open rupture with England, made preparations in private, formed an alliance with Caſtile, the earl of Flanders, and the princes of Germany, and attached to his intereſt the barons and citizens of Abbeville.

A. D. 1396.

The

A. D. 1370. The firſt operations of war were commenced in Ponthieu, where the French met with very little oppoſition. Abbeville opened its gates to them. This example was followed by St. Vallery, Crotoy, Rue; and in a little time the whole country was reduced to ſubmiſſion. The dukes of Berry and Anjou, brothers to Charles, aſſiſted by du Gueſclin, invaded the ſouthern provinces, and daily made a conſiderable progreſs againſt the Engliſh. The ſtate of the prince's health would not permit him to mount on horſeback, or exert his uſual activity. In one action the brave Chandois was ſlain; in another, the great du Buche, who had ſucceeded him as conſtable of Guienne, was taken priſoner; and prince Edward being conſtrained, by his increaſing infirmities, to return to his native country, the affairs of the Engliſh in the ſouth of France were totally ruined. Incenſed at the injuries he had received from Charles, Edward meditated a ſevere revenge. By advice of his parliament he reſumed the vain title of king, and endeavoured to ſend ſuccours into Gaſcony; but all his attempts proved unſucceſsful. The earl of Pembroke was intercepted at ſea, and both he and his whole army fell into the hand of the king of Caſtile, who had fitted out a fleet for that purpoſe, and attacked him near Rochelle. Edward himſelf, with another army, had embarked for Bourdeaux; but contrary winds obliged him to lay aſide his enterprize. Thirty thouſand men, under the command of Sir Robert Knolles, however, marched out of Calais, and continued their ravages to the gates of Paris, but were unable to provoke the enemy to an engagement. They therefore proceeded on their march, laying waſte the provinces of Maine and Anjou; but part of the army being defeated by the conduct of du Gueſclin, who was now made conſtable of France, the reſt were ſcattered and diſperſed; and the few who returned, inſtead of reaching Guienne, took ſhelter in Brittany, whoſe duke had entered into an alliance with England.

A. D. 1374. The duke of Lancaſter began his march from Calais with an army of twenty-five thouſand men, and marched the whole length of France from Calais to Bourdeaux; but his rear was ſo harraſſed by flying parties of the enemy, and his foraging detachments ſo frequently cut off, that hardly half his army reached their place of deſtination. One province after another fell into the hands of the French, till only Bourdeaux, Bayonne, Calais, with a few other leſs important places, remained in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh; when the neceſſities of Edward obliged him to conclude a truce with the enemy till the firſt of May in the following year 1375.

Edward, beſides the mortification of loſing his foreign dominions, felt the decay of his authority in England; and from the ſeverity of ſome parliamentary remonſtrances, experienced the influence his preſent ill fortune had on the affections of his people. As an addition to his misfortunes, during this laſt war he loſt his queen. He had lived with her forty years in perfect union. She was univerſally lamented by the people, who had always found her ready to relieve them in their neceſſities, and the poor were great loſers by her death. But Edward, who during the vigour of his life had been employed in the purſuits of war and ambition, now, in the decline of life, had to encounter with ſevere mortifications. The paſſion for military glory, that fired his breaſt in the vigour of his age, was now extinguiſhed. In his old age he fell in love with Alice Pierce, who had been one of the ladies of the bed-chamber to Philippa, his late queen; and his paſſion had ſuch an aſcendant over him, that, in order to gratify her avarice, he countenanced ſeveral corrupt practices, which, in the vigour of life, he would have diſdained to patronize. He was wrought upon by this abandoned miſtreſs, to convey to her the jewels and moveables of the late queen: ſhe created and diſplaced miniſters at her pleaſure; and the king only thought of procuring her diverſions, which were daily made at a great expence. In ſhort, the doating Edward was guided juſt as her caprice and humour prompted; but this weak conduct gave ſuch general diſguſt, that the parliament preſented a ſpirited remonſtrance, and the imperious lady was baniſhed the court. The king alſo ſatisfied his parliament in another requeſt. The nation had entertained a jealouſy of the great power of John of Ghent, duke of Lancaſter, and apprehended he might ſeize the crown on the death of his father. Edward, therefore, to remove their fears, declared, in full parliament, Richard, ſon to the prince of Wales, his heir and ſucceſſor.

A. D. 1376. At this period died at Windſor, on the eighth of June, Edward prince of Wales, commonly called the Black Prince, ſincerely regretted by his father and the whole nation, who flattered themſelves with the proſpect of conſummate felicity, under the reign of ſuch an accompliſhed ſovereign. The character of this prince is truly amiable. His valour and military talents, which produced the admiration of all Europe, form only a part of his merit. He was an ornament of human nature, and is deſervedly the boaſt of the Engliſh nation. In public life he exhibited the brighteſt diſplay of genius, heroiſm, and magnanimity; in private, he afforded a matchleſs example of benevolence, candour, and equanimity. Generous, humane, affable, and pleaſed with rewarding merit wherever he found it. He gained univerſal eſteem, and was qualified to throw a luſtre not only on that rude age, but on the moſt ſhining period of antient and modern hiſtory. His affability in converſation, and his remarkable modeſty, can never be ſufficiently admired; and he was equally diſtinguiſhed by the ſubmiſſion and profound reſpect he paid his father, whom he never once diſobliged. His virtues were celebrated by his greateſt enemies. The news of his death, though long expected, was received with inexpreſſible grief. Charles of France, though his kingdom had ſuffered ſo ſeverely from his valour, gave a noble mark of his high eſteem for this celebrated hero. He cauſed a ſolemn ſervice to be performed for the repoſe of his ſoul, in the church of Notre Dame, and aſſiſted himſelf in perſon, with the principal nobility of France. The body of this renowned warrior was placed in a ſtately hearſe, drawn by twelve horſes, and carried through London to Canterbury, where it was interred agreeable to his own deſire. The parliament ſhewed their regard by paying their duty to his ſon Richard, as heir-apparent to the crown of England, and petitioned the king that he might be created prince of Wales, duke of Cornwal, and earl of Cheſter. He was veſted alſo with all his father's lands, except thoſe aſſigned to his mother as her dower, and ſoon after received the honour of the garter.

A. D. 1377. Edward ſurvived the death of his favourite ſon little more than a year. He retired to Eltham in Kent, where he diveſted himſelf of the cares of government, and buried his glory in the grave of voluptuouſneſs. John of Ghent being declared regent of the kingdom, ingratiated himſelf with the princeſs of Wales, who reſided with her ſon Richard, at Kennington in Surry: he alſo acted in concert with Alice, who had now regained her former influence. At her inſtigation, the regent impriſoned Sir Peter de la Mere, who had contributed to her diſgrace in parliament, and recalled thoſe whom the king had a little before removed from his perſon: ſeveral noblemen and prelates alſo were deprived of their poſts on the ſame account. They choſe a new parliament of ſordid mercenary wretches, who could ſacrifice honour and conſcience to avarice and ambition; at the ſame time the infamous Alice was reſtored to her former privileges. The regent and his creatures now rioted in luxury, regardleſs of the public intereſt, and even ſuffered foreigners to infringe the liberties of the city of London, whoſe remonſtrances were treated with a ſupercilious contempt. This excited the reſentment of the populace, who plundered and deſtroyed the houſe of the lord-marſhal, and ſtripped the palace of the duke of Lancaſter of all its rich furniture; but the diſturbance was at length quelled by the interpoſition of the prince of Wales, and the biſhop of London.

The truce of France being expired, the militia were ordered to be ready to oppoſe an invaſion, for which preparations were thought to be making in France; but inſtead of embarking their forces for England, they inveſted the ſtrong fort of Outwick, in the neighbourhood of Calais, which ſurrendered almoſt without oppoſition. This was the laſt military operation in the reign of Edward, who was ſoon after ſeized with a malignant fever, attended with irruptions, which brought him to his grave. He died at Shene, near Richmond in Surry, on the twenty-firſt of June, in the ſixty-fifth year of his age, and the fifty-firſt of his reign. When no hope of recovery remained, his court ſycophants forſook him, as a bankrupt no longer capable of requiring their venal ſervices. Alice, his favourite, who took care of him in his ſickneſs, ſuffered few to enter his room. When he was dying, ſhe laid her hands upon every thing valuable ſhe could find, even the rings on his fingers, and then withdrew. No leſs ingratitude was ſhewn by his friends and chaplains, who all deſerted him, except one ſingle prieſt, who ſeeing him forſaken in his laſt agonies, approached the bed, and addreſſed to him ſome ſpiritual conſolations, to which the dying monarch endeavoured to reply, but his words were too inarticulate to be underſtood.

Edward had twelve children by Philippa of Hainault, his queen. Edward, ſtiled the Black Prince, his eldeſt ſon, who married his couſin Joan, commonly called the Fair Maid of Kent, daughter and heireſs of his uncle the earl of Kent, by whom the prince had only Richard, who ſucceeded in the throne. His ſecond ſon William of Hatfield, who died in his infancy. Lionel of Antwerp, duke of Clarence, who firſt married Elizabeth de Burgh, heireſs of William de Burgh, earl of Ulſter. After her death he married Violante, daughter to the duke of Milan, and died in Italy ſoon after the conſummation of his nuptials, without leaving any poſterity. John of Ghent, vulgarly called, John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter, from whom ſprung that houſe which afterwards filled the throne. He firſt married Blanche, daughter and co-heireſs of Henry duke of Lancaſter, to whoſe title he ſucceeded. His ſecond wife was Conſtance, eldeſt daughter of Peter the Cruel, king of Caſtile, in whoſe right he aſſumed the arms and title of that kingdom. After her death, he married Catherine Swinford, who had already bore him ſeveral natural children. Edward's fifth ſon, was Edmund de Langley, earl of Cambridge, conſtable of Dover-caſtle, and afterwards duke of York. William, ſurnamed, of Windſor, died an infant. Thomas of Woodſtock, his ſeventh ſon was created duke of Buckingham by Richard II. and afterwards duke of Glouceſter. Beſides theſe ſons, Edward had five daughters. Iſabella, married to Ingelram de Coucy, earl of Bedford. Joan, betrothed to the prince of Caſtile, but died in her journey to Spain. Blanche, who died in her infancy. Mary, married to John de Montfort, earl of Brittany. Ard Margaret, married to John de Haſtings, earl of Pembroke.

In this reign the celebrated John Wickliff began to declaim, in his ſermons, againſt the doctrine of the real preſence, pilgrimages, purgatory, monaſtic vows, and other ſuperſtitions of the church of Rome; and he ſoon had the good fortune to make a great many proſelytes, particularly the duke of Lancaſter. But notwithſtanding the protection of this powerful patron, he was cited to appear before the biſhop of London; and his tenets were ſolemnly condemned in an aſſembly held at Oxford. He eſcaped however the malice of his perſecutors, and died peaceably at his rectory of Lutterworth, in the county of Leiceſter. A. D. 1385. He was reputed a man of learning, and has the honour of being the firſt perſon in Europe who publicly called in queſtion thoſe doctrines, which had univerſally prevailed as undiſputed truths during many ages. His followers were called Wickliffites, and ſometimes Lollards.

The moſt remarkable law paſſed in this reign, was that which limited the caſes of high treaſon to three heads, namely, the conſpiring againſt the life of the king; levying war againſt his perſon; and adhering to the king's enemies: but the bounds of this ſtatute have been ſince enlarged; and its ſimplicity almoſt deſtroyed by the nice diſtinctions of law luminaries, which they term conſtructive treaſon, of this we have had one or two recent inſtances in the preſent reign, which are ſtill freſh in every one's memory.

At this period the ſpirit of chivalry and gallantry was perhaps more prevalent, than in any age which either preceded or followed it. A diſpute having ariſen between the Engliſh and the Bretons, which of them had the faireſt miſtreſſes; they agreed to decide the quarrel in a ſolemn duel of thirty knights on each ſide. After a bloody combat the Bretons prevailed; and gained for their prize, full liberty to boaſt of their miſtreſſes beauties.

In this reign was introduced pieces of artillery, and the uſe of gunpowder in war, which has by degrees changed the whole art of war, and many circumſtances in the political government of Europe. The ignorance of that age in the mechanical arts, however, rendered the progreſs of new inventions very ſlow. The artillery firſt made were very clumſy, and managed with ſuch difficulty, that people were not immediately ſenſible of its uſe; but ſince that time, improvements have been continually making on theſe dreadful engines of deſtruction; which, though they appear to be contrived for the overthrow of empires, and the extirpation of the human race, have, in fact, rendered battles leſs bloody, and given to civil ſocieties a greater degree of ſtability. By the uſe of gunpowder, nations have been brought more to a level; conqueſts have been rendered leſs frequent and rapid; and perſonal ſtrength in warriors leſs neceſſary.

To Edward III. we owe the ſuperiority, which in his time the Engliſh began to obtain over the French, and which, ſhould their councils be directed by wiſe and honeſt men, it is hoped they will maintain to the lateſt poſterity. This politic prince baniſhed the uſe of the French language in pleadings and public deeds; for the king and nobility ſeem to have kept in remembrance their Norman extraction, till the wars with Edward and France inſpired the Engliſh with an antipathy to that nation.

In this age the parliament attempted to reſtrain luxury by ſome peculiar ſumptuary laws. It was enacted that no one ſhould be allowed either for dinner or ſupper above three diſhes in each courſe, and not more than two courſes. Servants were prohibited from eating fleſh meat or fiſh above once a day: and no man not worth one hundred per annum was permitted to wear gold, ſilver, or ſilk in his clothes.

Edward built the magnificent caſtle of Windſor, and the method of his conducting the work, may ſerve as a ſpecimen of the condition of the people of that age, and of the bleſſings of a more equal government, which we, of this age, ought thankfully to enjoy. Inſtead of alluring workmen by wages and contracts, he aſſeſſed every county in England to find him maſons, tilers, and carpenters, as if he had been levying an army. To which incident we may add, that in his reign was impoſed the firſt toll we read of in England for mending the highways; and this was for repairing the road from St. Giles's to Temple-bar.

The only exports during this reign were wool, hides, ſkins, leather, butter, lead, tin, and the like unmanufactured goods, of which wool was the moſt conſiderable. To introduce and promote the woollen manufacture, Edward gave protection to foreign weavers; and a law was enacted, prohibiting the wear of any cloth not made in England. Yet ſo little was the nature of trade underſtood by the parliament, that the exportation of woollen goods was prohibited, while the exportation of unwrought wool was not only allowed but encouraged. The exportation of manufactured iron was alſo prohibited by parliament.

Character of Edward III.

He was certainly one among the number of accompliſhed princes that have filled the Engliſh throne. The memorable tranſactions of his reign ſufficiently enhance his character, whether we conſider him as a warrior, a legiſlator, a monarch, or a man. In his ſtature he was about ſix feet high, of an elegant ſhape, and robuſt conſtitution: his limbs were finely turned; his eyes quick and piercing; his viſage ſharp and aquiline; and his whole air ſuch as commanded eſteem, and engaged affection. Nor were the qualities of his mind inferior to thoſe of his body. He was brave, active, and enterprizing; ſhrewd, ſenſible, and engaging; ſevere but impartial in the execution of juſtice; liberal, but not profuſe in his expences. Glory was his predominant paſſion; and it muſt be confeſſed, that he ſcrupled not to indulge it at the expence of humanity, the lives of his ſubjects, and the intereſt of his country. But it ſhould, at the ſame time be remembered, that he was a man, and therefore ſubject to errors; and that the diſtracted ſtate of affairs on the continent, and the jarring intereſts of its princes, concurred in flattering his ambition, and inſpired him with ideas, which, otherwiſe, he might never have conceived. He was no leſs diſtinguiſhed for his domeſtic government, and the prudence and vigour of his adminiſtration, which procured England a longer interval of domeſtic peace and tranquillity, than this nation had enjoyed in any former period. His court was magnificent and regular; and he was remarkably judicious in the choice of his ſervants, whether in the cabinet or the camp. His plans were concerted with prudence, and executed with alacrity. He was a patron of genius and learning; and his buildings, levees, and other circumſtances, ſufficiently evince his taſte for the liberal arts, very little attended to in that rude and uncultivated age. His affability and obliging behaviour to the good, and his rigour and ſeverity to the bad, gained him the affections of the people, at the ſame time that it curbed their licentiouſneſs. Never did king beſtow honours and rewards with more judgment, and greater regard to true merit. His valour and conduct rendered him ſucceſsful in moſt of his enterprizes; yet this ſucceſs was far from filling him with pride; for never did he ſhew greater humility than in the courſe of his victories, which he conſtantly aſcribed to the interpoſition of divine Providence. Poſſeſſed of the greateſt affability, his converſation was eaſy, and always accompanied with gravity and diſcretion. He was a friend to the poor, the fatherleſs, the widow, the oppreſſed, and unfortunate. In the beginning of his reign he made ſome encroachments on public liberty; but he ſoon learned to maintain, in general, the prerogatives of the crown, without invading the privileges of the people. Edward, in the general tenor of his conduct, was a friend to the conſtitution; though his paſſion for glory obliged him ſometimes to break through the rules which ought to reſtrain the royal prerogative. He always conſulted his parliament; by which means that aſſembly acquired a conſiderable acceſſion of authority during his reign; and the commons were no longer regarded with that indifference with which they had formerly been treated. Edward's glory received a new luſtre from that of his ſon the prince of Wales; and his happineſs was increaſed by his conſtant union with his queen. His religion was without ſuperſtition; his greatneſs, of terror; and his majeſty, of pride. Some errors, it is true, fell to his ſhare, the principal of which was ambition in extreme; yet his reign was one of the longeſt and moſt glorious that occurs in the hiſtory of England.

A. D. 1377. RICHARD II. of Bourdeaux, ſon to Edward, the Black Prince, on the demiſe of his royal grandfather, aſcended the throne, without oppoſition, in the eleventh year of his age. Notwithſtanding his tender years, and the ſpecious pretenſions that might have been urged in favour of his uncle's claim, he was received by the Engliſh as their ſovereign, with the moſt cordial affection. The remembrance of his father's qualities, induced them to cheriſh this infant prince as deſcended from a ſtock whoſe archievements had rendered their nation eminently renowned.

nowned. Even Lancaſter, imperious as he was, inſtead of endeavouring to ſupplant his nephew, was the firſt to do him homage. His example was followed by the mayor and citizens of London, who repaired to Kingſton upon Thames, where the young prince then reſided, and implored his favour and protection for their city, ſoliciting him to reſide in the metropolis, and aſſuring him they would venture their lives and fortunes in his ſervice. Richard, in compliance with their requeſt, the very next day made a magnificent entry into London, where every tongue overflowed with gratitude, every heart with affection. Every gazing eye fondly read the revival of Edward's virtues, in the diſpoſition, genius, and appearance of this royal infant. The people were ſo impatient to ſee their youthful monarch decorated with the enſigns of royalty, that the day was fixed for the fifteenth of July, when the ceremony was performed with great magnificence at Weſtminſter. On this occaſion we meet with the firſt mention in hiſtory of a champion, who appeared completely armed in Weſtminſter-hall, where his majeſty dined. He was attended by the high-conſtable, the marſhal of England, and preceded by the heralds. When the champion reached the middle of the hall, he threw his gauntlet on the ground, at the ſame time challenging all perſons whatſoever to ſingle combat, who ſhould dare to diſpute his majeſty's title to the crown. The origin of this cuſtom, which is ſtill preſerved, is however unknown; for though this is the firſt time it is mentioned by hiſtorians, it is certainly of a much earlier date; ſince Sir John Dimmock, who performed the office of champion at the coronation of this prince, was admitted to it by virtue of a right annexed to a manor he poſſeſſed in Lincolnſhire.

During the king's minority, the government was conducted by a council of nine, conſiſting partly of prelates, and partly of lay-peers: however, the chief authority was engroſſed by his three uncles, the dukes of Lancaſter, York, and Glouceſter; but the whole power of the crown reſted on the ſecret authority of Lancaſter, who was really the regent. Unpopular, and of a genius not adapted to any bold undertakings; yet being accuſtomed to govern during the latter part of the late reign, he took upon himſelf the adminiſtration of public affairs, notwithſtanding neither of the three brothers were named in the council of regency.

The truce concluded with France was now expired; but Charles, ſtill reigning monarch of that kingdom, had received no information of Edward's death, the Engliſh government having laid an embargo upon all ſhips as ſoon as that event was known; however, the French king was not leſs aſſiduous in his preparations, eſpecially thoſe by ſea, whereby he was enabled to ſend out a ſtrong navy, which being joined by that of Spain, amounted to one hundred ſhips, veſſels, and gallies. A ſquadron of this fleet had already landed, and burnt the town of Rye; from whence they ſailed to the Iſle of Wight, the whole of which they reduced, except the caſtle of Cariſbrook, which was bravely defended by Sir Hugh Tyrrel; while the inhabitants of the iſland were obliged to pay a large contribution, to prevent their houſes from being pillaged. Having ſucceeded in this expedition, they viſited ſeveral of the Engliſh coaſts, and burnt the towns of Haſtings, Portſmouth, Dartmouth, and Plymouth. They then landed a party of men in Suſſex, where they were oppoſed by the prior of Lewis, at the head of a few undiſciplined forces, which were eaſily defeated; and the prior, with two knights, being taken priſoners, were ſent to France. From them the French gained the firſt intelligence of Edward's death; and John de Vienne, admiral of France, immediately diſpatched an expreſs to his court with advice of this important event. By this time the earls of Cambridge and Buckingham had collected a body of troops, and appeared on the coaſt to prevent the enemy's landing. This was all that could be done; for the navy of England was in no condition to face the combined fleets of France and Spain. The whole nation was greatly alarmed; their coaſts inſulted; their commerce interrupted; and the people threw out many melancholy, though bitter reflections, on the fatal reverſe of their affairs. Nor was Charles leſs ſucceſsful by land than by ſea. He ſent one army into Picardy, under the command of the duke of Burgundy, and the mareſchal Blainville, who took the town of Ardreſs. They next made themſelves maſters of Ardwick and Vavelingen, all of them ſtrongly fortified, and of great uſe to prevent any excurſions from the garriſon of Calais. Sir Thomas Felton was at this time governor of Aquitaine for Richard; and another army of French was ſent into Gaſcony, under the duke of Anjou, and the mareſchal Sancerre. The firſt inveſted Bergerac, and John de Bueil was ſent with a detachment to bring up the artillery from Reole. Felton, who was employed in collecting forces, as ſoon as he had formed a ſufficient body of troops, threw himſelf between this detachment under de Bueil, and the main body of the French army at Bergerac, hoping to ſeize the artillery, and cut in pieces the detachment, before it could receive any ſuccours from the main body, but the duke of Anjou took his meaſures ſo well, that de Bueil's brother reached the detachment with a ſtrong reinforcement, before Sir Thomas arrived. They then gave battle to the Engliſh who were defeated; and Felton, who had been guilty of an unſeaſonable ſeverity in ſtriking off the head of the lord de Poimeres, and that of his ſecretary, was taken priſoner, with all his ſoldiers who had eſcaped the ſword. The whole French army then preſſed the ſiege of Bergerac with ſuch fury, that the place was ſoon after taken. This acquiſition ſo intimidated the neighbouring garriſons, that they made little or no reſiſtance; and it is computed, not leſs than one hundred and thirty-four caſtles were taken by the French in the courſe of this campaign. As a counterbalance to theſe heavy loſſes, Sir Hugh Calverly, governor at Calais, made an inroad into Picardy with a detachment of the garriſon, burned above twenty-ſix ſhips in the port of Bologne, laid the town in aſhes, and carried off a large booty. On his return to Calais he learned, that the garriſon of Merck, a caſtle of great importance in its neighbourhood, had delivered up that fortreſs to the enemy, in the abſence of Sir Robert Solle their governor; whereupon, Sir Hugh attacked the place ſo vigorouſly that he retook it, and hanged up all the garriſon as traitors. About this time Sir Thomas Piercy had the good fortune to fall in with a fleet of merchantmen, conſiſting of fifty ſail, part whereof belonged to the Flemings, and part to the Spaniards, laden with French merchandize. Piercy ſent a meſſage to the Flemings, deſiring them to ſeparate from the Spaniards; but this requeſt not being complied with, a ſharp diſpute enſued, in which the Engliſh commander took twenty-two ſail, and returned with great honour to England.

Such was the ſituation of public affairs, when, about Michaelmas, Richard held his firſt parliament. They were ſummoned to concert meaſures for oppoſing the progreſs of the French. The commons declined giving their opinion without the advice of the duke of Lancaſter; but on the arrival of that nobleman, they granted a conſiderable ſupply for the defence of the kingdom. The duke immediately took into his ſervice nine large ſhips belonging to Bayonne, with which he attacked a fleet of French merchantmen, and took fourteen veſſels laden with wine. But alderman Philpot was more ſucceſsful in the north; he fitted out a ſmall armament at his own expence, and ſailed in queſt of one Mercer, a Scottiſh mariner, who had greatly annoyed the Engliſh coaſters, engaged and took him, together with fifteen Spaniſh ſhips, which had entered into his ſervice. The Scots had not only made captures at ſea, but commenced hoſtilities by land, in violation of a truce lately concluded between the two kingdoms. They ſurprized and took the town and caſtle of Berwick; on which the earl of Northumberland marched with an army of ten thouſand men, and ſummoning the fortreſs to ſurrender, was anſwered by Ramſay, governor of the garriſon, that the place had been taken by virtue of a commiſſion from the king of France, in whoſe name he would defend it to the laſt extremity. Upon this an aſſault was immediately given; the place was taken; and all the Scots, one only excepted, were put to the ſword.

A. D. 1378. The duke of Lancaſter was employed in fitting out a powerful ſquadron, in order to retrieve the honour of the nation, and aſſert the empire of the ſea; and about the latter end of July arrived at St. Malo, where he deſtroyed a fleet of French and Spaniſh veſſels, laden with wines and other commodities. Then landing his troops, he inveſted the city, which was defended by a gallant officer, at the head of a powerful garriſon; but the conſtable of France, encamping with ſixteen thouſand choice troops in the ſight of the Engliſh, the duke thought proper to raiſe the ſiege, and to embark his forces. His miſcarriage in this expenſive enterprize, increaſed the hatred he had already incurred, and he was univerſally conſidered as the author of all theſe ill concerted meaſures. In the mean time the war with France was carried on with little ſucceſs, and leſs ſpirit.

A. D. 1379. Sir Hugh Calverly being recalled from his government of Calais, was, with Sir Thomas Piercy, appointed admiral of England. Their firſt exploit was taking a fleet of ſeven merchant ſhips richly laden, together with a large ſhip of war their convoy: nor was the earl of Saliſbury, who ſucceeded Sir Hugh in the government of Calais, leſs aſſiduous by land. But a ſcene now began to open in France, which might have been attended with great advantages to England, had it been properly improved. After the duke of Lancaſter had raiſed the ſiege of St. Malo, the French made themſelves maſters of the important fortreſs of Auray, ſo that nothing remained of the duke of Brittany's dominions, except Breſt, which was in the hands of the Engliſh, and commanded by Sir Thomas Knolles. But the king of France could not think himſelf ſafe while the Engliſh were in poſſeſſion of that important place, which afforded them a ready acceſs to the very heart of his dominions. He therefore gave orders for inveſting the town by land, while the Caſtilian fleet blocked it up by ſea. But the king of Caſtile dying about this time, the French were obliged to raiſe the ſiege, and Charles, exaſperated at this diſappointment, ſummoned the duke of Brittany to appear before his court at Paris. The peers being aſſembled, and the king ſeated on his throne, the duke was formally ſummoned; not appearing, the advocate general accuſed him of bearing arms againſt the ſtate, of his being a declared enemy to his ſovereign, and of his taking refuge in England. Having endeavoured to ſupport this charge, he propoſed, that the duke of Brittany ſhould be declared a rebel, attainted, and convicted of felony, and that his duchy ſhould be confiſcated and reunited to the crown. The propoſal, though ſtrongly oppoſed, was at laſt carried by a majority, agreeable to the king's wiſhes. The ſentence being obtained, Charles ſent the duke of Bourbon, with the mareſchal de Sancerre, at the head of a powerful army, to ſeize all the places of importance. Not a moment was to be loſt; and the duke having obtained aſſurances of being ſupported by England, was once more prevailed upon to throw himſelf into the arms of his ſubjects. This happened juſt as the admirals, Sir Hugh Calverly, and Sir Thomas Piercy, were returning from a ſucceſsful cruiſe againſt the French and Spaniards. Having landed in Brittany, they heard the diſcontent expreſſed by the people againſt the French, and the ardour of their wiſhes for the reſtoration of their duke. On their return they confirmed the accounts government had before received; upon which the duke immediately embarked on board the Engliſh fleet for his own dominions, where he was received with the moſt ſincere demonſtrations of joy. Three great towns, Dinant, Rennes, and Vannes, declared for him; the nobility flocked to him from all quarters, and his army every hour increaſed by a number of deſerters from the French ſervice. This ſucceſs induced the court of England to ſupport him with a conſiderable army. A very ſtrong fleet was fitted out under the command of Sir Hugh Calverly, and Sir Thomas Piercy, on board of which a great number of the beſt land forces in England, commanded by Sir John Calverly, were embarked. But the fleet had ſcarcely put to ſea, before they were overtaken by a furious ſtorm, in which thirty-five tranſports, together with Sir John Arundel's ſhip, were loſt, and above a thouſand men, with their general periſhed. This miſfortune might have proved fatal to the duke of Brittany, had he not been effectually ſupported by the ſpirit of his own ſubjects. The duke of Bourbon found it impoſſible to ſtem the torrent; he was obliged to retreat, and the king of France, ſenſible that he had been too haſty in his meaſures, ſent du Gueſclin, to ſucceed the duke of Bourbon in command: but even that great general could perform no effectual ſervice, except ſcouring the country, and reinforcing the garriſon of St. Malo. While the conſtable continued at the latter, Sir Hugh Calverly with part of his fleet entered the mouth of the harbour, which being narrow, his rear was attacked by a ſquadron of French and Spaniſh ſhips. Sir Hugh inſtantly ſtood out to ſea, juſt at a time when the garriſon was reduced to the laſt extremity, defeated their ſquadron and brought his ſhips ſafe into the harbour of St. Malo. This exploit gave the conſtable a high opinion of Engliſh courage, and being a native of Brittany, the French court imagined that he did not act with his uſual vigour againſt the duke. In the mean time a peſtilence made dreadful havock in the north of England, and the Scots taking advantage of this calamity, made a furious irruption into that country, where they met with little reſiſtance, both the country and principal towns being almoſt depopulated; which gave the invaders an opportunity of committing the moſt ſhocking barbarities on the defenceleſs inhabitants.

Great preparations were now made, and events of the greateſt conſequences A. D. 1380. expected from the aſſiſtance of the duke of Brittany. The command of the army was conferred on the duke of Buckingham, who having landed at Calais, marched from thence into Brittany, without having met with any oppoſition. But in the interval the king of France was carried off in the flower of his age, and his ſon, Charles VI. who ſucceeded him, being a minor, a treaty of accommodation was concluded between France and the duke of Brittany: whereupon the earl of Buckingham returned to England. Not any actions of importance had hitherto been performed againſt France; yet the great expences attending ſeveral fruitleſs expeditions, had reduced the Engliſh treaſury to ſo low an ebb, that in order to raiſe neceſſary ſupplies, a new and extraordinary poll-tax was impoſed by parliament, of three groats upon every perſon in the realm, above the age of fifteen, to be levied in each town by collectors appointed for that purpoſe: and it was decreed, that in raiſing the tax, the wealthy ſhould aſſiſt the poor, according to the value of their eſtates.

This impoſition, added to the preſumptuous behaviour of the tax-gatherers, occaſioned one of the moſt ſingular inſurrections recorded in the annals of hiſtory. The people had already acquired, by an admiſſion into the legiſlature, a degree of independence, and given ſeveral indications of their deſire to break thoſe chains whereby they had long been ruled, under a haughty nobility. Enthuſiaſm alſo aſſiſted to ſtrengthen this deſire, and to make the commonalty acquainted with their own importance. John Ball, a turbulent but popular preacher, viſited various parts of the kingdom, and every where encouraged his levelling notions of equal right to all the goods of nature; and the tyranny of artificial diſtinctions, introduced by a few powerful rulers, in order to aggrandize themſelves, and degrade the more conſiderable part of the ſpecies. Theſe tenets were received and embraced by the populace, with the greateſt avidity, and kindled in their minds thoſe dangerous ſparks of ambition, which ſoon after burſt out into an open flame, and ended, which muſt ever be the reſult, in the deſtruction of their ſeducing leaders. The methods fixed upon to collect the tax, in their tendency, promoted the confuſion in the nation, which ſprung from the inflamed paſſions of a lawleſs multitude. The king farmed the tax to a ſet of rapacious collectors, who extorted the money with the utmoſt rigour, and thereby irritated the minds of the people to a higher degree. The inſurrection began in Eſſex, where a report was propagated, that the peaſants were doomed to deſtruction, their houſes to the flames, and their farms to plunder. While they were alarmed with this rumour, one of the perſons employed in collecting the tax, had entered into a diſpute with one Walter of Deptford in Kent, a tyler, known afterwards by the name of Wat Tyler, who refuſed to pay for his daughter, on account of her not being yet of the age aſſigned by the ſtatute. The brutal officer inſiſted on her being a full grown woman; and had the inſolence to proceed to acts of indecency, in order to diſcover, as he obſerved, the ſigns of her puberty; at which the father being juſtly enraged, was provoked to ſuch a degree, that he knocked out his brains with a tyling hammer. This action was applauded by the by-ſtanders, who exclaimed, that it was high time for the people to be revenged on their tyrants, and to defend their native liberty. Encouraged by the example of their friends in Eſſex, they inſtantly flew to arms, and the ſpirit of rebellion ſpread like a contagion, through the counties of Suſſex, Hertford, and Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Lincoln. It increaſed moſt rapidly, and the populace had thrown off all regard to their governors before they had the leaſt notice of their danger. Not only diſcontented peaſants, but all the debauched profligates, and deſperate villains in theſe counties, took the field on this occaſion; and being headed by Wat Tyler, Jack Straw, Hob Carter, and Tom Millar, the moſt audacious of their aſſociates, they committed all manner of outrages both in the perſons and property of the gentry, pulling down their houſes, putting to death all the juſtices and practitioners of the law, and burying all court-rolls and records.

A. D. 1381. When the ſeveral parties from different counties were collected together, they amounted to one hundred thouſand men, who on the twelfth of June, aſſembled at Blackheath, the place appointed for a general rendezvous. Ball, a principal incendiary, was remarkably aſſiduous in ſtirring up his hearers to madneſs and fury; and in conſequence of the harangues of this turbulent prieſt, which were well adapted to the underſtandings of his audience, houſes were demoliſhed, churches plundered, goals broke open, and every diſorder committed, that can be expected to proceed from an exaſperated, lawleſs multitude. As ſoon as the whole body was formed, they choſe Wat Tyler their general. The duke of Lancaſter was at this time on the borders of Scotland; the regular troops in the kingdom were very inconſiderable; ſo that the government was thrown into the utmoſt confuſion, as having every thing to fear from this lawleſs rabble. The princeſs dowager of Wales, returning from a pilgrimage to Canterbury, and paſſing through the midſt of them, they not only inſulted her attendants, but ſome of the moſt audacious among them kiſſed her, in order to ſhew their purpoſe of levelling all mankind; however they allowed the king's mother to continue her journey without attempting any farther injury. A council was now called in the Tower, and it was agreed, that a meſſage ſhould be ſent from the king, to demand the reaſon of ſuch a tumultuous meeting. The meſſengers were informed by the inſurgents, that they had aſſembled in that manner to ſettle the affairs of the nation; and if his majeſty was deſirous of being more particularly informed, he muſt repair in perſon to their camp. Richard was adviſed to comply with their requeſt. With this view the king ſailed down the river in his barge; but on his approaching the ſhore, ſuch ſymptoms of tumult and inſolence appeared, that Simon Sudbury, archbiſhop of Canterbury, the chancellor, and Sir Robert Hales, grand prior of the knights hoſpitallers, treaſurer of England, hurried him back to the Tower. The rebels, thus diſappointed, called aloud, Treaſon! Treaſon! Then proceeding to Southwark, they plundered ſeveral houſes, and murdered ſome Flemiſh merchants. They ſtruck off the head of every lawyer who unfortunately fell into their hands: even eccleſiaſtics, who belonged to ſpiritual courts, ſhared the ſame fate; it being one of Ball's maxims, that while there was any law no liberty could exiſt. However, amidſt all their acts of violence, they affected to preſerve an appearance of loyalty to Richard's perſon. They even took an oath for that purpoſe; but it contained an expreſs clauſe for excluding from the throne every perſon whoſe name was John, becauſe the duke of Lancaſter, whom they hated, was of that name. Nevertheleſs, that they might not injure their plauſible pretences for riſing, they paid ready money for every thing they received, and by that means rendered themſelves ſo very agreeable to the common people in and about London, that on their approach, the magiſtrates thought it prudent to open the gate of the bridge, and give them free admiſſion into the city, in order to prevent the ravages and murder they had begun in Southwark, being joined by the priſoners confined in the King's Bench and Marſhalſea. Being thus maſters of the city, they were joined by the populace; and going to the Savoy, the ſtately palace of the duke of Lancaſter, they burnt that ſuperb ſtructure, with all the jewels, plate, and rich furniture. One of the rioters being detected in endeavouring to conceal a piece of plate for his own uſe, was ſeized by ſome of his companions, and thrown immediately into the flames, boaſting, that they were not come as thieves, to enrich themſelves by plunder, but to redreſs the grievances of the nation, and reſtore a perfect equality among the people; this affected appearance of diſintereſtedneſs, it muſt be confeſſed, has raiſed them above the level of the miſcreants in 1780, and at that time increaſed their credit with the middling and lower claſſes of citizens: yet their execrable deſigns bordered upon folly in the extreme; and the liquor of which they drank very plentifully, in the houſes they plundered, carried their madneſs, thus inflamed, to a ſufficient height for executing any deteſtable project. From the Savoy they turned back to the Temple, where they burned all the records, books, and papers they could find, and laid the whole ſtructure in aſhes. The magnificent priory of St John, Clerkenwell, ſhared the ſame fate. After having performed theſe exploits, they divided themſelves into three bodies; one under their leader Jack Straw, marched to Heighberry, about two miles north of London, and reduced to aſhes a ſpacious edifice belonging to the knights of St. John. A ſecond body which conſiſted chiefly of the people of Eſſex and Hertfordſhire, proceeded to Mile-end Green; and a third diviſion, with Wat Tyler at their head, poſted themſelves in St. Catherine's, and about the Tower.

The Eſſex men, who had taken up their quarters at Mile-end, and who appeared the moſt reaſonable, ſent a meſſage to the king, with whom he was adviſed to treat in perſon. At the ſame time their companions on Tower-hill intercepted the proviſions intended for his majeſty, and loudly demanded the heads of the chancellor and the treaſurer. Though the archers and men at arms in the Tower were able to defend it againſt ſuch an undiſciplined and ill armed mob, they were ſo intimidated, that they could not even manage their arms; and Richard being afraid of exaſperating the rebels, by refuſing to grant them a conference, agreeable to their requeſt, found means to repair to Mile-end, notwithſtanding all the vigilance of Tyler. When arrived among the ſeditious rioters, the king accoſted them with great affability; told them he was their king, and came to redreſs all their grievances. In anſwer to this demand, they required to be freed from bondage, and particularly that of villainage, and that they, their heirs, and lands, ſhould for ever remain free; they requeſted likewiſe freedom of commerce in market towns, without toll or impoſt; and a general pardon for all offences. Theſe requeſts were immediately complied with. Charters being drawn up, were delivered to them, ſealed and executed the next morning; which condeſcenſion on the ſide of the king had ſo good an effect on the Eſſex-men, that they immediately returned to their ſeveral homes. In the mean time Tyler, at the head of his Kentiſh-men, demanded entrance into the Tower of London. Within this fortreſs were welve hundred of the beſt troops in the kingdom, but the fear of famine, added to the terror of the princeſs, prevailed on the king to grant the rebels admiſſion, and the gates of the Tower were thrown open. Their behaviour now was truly inhuman. They dragged Simon Sudbury, archbiſhop of Canterbury, out of the fortreſs, and beheaded him with all the circumſtances of ſavage barbarity. The lord treaſurer, Sir Robert Hales, with Legg, the Flemiſh farmer of the land-tax, ſuffered the ſame fate. A franciſcan friar was put to death; and they made a merit of permitting the ladies to remain without being violated. Fifteen other perſons were maſſacred in cool blood; one of whom was the friar, becauſe he had been intimate with the duke of Lancaſter. Even the king's mother was treated with the greateſt indignities. Succeſs and ſhedding blood, inſtead of ſatiating, increaſed the ſanguinary diſpoſition of theſe brutiſh inſurgents. Every perſon of note was ſacrificed as a victim to their lawleſs barbarity. Lyons, a famous merchant, was murdered, and thirty Flemings, who had been dragged from the churches in and about London, had their heads ſtruck off in the open ſtreets.

At length Tyler, who now ſeemed to thirſt for blood, entertained thoughts of murdering the king, with all his nobility, and laying the city of London in aſhes. It appears that he only waited for reinforcements from Hertfordſhire, and the adjacent counties, in order to execute this inhuman reſolution; for when the king ſent to acquaint the rabble of the terms he had granted the Eſſex-men, and that they might enjoy the ſame advantages, the miſcreant Tyler inſolently replied, that he would embrace peace if he liked the conditions. Nay, ſo obſtinately did they perſiſt in their ſeditious proceedings, that they not only rejected three different forms of charters, but openly avowed their reſolution of not making a peace, without all laws were extinguiſhed, and they had the liberty of putting all lawyers to death. The citizens now too plainly ſaw their error, in admitting without reſiſtance ſuch a lawleſs multitude into the city. Walworth, the mayor, and Philpot, one of the aldermen, promiſed to ſupport the king againſt the rebels, provided means could be ſound to amuſe them ſome time with propoſals for an accommodation. Richard therefore ſent Sir John Newton to Tyler, requiring him to meet the king, in order to conſider his objections to the charters. Having delivered his meſſage, the knight deſired Wat to make haſte, the king being then waiting for him in Smithfield, attended by the lord mayor and other officers of London. Tyler replied, he would come when he thought proper, and, probably now ſomewhat alarmed, he moved toward Smithfield, at the head of the inſurgents, with a very ſlow pace. Newton begged he would quicken his march. "Make "what haſte you pleaſe," replied the inſolent leader, "I ſhall take my own time." The true reaſon of this delay aroſe from his deſire of deferring the conference till the arrival of his expected reinforcement. But by this time the magiſtrates of London had joined their ſovereign with a large body of well-armed citizens; and Sir Robert Knolles had entered the city at the head of a thouſand veterans to act as occaſion ſhould require. When Wat Tyler came into Smithfield, Sir John Newton told him, that both duty and decency required he ſhould be uncovered in the preſence of his ſovereign; but the traitor was ſo highly offended, that he aimed a ſtroke at him with his dagger. Exaſperated at this inſolent attempt upon his life, Newton would probably have diſpatched the ruffian, had not the king interpoſed, and ſuddenly advancing, enquired of him what he had to requeſt? Tyler made ſuch extravagant demands, and delivered himſelf in ſo incoherent a manner, that the king could make no reply. He demanded that all antient laws ſhould be aboliſhed; that all bondmen ſhould be free; that all warrens, parks, and chaſes ſhould be laid open; and that every perſon ſhould have free liberty to fiſh, fowl, and hunt, in every part of the kingdom. He added ſeveral other particulars relative to his levelling plan, but in ſo confuſed a manner that they were not underſtood. The king not being able to comprehend the meaning of what this illiterate fellow had advanced, kept ſilence. This the demagogue conſidered as a contemptuous refuſal. He now diſcovered a gloomy ominous countenance, and appeared in all the diſorder which actuates a weak mind, when on the point of plunging deep into wickedneſs. The dagger ſhook as he graſped it; he ſhifted it from one hand to the other; he ſurveyed the royal perſon with all the ſymptons of irreſolute guilt, as if making a place where the blow might be mortal. At laſt he raiſed the dagger, and ſeized the reins of Richard's horſe. Walworth, who had with difficulty curbed his reſentment hitherto, was now ſo exaſperated at the behaviour of this audacious rebel, that, without conſidering to what danger he expoſed his maſter, he diſcharged ſuch a blow with his mace, at the head of the rebel, as ſtunned him, when Philpot laid him dead with his dagger, under the horſe's belly. Upon this the rebels, giving a dreadful ſhout, cried out, "Our captain is dead! revenge! revenge!" and immediately bent their bows. But Richard prevented the conſequences that might have been expected, by a conduct which ſhewed great boldneſs and prudence in a young prince not quite ſeventeen years of age. Inſtead of flying from, he, with admirable preſence of mind advanced towards the rebels, calling out to them in a reſolute tone, "What! will you kill your king? Give yourſelves no concern for the loſs of your leader. Follow me. I will be your captain, and will grant all your deſires." The rebels, overawed by his preſence, and not leſs by his magnanimity, implicitly followed him; and to prevent any diſorder that might have ariſen from their entering the city, he led them into the fields near Iſlington, where he was immediately joined by Sir Robert Knolles, and ſome thouſands of Londoners. The rebels were now ſo much diſcourged at the ſight of theſe troops, that, on the king's repeating his offer of granting them the ſame charter he had before given to the people of Eſſex, they threw down their arms, and implored the royal mercy. Sir Robert propoſed puniſhing the ringleaders with inſtant death on the ſpot; but the king granted them a free pardon, and diſmiſſed them all with the ſame charters their comrades had received. But at the ſame time he iſſued a proclamation, forbidding the citizens to hold correſpondence with the rebels, or to admit any of them within the liberties and walls of London.

Nevertheleſs, the death of Wat Tyler, and diſperſion of his followers, did not extinguiſh entirely the flames of rebellion. The inſurgents of Hertfordſhire, Suffolk, and Norfolk, ſtill continued their outrages; but the latter of theſe were attacked and routed by the biſhop of Norwich, and a great number of them ſlain in the purſuit. John Litteſter, or the dyer, who headed them, and his principal accomplices, being taken, were hanged as traitors, and the quiet of the county was ſoon re-eſtabliſhed. After this ſucceſs, the prelate marched into the counties of Cambridge and Huntingdon, where he reduced all the mutinous peaſants to their duty; and entering Suffolk, routed all the mal-contents in that diſtrict, who had committed terrible ravages. However, notwithſtanding the ill ſucceſs of other inſurgents, thoſe of Eſſex ſent deputies to the king, to procure a confirmation of their charter. But Richard's ſituation was now changed; for the nobility and gentry, finding themſelves to be the principal marks aimed at, had flocked to London with all their retainers, and Richard had taken the field with forty thouſand men. He therefore iſſued a proclamation, requiring all tenants to perform their accuſtomed ſervices; and then marched in perſon againſt the rebels of Eſſex, who, having been defeated in two battles, ſued for mercy. Theſe inſurrections being in a great meaſure ſuppreſſed, the charters of enfranchiſement and pardon were revoked; the peaſants were reduced to the ſame low condition as before, and commiſſions were iſſued for trying the ringleaders; among whem John Ball, the fanatic prieſt, and Jack Straw, with many of their accomplices, being convicted of high treaſon, ſuffered the puniſhment due to their crimes. From their fate, the people of this age may learn the invaluable eſtimation of their precious conſtitution and equal government, and not haſtily to engage in riots and popular inſurrections, which generally, if not always, end in their own deſtruction; for popular inſurrections, where they have no perſons of rank and diſtinction at their head, who have genius and influence to govern them, and to awaken their attention to the voice of reaſon, prudence, and humanity, degenerate into licentious mobs. The moſt daring, vicious, and abandoned, get the lead; cruelty and rapine become wanton ſports; all the laws of right, reaſon, nature, and juſtice are trampled under foot; and with whatever laudable views they may have been firſt actuated, every valuable purpoſe is ſure to be defeated; and the more upright in their intentions, will ſuffer equal puniſhment with thoſe knaves and fools who have deluded them. It is ſaid, that beſides thoſe inſurgents who fell with their arms in their hands, above fifteen hundred were put to death by the common hangman. Judge Treſilian was commiſſioned to take a circuit through the ſeveral counties, and try the guilty, the number of whom being great, he had an opportunity of indulging his naturally cruel temper by puniſhing the unfortunate, miſguided wretches, to whom he ſhewed no mercy. During theſe tranſactions, Richard proceeded to diſtinguiſh the magiſtracy of London, who had ſo well deſerved his favour. Walworth, lord-mayor, Philpot, and four other aldermen, were knighted; and the mayor had one hundred pounds a year, ſettled upon himſelf and his heirs. Shortly after theſe diſturbances, a treaty of marriage was concluded between the king, and Anne, ſiſter of Winceſlaus, king of Bohemia. The princeſs arrived in England a few days before Chriſtmas, and the nuptials were ſolemnized after the holidays. She was crowned at Weſtminſter with great pomp, and tournaments were held upon that occaſion.

A. D. 1382.

At this period, the ſtate of public affairs was no leſs unſettled on the continent than in England; and ſeveral events happened, which threatened to involve all Europe in confuſion. Conferences had been opened between England and France, but they were ſuſpended by an eccleſiaſtical diſpute that divided all Chriſtendom. On the death of Gregory X. the inhabitants of Rome inſiſted his ſucceſſor ſhould reſide in that city. This reſolution was ſignified to the college of cardinals, moſt of whom were natives of France; and theſe, in a formal inſtrument, proteſted againſt the validity of the election, ſhould any violence be offered to the conclave. On the day of election, the Romans became ſo reſolute, that the cardinals were awed into ſubmiſſion to their will; and the archbiſhop of Bari being choſen, aſſumed the title of Urban VI. but the French cardinals retiring to Naples, diſclaimed this election as extorted, and proceeded to a new choice, which fell upon the cardinal of Geneva, who took the name of Clement VII. Urban, dreading the reſentment of ſo powerful a nation as France, and deſirous of ingratiating himſelf with the potentates of Europe, created twenty-nine cardinals in one day, among whom was Philip of Alençon, a prince of the blood of France. On the other hand, Clement preached up a cruſade againſt Richard and his ſubjects; while Urban not only fulminated his excommunications againſt all the adherents of Clement, but alſo ſent over a commiſſion to Henry Spencer, biſhop of Norwich, nominating him leader of a cruſade againſt the anti-pope, his rival. With this commiſſion the pope ſent him plenary powers, as his legate, to grant the ſame indulgences to all who engaged in this expedition, as to thoſe who carried arms againſt the infidels. The publication of this cruſade in England, anſwered the moſt ſanguine wiſhes of the pontiff. The nobility, gentry, clergy, and almoſt all ranks of people, engaged in it with the ſame ardour and alacrity, as if they had been going to fight againſt an enemy that threatened to put a period to the Chriſtian name. All ranks of both ſexes contributed largely towards the expence, even before the biſhop was empowered by the king to put the pope's ſcheme in execution. However, it was at length reſolved, by a parliamentary decree, that the biſhop of Norwich ſhould tranſport his troops to Calais and join the Flemings; upon which the biſhop began to aſſemble his forces, and was joined by a great number of volunteers, who embarked in the expedition from religious motives.

A. D. 1383. With theſe he paſſed over to Calais, where he landed on the fourth of May, and ſoon found himſelf at the head of fifty thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe. His firſt attempt was upon Gravelines, which he carried by aſſault. The inhabitants of Dunkirk, intimidated by this exploit, opened their gates to the victor. Caſſel, Furnes, Oſtend, and all the towns on the ſea coaſt, followed the example of Dunkirk. Alarmed at this progreſs of the biſhop, the count of Flanders, who was in the French intereſt, prepared to give him battle. Norwich, depending on the enthuſiaſtic diſpoſition of his followers, marched to meet the enemy, and a bloody battle enſued, in which the count was totally defeated, and ſeveral cities afterwards ſurrendered to the Engliſh. The king of France, at the head of one hundred thouſand men, now advanced to check the progreſs of the cruſaders; and the biſhop's forces, by the continual arrival of freſh ſupplies from England, being increaſed to ninety thouſand, he determined to hazard a battle with the French. But many of his volunteers and recruits were the very dregs of the people, at once ignorant of diſcipline, and impatient of command. Beſides, ſome mutineers in his army inſiſted, before they marched into France, on his attempting the reduction of Ypres, where they expected to acquire an immenſe booty. It was in vain to oppoſe their obſtinate determination; and the biſhop, contrary to his own judgment, was under a neceſſity of inveſting that place. The approaches were carried on with great intrepidity; yet the Engliſh were repulſed in ſeveral furious aſſaults, by which means they were ſo exaſperated, particularly the dregs of the people, that they rejected all military reſtraint, ravaged the adjacent country, and deſerted in ſuch numbers, that the biſhop, finding it impracticable to execute his deſign, retired to Dunkirk, leaving his artillery and ammunition in the hands of the enemy. Sir Hugh Calverly, and Sir Thomas Trivet, threw themſelves into Barbourg, which was immediately inveſted by the king of France; but thoſe gallant officers ſtood two deſperate aſſaults, in which the French were repulſed with great ſlaughter, and then obtained an honourable capitulation, by virtue of which they returned to Calais. Charles, marching to Gravelines, found the biſhop ſo reſolute in his defence, that he propoſed to treat for a truce.

Norwich, diffident of the courage of his cruſaders, demanded a ceſſation of hoſtilities for a certain number of days, at the expiration whereof he promiſed to give a definitive anſwer. The terms offered were, that he and his army ſhould have a free conduct to any place he ſhould name, and fifteen thouſand marks in ready money, provided he ſurrendered the town without diſmantling its fortifications. His requeſt being granted, he immediately diſpatched a meſſenger to England, preſſing, in the moſt earneſt manner, a ſufficient reinforcement of men and neceſſary ſupplies. Richard had by this time greatly degenerated from his father's virtues, by plunging into all exceſs of riot and debauchery. He was likewiſe ſurrounded with pernicious ſycophants, who inflamed inſtead of checking the tendency of his headſtrong paſſions, which knew no reſtraint. He had not one faithful counſellor to adviſe, remonſtrate, or make him ſenſible of the errors of his conduct. Riot and debauch ſurrounded his table, and made up the morning and evening of his days. The judgment he formed of his friends, was regulated by the meaſure of their adulations; he conſidered the prerogatives of royalty valuable only in their furniſhing out the gratifications of luxury and magnificence. When he received the biſhop's letter, his brain being heated with wine, he called for his horſe, and poſted alone from Daventry in Northamptonſhire to London, breathing deſtruction to France, and threatening to take in perſon the ſevereſt vengeance. In his cooler moments, however, he ſent for the duke of Lancaſter, and appointed him to take the command of an army deſtined to relieve Gravelines. But through the intemperance of the king, and the tardineſs of Lancaſter, the truce expired before they could embark, and Norwich was obliged to accept of the terms offered him by Charles. Accordingly he retired to Calais, from whence he embarked the wretched remains of his army for England. From this example of Richard's weak conduct, ſome idea may be formed of his capacity for government, and of the cauſe of thoſe diſorders which now ſullied the glory of England. The few prudent perſons who ſaw and bewailed them, were ſilenced by the humour of the times; and calamity only, as in theſe days, was the alone phyſician that could cure the madneſs of its authors. Extortion and rapacity, heats and diviſions, reigned in the city of London, and all received encouragement from the venality of the court.

The duke of Lancaſter was far from approving of the expedition of the biſhop of Norwich; but unfortunately, his own private affairs kept him from acting the part dictated by his better judgment. He ſaw his nephew ſurrounded by the moſt abandoned of mankind, who conſidered him as their property; yet he could not diſoblige them for fear of hurting his own intereſt. He therefore choſe to reſide at a diſtance from court, eſteeming a private retirement the true poſt of honour, and affected to apply himſelf in taking care of the nation's concerns in Scotland. The biſhop of London alſo reſigned the great ſeal, which was delivered to the ſon of a rich merchant, who ſupplied the king with money at an exorbitant intereſt, and by gratifying his follies, ſerved his own uſurious purpoſes, at the expence of his country's good. The king, by ſquandering his revenue on paraſites and pleaſures; and the queen, by profuſion to her needy countrymen, had exhauſted their finances. Their neceſſities, therefore, together with the ſituation of public affairs, requiring the interpoſition of a parliament, one was aſſembled at Weſtminſter on the firſt of November; and, in conſideration of the exigencies of the ſtate, they granted a conſiderable ſubſidy, notwithſtanding their diſapprobation of the king's proceedings.

A. D. 1385. The Scots having for ſome time paſt infeſted the northern counties, and intelligence being received, that, in conjunction with the French, they intended to invade England both by ſea and land, it was reſolved in parliament to raiſe a conſiderable army, and to grant a ſufficient ſubſidy for the defence of the kingdom. In the mean time, Charles preſſed the king of Scotland to collect his forces, and commence hoſtilities in the north; but that prince refuſed compliance, without certain information of the landing of the French in the ſouthern parts of England. But Robert, now king of Scotland, applied to the regency of Charles VI. for a body of cavalry, on which they ſent John de Vienne, admiral of France, with fifteen hundred men at arms, to ſupport the Scots in their incurſions againſt the Engliſh.

Richard, reſolving to march againſt the Scots in perſon, appointed a rendezvous of his forces at Newcaſtle upon Tyne, where a great number of knights aſſembled to ſhare the glory of the king's firſt campaign. At the ſame time a fleet of tranſports attended the motions of the army, in order to ſupply it with proviſions, in caſe ſubſiſtence ſhould fail in Scotland. He now entered that kingdom by Berwick, at the head of ſixty thouſand men, while the Scots, as uſual, abandoned their country to be plundered; and the French commander expreſſing his ſurpriſe at this conduct, they let him know, that their cattle being driven into places of ſecurity, their houſes and goods were of little value, and they could eaſily repair the loſſes they ſuſtained in this reſpect, by an incurſion into England. In conformity to this policy, when Richard entered Scotland on the eaſt, thirty thouſand of the Scots, attended by the French, entered England by the weſt, extending their devaſtations through Cumberland, Weſtmoreland, and Lancaſhire, and returned unmoleſted with an immenſe booty. Meanwhile Richard advanced as far as Edinburgh, burning and deſtroying all the towns and villages on each ſide of him; but when his moſt experienced officers adviſed him to march towards the weſtern coaſt, in order to intercept the enemy in their return, he weakly rejected their counſel. His impatience to enjoy his favourite pleaſures, induced him to return with his army to England, having incurred much expence, and not performed any action worthy of notice. Soon after, the Scots, finding in the kind of war to which they confined themſelves, that a heavy body of French cavalry was of little uſe, they treated their allies ſo ill, that they returned home greatly diſguſted with the country and its inhabitants. On the king's arrival at Weſtminſter he ſummoned a parliament, who granted a large ſubſidy, to enable the duke of Lancaſter to aſſiſt the king of Portugal, he having promiſed the duke, on that condition, to recognize his title to the crown of Caſtile. At the ſame time Richard conferred honours and preferments on his unworthy creatures and favourites, to the injury of the deſerving, and the diſpleaſure of his people, who on this account deſpiſed his government and hated his perſon.

A. D. 1386. Long had the French been jealous of the ſway the Engliſh bore in their country, and now imagined a favourable opportunity offered of wreſting the ſea-ports out of their hands; the duke of Lancaſter having carried all the flower of the Engliſh military force into Spain, in order to proſecute his empty claim to the crown of Caſtile. Great preparations were therefore made in France for an invaſion of England, as the moſt likely method of ſucceeding in their deſign. With theſe views, Cliſſon the conſtable was ſent into Brittany, where, in conjunction with that duke, he formed the ſiege of Breſt, ſtill poſſeſſed by the Engliſh. Another army, under the high-admiral of France, was ſent to block up Cherburg in Normandy; while a third was ordered to keep a watchful eye over the garriſon of Calais, and other places poſſeſſed by the Engliſh in Picardy. A prodigious fleet and army were collected at Sluys. All the nobility of France were engaged in this enterpriſe, and the Engliſh were kept for ſome time in perpetual alarms. The French army, when reviewed at Arras, conſiſted of eighty thouſand men in arms, with their followers on horſeback, beſides a vaſt number on foot. Twelve hundred and eighty-ſeven ſhips of all ſorts were ready at Sluys, to carry over this numerous army, and ſeveral warlike engines, of a new conſtruction, were put on board the fleet. All Europe fixed their attention on this amazing armament. The Engliſh were intimidated, particularly the city of London; the ports and harbours were put in a poſture of defence; the militia were ordered to the ſea-coaſt; a fleet put to ſea to watch the motions of the enemy; and all the beacons on the coaſt were prepared for giving an alarm, whenever they ſhould appear. Every prudent meaſure, which reaſon could ſuggeſt, was purſued with the utmoſt alacrity. But the ſafety of England was to ſpring from other cauſes, independent of human wiſdom, for which ſhe has frequently had reaſon gratefully to acknowledge the goodneſs of preſerving Providence. About the latter end of October the French forces were embarked, and the fleet ſailed out of harbour with a fair wind; but had not left the coaſt more than two hours, before a violent ſtorm aroſe, which diſperſed to different quarters the whole navy: part of which were driven back to Sluys; part either ſunk in the raging ocean, or were daſhed upon the rocks; and ſome of them were taken by the Engliſh. Thus the mighty project of many days was rendered abortive in a few moments.

No language can deſcribe the timidity and diſtraction which, at this period, prevailed in the Engliſh cabinet; nor ſcarcely to conceive the luxury and effeminacy which pervaded the Engliſh court. With a view of freeing himſelf from the ſubjection in which he was held by his uncles, Richard threw himſelf into the arms of Robert de Vere, earl of Oxford, a young nobleman of an agreeable figure, but of very diſſolute manners, therefore more calculated to corrupt the prince, than to govern the kingdom. This favourite engroſſed the affection of Richard; and by gaining an aſcendancy over him, governed him with abſolute authority. Richard, ſetting no bounds to his partial fondneſs, created him marquis of Dublin, a title before unknown in England. He then made him duke of Ireland; and transferred to him for life the entire ſovereignty of that iſland. The king alſo gave him in marriage his couſin-german, the earl of Bedford's daughter; and though that lady was of an unexceptionable character, he ſoon after permitted him to divorce her, in order to marry a young Bohemian lady, who waited on his queen, with whom that nobleman had become enamoured. The whole attention of the court was turned to this favourite; all favours paſſed through his hands; and by his mediation alone, acceſs to the king could only be obtained. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, a prelate of worth and ability, was ſet aſide, and retired from public buſineſs; while the archbiſhop of York, without one amiable quality, engroſſed a great ſhare of the king's favours. Alexander Nevil, and judge Treſilian, who never wanted reaſons to juſtify what he knew would pleaſe his maſter, ſtood high in his eſteem. Michael de la Pole, the chancellor, lately created earl of Suffolk, was another of his favourites. He was poſſeſſed of great military talents, and had ſerved in the army with applauſe. He had alſo been employed in ſeveral embaſſies and treaties of peace, in all which he had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his prudence, judgment, and integrity. Yet the jealouſy of power produced great animoſities between the princes of the blood and the chief nobility on the one hand, and between the principal favourite and his creatures on the other. The dukes of York and Glouceſter repined at their want of influence; diſcontent prevailed in the nation; and the people inſiſted on an impeachment againſt the earl of Suffolk. An impeachment was accordingly drawn up againſt Michael de la Pole, and Glouceſter undertook to carry it up to the houſe of lords. It was, however, thought proper to obſerve the appearance of decency at leaſt; and the commons ſent a meſſage by the ſpeaker to the king, importing, that unleſs the chancellor was removed, they could not proceed in the diſpatch of public buſineſs. Richard, who little expected a motion of this nature, received the addreſs with an indignation nation he could not conceal. He told the ſpeaker very ſharply, " That it would better become parliament to attend to the buſineſs for which they were ſummoned, than to concern themſelves with his ſervants;" and leſt his preſence ſhould be conſtrued as a ſanction to their proceedings againſt his favourite, he retired to his palace at Eltham in Kent. The parliament ſent a deputation, inviting him to return, threatening, in caſe of refuſal, to diſſolve, and leave the kingdom, then in danger of a French invaſion, without voting any ſupply for its defence. The king, finding it impoſſible to divert the parliament from their reſolution, prevailed on the earl of Suffolk to reſign the great ſeal, which was delivered to the biſhop of Ely. The biſhop of Durham was removed from the office of treaſurer, which was conferred on the biſhop of Hereford, and John de Waltham was made keeper of the privy-ſeal. But the commons, not ſatisfied with the removal of the chancellor, impeached him in full parliament of having purchaſed lands and tenements of the king under full value; of having applied to other uſes a tax granted for the protection of the ſea-coaſt, which had been ſhamefully neglected to the prejudice of the realm; of having purchaſed for himſelf and his heirs a grant of fifty pounds a year out of the cuſtoms of Kingſton-upon-Hull, which had been beſtowed upon the king's grandfather; of having, by falſe inſinuations, prevailed on the king to confirm the ſaid purchaſe; of having procured from the pope a penſion for his ſon John upon the hoſpital of St. Antony, to the prejudice of the high maſter; of having obtained divers charters, and pardons for murders, treaſons, felonies, and other crimes; and in particular, a charter of certain franchiſes to the caſtle of Dover, to the ſubverſion of the laws and the king's courts of judicature; and finally, of having embezzled ten thouſand marks, which had been raiſed for the relief of Ghent, by which means that city was loſt, together with part of the money. Suffolk made ſo poor a defence by way of exculpation, that the king himſelf, who was preſent at his trial, could not help ſhaking his head, and ſaying, " Ah! Michael, Michael, ſee what thou haſt done!" Being convicted on clear evidence, he was committed to the cuſtody of the duke of Glouceſter, who, as conſtable of the kingdom, ſent him priſoner to Windſor-Caſtle; and all his illegal grants and proceedings were annulled. Having made this example, Richard expected to recover the countenance of his parliament; but he was miſtaken; for they were determined to make a thorough reformation in the management of the revenues. They ſaw the miniſters grow rich amidſt national penury, and that there was a neceſſity for eſtabliſhing a committee of inquiry and reformation. Eleven noblemen were therefore nominated for this purpoſe; they were furniſhed with full powers for inſpecting the ſtate of the public revenue ever ſince the king's acceſſion to the throne; they were ſworn to adminiſter juſtice to every perſon in the courſe of this inquiry; and the king himſelf took an oath to abide by their determination. Nor was this all; it was ordained by the parliament, that whoever ſhould adviſe the king to make any revocation of the powers granted to the committee, even though his majeſty did not revoke them, ſhould, for the firſt offence, forfeit his eſtate; and for a repetition of the ſame, ſuffer death as a traitor. Theſe powers were confirmed under the great ſeal; the committee, conſiſting of eleven perſons, was eſtabliſhed; and the ſovereign power transferred to them for a twelvemonth. By this act of the ſtate, Richard, who had now attained the twenty-firſt year of his age, was, in reality, dethroned, and a kind of ariſtocracy eſtabliſhed; for though the commiſſion was limited to a twelvemonth, it was ſufficiently evident, that the intention of the party was to render it perpetual, and that it would be a difficult matter to wreſt the power from their hands. Richard, however, entered a proteſt againſt theſe acts of compulſion at the cloſe of the ſeſſion, declaring, that the prerogatives of his crown, notwithſtanding his late conceſſions, ſhould ſtill be deemed entire and unimpaired. The conſequence was a confederacy, which, in the end, occaſioned his depoſition. Mowbray, earl of Nottingham, the marſhal; Piercy, earl of Northumberland; Fitz-Alan, earl of Arundel; Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, and Montacute, earl of Saliſbury, were cloſely united with each other and the princes, both by friendſhip, and their antipathy to the minion; and being no longer kept in awe by the king's perſonal character, now truly contemptible, they ſcorned to ſubmit to his corrupt miniſters, and ran to the greateſt extremities in their oppoſition. On the other hand, Richard ſoon became ſenſible of the contempt into which he had fallen, by having his prerogative thus circumſcribed; and his favourites, who were yet allowed to remain about his perſon, did not fail to aggravate the injury that had been offered him: he therefore reſolved to ſeek the means, both of recovering his prerogative, and of being revenged on thoſe who had invaded his authority. To this end he attempted to procure a favourable houſe of commons, by ſounding ſome of the ſheriffs, who being then returning officers, and alſo magiſtrates of great power in the counties, had a conſiderable influence in elections; but as they had moſt of them been appointed by his uncles, they were averſe to all his propoſed meaſures.

A. D. 1387.

The king, on this ill ſucceſs, applied to the lawyers and judges, and propoſed to them ſome queſtions, which they made no ſcruple of anſwering agreeable to his wiſhes. They declared, that the late commiſſion was derogatory to the royalty and prerogatives of his majeſty; that thoſe by whom it was procured, or who adviſed the king to conſent to it, were liable to capital puniſhment; that thoſe by whom he was compelled to ſign it, were guilty of high treaſon; that the king has a right of diſſolving parliaments whenever he pleaſes; that while the parliament ſits, it muſt firſt proceed upon the king's buſineſs; and that, without his conſent, they cannot impeach any of his miniſters and judges. This anſwer they ſigned in preſence of the archbiſhops of York and Dublin, Chicheſter and Bangor, the duke of Ireland, the earl of Suffolk, and two other of the council. It was not long before the determinations of this ſecret council reached the ears of the duke of Glouceſter and his adherents, who reſolved to prevent the execution of the king's intentions. Having collected their forces, they marched towards London; and the king, on receiving intelligence of their deſign, haſtened thither, where he was received with great ſplendor by Bembre the lord-mayor, who undertook to raiſe fifty thouſand men for his ſervice. Next day the confederates arrived within three miles of London; but inſtead of entering the city, and proceeding to extremities, they wiſely preſerved a ſhew of moderation; profeſſed a deep ſenſe of the calamities conſequent on civil diſcord; propoſed ſchemes of accommodation; and by private emiſſaries inflamed the reſentment of the people againſt the king. It was currently reported, that under pretence of a pilgrimage to Canterbury, Richard intended to croſs the ſea, and deliver up Calais to the king of France, who, in conſideration of that ceſſion, had engaged to ſupply him with an army to ſubdue his rebellious ſubjects, and eſtabliſh an arbitrary government upon the ruins of the Engliſh conſtitution. This report, which gained much credit from the late deciſion of the judges, gave juſt cauſe of offence to every lover of his country. The archbiſhop of York, with the neutral lords, endeavoured to effect an accommodation; and Richard at length conſented to an interview with Glouceſter and his aſſociates in Weſtminſter-Hall. But at the time appointed for the conference, it was diſcovered that a body of armed men, under Sir Nicholas Bembre, were placed in ambuſh in order to apprehend them: the barons, therefore, refuſed to proceed, till the avenues were examined; in conſequence of which, the conſpirators immediately diſperſed. The lords then repaired to Weſtminſter-Hall, and approaching the throne with great ſubmiſſion, fell on their knees, in which poſture they remained a conſiderable time, before the king bid Glouceſter riſe. The biſhop of Ely reprimanded them ſeverely, for preſuming to take up arms againſt their ſovereign, who, had he not been reſtrained by his royal clemency, would have cruſhed them to atoms. To this harangue of the prelate the lords made no reply, but ſtill retaining the marks of humility and ſubmiſſion, preſented a memorial, wherein they demanded that the archbiſhop of York, the duke of Ireland, the earl of Suffolk, Robert Treſilian, and Nicholas Bembre, ſhould be removed from his majeſty's council and preſence for ever, as traitors to their king and country. Having delivered this requeſt in writing, they threw down their gauntlets, challenging the accuſed to ſingle combat. Richard, alarmed at the reſolute and determined air they now aſſumed, laid aſide his imperious deportment, and anſwered their petition with great affability. He promiſed to redreſs their grievances, in the enſuing ſeſſions of parliament, exhorting them, in the mean time, to avoid all quarrels and diſſentions. He then diſmiſſed them with aſſurances of paternal eſteem, and as a proof of his ſincerity, in a few days iſſued a proclamation, clearing the duke of Glouceſter, the earls of Arundel and Warwick, from the imputation of treaſon, which had been thrown upon them by the five perſons they challenged to combat, and requiring thoſe calumniators to anſwer their charge in parliament. The lords however ſtill kept on their guard, as they had obſerved ſeveral ſuſpicious ſymptoms in the behaviour of the king, who, though he had not ſuffered his favourites to appear at the interview, ſtill protected them at court, and was wholly governed by their advice. Their diffidence ſoon appeared juſtly founded; for in a ſhort time they heard, that the duke of Ireland had repaired to the Marches of Wales, where he was joined by Sir Thomas Molineaux, Sir Ralph Vernon, Sir Ralph Ratcliff, and that his army daily increaſed. On the firſt report of theſe proceedings, the confederates ſent the earl of Derby, with a conſiderable detachment to ſtop his progreſs, and he met him near Radcot-Bridge in Oxfordſhire. The duke had not courage enough to ſtand the firſt charge, but fled towards the bridge; which being broken down, he quitted his horſe and armour, and ſwimming acroſs the river, eſcaped to the oppoſite bank. Molineaux, diſdaining to fly, was killed on the ſpot, and the earl of Derby not only gained an almoſt bloodleſs victory; but among the baggage of the duke, who was ſuppoſed to have periſhed in the river, found a number of letters, plans, and commiſſions, by which the projects of the king and his favourites were diſcovered. This miſfortune entirely diſconcerted the meaſures of the cabal, and ſtruck them with ſuch conſternation, that the earl of Suffolk diſappeared, and with a view of eſcaping to France, went over in diſguiſe to Calais, where he was diſcovered, and arreſted by his own brother, and ſent priſoner to the Tower of London by Beauchamp the governor.

The French war was ſcarcely mentioned during theſe internal commotions. Early in the ſpring of this year, the earl of Arundel put to ſea, with a powerful fleet, at a time when the French had laid up their ſhips. In the courſe of his cruiſe, the earl happened to fall in with a very rich fleet of Flemiſh, French, and ſome Spaniſh men of war for their convoy. The Engliſh attacked them very bravely, and were as bravely received; but the victory at laſt declared for the Engliſh, who took the Flemiſh admiral, with many of the enemy's beſt officers, and fifty-ſix of their ſhips. Not contented with this capture, they purſued the flying enemy for two days with ſuch ſucceſs, that the number of ſhips taken amounted to one hundred and twenty-ſix. The earl of Nottingham, a very promiſing young nobleman, commanded under the admiral, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf greatly on this occaſion. The ſhips were ſcarcely brought into harbour, when advice arrived that Breſt was inveſted by the French. The admiral therefore immediately put to ſea, obliged the enemy to raiſe the ſiege, demoliſhed two forts, and ſupplied the garriſon with a whole year's proviſions. The French councils were ſoon after diſconcerted, by Cliſſon, the conſtable, being taken priſoner by John de Montfort; and as this officer was the very ſoul of the propoſed deſcent upon England, that enterpriſe was entirely laid aſide. This ſucceſs, though fortunate for the nation, gave uneaſineſs to the king and his minions; for they had no other proſpect of freeing themſelves from the reſtraint of the council, than that of its incurring national diſgrace, from the miſcarriage of its meaſures. When therefore the two earls returned, they were received with great applauſe by the whole nation, except the king and his favourites, who treated them with coldneſs and neglect: though Nottingham had been the companion of his youth, Richard now received him with indifference, and the commiſſion of Arundel was given to the famous Henry Piercy, who, though but a young officer, defended the coaſt with great bravery. This glaring mark of ill-timed partiality, fired thoſe brave commanders with reſentment againſt the tools of power; and they attached themſelves cloſer than ever to the duke of Glouceſter's party. Indeed, both common danger and common injury, became now the bonds of a ſtrong confederacy againſt Richard, owing to his conduct.

During theſe ſcenes of anarchy, the Scots purſued their deſultory war with great advantage, but nothing happened worthy a place in hiſtory till the beginning of Auguſt, when they entered Northumberland with a ſmall army, conſiſting of three hundred horſe and two thouſand foot, all veterans, commanded by the earls of Fife, Murray, and Dunbar, the moſt celebrated commanders in the Scottiſh army. They ravaged the whole country through which they paſſed, and advanced as far as Newcaſtle, where lord Piercy, ſurnamed Hotſpur, ſon to the earl of Northumberland, firſt oppoſed them. But his troops were defeated, and himſelf unhorſed in ſingle combat by the younger Douglas, who having ſeized his lance, vowed to carry it to Scotland as a trophy of his victory. Inflamed with rage at his late miſfortune, Hotſpur vowed Douglas ſhould never carry his lance to Scotland in triumph. He accordingly collected a body of ſix hundred horſe, and eight thouſand foot, and putting himſelf at their head, marched in purſuit of the enemy, without waiting for a reinforcement of troops that were haſtening to join him, under the command of the biſhop of Durham. The Scots, elated with their late ſucceſs, had undertaken the ſiege of the caſtle of Otterborn, and were lying before that fortreſs when Piercy, by forced marches, reached their camp. Rage had expelled prudence from the breaſt of Piercy: he would not delay the engagement for a moment, though his troops were greatly fatigued, and night was approaching when he came up with the enemy. He attacked the Scots with all the fury of a diſappointed warrior; but the darkneſs rendered it impoſſible to continue the conteſt, and they ſeparated without either obtaining the victory. The moon riſing at midnight occaſioned the battle to be renewed, and at laſt victory declared for the Scots; Douglas was ſlain, and Piercy taken priſoner. The conſternation of the Engliſh was ſo great, that the biſhop of Durham, who was advancing with ten thouſand men, inſtead of attacking the Scots, weakened and fatigued by the late battle, diſmiſſed his men, and retired with his principal officers to Newcaſtle, leaving the Scots at liberty, to return into their own country at leiſure, with their priſoners and booty.

The duke of Lancaſter came home about this time from his expedition, after having obliged the king of Caſtile to conclude a treaty with him, he having promiſed to pay him ſix hundred thouſand livres, with an annual penſion of forty thouſand, or ten thouſand pounds of our preſent money, during his life, and that of his ducheſs. This treaty was followed by the marriage of Catharine, the duke's daughter, with Henry, the eldeſt ſon of the king of Caſtile; on which account the duke reſigned his pretenſions to the crown of Caſtile. Lancaſter's authority ſerved to counterbalance, for a ſhort time, that of the duke of Glouceſter, and ſecured the power of Richard, who treated him with great reſpect, and ceded to him for life the duchy of Guienne; but as the nation loudly remonſtrated againſt this ceſſion, it was afterwards given up by the duke's conſent.

The earl of Derby returned, after the engagement at Radcot-Bridge, to the lords at St. Alban's, and they marched immediately at the head of forty thouſand men to London. Having encamped in Clerkenwell-Fields, they ſent for the mayor and principal citizens, who waited upon them with the keys of the city. By this time Richard had ſhut himſelf up in the Tower, where he remained in a forlorn condition, abandoned by all, except a few of his creatures, who were as much dejected in adverſity, as they had been elated by proſperity, and therefore incapable of aſſiſting him in the trying moments of his preſent diſtreſs. The confederates deſiring an audience, he was afraid to refuſe their requeſt, and in the interview they expoſtulated with his weak conduct ſo ſharply, that the unhappy monarch could not refrain from tears. This was conſidered by the lords as an evidence of a heart ſtill ſenſible of honour, eſpecially when the king promiſed to meet them next day at Weſtminſter, in order to concert meaſures to be taken in the enſuing parliament. But theſe impreſſions were ſoon removed, by the inſinuations of his ſycophants, who perſuaded him to retract a promiſe, which they alleged was injurious to his royal dignity: in conſequence of which Richard refuſed to treat any further with the diſcontented nobles. Exaſperated at ſuch trifling proceedings, they drew up their forces on Tower-Hill, and ſent a meſſage to the king, declaring, that if he continued to trifle with them any longer, they would advance another prince to the throne. Terrified at this menace, he promiſed ſolemnly to appear next day at Weſtminſter-Hall, and he punctually fulfilled his appointment. The proceedings of parliament were perfectly conſiſtent with the declarations of the lords, public juſtice, and the cuſtoms of that age; and Richard, fully ſenſible of this, complied with every thing they propoſed. He gave up his favourites, without diſtinction of ſex or quality, who had brought his perſonal character into the loweſt contempt. The archbiſhop of York had already fled, with the biſhop of Chicheſter, from juſtice. Of thoſe that remained were the biſhop of Durham, friar Ruſhok, the king's confeſſor, the lords Zouch of Haringworth, Burmel, and Beaumont, Sir Albaric de Vere, Sir Baldwin Bereſford, Sir John Worth, Sir Thomas Clifford, Sir John Lovel, with ſeveral ladies of quality, who had contributed to the debauchery and profligacy of the court. Some of theſe were impriſoned in different parts of the kingdom, ſome obliged to give ſecurity for their appearance, to anſwer the charges that might be exhibited againſt them, and others were baniſhed the court. Sir Simon Burley, Sir Thomas Trivet, Sir Nicholas Bambre, Sir William Ellingham, Sir John Beauchamp, John Blake, and the following clergymen, Richard Clifford, John de Lincoln, Richard Matford, and Nicholas Larke, were committed to priſon, that they might be brought immediately to trial. The corrupt judges, who had given unjuſt deciſions, were arreſted on the bench in Weſtminſter-Hall; but Treſilian had abſconded, conſcious of his own demerits.

As the parliament met at the time appointed, the ſeſſion was opened by the biſhop of Ely, chancellor of the kingdom, who declared they were aſſembled to redreſs the grievances of the public; to further the impartial adminiſtration of juſtice; to concert meaſures for defending the coaſts and borders of the kingdom; and to raiſe neceſſary ſupplies in the eaſieſt and moſt expeditious manner. The chancellor having finiſhed his ſpeech, Glouceſter fell on his knees before the king, and offered to ſtand the award of his peers, touching certain malicious reports, ſuggeſting his intention of dethroning the king, and uſurping the ſovereign authority; but the king declaring himſelf aſſured of his innocence, he was acquitted of all ſuſpicion. The lords now demanded a confirmation of their claim, of trying and judging all important caſes relating to the peers in the courſe of parliament, independent of the common and civil law of the kingdom; which claim was confirmed under the ſanction of parliament. Theſe points being ſettled, the appellants exhibited their charge againſt the archbiſhop of York, the duke of Ireland, the earl of Suffolk, Sir Robert Treſilian, and Sir Nicholas Bembre, in thirty-nine articles, containing accuſations of treaſon and miſdemeanors of various kinds and degrees. The accuſed were ſummoned in the chamber of parliament, and at the great gate of the palace; and on their non-appearance, the appellants moved that the default might be recorded, and the lords proceeded to judgment. Fully ſatisfied concerning the truth of the charges, the king, with the lords temporal, pronounced the accuſed guilty of high-treaſon. Their eſtates were forfeited, the archbiſhop's temporalities were ſeized, but the others were condemned to be hanged and drawn, as traitors. Judge Treſilian, being betrayed by his own ſervants, was taken in a mean diſguiſe, and brought before the parliament, who ordered their ſentence to be executed immediately at Tyburn. The archbiſhop of York was apprehended at Shields, attempting to embark in diſguiſe: he was however permitted to retire to Flanders, where he ſerved a ſmall cure to the day of his death, which happened about three years after. Suffolk did not long ſurvive his diſgrace, and the duke of Ireland died at Lovain, of a wound he received in hunting. Sir Nicholas Bembre was delivered into the hands of the earl-marſhal, who with the mayor, aldermen, and ſheriffs of London, attended at his execution. Several others ſuffered the ſame fate; but none were more regretted than Sir Simon Burley. His execution made a deeper impreſſion on the mind of Richard than all the others. The queen intereſted herſelf extremely in behalf of Burley: were we to credit one writer, who has endeavoured to varniſh over the vices of this reign, and to blacken the ſolemn reſolutions of parliament, as ſcenes of injuſtice and violence, ſhe remained three hours before the earl of Glouceſter, on her knees, pleading for that gentleman's life; but her petition was rejected by that nobleman, who certainly had more ſenſe than to plead for a man, who had been governor to Richard, and connived at, to ſay the leaſt, his follies and vitious courſes. Theſe proſecutions being ended, a declaration was made by parliament, that none of the articles pronounced treaſon on the late trials, ſhould ever after be drawn into precedents by the judges, who ſtill were to conſider the ſtatute of the twenty-fifth of Edward, as the only rule of their conduct. The parliament alſo paſſed a general act of amneſty and pardon; and as Richard had violated his contract with his people, it was thought neceſſary he ſhould renew his coronation oath, and, in his turn, receive the homage and fealty of his ſubjects. This done, the archbiſhop of Canterbury denounced ſentence of excommunication againſt all who ſhould attempt to diſturb the tranquillity and peace of the kingdom. After theſe important tranſactions, the ſeſſion broke up, with the appellation of the mercileſs parliament, having continued from the third of February to the fourth of June.

The earl of Arundel, having received a commiſſion as governor of Breſt, and a renewal of that which conſtituted him lord high admiral, put to ſea at the beginning of the ſummer with his ſquadron, and had the good fortune to fall in with a fleet of French ſhips, conſiſting of eighty ſail, moſt of which he took, and deſtroyed the reſt. Rhee and Aleron, with ſome other iſlands on the French coaſt, he likewiſe plundered.

A. D. 1389. In ſpite of all the extraordinary tranſactions of laſt year, in which the violent contentions between Richard and his nobility, in appearance, ſeemed to have been brought to an iſſue, the event proved otherwiſe. The king, who was now in the twenty-third year of his age, declared, in full council, held at Eaſter, his intention of directing the affairs of his houſehold and kingdom, by his own ſole authority, and of taking into his hands the reins of government. Not the leaſt oppoſition was made to ſo reaſonable a deſign; Richard immediately demanded the great ſeal from the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and gave it to William of Wickham, biſhop of Wincheſter. He removed the duke of Glouceſter, and the earl of Warwick, from the council board, and ſupplied their places with others, whom he thought more worthy of his confidence. The biſhop of Hereford was deprived of his office of treaſurer, and the earl of Arundel of that of admiral. Theſe changes were unpopular, yet the dukes of Lancaſter and York affected to return to their duty. Theſe political revolutions, conſidering how much the power of the crown had been limited, appear, at this time, rather unaccountable, nor have modern hiſtorians given us any reaſons for ſuch unexpected changes. Perhaps ſome ſecret animoſities prevailed among the leading men of the oppoſition, which enabled the king to recover his authority. Perhaps the affections of the people were cooled, who eaſily paſs from one extreme to another. Perhaps the lords knowing the king's headſtrong temper, were inclined to give him his full length of command, that hereafter they might effectually execute their purpoſes, and ſhift the blame from themſelves to him. But however this be, Richard exerciſed the authority he had reſumed, with a degree of moderation; and the kingdom, from this period, enjoyed a ſhort calm of tranquillity. On the fourth day of the ſeſſion of parliament, the biſhop of Wincheſter reſigned the great ſeal, as the biſhop of St. David's did the keys of the Exchequer; and all the lords of the council were diſcharged at their own deſire. They then aſked in open parliament, if any member had ought to object to their conduct, which having examined, the commons declared themſelves amply ſatisfied on this point. After this declaration the king reſtored them to their offices, and the dukes of Lancaſter and Glouceſter were added to the council, proteſting, however, that for any thing then done, he would retain or diſplace thoſe counſellors, as he himſelf ſhould think expedient.

A. D. 1391.

However, while the new adminiſtration conducted themſelves with more integrity than his abandoned favourites, the conduct of the king was in many inſtances exceedingly obnoxious to the ſober part of the nation. Addicted to pleaſure, he ſpent his time in feaſting and jollity; and laviſhed away immenſe ſums in tournaments. Though a terrible plague, and a famine not leſs dreadful, afflicted England, the king's exceſſive fondneſs for pageantry and pomp, induced him to retrench none of his diverſions or expences. He valued himſelf upon ſurpaſſing in magnificence all the ſovereigns of Europe, and acted as if he had poſſeſſed an inexhauſtible fund of treaſure. Three hundred domeſtics were employed in his kitchen alone; and the queen had the ſame number in her ſervice. The courtiers eaſily obtained what they aſked, and he in every thing behaved with a profuſeneſs, which could not fail of being very chargeable to his ſubjects. His finances being reduced, he attempted to borrow ſo ſmall a ſum as one thouſand pounds of the city of London, but had the mortification to be refuſed; and even an Italian merchant, who offered to lend the money, was cut in pieces by the populace. This affront Richard highly reſented, and ſoon after, under colour of puniſhing a tumult of a trifling nature, raiſed by a baker's apprentice, he took away the charter of the city, and removed the courts of juſtice to York: but afterwards the city of London, by making a preſent of ten thouſand pounds, and two gold crowns, were glad to redeem their charter.

There now appeared ſuch perfect harmony between Richard and his parliament, that they voted him a whole tenth and fifteenth, to defray the expences of his voyage to France, whither he had been invited, to effect, if poſſible, a laſting accommodation. In the mean time commiſſioners were appointed to treat with France and Scotland, and all parties agreed, that a general congreſs ſhould be held at Amiens, that a treaty of peace might be concluded, and in the preſence of the two monarchs ratified.

A. D. 1392. Charles, king of France, with his two brothers and three uncles, repaired to Amiens, at the time appointed, and Richard proceeded as far as Dover, in his way thither; but whether he altered his reſolution from his own judgment, or was diverted from his purpoſe by the repreſentation of his council, his voyage was poſtponed, and he remained at Dover with the duke of Glouceſter; while his two uncles, the earls of Huntingdon, Derby, and other noblemen, proceeded to Amiens, in quality of ambaſſadors and plenipotentiaries. They entered the town with a train of twelve thouſand horſe, and during their ſtay, were magnificently entertained at the expence of the French king. Yet the demands of both courts were ſo incompatible, that nothing was done till Michaelmas the enſuing year, but prolonging the truce.

A. D. 1394. Treaties for a peace were again renewed by the duke of Lancaſter, in Picardy, but were again broken off without coming to any concluſion, except that of prolonging the truce for five years. After this ſome inſurrections of the Iriſh induced the king to make an expedition into that country, which he had the good fortune to reduce to obedience, and recovered by that means, in ſome degree, his character with reſpect to courage, which he had loſt by his inactivity. The Engliſh noblemen, who poſſeſſed large eſtates in that country, choſe to reſide in England, ſo that Ireland was left almoſt defenceleſs, and expoſed to the ravages of the old Iriſh Scots, who took care to avail themſelves of every favourable opportunity for recovering their ancient poſſeſſions. Theſe they took by force of arms, and plundered all the reſt of the country belonging to the Engliſh, ſo that the revenue, which in the time of Edward III. was very conſiderable, was not now ſufficient to defray the ordinary expences of government. In Auguſt a proclamation was publiſhed, commanding all the proprietors to repair to Ireland by the eighth of September, and wait the king's arrival. The military tenants of the crown were likewiſe ſummoned; the cinque ports required to furniſh their armament of fifty-ſeven ſhips well manned. This being accordingly provided, Richard ſet out for Wales, accompanied by the duke of Glouceſter, the earls of March, Nottingham, and Rutland; and embarking about Michaelmas, at Milford-Haven, landed in Ireland with an army of fifty thouſand men. The native Iriſh, terrified at the ſight of ſuch a formidable army, either retired to their faſtneſſes, or made their ſubmiſſion, and they were treated by the king with great clemency. He not only pardoned thoſe who ſubmitted, but even allotted penſions to their chiefs, and endeavoured to ſoften their native ferocity. The earl of Nottingham was empowered to receive, in the king's name, ſubmiſſion and homage of all the Iriſh in Leinſter, who gave bonds for their peaceable behaviour. O'Neal, lord paramount over the other princes of Ireland, voluntarily tended allegiance to the king of England, and did homage to him at Drogheda. His example was followed by O'Hanlon, O'Donnel, Mac Mahon, and other toparchs, who engaged for themſelves and their clans, to maintain the peace of the kingdom. Richard, during the Chriſtmas holidays, invited all the chiefs to an entertainment, and not only diſplayed on that occaſion his uſual magnificence, but conferred on them the order of knighthood, and encouraged them to adopt the Engliſh dreſs, and way of living. He then ſummoned a parliament in the ſame city to redreſs their grievances, and in ſhort conducted himſelf with ſuch moderation and prudence, as acquired the affection and eſteem of the native Iriſh, the greater part of whom ſubmitted to his government of their own accord.

The queen about this time paid the debt of nature, to the general regret of the nation: ſhe acquired, on account of the meekneſs of her diſpoſition, the epithet of the good queen Anne; and Richard was ſo deeply affected with her death, that he was for ſome time inconſolable; nor could he bear the ſight of the palace of Sheen, where ſhe expired, ever after.

A. D. 1395. The regent, while the king was thus laudably employed in Ireland, ſummoned a parliament at Weſtminſter, and the duke of Glouceſter was ſent to manage the affairs of the crown in this aſſembly, who being informed of the king's proceedings, were ſo pleaſed with his conduct, that they granted a ſubſidy for finiſhing the reduction of that country. During this ſeſſion, a remonſtrance was preſented by the Lollards, who were become ſo numerous and confident, as to preach, write, and openly declaim againſt the eſtabliſhed religion. Protected by ſome powerful noblemen, they impeached the morals and doctrines of the clergy, and a writing, containing the articles of the charge, was brought into the houſe by Sir Thomas Latimer, Sir Richard Story, and other members, who had adopted their principles. The archbiſhop of York, and biſhop of London, alarmed at this preſumptuous behaviour, went over to Dublin, where they inveighed againſt the Lollards as enemies to church and ſtate, and wrought ſo effectually on the mind of Richard, that he declined his deſign of reducing Ireland, and returned to England, with a view to cruſh theſe innovating reformers. On his arrival, they were threatened with death, if they continued to propagate their tenets, and the chancellor of Oxford was ordered to expel all thoſe who were ſuſpected of favouring them. The next ſubject that came under the conſideration of Richard and his council, was the appointment of a preſumptive heir to the crown, the queen having died without iſſue. Richard had, previous to his departure, declared Edmund Mortimer, ſon and heir to Roger earl of Marche, ſucceſſor to the crown; but the ambition of Glouceſter and Lancaſter would doubtleſs have prevented this appointment ever taking place. In order to prevent civil diſſentions, the king was adviſed to engage in a ſecond marriage, and his council propoſing Iſabella, eldeſt daughter of the French king, Charles VI. as a ſuitable conſort, the archbiſhop of Dublin, the biſhop of St. David's, the earls of Rutland and Nottingham, the lord Beaumont, and Willa le Scroop, were ſent ambaſſadors to the court of France, to demand that princeſs in marriage for Richard. They were inſtructed to inſiſt on a conſiderable portion, and to offer ten thouſand marks a year for her jointure. When this propoſal was laid before the council of France, ſome of the members hinted at the inconſiſtence of treating of a marriage previous to the concluſion of a peace; but the duke of Burgundy wiſely obſerved, it was the moſt probable expedient to effect and conſolidate an accommodation. Through the powerful influence of this nobleman, the ambaſſadors were honourably received, and the king favouring the propoſal, it was accepted. A treaty was immediately ſet on foot, and the articles having been diſcuſſed by the plenipotentiaries, it was agreed, that Richard ſhould marry the princeſs Iſabella, and receive with her a portion of eight hundred thouſand franks in gold, at yearly payments; that he ſhould renounce all claim to the crown of France, either by his own hereditary pretenſions, or by virtue of his marriage; that the truce ſhould be prolonged for five and twenty years; and that the king of France ſhould aſſiſt him againſt his rebellious ſubjects. Theſe articles being ratified, the young princeſs, only ſeven years old, was ſtyled queen of England, and married by the earl of Northumberland, proxy for Richard.

A. D. 1396. When this negotiation and alliance with Charles was concluded, Richard determined to go over to the continent, and eſpouſe the princeſs in perſon. Both kings met under a pavilion, ſuperbly decorated, between Ardes and Calais, each with a ſplendid retinue; where the nuptials were ſolemnized, and the treaty ſigned to their mutual ſatisfaction. But this confederacy with France gave offence to the Engliſh, who had contracted a violent antipathy againſt that nation. Glouceſter told the king, it would have been more adviſable to attempt the recovery of what England had loſt in France, by a vigorous war, than enter into an alliance with a crown, that had always gained greater advantages by treaties with England, than by its arms. The public diſſatisfaction was increaſed by the reſtitution of Cherburg to the king of Navarre, and of Breſt to the duke of Brittany, for which the king received an inconſiderable ſum, and laviſhed it away in needleſs expences. The duke of Glouceſter was ſo diſpleaſed with this meaſure, that he upbraided his nephew in ſevere terms, to which Richard replied in a manner that ſhewed he was greatly offended. He afterwards complained to the dukes of Lancaſter and York, that Glouceſter took upon him to control his actions, and dropped ſome expreſſions, which made them think, he ſuſpected all three of forming ill deſigns againſt him. The two princes profeſſed their unſhaken ſhaken loyalty, and obſerved, they did not queſtion but that the duke their brother was equally loyal, though his haſty temper made him ſometimes ſpeak with too much warmth. Richard endeavoured to employ theſe his two uncles as tools of his reſentment againſt Glouceſter, but they declined all concern in any deſign againſt the life of their own brother, and retired to their country ſeats to avoid all ſuſpicion and cenſure. Sir Thomas Piercy, brother to the earl of Northumberland, alſo withdrew from court, which was now entirely devoted to riot and luxury. Richard, a ſlave to pleaſure, was incapable of applying himſelf to buſineſs; under the dominion of favourites, on whom he profuſely laviſhed the revenues of the crown, and the grants of the people; and ſullying the dignity of his rank by admitting perſons of very mean condition to his familiarity; thereby rendering himſelf totally unworthy of wearing the Engliſh crown. He was alſo at this time left to the direction of unexperienced, hot-brained counſellors, who perſuaded him that his life was in danger, during the exiſtence of Glouceſter; which opinion the account of St. Pol, a French nobleman who came to viſit the young queen of England, confirmed.

But Glouceſter was too conſiderable a ſubject, and too popular to be taken off by any ſhew of juſtice, and his brothers were too well affected to his merit and perſon, to be unconcerned ſpectators of his danger; recourſe was therefore had to a more probable expedient. Richard having determined to be revenged on his uncle, to effect this he condeſcended to be himſelf an accomplice in his murder. The duke was then at Plaſhy, one of his ſeats in Eſſex, without the leaſt ſuſpicion of any attempt againſt his life. Having always maintained the appearance of affection for his uncle, on a ſummer evening he paid him a viſit, and was received by the duke and ducheſs with all the endearing marks of hoſpitality. Richard was mean enough to partake of an entertainment from the very perſon he intended to betray. During ſupper he told the duke, that he wanted to conſult him on ſome very important affairs, and deſired he would accompany him to London, where a council was, as he pretended, to be held in the morning. The duke, not ſuſpecting the leaſt treachery, very readily obeyed, and ſet out with the king, attended only by four or five domeſtics. An ambuſh having been placed on the road near Epping-Foreſt, when they came near it, the king putting ſpurs to his horſe, rode off at full gallop, and before the duke of Glouceſter could overtake him, he was ſurrounded by armed horſemen, who arreſted him in the king's name, conveyed him inſtantly to the river, and put him on board a ſhip, which inſtantly ſet ſail, and arrived at Calais the next day. This treacherous tranſaction was carried on with ſuch ſecrecy, that his friends, the earls of Arundel and Warwick, came to court the next morning, purſuant to the king's invitation, without the leaſt ſuſpicion of danger; but ſoon after their arrival, they were arreſted, together with lords Cobham and Cheney, and committed to the Tower. This event blew up again the flames of diſcontent among the people, who conſidered the impriſoned lords as their protectors and deliverers; and a general rebellion would doubtleſs have been the conſequence, had not Richard, with remarkable prudence, iſſued a proclamation, declaring, that the lords were arreſted in conſequence of a freſh information againſt them, and that they ſhould be tried before their peers, during the next ſeſſions of parliament ſummoned to meet at Nottingham on the firſt of Auguſt. Accordingly an appeal for high treaſon was brought in againſt the duke of Glouceſter and his confederates, by the earls of Rutland, Kent, Huntingdon, Nottingham, Somerſet, and Saliſbury, the lord Spencer, and William Scroop, the chamberlain of the houſehold. After having read and conſidered the bill, the appealed lords were indulged with time till the fourteenth of September, to prepare anſwers to the articles of impeachment exhibited againſt them. The ſuſpenſe, the hopes, the fears, and diſtreſs of the nation were increaſed, when it was underſtood how great, how good, how fair in eſtimation, the impeached perſons were conſidered. They were almoſt all of them connected, either by blood or alliance, with every member of the houſe; ſo that Richard was afraid to truſt them with his bloody purpoſe, the death of the duke of Glouceſter. He therefore firſt endeavoured to extort a confeſſion from him by the aſſiſtance of William Reckhill, one of the juſtices of the Common-Pleas. This perſon had a commiſſion to examine the duke at Calais, and Richard hoped that the ſubtle lawyer, by tampering with the heat and impatience of his temper, would extort from him particulars upon which an accuſation might be grounded. But Glouceſter ſeems to have been ſo very open and ingenuous on his examination, that the reſult did not anſwer the intention of finding him guilty. Richard therefore ſent orders to the earl of Nottingham, governor of Calais, that the duke ſhould be privately diſpatched. On receiving this order, the earl was ſo ſhocked at the intended treachery, that he abſolutely refuſed to obey. But being threatened by Richard with death, in caſe of refuſal, the earl ſecretly connived at the baſe aſſaſſination. We are informed, that the duke was taken out of the caſtle of Calais, and carried to an adjacent inn by four aſſaſſins, Hall, Lovetoft, Serle, and Francis, who were all ſworn to ſecrecy. Lovetoft carried the duke to an inner apartment, where he informed him of the king's command. The duke, who expected nothing leſs than death, anſwered, without the leaſt emotion, that he would readily ſubmit, and leave his death to be revenged by his country. They then threw him on a ſmall bed, where they ſmothered him between two feather beds. This horrid tranſaction being over, they ſtripped the body, placed it in the bed, and it was pretended that the duke died of an apoplexy. Thus fell Thomas of Woodſtock, duke of Glouceſter, from whoſe unworthy fate we may learn, how fatal a taint the brighteſt virtues may receive from the ſlighteſt failings. That he was brave, open, ſincere, and patriotic, none can deny; but as theſe qualities were unhappily blended with ambition and a love of popularity, he was hurried at times into ſuch conduct as entailed on him the ſuſpicion of the king, and the hatred of the greater part of the nobility, notwithſtanding which, he lived and died the friend of liberty, that particular glory of the Engliſh conſtitution. It is impoſſible to conceive the horror which ſeized all ranks of people, when this unnatural murder was known, nor is it eaſy to determine which was excited moſt, their conſternation or reſentment. But Richard with admirable foreſight, had taken every precaution for ſupporting his deteſtable plan of arbitrary power. Had the ſame vigour and ſagacity been employed in a virtuous cauſe, which was proſtituted in the ſervice of vice, this prince might have lived with renown, and died with glory. The king had already taken all neceſſary meaſures to have a parliament at his devotion, he having ſome time before changed all the ſheriffs of the kingdom, and placed in their room none but thoſe who had promiſed to be ſubſervient to his deſign. The parliament, thus at his devotion, had lately paſſed whatever acts the king was pleaſed to dictate: they annulled for ever the commiſſion which uſurped upon the royal authority, and declared any attempt to revive a like commiſſion to be treaſon: they abrogated all the acts which attainted the king's miniſters, and which both the parliament that had paſſed them, and the whole nation, had ſworn to maintain; and declared the general pardon granted by the king to be invalid, becauſe extorted by force, though after Richard had reſumed the government, and no longer lay under any reſtraint, he had voluntarily confirmed that general indemnity by proclamation. They even annulled a particular pardon granted to the earl of Arundel, ſix years after, under pretence that it was obtained by ſurpriſe, and that the king was not fully informed of the guilt of that nobleman.

Richard, beſides having gained over the parliament to his devotion, had collected alſo an army of twenty thouſand veterans, and ſtationed them in the neighbourhood of London; and when, on the death of the duke of Glouceſter, his two brothers haſtened thither, breathing revenge, he employed his favourite Rutland to compromiſe matters, on the principles of preventing a civil war; who accordingly repreſented, that though Glouceſter's fate was deplorable, it could not be altered; and that by endeavouring to revenge it, they might deſtroy their country. He aſſured them of the king's unfeigned ſorrow for that unhappy event; and engaged, in his majeſty's name, that if they would decline all thoughts of revenge, and conſent to a hearty reconciliation, they ſhould preſide in his councils, and be intruſted with the ſole direction of public affairs. The immediate reſult of this engagement too plainly evinces, that ambition was the ruling paſſion of York and Lancaſter; for they diſmiſſed their adherents, and all diſputes between thoſe two noblemen and the king ſubſided. The parliament was no ſooner met, than ſtrong marks of venality and corruption appeared; and the miniſtry, ſolicitous only to procure ſucceſs to their meaſures, were very indifferent about the means they employed for that purpoſe. Fitz William, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and brother to Arundel, was then impeached by the commons for his concurrence in procuring the illegal commiſſion, and in attainting the king's miniſters. To this the primate pleaded guilty; but, being an eccleſiaſtic, the king was ſatisfied with his being baniſhed the realm, and his temporalities ſequeſtered. The duke of Glouceſter, with the earls of Arundel and Warwick, were accuſed of the ſame crimes, and alſo of having appeared in arms in a hoſtile manner. The earl of Arundel, when brought to the bar, pleaded both the king's general and ſpecial pardon; but this plea being overruled, he was found guilty. The earl of Warwick, likewiſe, was found guilty of high treaſon; but, on account of his ſubmiſſive behaviour, was ſentenced to perpetual baniſhment in the Iſle of Man. In the mean time a warrant was iſſued in due form to the governor of Calais, commanding him to bring over his priſoner to take his trial; but anſwer was returned, that the duke of Glouceſter had died of an apoplexy. The time and circumſtances of that prince's death appeared extremely ſuſpicious; and it was the general opinion, that he was murdered by order of the king his nephew: which popular opinion was too well founded; for in the following reign, undoubted proofs were produced in parliament of his being diſpatched in the way we have already related; and it evidently appeared, that Richard, apprehenſive leſt the execution of ſo near a relation might prove dangerous, had thus baſely gratified his revenge, by a method which he thought would have perfectly concealed it. Having received ſuch ſubſtantial proofs of ſervile obedience from his parliament, he exacted from them an oath, that they would perpetually maintain all the acts they had lately made; and the ſeſſion concluded with ſome acts of the king's munificence, by the creation or advancement of ſeveral of his peers. The earl of Rutland was made duke of Albemarle; the earl of Derby, duke of Hereford; the earl of Kent, duke of Surrey; the earl of Nottingham, duke of Norfolk; the earl of Huntingdon, duke of Exeter; the earl of Somerſet, marquis of Dorſet; Ralph Nevil, earl of Weſtmoreland; lord Spencer, earl of Glouceſter; William Scroop, earl of Wiltſhire; and Thomas Piercy, earl of Worceſter. In the mean time the earl of Arundel, in conſequence of the ſentence pronounced upon him, prepared to ſuffer its execution, with all the fortitude that attends conſcious virtue. The king himſelf was mean enough to be a ſpectator of this tragic ſcene, attended by the earls of Kent and Nottingham, with all the ſymptoms of ſavage exultation. When the earl came upon the ſcaffold, he turned to Nottingham, his ſon-in-law, and ſaid, "My lord, it would ſurely have better become you to have been abſent on this occaſion: you ſeem to triumph in my ſufferings; but remember, the time is coming, when your own misfortunes may furniſh the like triumph to your enemies." The ungrateful and cruel treatment of this gallant nobleman, excited an univerſal clamour among the people, who publicly declared, that he fell a martyr to the liberties of his country. His life was ſpent in performing a ſeries of brave actions, from his firſt entrance on the ſtage of the world, to his magnanimous exit. He had boldly aſſerted the freedom of his country, in oppoſition to vice, weakneſs, and venality, and with ſo uniform a tenor of conduct, that he was never known to deſert its principles.

When ſober reflection took place, Richard could not help feeling for the fate of this gallant earl, who had performed ſo many ſignal actions in his ſervice, and had always been a ſucceſsful commander. His image inceſſantly haunted the mind of the guilty monarch, and the uneaſineſs of his ſpirit was heightened by the apprehenſion of danger; for though he had obtained all he required of his parliament, yet by his conduct he had alienated the affections of the whole body of the people. The principal nobility ſaw themſelves debaſed by the cheapneſs of public honours, and the admiſſion of the vile and venal into public councils. Diviſions ſoon ſprung up among the members of the new miniſtry; and Richard was ſo far from diſcountenancing, that he encouraged them; thinking, as moſt miſguided princes have always done, that his own power was by that means rendered of more deciſive weight. At the ſame time he took every ſtep in his power for fixing the arbitrary authority he had lately acquired, on a more ſolid baſis. He new modelled his guards, and endeavoured to render them capable of committing every ſpecies of cruelty, in order to ſupport the abſolute power of the crown. It is impoſſible to deſcribe the miſeries of England at this period. The ſhameful fetters ſhe had forged for herſelf, and which now ſeemed to be firmly rivetted, galled her ſenſe of freedom, embittered her ſufferings, and increaſed her afflictions. But calamity at laſt rouſed her to a true ſenſe of her fallen ſtate; and liberty, though now to all appearance in her laſt convulſive pangs, wrought out her own deliverance, and reared her head!

A parliament having met on the twenty-eighth of January, Richard appeared ſo anxious for the eſtabliſhment of their late acts in the laſt ſeſſion, that he not only obliged the lords and commons to ſwear again to obſerve them on the croſs of Canterbury; but ſoon after procured a bull from the pope, in order to ſecure and eſtabliſh them for ever. The parliament, to keep pace with the king's deſires, granted him a moſt exorbitant ſubſidy by duties on wool, leather, and wool-fells for life; alſo a ſubſidy of one tenth and a half, and one fifteenth and a half. The attainder of Treſilian and other judges were reverſed; and the anſwers, for which they had been impeached, were, by the approbation of the preſent judges, declared to be juſt and legal. They even went ſo far back as to reverſe the attainder of the two Spencers, in the reign of Edward II. Before their diſſolution, they preferred a petition, importing, that as the ſeſſion had been ſhort, and the buſineſs before them long and difficult, his majeſty would be pleaſed to appoint a committee of lords and commons, who might be veſted with full powers of parliament, for hearing and determining all matters then depending before the aſſembly; and the king, with the advice and conſent of the lords, agreed to the petition. Thus the deſpotiſm of Richard had almoſt reached the point of perfection; and nothing but to place him above the neceſſity of calling any more parliaments for the future ſeemed now to be wanting.

A charge againſt the duke of Norfolk, being the firſt object that fell under this committee, was exhibited by the duke of Hereford, who accuſed him of having ſpoken ſeditious words againſt his majeſty, in a private converſation between Brentford and London. Henry, duke of Hereford, equally diſtinguiſhed by the gifts of nature and fortune, was now in the flower of his age: he had neither declined, nor courted popularity, and therefore had acquired it; he had neither frequented, nor ſhunned the court, and therefore adorned it; he had always kept fair with the king, and was particularly careful not to leave the ſmalleſt ſtain, on which the piercing eye of ſuſpicion could faſten an imputation of diſloyalty. His eſtimation of mankind was founded upon his own experience of their diſpoſitions and intereſts, without truſting to profeſſions which vaniſh on the proſpect of advantage, or to ties of friendſhip, which diſſolve by the breath of power. He had gone too far in the late meaſures, owing perhaps to that exceſſive caution which he inherited from his anceſtors. Nor is it to be ſuppoſed, that a prince of his character would be fond of forming any connections but with ſuch as he knew he could truſt. The duke of Norfolk was alſo a nobleman of high rank, and diſtinguiſhed courage; but his manners were unpoliſhed, and without a ſteady virtue to recommend them. He had never been greatly courted by any party; and therefore thinking himſelf ſlighted by all, he had attached himſelf to the king, from whom he received an increaſe of dignity, but no degree of confidence. Both he and the duke of Hereford, had formerly been deeply engaged in that oppoſition, which Richard always conſidered as an unpardonable crime; and both, perhaps, dreaded the effects of his reſentment. Both being in the ſame ſituation, the duke of Norfolk was perſuaded that they could be ſafe only by uniting their intereſts. He was imprudent enough to propoſe this caolition to the duke of Hereford, who received it with great diſguſt. He knew the character and diſpoſition of the duke of Norfolk too well, to embark with him in ſo dangerous a coalition: he even ſuſpected that the propoſal had been ſecretly dictated by his enemies at court; and therefore, in the preſence of the king, charged the duke of Norfolk with having privately ſpoken to him many ſlanderous and difreſpectful words of his majeſty, in relation to his intending to deſtroy many of the principal nobility. The duke of Norfolk denying the charge, gave Hereford the lie, and offered to prove his innocence by ſingle combat. The challenge was accepted, and the diſpute ordered to be decided according to the laws of chivalry, in the preſence of the king and his whole court. When the two noblemen entered the liſts, and were on the point of engaging, the trumpets having ſounded a charge for that purpoſe, the king ordered their lances to be taken away, and they returned to their chairs, according to the uſual ceremony on theſe occaſions, while his majeſty retired to council, where their doom was fixed, with a view to prevent effuſſion of blood, or rather, to prevent the conſequences of their quarrel, by expelling two of the moſt powerful oppoſers of Richard's tyrannical government. Sir John Brurey returned to the field at the king's command; and ſilence being enjoined by proclamation, pronounced their ſentence to this effect: That as both the appellant and defendant had honourably appeared in the liſts, their courage was ſufficiently aſcertained; and the king, with the advice of his council and a committee of parliament had agreed, that the duke of Hereford ſhould, within fifteen days, depart the kingdom, and go into exile for the ſpace of ten years, on pain of death; and that Norfolk ſhould be baniſhed for life, becauſe he had not been able to clear himſelf of the crime laid to his charge. This ſentence being pronounced, proclamation was iſſued, that no perſon ſhould preſume to intercede with the king in behalf of either party, on pain of incurring his majeſty's diſpleaſure. A ſentence, at once impolitic and unjuſt; perhaps the moſt arbitrary ever pronounced by a king of England; for both were baniſhed, though one only could be guilty. Nor was the penalty leſs ſevere; the one being for life, and the other for ten years. The duke of Norfolk confeſſed ſome part of the charge, while he was confined at Windſor; but afterwards retracted his confeſſion. As to the duke of Hereford, he retained his uſual moderation. When he waited on the king to take his leave, he behaved with ſuch ſubmiſſion, that Richard, pleaſed with his reſpectful deportment, remitted four years of his exile, and gave him permiſſion to continue a month at Calais, with a retinue of twelve perſons. Both of theſe noblemen alſo obtained paſſes, directed to all ſovereign powers, for a kind reception ſuitable to their rank; and in all writs wherein they were mentioned, the word exile was induſtriouſly avoided, and that of travelling or peregrination, ſubſtituted in its room. On their departure, the duke of Norfolk retired to Germany, where he ſoon after died of grief, and Hereford to France. Richard had empowered Hereford, by letters patent, to enter into immediate poſſeſſion of any eſtates that might fall to him during his abſence, and till his return to poſtpone the homage.

The Scots during theſe tranſactions, were continually offering repeated inſults to the natives of the northern counties, which inſults were either connived at by the court, or terminated by a truce haſtily concluded, and as readily broken. At length a treaty was ſigned under proper guarantees, conſiſting of ſubjects inhabiting the Marches that ſeparated the kingdoms; but nothing towards effecting a ſolid peace was done.

A. D. 1399.

At this time the power of Richard became very extenſive, and roſe to an amazing height; yet reſted on ſo narrow a baſis, that it tottered with its own weight. His deſpotiſm had wrought him to a kind of frenzy of pride and inſolence, and the magnificence of his court was ſupported by repeated acts of oppreſſion and injuſtice. The earls of Wiltſhire, Buſhy, Green, and Bagot, formed his cabinet council, where every thing was digeſted, and came previouſly determined to the other counſellors, who had nothing to do but approve. Theſe minions alſo farmed the royal revenues; and the ordinary funds not anſwering their avaricious purpoſes, exceſſive loans were demanded from every county. At the ſame time new oaths were exacted from the ſheriffs of counties, by which they bound themſelves to obey the king in all his arbitrary and illegal proceedings. In this gloomy ſeaſon of public affairs, died John of Ghent, duke of Lancaſter, caſter, in the fifty-ninth year of his age; and his ſon, the duke of Hereford, in conſequence of his right and letters patent, expected to be put in poſſeſſion of the eſtate and juriſdiction of his father. John of Ghent, or Gaunt, poſſeſſed an aſſemblage of virtues and vices. His addreſs in buſineſs was remarkable; but his lending his name and authority to Richard, in the moſt unjuſtifiable acts of government, does no honour to his virtue. His ambition, however, proved extremely fortunate to England. His alliance with the courts of Spain and Portugal, opened an immenſe channel of trade, which greatly, though almoſt by inſenſible degrees, enriched the nation. With a foreign education, and foreign employments, he always retained an Engliſh heart, and imported into England the rudiments of that learning, for which ſhe is now ſo deſervedly celebrated. His court was magnificent without affectation, and himſelf learned without pedantry. So that had he lived under a prince of more virtue, prudence, and fortitude, he might have proved as uſeful a member of ſociety, as he was an ornament to the nation.

As ſoon as the ſon of this illuſtrious prince left the kingdom, Richard's jealouſy of the wealth and power of that family revived. Being informed that Hereford had entered into a treaty of marriage with the daughter of the duke of Berry, the French king's uncle, he reſolved to prevent the concluſion of an alliance that would ſo much ſtrengthen the duke's intereſt abroad; and for that purpoſe ſent the earl of Saliſbury to Paris, and by the authority of the parliamentary commiſſioners, not only reverſed his letters patent, but ſeized the eſtate of his late father, and declared that his baniſhment ſhould be perpetual. By theſe acts of deſpotic power it appeared, that the laws and liberties of England could afford no ſecurity againſt the efforts of tyranny and oppreſſion. From the number of great nobility who had been baniſhed there was ſcarce a man left in the kingdom able to oppoſe the uſurpations of the king. The duke of York alone might have defended the intereſts of the people; but he loved his eaſe too well to engage in ſuch an undertaking. Richard, therefore, finding himſelf above all reſtraint, paid no regard to the good of the public; and while his miniſters ſuffered the nation to fall into contempt, every means was uſed to extort money from the people, in order to ſupply the king's prodigious expences; among the reſt, accuſations were brought againſt ſuch as had taken arms in favour of the duke of Glouceſter and his adherents; and as their pardon had been lately reverſed, ſeventeen counties were condemned as guilty of treaſon, and the eſtates of all the inhabitants adjudged to the king. In this extremity, the moſt wealthy gentlemen and burgeſſes, in order to avoid the ſeizure of their landed property, were obliged to give blank obligations, which the king cauſed to be filled up with ſuch ſums as he pleaſed to require; and in theſe bonds every perſon was obliged, under great penalties, to ſupport the ſtatutes of the parliament held at Shrewſbury, and all the ſubſequent acts, and thus to throw themſelves entirely on the king's mercy. A government ſo tyrannical, naturally excited the hatred of the nation, and kindled in the hearts of all an ardent deſire to free themſelves from ſuch baſe deſpotiſm.

But the moſt exaſperated at this ſcene of complicated iniquities was young Hereford, now duke of Lancaſter. He was of a bold and enterpriſing ſpirit; he had ſignalized his courage both at home and abroad; he was beloved by the people and adored by his ſoldiers. Always cool, ſedate, and prudent, he was conſidered as the only Engliſh prince that deſerved the public confidence and eſteem. His misfortunes were lamented, and the injuries he had received complained of by all ranks of people. To him therefore they looked up, as the only perſon able to redreſs the abuſes of government, and to free them from its tyranny. In this diſpoſition they ſecretly invited young Henry to return to England, promiſing to aſſiſt him in the recovery of his lawful inheritance, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes. The duke readily embraced the invitation, and promiſed to comply with their requeſt; and a favourable opportunity for fulfilling his engagements now preſented itſelf. Roger Mortimer, Richard's couſin, and lord-lieutenant of Ireland, had been lately killed in a ſkirmiſh with a ſmall party of native Iriſh; and the king, in order to reduce the rebels to ſubjection, and revenge the death of the preſumptive heir to the crown, reſolved to paſs over into that iſland, and head his army in perſon. He accordingly embarked at Briſtol; and, after a ſhort paſſage, landed at Waterford, at the head of two thouſand men in arms, and ten thouſand archers. When the king was ready to embark, ſome ſuſpicions being inſtilled into him of the earl of Northumberland, governor of the northern counties, he ſent that nobleman poſitive orders to join him without delay; and on his excuſing himſelf, on account of his preſence being neceſſary in thoſe parts, the king, without further inquiry, pronounced him a traitor, and ordered all his eſtates to be ſeized; then awarding the regency to his uncle, the duke of York, he ſet ſail, and left his kingdom open to his enemies power.

The duke of Lancaſter had prudently concealed his intentions till the departure of Richard, of which he no ſooner heard than he ſet out for Nantz on the fourth of July, where he hired three ſmall veſſels, and embarked with the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the young earl of Arundel, lord Cobham, Sir Thomas Erpington, Sir Thomas Ramſtone, and a retinue of about fourſcore perſons; and, after a ſpeedy paſſage, landing at Ravenſpur in Yorkſhire, he was joined by the earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, the lords Willougby, Roſs, Darcy, Beaumont, and ſeveral gentlemen of diſtinction, attended by a numerous body of vaſſals and adherents; and having publiſhed a manifeſto, in which he aſſerted that he had taken arms only to obtain ſatisfaction for the injuſtice with which he had been treated, it had ſuch an effect, that the people flocked in crowds to join him, ſo that in a few days he had an army of ſixty thouſand men. The regent was in no condition to oppoſe ſo powerful a body of malcontents, had he been a real friend to the tyrant. He had long beheld, with ſecret diſguſt, the injuries done to his country in general, and to his nephew the duke of Lancaſter in particular; but his own indolence, and the arbitrary diſpoſitions of the king, had hitherto prevented his complaining. He had, however, too much honour to betray his truſt on this occaſion, though not diſpleaſed at his inability. He appointed a general rendezvous at St. Alban's, and found the number of his forces amounted to forty thouſand; but he ſoon perceived, not a man would draw his ſword againſt the duke of Lancaſter (a caution this to all tyrants not to place a vain-confidence in their army) who, they openly affirmed, had been unjuſtly baniſhed, and deprived of his lawful inheritance. Nor could they bear the preſence of the earls of Buſhy, Green, and Bagot, who farmed the revenues, and were univerſally deteſted as monſters of iniquity and oppreſſion, and who had perverted the king by their pernicious counſel. The duke of York, therefore, finding it impoſſible to ſtem the torrent of Henry's popularity, broke his ſtaff of office, and laid aſide all oppoſition. In the mean time the march of the duke of Lancaſter's army to London, was rather triumphal than hoſtile. Every tongue was buſied in his praiſe, every purſe was open to his wants, every hand employed in his defence. His affability, his graceful modeſty, his winning addreſs, his moderate pretenſions, and above all his former ſufferings, ſpoke irreſiſtibly in his favour. The duke of York now declared, that he would ſecond his nephew, in his juſt requeſt of recovering his legal patrimony. The two armies embraced each other, and Henry was joyfully received by the citizens of London, as their guardian and deliverer. Having ſecured the capital in his intereſt, he directed his march to Briſtol, which after a feint reſiſtance, was obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion. The earl of Wiltſhire, Sir John Buſhy, and Sir Henry Green, who had taken refuge there, were led out to immediate execution, at the people's importunate requeſt.

No ſooner had the king received intelligence of this inſurrection, than he haſtened over from Ireland, and landed at Milford-Haven with a body of twenty thouſand men. When arrived at Carmarthen, he received a particular detail of Lancaſter's amazing progreſs, the death of his favourites, the ſurrender of his forts, the revolts of his cities, and the defection of his ſubjects. His ſoldiers alſo, like the reſt of their comrades, were ſo ſtrongly infected with the prevalent opinion in favour of the duke of Lancaſter, that his army melted away like ſnow before the ſun; and Richard ſoon perceived he was in no condition to meet the enemy. Diſtracted with a variety of thoughts, he knew not which way to turn, or what courſe to purſue. Wavering and irreſolute, he knew not whom to truſt, or whom to fear. At length he determined to take refuge in Wales. Accordingly he retired with the dukes of Exeter and Surrey, the biſhop of Carliſle, and a few other attendants, to Conway-Caſtle; propoſing to take the firſt opportunity of eſcaping to Ireland or France, and there wait for ſome favourable criſis of recovering his crown, which he was now incapable of defending. Finding himſelf in this forlorn condition, in a place he had choſen for his ſanctuary, without the leaſt proſpect of being able to defend himſelf, he was afraid that if he attempted to eſcape he ſhould fall into the hands of the enraged populace, who gave him too many proofs of their hatred. In this extremity, he reſolved to throw himſelf upon the generoſity of his enemy, and ſent the duke of Exeter about an accommodation, and the duke of Surrey obtained leave to accompany him in this embaſſy, which proved very unfortunate, for they were both detained as priſoners at Cheſter. In this interval the king was deſerted by Sir Thomas Piercy, lord ſteward of his houſehold, who reſigned his office, and declared his reſolution to join the duke of Lancaſter. Henry apprehenſive that Richard meditated an eſcape, conſulted with the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the earl of Northumberland, when it was agreed, that the latter ſhould be ſent to Conway-Caſtle, with propoſals to amuſe the king, and if poſſible, perſuade him to put his perſon into the duke's hands. Northumberland advanced with a ſelect number of troops to Conway river, whence he ſent a herald to Richard, deſiring a ſafe conduct for himſelf only; which being granted, he went to the caſtle, and being admitted into the king's preſence, demanded, in the name of Henry, that a parliament might be immediately ſummoned, to reverſe his ſentence of baniſhment, and reſtore him to the poſſeſſion of his eſtate; that the dukes of Surrey and Exeter, the earl of Saliſbury, and biſhop of Carliſle, ſhould be brought to trial, together with all thoſe who had been concerned in the death of the duke of Glouceſter. Richard, who owned that he was both unworthy and weary of royalty, agreed to this propoſal, yet not without ſigns of diſtruſt. But the earl declared, in the name of his principal, that he ſhould be reſtored to all the prerogatives of royal dignity; that Henry had ſworn to fulfil the articles with the utmoſt punctuality, and that he himſelf was ready to take the ſame oath. The king was diffident of the ſincerity of this ambaſſador, yet was perſuaded to truſt him upon his oath, which he took in the moſt ſolemn manner. Richard then ordered him to ride on before, and declared his intention of following him to Flint-Caſtle, where he ſhould be nearer the duke, to treat about an accommodation. Soon after his arrival, he received a meſſage by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the earl of Rutland, and lord Thomas Piercy, that the duke was coming from Cheſter to wait upon his majeſty. Henry came to him the next day, and was received by the king with the ſalutation of "Couſin of Lancaſter, you are welcome." The duke bowing three times to the ground, replied, "My lord the king, I am come ſooner than you appointed, becauſe, according to the general voice of your people, you have governed for this one and twenty years with great rigour and imprudence, ſo that they cannot but diſapprove your conduct; but if it pleaſe God, I will help you to govern them better for the future." To which the king only replied, "Fair Couſin, ſince it pleaſes you it pleaſes us likewiſe." In a few days after the duke ſet out with his royal captive for London, who, in the courſe of his journey, had the mortification to hear the very dregs of the people add inſults to his miſery, and heap curſes on his government. Henry made his entrance into London amidſt the acclamations of the people, who cried out, "Long live Henry, the noble duke of Lancaſter, our worthy friend and glorious deliverer." The duke took up his lodgings in the houſe of the knights of St. John in the ſuburbs, while Richard was conveyed to the Tower.

To prevent loſs of time, a parliament was ſummoned to meet at Weſtminſter. In a conference Henry held with his friends, previous to their aſſembling, on the manner how they ſhould proceed, it was reſolved to place him on the throne; but the manner in which this might be effected was the ſource of various opinions. Some were for his taking poſſeſſion upon Richard's reſigning the crown. Others thought the reſignation too conſtrained to be the foundation of any right, eſpecially as a nearer heir than Henry being then alive. This was Edmund Mortimer, earl of Marche, the ſon of Roger, who had been declared Richard's preſumtive ſucceſſor, he being deſcended from Lionel, duke of Clarence, the third ſon of Edward III. whereas Henry was the ſon of John, Lionel's younger brother, and thus the duke of Lancaſter could claim no right to the crown by Richard's reſignation. It was therefore concluded, that Richard ſhould be formally depoſed by parliament, and the duke elected by the ſame authority. This opinion was not without its difficulties, as it aſcribed to the parliament a power to diſpoſe of the crown, contrary to the laws and cuſtoms, to the prejudice of the next heir, who might have done nothing to weaken his title. After many debates, the duke of York propoſed to unite theſe ſeveral opinions by three ways: that Richard ſhould, in the firſt place, be obliged to reſign the crown; that the parliament ſhould immediately proceed to depoſe him; and that then, the crown being declared vacant, the ſame parliament ſhould in conſideration of the duke of Lancaſter's great ſervices, adjudge to him the throne, by their ſupreme authority. This opinion was unanimouſly approved; but the very expedient which was then thought requiſite to reſtore the peace of the kingdom, proved a ſource of dreadful calamities, in which the nation was afterwards involved. For the deſcendants of the duke of York, who propoſed this opinion, found it to their intereſt to maintain, with fire and ſword, that this parliament had exceeded their power, in thus transferring the crown to the duke of Lancaſter. Agreeable to theſe reſolutions, Henry, duke of Lancaſter repaired to the Tower, attended by a great number of lords, on the 29th of September, the day before the opening of parliament, when Richard, in the preſence of theſe nobles, delivered up the crown and ſceptre, with the other enſigns of royalty; and even by an inſtrument ſigned with his own hand, confeſſed himſelf unworthy and unfit to govern any longer, and that he freed his ſubjects from their oaths of fealty, homage, and obedience. After this ceremony was finiſhed, he deſired the archbiſhop of York, and biſhop of Hereford, to acquaint the eſtates of the realm, that he wiſhed his couſin Lancaſter might be choſen his ſucceſſor: at the ſame time he drew his ſignet ring from his finger, and delivered it to the duke, as his teſtimony of good-will, which he deſired the parliament ſhould be made acquainted with.

The day after, the two biſhops declared the king's meſſage, and produced the inſtrument of reſignation, which being read in Latin and Engliſh, was admitted by the unanimous conſent of both houſes; but as this, according to the meaſures before concerted, did not appear ſufficient, a charge of thirty-three articles againſt the king, was preſented to the aſſembly. Theſe articles being afterwards drawn up, contained the reaſons of his depoſition, and were received with general approbation. The only perſon who offered to ſpeak in defence of Richard, was the biſhop of Carliſle, who with great ſtrength of judgment pointed out the injuſtice of the charge; adding, that however the nation might act right in depoſing the miſguided Richard, no reaſon could be offered for taking the crown from his lawful ſucceſſor, who was confeſſedly innocent: but this ſpeech was ſo far from producing the deſired effect, that it brought down upon the biſhop the diſpleaſure of the whole aſſembly, by whoſe order he was immediately taken into cuſtody, and ſent priſoner to the abbey of St. Alban's. The prince being thus depoſed, and the throne declared vacant, Henry, duke of Lancaſter, after croſſing himſelf on the forehead, claimed the crown: building his pretenſions on his being deſcended from Henry III. and the right he received from God, by the aſſiſtance of his relations and friends, for the recovery of the realm of England, which was upon the brink of deſtruction. The parliament took care not to examine his claim too cloſely, and therefore, without any regard to the earl of Marche, it was decreed, that Henry, duke of Lancaſter, ſhould be proclaimed king of England and France, and lord of Ireland.

The parliament having been diſſolved by the depoſition of Richard, it was neceſſary to ſummon a new one; and in ſix days after, Henry, without any new election, called together the ſame members; and this aſſembly was employed in reverſing every thing done by the oppoſite party. All the acts which had paſſed in the parliament where Glouceſter prevailed, and which had been abrogated by Richard, were again eſtabliſhed: all thoſe of the laſt parliament of Richard, though confirmed by a papal bull, were abrogated. The anſwers of the judges, which one parliament had annulled, but which had been approved by a new parliament, and new judges, were here a ſecond time condemned: and the peers who had received higher titles for accuſing Glouceſter, Arundel, and Warwick, were ſtripped of their new honours. Soon after theſe tranſactions, the earl of Northumberland made a motion in the houſe of peers, relating to the depoſed monarch, and aſked, that ſince Henry was reſolved to ſpare his life, what advice they would give for his future treatment, when the lords replied unanimouſly, that he ſhould be confined in ſome ſecret place, under a ſecure guard, and deprived of all commerce with his friends or partizans; on which he was removed to Pontefract-Caſtle from the Tower.

Though variouſly related, the manner of Richard's death is one of thoſe ſecrets, which the eye of the moſt penetrating and ſagacious hiſtorian has not been able to diſcover. It has been the prevailing opinion, that Sir Piers Exton and eight of his guards fell upon him, when the king wreſting a pole axe from one of them, defended himſelf with ſuch bravery, that he laid four of them dead at his feet; on which Exton coming behind him, and getting up on a chair, diſcharged ſuch a blow on his head, as laid him dead at his feet. Others ſay he was ſtarved to death, and that he had lived a fortnight without food, before he reached the end of his miſeries. Theſe being mere ſuppoſitions, may we not ſuppoſe in our turn, that vexation, grief, cloſe confinement, inſults, and a manner of living the reverſe of voluptuouſneſs, to which he had been accuſtomed, were the inſtruments that brought this youthful monarch to an untimely end; and this conjecture is conſiſtent with the authentic account we have of his body being brought to London, and expoſed in St. Paul's cathedral to the eyes and inſpection of every obſerver, and that no marks of violence were found upon it. Thus much we may with truth affirm, Richard II. ſon of the brave Edward, the Black Prince, and grandſon to Edward III. was cut off by a ſudden ſtroke of death, which his own weak conduct occaſioned, in the flower of his youth, being only in the twenty-fourth year of his age, and the twenty-third of his reign; and was the thirtieth king of England from Egbert I. He left no poſterity, either legitimate or illegitimate, though he was twice married; firſt to Anne of Luxemburgh, ſiſter to the emperor Winceſlaus; and afterwards to Iſabella of France, daughter of Charles VI. but his marriage was never conſummated with this laſt princeſs.

There are few particulars in this period, like thoſe preceding it, relative to learning, or the arts, which are adapted to excite our curioſity or our admiration. It is indeed no wonder that a proud, warlike, and ignorant nobility, encouraged only thoſe arts, which proclaimed their dignity, or contributed to their ſecurity. They were magnificent without taſte, and pompous without elegance. Rich plate, even to the enamelling on gold, rich ſtuffs, and curious armour, were carried to exceſs, while their chairs were mere pedeſtals, their clothes incumbrances; and they knew no uſe of ſteel, but as it ſerved for ſafety or deſtruction. Their houſes (for there was no medium between caſtles and houſes) implied the dangers, not the ſweets of ſociety; and whenever peace left them at leiſure to think of modes, they ſeemed to imagine that faſhion conſiſted in disfiguring the human body, inſtead of diſplaying its graces. While the men wore ſhoes ſo long and pointed, that they were forced to ſupport the points by chains from their middle; the ladies erected ſuch pyramids on their heads, that the face became the centre of the body. The ſciences alſo were abſorbed in the myſteries of theology; and learning chiefly confined to the clergy, who generally employed their talents in uſeleſs, and often ridiculous ſpeculations. Some indeed ſtudied phyſic, but in ſo ſtrange and imperfect a manner, that every epidemical diſtemper, which reſiſted their injudicious method of practice, became a real plague, and ſwept away conſiderable numbers.

There were ſome diſcoveries however made, and ſome extraordinary characters flouriſhed, during this period. It ſometimes happens that in the darkeſt nights of ignorance and error, a bright ſtar of uncommon luſtre darts the beams of genius amidſt the horrid gloom. Roger Bacon was a genius of this kind, and born for the inſtruction of the human ſpecies; but the age in which he lived knew not his merit. He was a Franciſcan friar at Oxford, and ſtiled Doctor mirabilis, for his great learning, and by the common people, the Conjuror, on account of his inventions. He diſcovered the teleſcope, burning glaſs, camera obſcura, gunpowder, the tranſmutation of metals, and ſeveral other particulars, known only to himſelf. Future times, and future artiſts, have claimed the diſcoveries made by Bacon. A greater genius in mechanics had not then aroſe ſince the days of Archimedes. But all his merit could not protect him againſt the barbarous opinions of the age in which he lived. He was perſecuted by an enthuſiaſtic clergy, at a time when philoſophy had made leſs progreſs than any other branch of learning, and when geometry and aſtronomy were branded with the odious ſtigma of necromancy. He died on the eleventh of June, 1292.

In the year 1237, water was firſt conveyed into the city of London by means of leaden pipes, from ſprings in the manor of Tyburn; but the infant artiſts of that age were forty-eight years in completing that uſeful work; the great conduit in Cheapſide, built of ſtone, and furniſhed with ciſterns, lined with lead, not being finiſhed till the year 1285.

The noble diſcovery of the mariner's compaſs was made about the year 1302; but the perſon to whom we owe that valuable acquiſition is not certainly known: but though the Engliſh lay no claim to the diſcovery, they were inventors of the box in which the magnetical needle is ſuſpended, a contrivance whereby it is always kept in an horizontal poſition.

The art of weaving received very conſiderable improvements during this period, by the great encouragement given to our woollen and linen manufactures by Edward III. and the two ſucceeding reigns. The art of painting alſo began to be eſteemed, which was chiefly performed on board or glaſs.

In the year 1344, the firſt regular gold coins were ſtruck in the kingdom, of three different ſorts; one of ſix ſhillings value; a ſecond of three ſhillings; and a third of eighteen pence. About the ſame time alſo the art of gauging was invented. The firſt mention of clocks in England, was in the year 1368, though they had been invented in the ninth century by Pacificus, archdeacon of Verona.

The moſt remarkable for learning, beſides a few hiſtorians who flouriſhed in this period, were John Wickliffe, and William of Wickham.

Wickliffe may be juſtly regarded as the father of the reformation, he being the firſt in Europe, who ventured to bring religion to the teſt of ſcripture, and eccleſiaſtical authority. The auſterity of his life, and the ſanctity of his manners, added great weight to his doctrine. He was indefatigable in his labours, and generally went about barefooted in the habit of a pilgrim; but we have already had occaſion to ſpeak of him in the courſe of this reign.

William of Wickham was conſidered as one of the moſt learned perſons of the age; and it appears that his great and uſeful talents, eſpecially his ſkill in architecture, recommended him to the favour of Edward III. He perſuaded that prince to pull down a great part of Windſor-caſtle, and rebuild it from his plan in that plain magnificence in which it now appears. He alſo drew the plan, and ſuperintended the building of Queenborough-caſtle. He was afterwards made ſecreta privy ſeal, and enjoyed other ac ments, before he was promoted to cheſter. He died on the twenty-ſev tember, 1404.

The moſt noted hiſtorians of this peri
Thomas Wikes. His hiſtory begins at queſt, and ends with the death of Edward was a canon regular of Oſney, near Oxford, the part of his work which relates to the ba wars, is clear and explicit. His hiſtory was pu liſhed by Dr. Gale, in his Hiſt. Angl. vol. 2.

John Brompton, abbot of Joreval, in Yorkſhire, wrote a chronicle of the principal tranſactions of England. It was publiſhed among the Decem Scriptores. It begins with the arrival of St. Auguſtine the monk, and ends with the death of Richard I.

Matthew, a Benedictine monk of Weſtminſter, finiſhed his hiſtory in the year 1307, and died ſoon after. But the work has been continued by ſeveral hands, eſpecially by Adam Merimath, a canon regular of St Paul's, who devoted the latter part of his time to the ſtudy of Engliſh hiſtory.

Character of Richard II.

In every quality the reverſe of his father, was a weak, vain, tyrannical, contemptible prince, and agreeable to his own confeſſion, altogether unqualified for managing the reins of empire. He was violent in his temper; fond of oſtentation, pomp, idle ſhew, and magnificence; devoted to favourites, who made him a dupe to their flattery; addicted to pleaſure, which made him a tyrant to his people; gratifications and paſſions the moſt inconſiſtent with prudent œconomy, and conſequently dangerous in a limited and mixed government. He ſeems to have preferred, on all occaſions, his own eaſe to the happineſs and welfare of the nation. Inſtead of diſplaying a cordial affection for his people, he ſeemed to glory in oppreſſing them; nay even proſtituted the very legiſlature to gratify his preſumptuous arrogance. He wanted the diſcernment neceſſary to enable him to chuſe a good miniſtry, and the reſolution to oppoſe the meaſures of his evil counſellors, when they happened to claſh with his own opinion: yet big with the idea of ſovereignty, he forgot that he was a man; ſunk in loathſome ſenſuality, he forgot that he was a king. Indeed his erroneous conduct ſeems to have flowed from the general ſource of moral evil, that of inattention to the grand deſign of rational exiſtence, which is to promote the happineſs of our fellow creatures. When Richard found means to gain the commons to his intereſt, and to contract a formidable alliance with France, prerogative weighed down the conſtitution. But by extending his power to the utmoſt boundaries of arbitrary ſway, the commons again deſerted him, and he became the victim of his own folly. Richard is a memorable inſtance of the power of habit over the human mind; and his hard fate ſpeaks to the living; and bids them remember it as an eternal warning, to prefer public good to private humour; while at the ſame time it reminds them, that they are only ſtewards in the hand of God; and that however they may plume themſelves upon the ſtratagems of refined policy, one truth in ſpite of human pride will remain eternally the ſame, namely: That virtue alone is true nobility.

CHAP. I.

HENRY IV.

Henry, duke of Lancaſter, ſurnamed Bolingbroke, is crowned king of England; notwithſtanding Mortimer, earl of Marche, had a preferable title—His reign continually diſturbed by inſurrections, which he finds means, in the end, to ſuppreſs—Perſecution againſt the Lollards, in which William Sawtree is burned for hereſy, being the firſt perſon who ſuffered on account of religion—Firſt inſurrection in England by the earl of Kent and others—Second, in Wales by Owen Glendour—Third, in England by the earl of Northumberland—The battle of Shrewſbury—The archbiſhop of York and earl of Nottingham take arms—The earl of Northumberland and lord Bardolf defeated and ſlain—War with France and Scotland: not diſtinguiſhed by any conſiderable actions—James, ſon of Robert III. king of Scotland, ſeized and detained in captivity by Henry, who gives him an excellent education—Diſſolute life of the prince of Wales—Death, family, and character of Henry IV.

A. D. 1399. HENRY, ſurnamed Bolingbroke, from the place of his birth, immediately after his being proclaimed, aſſumed the reins of government. He was the ſon of John of Ghent or Gaunt, late duke of Lancaſter, who was third ſon of Edward III. But Mortimer, earl of Marche, deſcended from Lionel, duke of Clarence, ſecond ſon of Edward III. had a preferable title. Henry was crowned with the uſual formalities, on the thirteenth of October, being then thirty years of age. He was anointed with a kind of oil, pretended to be brought by the Bleſſed Virgin to Thomas Becket while in France. This precious oil was contained in a phial, which fell into the hands of a hermit, who preſented it to Henry duke of Lancaſter, the grandſon of Henry III. at the ſame time propheſying, that the kings who ſhould be anointed with it, would become true champions for the church. The duke of Lancaſter afterwards gave it to Edward the Black Prince, who reſolved to be anointed with it; but after his death the phial, which had on the top an eagle of gold ſet with diamonds, was laid up among the jewels, without being minded, till it fell into Henry's hands; but the reign of this prince and ſeveral of his ſucceſſors, who were anointed with this oil, contradict the hermit's prophecy. The uſurpation of Henry was ſo palpable, and the right of Edmund Mortimer, earl of Marche, ſo clear, that all the courage, capacity, and diſcernment of the new monarch, were neceſſary to prevent the diſorders that threatened the commencement of his reign; but the friends of young Mortimer, who was only ſeven years of age, conſidering that it would be equally dangerous and fruitleſs to maintain his juſt rights to the crown, took him to his eſtate at Wigmore, near the borders of Wales, from whence he was afterwards removed by Henry to Windſor-caſtle, where he and his younger brother were detained in an honourable cuſtody, the king having reaſon to apprehend, that when that nobleman arrived at man's eſtate, he would attract the reſpect of the people, and make them reflect on the injuſtice which had been uſed to exclude him from the throne.

Henry's firſt parliament, which aſſembled on Monday after Michaelmas, gave him an opportunity of perceiving the dangers to which his high ſtation expoſed him. The nobles were agitated with ſuch violent animoſities, that forty of the peers threw their gauntlets on the floor, and mutually challenged each other, while the epithets lyar and traitor reſounded from every quarter; yet the king had influence ſufficient to prevent all theſe combats, though he was unable to reconcile them to each other. The city of London, and the adjacent counties, were in general well affected to the preſent government; but Wales with its Marches, where the intereſt of Mortimer lay, and which had always been diſtinguiſhed by Richard, wanted only an opportunity of breaking out into rebellion. The northern counties had not appeared very ſanguine in the late revolution, and all they had done to favour it was entirely owing to the great intereſt of the Piercy family, ſo that the continuance of the people's loyalty, depended almoſt wholly on that of the earl of Northumberland. Nor had the king any reaſon to depend upon the fidelity of the clergy, with whom he was not a favourite. Both he and his father had been ſtrongly ſuſpected of favouring Wickliffe's doctrine, and the king, when duke of Lancaſter, had been heard to ſay, that in England the revenues of the barons were too ſmall, and thoſe of the church too great. The abbot of Weſtminſter, a bold intriguing prieſt, one who had always been foremoſt in the proceedings of both parties, embraced this opportunity of forming a ſecret cabal againſt the government. The earls of Kent, Rutland, and Huntingdon, with lord Spencer, who were now degraded from the titles of Surry, Albermarle, Exeter, and Glouceſter, conferred on them by Richard, together with the biſhop of Carliſle, lord Lumley, Sir Thomas Blount, and ſeveral other perſons of fortune, joined in the conſpiracy, and met frequently in the abbey of Weſtminſter, where, in a ſecret room, they concerted their dangerous deſigns which ſoon after broke out into action.

A. D. 1400. Henry, finding himſelf preſſed on every ſide with ſurrounding difficulties, had recourſe to every prudent meaſure, that might have the leaſt tendency to remove them. In order to pay his court to the clergy, he reſolved to uſe his endeavours to ſuppreſs the heretical Lollards. Hitherto there had been no penal laws enacted againſt hereſy; but the king now engaged the parliament to ordain, that when any heretic, who relapſed, or refuſed to abjure his opinions, was delivered over by the biſhop or his commiſſaries to the ſecular arm, the civil magiſtrate ſhould commit him publicly to the flames. This infernal weapon being put into the hands of the clergy, did not long remain unemployed. William Sawtree, rector of St. Oſithes in London, being condemned by the convocation of Canterbury, his ſentence was ratified by the houſe of peers. Whereupon Henry iſſued his writ for execution, and he was puniſhed for ſuppoſed erroneous opinions, by being committed to the flames. This was the firſt man who ſuffered death in England, for the ſake of his religion.

The KINGS of ENGLAND, (with their Coats of Arms) from the Earlieſt Period to the Preſent Time.

While this perſecution was carried on againſt the followers of Wickliffe, a peſtilence raged in the northern counties of England; and the Scots, according to their uſual cuſtom, in times of public calamity, invaded the northern counties of England. They beſieged and took the caſtle of Werk, commanded by Sir Thomas Grey, who was then attending his duty in parliament. Yet this inſult did not provoke Henry to abandon his cautious conduct, in watching narrowly the motions of his domeſtic enemies. The effects of the abbots conſpiracy began now to appear. When their ſcheme was ripe for execution, the principal actors prevailed on one Maudlin, who had been chaplain to Richard, and who greatly reſembled him in features, to perſonate that monarch. They imagined it would not be difficult to ſurpriſe the king, who was then in a bad ſtate of health at Windſor, attended by a few of his nobility. It was therefore agreed, in order to aſſemble a ſufficient number of perſons without ſuſpicion, to appoint a tournament to be held at Oxford. Henry was to be invited. If he accepted the invitation, they ſuppoſed it would be very eaſy to ſeize his perſon; if he refuſed it, they were to march ſecretly to Windſor-caſtle, into which they flattered themſelves with obtaining an eaſy admittance. Every particular of this infamous plot was conducted with the utmoſt precaution, and on the point of being carried into execution, when Henry was informed by Rutland, one of the aſſociates, of his danger, and ſuddenly returned to London; ſo that the conſpirators who arrived at Windſor with five hundred horſe, had the mortification to find they were betrayed, and their plot defeated. The next day Henry, at the head of twenty thouſand men, appeared at Kingſton upon Thames; on which the rebellious lords, being unable to reſiſt him, diſperſed into their ſeveral counties, in order to raiſe their followers, when they met with what was worſe than diſappointment; for the king's adherents having every where oppoſed their progreſs, the earls of Kent and Saliſbury were taken priſoners by the citizens of Cirenceſter, and according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, inſtantly beheaded by the mayor's orders. Spencer and Lumley were treated by the citizens of Briſtol in the ſame manner. The earl of Huntingdon, Sir Thomas Blount, with ſeveral others of the conſpirators ſuffered the ſame juſt puniſhment, by orders from Henry. When the quarters of theſe miſjudging men were brought to London, it is ſaid, that eighteen biſhops, and thirty-two mitred abbots, joining the populace, went with the moſt indecent marks of exultation to meet them. The earl of Rutland carried on a pole the head of his brother-in-law, the lord Spencer; and as a teſtimony of his loyalty, preſented it to Henry; a ſpectacle which muſt have been extremely ſhocking to all who were not deſtitute of every ſentiment of humanity. This treacherous earl, who thus diſhonoured his birth, and who became ſoon after, by the death of his father, duke of York, had been concerned in the murder of his own uncle, the duke of Glouceſter; had then deſerted Richard who truſted him; had conſpired againſt the life of the preſent king; had betrayed thoſe whom he had ſeduced; now, by this proof of inhumanity, publickly proclaimed his own baſeneſs.

A. D. 1401. The unſettled ſtate of the Engliſh government encouraged Owen Glendour, a deſcendant of the ancient prince of Wales, and obnoxious to the preſent ruling power, on account of his attachment to the late king, to ſet up his ſtandard in oppoſition to Henry. His mind was that of a hero, and his heart that of a patriot, ready to burſt with the indignation at the miſeries of his country. His genius was enterprizing, his conduct firm but cautious. Owen contented himſelf at firſt with attacking the eſtates of the earl of Ruthyn. He was always ſucceſsful in theſe ſkirmiſhes, and at laſt took that nobleman priſoner; nor would he releaſe him but on condition of his marrying his daughter. This alliance rendered Owen ſtill more illuſtrious in the eyes of the Welch, who now conſidered him as born to be the deliverer of his country. The earl of Marche, who had armed his followers in favour of Henry, was defeated and taken priſoner. He was ſuffered to remain in captivity; nor would the king, notwithſtanding his loyalty, permit the earl of Northumberland to ranſom him, though he owed his crown to the aſſiſtance of that powerful nobleman. But notwithſtanding his indifference for his couſin, Henry ordered all his forces to advance to the borders of Wales. Owen, who was in no condition to oppoſe a royal army, commanded by the ableſt and moſt fortunate prince of the age, in the open field, purſued that conduct which true policy dictated, and his anceſtors had found ſucceſsful. He retired behind Snowdon-Hills, and left the Engliſh monarch, in a ſevere ſeaſon, to wreak his vengeance on an already deſolate country. By this prudent ſtep, Henry was compelled to return to England, without having effected any thing of conſequence againſt the enemy. When the ſeaſon permitted, he again entered Wales; but the A. D. 1402. very elements fought againſt him, and nature ſeemed to have abandoned her ordinary courſe in favour of Owen. Such dreadful ſtorms aroſe, that the common people in that age of ignorance believed they were raiſed by the magic of Glendour, whoſe activity and ſucceſs, and above all his retirement into parts almoſt inacceſſible, made them conſider him as ſomething more than human. Henry was unable to regain any part of the vaſt plunder taken from the Engliſh, and forced to abandon an expedition, in which his diſappointment was heightened by the great hopes he had entertained of ſucceſs.

In the mean time the Scots tempted by the changes in the government were not inactive. Archibald, earl of Douglas, at the head of twelve thouſand men, and attended by many of the principal nobility of Scotland, made an irruption into England, carrying fire and ſword through the northern counties. On his return, he found his retreat cut off by the Piercy's, and both parties prepared for a general engagement. The Scots were drawn up upon the declivity of Halidown-hill, but to great diſadvantage; for riſing one above another they preſented to the Engliſh archers a very extended front, ſo that the arrows of the latter did much greater execution than thoſe of the former. Douglas, perceiving this advantage, endeavoured to repair it, by coming down the hill upon the Engliſh, ſword in hand. The archers, fearing to be broke, at firſt gave way, but again cloſing their ranks, plied the Scots ſo warmly with their arrows, that a total rout enſued. The gallant but unfortunate Douglas, ſeverely wounded, and fainting with the loſs of blood, was taken on the field of battle, together with the earls of Fife, Murray, Angus, and Orkney; the lords Montgomery, Erſkine, and Graham, beſides eighty knights, and a great number of ſoldiers. The remainder of the Scottiſh army that fled were purſued by the Engliſh archers, who made a dreadful ſlaughter: part were puſhed into the river Tyne, where many of them periſhed, and part obliged to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war. Among the ſlain of the Scottiſh army were Sir John Swinton, Sir Adam Gordon, Sir John Levingſton, Sir Alexander Ramſay, twenty-three knights, and near ten thouſand common ſoldiers: while the loſs of the Engliſh was too inconſiderable to be mentioned.

Henry no ſooner received intelligence of this victory, than he wrote A. D. 1403. a letter of congratulation to the earl of Northumberland and his ſon, full of the warmeſt expreſſions of gratitude; but, at the ſame time ſent them a peremptory order, enjoining them not to ranſom any of their priſoners. This was regarded as an arbitrary ſtretch of power; all priſoners being, by the laws of war which then prevailed, the ſole property of the victors. The earl expoſtulated with Henry on the illegality of this reſtriction, but in ſuch preſumptive terms, that the king rebuked his freedom, and deſired him to obſerve the deference due to his ſacred perſon. This reprimand fired the choleric ſpirit of the earl of Northumberland, who, in the heat of paſſion, conceived it to be an unpardonable indignity. Both father and ſon conſidered themſelves as the principal ſupporters of Henry's throne, and vainly imagined it would be as eaſy to deprive him of the crown, as it was to place it on his head. Northumberland's brother, Thomas Piercy, earl of Worceſter, not only eſpouſed their quarrel, but concerted a plan of revenge, which had well nigh deprived Bolingbroke of his royalty. Other cauſes alſo contributed to excite his reſentment. He had been made vice-chamberlain and admiral by Richard; he loved the perſon of his old maſter and benefactor while living; retained a grateful ſenſe of his benefits after his death; and could not but deteſt Henry as the uſurper of his crown. He therefore readily joined his brother, to drive from his throne a perſon, who, in his opinion, had no title to it. With this rebellious intent, he entered into a correſpondence with Glendour; releaſed earl Douglas without ranſom, formed a ſtrict alliance with this martial nobleman; aſſembled his vaſſals from all quarters; and ſo unlimited was his authority, that the very ſame men whom he had lately led againſt Richard, were now ready to repair to his ſtandard, in oppoſition to Henry. When this rebellion was ready to break out into action, Northumberland remained at Berwick, on pretence of being indiſpoſed; but in reality, to aſſemble another body of troops, with which he might join the confederates in caſe they proved ſucceſsful in their firſt attempt; or, that he might be at hand to retire into Scotland, provided the enterprize ſhould miſcarry, and he himſelf be conſidered by the king as an accomplice of the rebels. An army being aſſembled, the chief command devolved on young Hotſpur Piercy, who led his forces to Shrewſbury, in order to join the troops under Glendour. Before they took the field, Piercy publiſhed a manifeſto, in which he renounced his allegiance to Henry, and ſet that prince at defiance; and in the name of his father and uncle, repreſented all the grievances of which the nation had reaſon to complain, and which he took upon himſelf to redreſs. He accuſed Henry of perjury; becauſe, ſoon after his landing at Ravenſpur, he had ſworn upon the goſpels, in preſence of the earl of Northumberland, that his ſole intention was that of recovering poſſeſſion of his duchy, and that he would ever remain a faithful ſubject to king Richard. He aggravated his guilt, in firſt dethroning, and then impriſoning that prince; and in uſurping upon the title of the houſe of Mortimer, to whom the crown juſtly belonged, both by lineal deſcent, and the declaration of parliament. He complained loudly of the cruelty exerciſed againſt the earl of Marche, who was ſuffered to remain a captive in the hands of the enemy; nor were any of his friends permitted to treat for his ranſom. He alſo accuſed the king of having ruled with a tyrannic ſway, rendering himſelf inacceſſible to all but the clergy, ſo that the greateſt nobleman in the kingdom could not be admitted to his preſence, unleſs introduced by a biſhop, and finally, he charged him with laying upon the nation a heavy burden of taxes, after having ſworn, that, without the utmoſt neceſſity, he would never lay any impoſitions on his people; and that he had converted to his own private uſe, the ſubſidies granted for public ſervices. Henry publiſhed an anſwer to this manifeſto, in which he endeavoured to exculpate himſelf from all the crimes laid to his charge. He accuſed the Piercys, in his turn, of having excited an unnatural rebellion againſt their lawful ſovereign; one who had, on all occaſions, diſtinguiſhed them from the reſt of his ſubjects, by every act of munificence and friendſhip that a prince could beſtow upon his moſt favourite counſellors. But Henry was not to learn that remonſtrances were of little uſe on the preſent occaſion; and fortunately for him, he had, at that time, a good body of forces, which had been levied for another expedition againſt the Welch. With theſe he proceeded as far as Burton upon Trent, where he received intelligence, that Worceſter and his nephew had marched towards the frontiers of Wales; on which the earl of Dunbar prevailed on him to alter his rout, and, if poſſible, prevent their joining. He accordingly wheeled about, and directed his march towards Shropſhire; and this motion was of infinite advantage; for Glendour had advanced as far as Oſweſtry, with a body of twelve thouſand men, in order to join Piercy, who was already reinforced by the people of Cheſhire, the conſtant adherents of Richard in all his diſtreſſes. The Piercys had given out that the late king was alive; to give credit to which report, they had dreſſed Maudlin in royal robes, and carried him about to different parts of the kingdom, pretending he was Richard, who had eſcaped out of priſon; and this ſtratagem induced many to join their banners. The rebels had marched to Shrewſbury, when the royal army unexpectedly appeared in ſight; upon which Hotſpur, abandoning the ſiege, withdrew his forces to Hartlefield, where he reſolved to make a ſtand, and hazard an engagement; while the bravery of the two leaders, and the equality of the two armies, each of which amounted to about twelve thouſand men, rendered the iſſue of the combat extremely doubtful. The king, with the aſſiſtance of the earl of Dunbar, and his ſon Henry, made an excellent diſpoſition of his troops; and being perſuaded the whole force of the battle would be directed againſt his own perſon, ordered ſeveral officers to array themſelves in the ſame armour, and to have the ſame equipage, that uſually diſtinguiſhed himſelf in time of action. The charge was no ſooner ſounded, than the battle began. The firſt ſhock was at once both dreadful and conſtant. The two armies engaged with fury, and maintained the fight with obſtinacy and perſeverance hardly to be equalled in the records of time. Henry's infantry was the firſt that gave ground; and his whole army would have been thrown into confuſion, had not the impetuous valour of Piercy and Douglas afforded the royaliſts an opportunity of rallying. Theſe two chiefs fought ſide by ſide, and opened themſelves a paſſage to the ſpot where the royal ſtandard was erected, and where they knew Henry fought in perſon, both contending who ſhould have the honour of encountering the royal warrior. Piercy ſupported that renown he had acquired; and Douglas, his antient enemy, but now his friend, ſtill appeared his rival amidſt the dangers and horrors of this bloody battle. Their ardour, however, proved fatal to their cauſe; for they charged with ſuch dreadful impetuoſity, and pierced with ſuch deſperate rapidity the ranks of the enemy, that few of their men could follow them. A ſurrounding heap of dead bodies, and the lines they had broken cloſing again, intercepted their retreat. The feats of valour performed by theſe undaunted heroes are incredible. Douglas ſlew three brave warriors who perſonated the king of England. The royal ſtandard was thrown to the ground. Death and horror followed their ſteps, and equally reigned; but, numbers of their followers being ſlain, they found themſelves hemmed in on all ſides, without any proſpect of being relieved by the main body of the army; which the king obſerving, he advanced with a body reſerve, and made a dreadful havock; expoſing his perſon in the thickeſt of his foes, and every where braved, with undaunted perſeverance, the raging ſtorm of claſhing weapons. His gallant ſon alſo, who afterwards became the renowned Henry V. atchieved prodigies of valour, following the example of his illuſtrious father; nor could even a wound in his face, which he had received from an arrow, oblige him to quit the field. In the mean time Piercy and Douglas endeavoured to cut their way back to their own forces; but the former, in the midſt of this furious conteſt, being ſlain by an unknown hand, his death was no ſooner known, than the remains of his mangled army fled in the utmoſt confuſion, after the battle had raged little more than three hours; in which ſhort ſpace of time Henry had expoſed his perſon like the meaneſt ſoldier, and is ſaid to have killed thirty-ſix perſons with his ſingle arm. In this battle, which was fought on the twenty-firſt of July, and is called the battle of Shrewſbury, about ſix thouſand were ſlain, two-thirds of whom were of Piercy's army. The earls of Worceſter and Douglas were taken priſoners, together with the baron Kinderton, and Sir Richard Vernon. All theſe, except Douglas, whom Henry diſmiſſed without ranſom, on account of his valour, were beheaded at Shrewſbury. On the king's ſide, the earl of Stafford, Sir Hugh Shirley, Sir John Clayton, Sir John Cockayne, Sir Nicholas Chauſel, Sir John Calverly, Sir John Maſſey, Sir Hugh Mortimer, beſides ſixteen hundred privates, were ſlain, and about three thouſand dangerouſly wounded. The body of Hotſpur Piercy was, by the king's permiſſion, buried in the field where he had ſignalized his valour, bnt his quarters were afterwards hung up in ſome of the chief towns of England. During theſe tranſactions, the earl of Northumberland was marching at the head of a conſiderable body of troops to reinforce the army of the rebels; but hearing of his ſon's death and defeat, and that the king was advancing againſt him with his victorious troops, he ſhut himſelf up in Warkworth-caſtle, where he diſmiſſed his forces, and came to the king at York, after having previouſly received an aſſurance of a pardon. He pretended that he had no other intention in taking arms, but to mediate between the parties. This apology Henry accepted, and granted him a pardon. The ſame lenity was extended to all the other rebels; and except the earl of Worceſter and Sir Richard Vernon, who were conſidered as principals, none engaged in this inſurrection appear to have periſhed by the hands of the executioner.

A.D. 1404. Henry having thus ſtifled this unprovoked rebellion, marched towards the borders of Wales, in order to proceed againſt Owen Glendour; but the deſign was defeated by want of money for the ſubſiſtence of his army. Soon after this the parliament met at Weſtminſter, when the earl of Northumberland preſented a petition to the king, imploring his clemency, and promiſe of pardon he had made at York. Henry referred the petition to the judges; but the lords entered a proteſt againſt this reference, declaring, that judgment, in caſes of treaſon, belonged to them only. Then they took into conſideration the charge againſt the earl, and pronounced, that the facts alledged to him did not amount to treaſon or felony, but only a treſpaſs, for which the ſaid earl ought to make fine and ranſom to his majeſty. Being thus acquitted, the earl petitioned that he might renew his oath of allegiance, which he ſwore anew upon the croſs of Canterbury; and then the king remitted his fine and ranſom. The commons, having acknowledged the juſt and equitable judgment of the lords, petitioned, that the king would be graciouſly pleaſed to aboliſh all animoſities ſubſiſting among the noblemen of the realm; and by his command the earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland embraced each other, with marks of perfect reconciliation, promiſing for themſelves, their tenants and vaſſals, that they would, for the future, live in peace and amity. The earl of Dunbar was alſo reconciled to Northumberland; and the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the duke of York, with ſeveral other prelates and lords, ſuſpected to have been concerned in the late conſpiracy, were cleared by the king, being declared at the ſame time true and loyal ſubjects.

The rebellion under Glendour was now grown to a dangerous pitch. He had lately reduced the caſtles of Harlegh and Aberyſtwith, defeated a ſtrong body of Engliſh near Monmouth, and ravaged the country as far as the banks of the Severn. The king, who well knew the objects that demanded, at preſent, his ſole attention, was averſe to an expedition into Wales, and was reſtrained from proſecuting that war by a trivial incident. The report of Richard's being alive was now revived, and gained more credit than ever. One Serle, who had been his domeſtic, engaging as an accomplice in the deceit, wrote letters to different perſons in England, aſſuring them, that the king was then in being, and in good health. The evidence of a man who could not reaſonably be ſuppoſed to err in that point, greatly promoted the deſign of the impoſture, which was aſſiſted by the old counteſs of Oxford, mother to the duke of Ireland, who had been attainted in the reign of Richard. But the cheat was at length detected by means of Sir William Clifford, governor of Berwick, who, in order to make up a former breach with the king, delivered him up to juſtice.

A. D. 1405. However, though this deſign was defeated, the diſcontented nobles ſeemed ripe for a revolt. Northumberland was ſenſible that, notwithſtanding his being pardoned, he ſhould never be truſted, and that his great power rendered it difficult for him to be ſincerely forgiven by Henry, who had ſuch reaſonable grounds of jealouſy. Indeed, the folly of that prince's enemies in never acting in concert, prevented his ruin. The earl of Nottingham, the ſon of the duke of Norfolk, and the archbiſhop of York, brother to the earl of Wiltſhire, whom Henry, when duke of Lancaſter, had cauſed to be beheaded at Briſtol, notwithſtanding their having remained quiet, while Piercy was in the field, ſtill entertained a violent hatred againſt the king; and joining with the earl of Northumberland, reſolved to be revenged. They took arms before that nobleman was ready to aſſiſt them; and publiſhing a manifeſto, in which they bitterly reproached Henry with his uſurpation, demanded, that he ſhould reſtore the right line, and redreſs all public grievances. This conſpiracy ſoon after received additional ſtrength, by the junction of lords Bardolf, Haſtings, and Fauconbridge, and a great number of gentlemen of figure and fortune in their reſpective counties. The earl of Northumberland viſited the courts of France and Scotland, in order to prevail upon thoſe powers to ſupport the confederates, and wreſt from the hand of Henry the ſcepter of England. He was received with the utmoſt reſpect, and met with great encouragement in his negotiation. The hopes of foreign aſſiſtance gave new life to the conſpiracy, and a plan was formed for making an inſurrection in the north, while the French made a deſcent in Wales; and Glendour alſo joined the confederacy, which now became truly alarming. Yet Henry was not idle in his endeavours to break the gathering ſtorm. He ſent an army into Wales under the command of his ſon, who attacked one of Glendour's detachments, and obtained a complete victory. The conſpirators now perceived the king was no ſtranger to their deſigns, and therefore precipitantly took the field. On the other ſide, the earl of Weſtmoreland, aſſiſted by ſeveral noblemen of conſiderable power in the north, having been appointed to watch the Scottiſh Marches, no ſooner heard of this inſurrection than he advanced with his forces, hoping to ſurprize the rebels before they were prepared for defence. He was deceived; for on his reaching Shipton-moor, he ſaw the inſurgents, amounting to ſeventeen thouſand, drawn up in excellent order, and ready to engage. The force of Weſtmoreland being inferior to that of the enemy, he was afraid of hazarding a battle, and therefore endeavoured to obtain by artifice, what he could not attempt by force of arms. He deſired to enter into a conference with the archbiſhop and the earl of Nottingham, between the two armies; which being granted, he heard their grievances with great patience, and begged of them to propoſe the remedies. This done, he approved of every expedient they mentioned; granted every demand; and engaged that Henry ſhould give them full ſatisfaction. On finding them pleaſed with his ready compliance with all their demands, he obſerved, that ſince their amity was thus reſtored, it would be better for both ſides to diſband their forces, which would otherwiſe prove burthenſome to the country. To this propoſal the archbiſhop and earl not having the leaſt ſuſpicion, aſſented, and inſtantly diſmiſſed their troops, which ſeparated in the field; on which, Weſtmoreland ſeizing the two rebels without reſiſtance, conducted them to the king, who was within three days march at the head of a powerful army. Henry refuſed to confirm the terms offered by Weſtmoreland, being determined to make thoſe mutinous leaders feel the weight of his juſt reſentment. But knowing that the trial of an archbiſhop, if conducted with the uſual form, would prove troubleſome and tedious, and that the celerity of the execution could alone render it ſafe and prudent, he determined to follow the ferocious cuſtom of that age, and put the prelate to death without the form of a trial. He accordingly applied to Sir William Gaſcoigne, chief juſtice, to paſs ſentence of high treaſon on the archbiſhop. But Gaſcoigne refuſed to act contrary to the laws of his country. Sir William Fulthorpe was therefore appointed a judge on this occaſion; who, without any indictment, trial, or defence, condemned the prelate to the death of a traitor. Nor was the execution of the ſentence delayed; the archbiſhop was immediately put to death, with many ignominious circumſtances. This was the firſt inſtance, in England, of a capital ſentence being inflicted on a dignitary of the church. The earl of Nottingham, Sir John Lamplugh, and Sir Robert Plumpton, ſuffered at the ſame time. The pope was ſo highly incenſed at this alarming attack on the privileges of the church, that he pronounced the ſentence of excommunication againſt all who were concerned in the death of the archbiſhop; and it was only by the prevailing eloquence of a large ſum of money, that Henry procured abſolution. During theſe tranſactions, the mareſchal de Montmorency arrived in Wales with a numerous fleet, from which he landed twelve thouſand men; then joining Glendour, reduced Caermarthen and ſeveral other places, ravaging the country with fire and ſword, and carrying off an immenſe booty. Henry advanced to ſtop the progreſs of theſe invaders; but being retarded by bad weather, the French auxiliaries were embarked, and the ſeaſon ſo far advanced, that he could undertake nothing of conſequence againſt Owen, who found means to intercept fifty waggons, loaded with proviſions and money for the ſubſiſtence of the army, ſo that the king was obliged to retreat to London. In the interim, the earl of Northumberland fled with lord Bardolf into Scotland, on which Henry reduced thoſe noblemens caſtles without oppoſition.

A. D. 1406.

In the ſpring Henry called a parliament; and, under certain reſtrictions, obtained a conſiderable ſubſidy. In the mean time he carried on a private correſpondence with ſome Scottiſh noblemen, who promiſed to deliver the earl of Northumberland, and the lord Bardolf into his hands, on condition of his releaſing, without ranſom, their relations who had been taken at the battle of Holmedon. Robert III. king of Scotland, being weak and infirm, his brother, the duke of Albany, directed the adminiſtration; and not content with his preſent authority, he had formed the cruel deſign of deſtroying his brother's children, and advancing his own family to the throne. On pretence of ſome irregularities, he had extorted an order from Robert to confine his eldeſt ſon David in the caſtle of Falkland, where that unhappy prince was ſtarved to death by his inhuman uncle. James alone, the younger brother of David, ſtood between Albany and the throne, and he was detained by Henry in England, who refuſed to ſet him at liberty. Oppreſſed with cares and infirmities, Robert was unable to ſuſtain the ſhock of his misfortunes, and died ſoon after, leaving the government in the hands of the duke of Albany.

The city of London being afflicted with a grievous plague, which ſwept off great numbers of its inhabitants, the king, to avoid the contagion, reſided for ſome time in the caſtle of Leeds, in Kent; where, having paſſed part of the ſummer, he reſolved to viſit another country ſeat in Norfolk, and for that purpoſe went on board a ſmall veſſel, attended by four ſhips loaded with his baggage and domeſtics; but in this ſhort voyage he was attacked by ſome French cruizers, who took the ſhips, with all his ſervants and equipage, while he himſelf eſcaped with the utmoſt difficulty.

A. D. 1407.

The earl of Northumberland and lord Bardolf entered the north of England, in hopes of engaging the people to take arms. He was joined by a party of Scotch freebooters, and as he advanced, his little army conſiderably increaſed. Pleaſed to find the inhabitants of the ſeveral places through which he paſſed had not yet loſt their affections for his family, he continued his march, made himſelf maſter of ſeveral caſtles which had been reduced after the fatal battle of Shrewſbury, and appointed Thirſk in Yorkſhire, the general rendezvous of his army. The government was alarmed at the ſucceſs which attended the beginning of Northumberland's inſurrection, and there was no royal army to march againſt the rebels. Sir Thomas Rokeſby, ſheriff of Yorkſhire, thought it his duty to ſtop their progreſs. With this view he raiſed a conſiderable body of forces, and advanced to meet them. The earl of Northumberland was equally deſirous of coming to an action with the ſheriff, perſuaded, that if he could defeat Rokeſby's forces, he ſhould not only diſappoint Henry of ſo eſſential a reinforcement, but alſo, by this ſucceſs, engage the city and county of York in his favour. Accordingly he drew up his followers in a line of battle, on Barham-moor; yet, though prepared for the attack, his party did not long ſuſtain the fury of the royal army. The fight was maintained a conſiderable time with equal impetuoſity; but the rebel troops, conſiſting of raw, unexperienced people, were ſoon broken and routed, notwithſtanding the vigorous efforts of the gallant earl, who was ſlain in the field of battle, and lord Bardolf who died of his wounds. The king received the news of this victory in his march; notwithſtanding which he proceeded to York, where he puniſhed the ſurviving rebels with death, fine, or forfeiture; and rewarded the ſheriff with part of Northumberland's forfeited eſtate.

Glendour's power and influence were greatly impaired, by the vigilance and ſucceſs of the prince of Wales; who completed the conqueſt of South Wales; and reduced A. D. 1408. Harlech in Merionethſhire; ſo that Owen was in a manner beſieged at Snowdon, where he was greatly diſtreſſed for want of ſubſiſtence. Owen, on this reverſe of fortune, was gradually forſaken by the greater part of his adherents, who ſubmitted, and were pardoned by Henry. About two years after the ſuppreſſion of the rebels, Glendour died at his daughter's houſe in Herefordſhire, where he had been ſupported during that term in the diſguiſe of a ſhepherd. Theſe fortunate events freed Henry from all his domeſtic enemies. Not any more attempts were made to tear the laurel from his brow; and he enjoyed the crown without any farther oppoſition from the ambition of his turbulent nobles.

A. D. 1409. The commerce of England had been greatly annoyed by French corſairs. The king therefore ordered a ſtrong fleet to be fitted out, under the command of the earl of Kent, who immediately directed his courſe to the town of Brehal, the rendezvous of thoſe pirates. The earl immediately inveſted the place, but was repulſed after having received a wound in his head, which proved mortal. The Engliſh, incenſed at the death of their commander, renewed the attack with ſuch fury that they carried the place; put all they found in arms to the ſword; and brought the reſt priſoners to England.

A. D. 1410. The followers of Wickliffe, notwithſtanding the bloody act paſſed againſt them, were grown more numerous than ever, and many of them held places of power and truſt under the government. The major part of theſe heretics were very illiterate, neither capable of defending their tenets by ſound argument, nor regulating their conduct with decency. There were many perſons of learning and reflection all over the kingdom, who condemned the intemperate zeal of theſe Lollards, but made no ſcruple of declaring, that the church ſtood in need of reformation. A parliament being convoked at Weſtminſter on the twenty-ſeventh of January, ſeveral proviſions were made againſt alienations; and the commons preferred a bill againſt frauds in returning officers, to which the king aſſented with reluctance. During this ſeſſion an execution happened, which affords a ſtriking inſtance of perſecution on the one hand, and abſurd zeal on the other. One Bodby, a taylor, took upon him to exclaim violently againſt the real preſence in the euchariſt. As the ſpirit of reformation daily increaſed, the clergy ſingled out this poor fanatic for exemplary puniſhment. On his trial he was condemned to the ſtake, and Henry was a ſpectator of his execution. The commons, of whom a great part were Lollards, conſidered the ſufferings of this man as an intended affront offered to themſelves, and therefore took the firſt opportunity of expreſſing their reſentment.

The truce with Scotland expiring in the courſe of this year, the Scots renewed their hoſtilities on the borders; and with their cruizers interrupted the navigation and trade of the Engliſh. To chaſtize theſe adventurers, Robert de Umfreville, vice-admiral of England, entered the Frith of Edinburgh with ten capital ſhips, and not only deſtroyed the naval force of Scotland, but ravaged the whole coaſt, and brought off immenſe plunder.

Several negotiations were carried on in different parts of the continent, A. D. 1411. and produced a prolongation of the truce with France for five years, with Caſtile for two, and with Brittany for ten. A treaty was alſo concluded with the duke of Burgundy, againſt whom a powerful confederacy had been formed by the dukes of Berry, Orleans, Alençon, and Brittany. Theſe aſſociates having levied a powerful army, inveſted Paris; on which the duke of Burgundy had recourſe to his Engliſh ally, who ſent a body of troops to his aſſiſtance. Thus reinforced, the duke began his march; but the Picards and Flemings who compoſed his army, quarrelling after he had reduced the town of Ham, diſperſed and returned to their own habitations; ſo that he was abandoned by all but the Engliſh auxiliaries under the earl of Arundel, amounting to one hundred men at arms, and a thouſand archers. With theſe he proceeded to Paris, the blockade of which had been ſome time formed by the duke of Orleans; and, forcing his way through the quarters of the enemy, entered the city amidſt the acclamations of the people. The next day after their arrival, the duke ordered the Engliſh troops to attack the important poſts of Montmatne, and la Chapelle, from whence they drove the enemy with great ſlaughter; and a few days after this valiant action they attacked St. Cloud, which was defended by two officers of courage and experience, at the head of ſome of the beſt troops in France; and, notwithſtanding the vigorous efforts of the defendants, the Engliſh, ſupported by a body of Picards and Pariſians, carried on the aſſault with ſuch irreſiſtible fury, that the place was taken, and a great number of perſons of diſtinction made priſoners. The duke of Orleans, alarmed at this loſs, raiſed the blockade of Paris, and retired into the provinces, where his troops diſperſed. After this retreat, the duke of Burgundy reduced all the caſtles and fortreſſes in the iſle of France, which had been ſeized by the other faction; and this ſucceſs encouraged great part of the kingdom to declare in his favour. The Engliſh parliament meeting on the twelfth of November, were ſo well pleaſed with this expedition, that, in an addreſs to his majeſty, they deſired thanks might be given to the prince, and to the reſt of the counſellors, appointed by the laſt parliament to ſuperintend the application of the public money. They then petitioned that a general amneſty, under the great ſeal, might be paſſed in favour of all his majeſty's ſubjects; and the king granted their requeſt; in conſideration of which the commons voted a ſubſidy for the occaſions of the crown. At the ſame time Henry's three ſons, John, Thomas, and Humphrey, were created dukes of Clarence, Bedford, and Glouceſter; and his own brother duke of Dorſet.

Henry had now neither foreign nor domeſtic enemies to contend with; A. D. 1412. yet his days were embittered, as a parent, by the diſſolute behaviour and irregular courſes of the prince of Wales. He was now in the full vigour of youth, and of an active, ſprightly ſpirit. While employed in the field, no action, of an immoral tendency, ſtained his character. But a life of indolence was not ſuited to his turn of mind. The diſtruſt and jealouſy of his father having removed him from all ſhare in the public buſineſs, he plunged himſelf, with the utmoſt violence, into all the extravagancies of debauchery, and bluſhed not for a conduct the moſt diſorderly and licentious. But his outrages proceeded not leſs from a depraved diſpoſition, than the violence of his temper, which being not directed to uſeful objects, induced him to give full ſcope to his paſſions; but many gleams of ſpirit and magnanimity were obſerved to break through the cloud, which a wild conduct had thrown over his character. The degeneracy of the heir apparent was not more mortifying to the king than alarming to the nation, who trembled at being governed by a prince whoſe court was the receptacle of libertines, buffoons, paraſites, and every ſpecies of vermin, which are at once the diſgrace and ruin of noble princes and kings. However, in the midſt of theſe exceſſes, the greatneſs of his ſoul ſeemed ſometimes to emerge from the dungeon of deformity in which it lay obſcured. One of young Henry's diſſolute companions having been indicted for ſome miſdemeanor, was condemned, notwithſtanding all the intereſt of the prince, who was preſent at the trial, could make in his favour; and he was ſo incenſed at the iſſue of the trial, that he ſtruck Sir William Gaſcoigne, the judge, as he ſat on the bench; but the magiſtrate, who acted with a ſpirit ſuitable to his character, inſtantly ordered the young prince to be committed to priſon; and young Henry, conſcious of the flagrant inſult he had committed, both with reſpect to the judge, and the laws of his country, ſuffered himſelf with the utmoſt reſignation to be conducted to the place of confinement, by the officers of juſtice. When this tranſaction had been reported to the king, who was an excellent judge of mankind, he cried out in a tranſport of joy, "I thank God, I have a judge endowed with courage to execute the laws, and am ſtill more happy, in having a ſon who will ſubmit to ſuch chaſtiſement."

During the reign of Henry, the parliamentary proceedings deſerve more attention, than thoſe relating either to military or foreign tranſactions. The commons had now attained a very conſiderable ſhare of importance, and it became an object of policy to direct their election. This circumſtance had been complained of during the preceding reign, and was made one of the articles of charge againſt Richard; but it continued ſtill unredreſſed. Henry purſued the ſame meaſures he had ſeverely cenſured in his predeceſſor. He was however obliged to court popularity, and this gave the legiſlative body an opportunity of aſſuming powers they had not hitherto ventured to exerciſe. In the firſt year of Henry's reign, the commons procured a law, that no judge, on being guilty of any iniquitous meaſures, ſhould be excuſed by pleading the king's orders, or even the danger of life from the ſovereign's menaces. In the ſecond year, they inſiſted on maintaining the practice, of not granting ſupplies before their petitions were anſwered. In the fifth year, they petitioned the king to diſmiſs four officers who had diſpleaſed them, one of whom was his own confeſſor; and though the king informed them, that he was not ſenſible of their having been guilty of any offence, yet to gratify them he complied with their requeſt. In the ſixth year, though they voted the king ſupplies, they appointed treaſurers of their own, to ſee the money diſburſed for the purpoſes intended; and enjoined them to deliver in their accounts to the houſe. In the eighth year, they propoſed thirty important articles for the regulation of the government, and the houſhold, which were all agreed to; and they even conſtrained all the members of the council, the judges and officers of the houſhold to ſwear to their obſervance: but in a ſubſequent parliament, when the king had overcome all his difficulties, the ſpeaker, on making his cuſtomary application to the throne for liberty of ſpeech, was told by Henry, that he intended to enjoy his prerogatives, and would have no novelties introduced. However this prince was more attentive to maintain the rights and privileges of the people than moſt of his predeceſſors. When the houſe of commons were at any time brought to make unwary conceſſions to the crown, they always ſpeedily retracted them. On this account, though Henry entertained a well grounded jealouſy of the family of Mortimer, he never allowed their name to be once mentioned in parliament; and as none of the rebels had ventured to declare the earl of Marche king, he would not attempt to procure an expreſs declaration againſt that nobleman's claim, though he knew this would not have been refuſed him, he being ſenſible, that ſuch a declaration would only ſerve to revive the memory of Mortimer's title. As the commons, during this reign, diſcovered a laudable zeal for liberty, in their tranſactions with the crown, they exerted themſelves no leſs againſt the church: for in the ſixth year of Henry's reign, they, on being required to grant ſupplies, propoſed to the king in plain terms, that he ſhould ſeize the temporalities of the church, and make uſe of them as a perpetual fund to ſupply the exigencies of the ſtate. They obſerved, that a third part of the lands of the kingdom was poſſeſſed by the clergy, who contributed nothing towards relieving the public burdens; and that their riches tended only to abate their zeal and attention in the performance of their miniſterial functions. The archbiſhop of Canterbury being with the king when this addreſs was preſented, obſerved, that though the clergy did not go in perſon to the wars, they, in caſes of neceſſity, ſent their vaſſals and tenants; while they themſelves who ſtaid at home, were day and night employed in offering up their prayers for the happineſs and proſperity of the kingdom. The ſpeaker anſwered with a ſmile, that the prayers of the church were but a ſlender ſupply. However the archbiſhop prevailed; the king refuſed their requeſt, and the lords rejected the bill. Not diſcouraged by this repulſe, the commons returned to the charge in the eleventh year of this reign, with greater zeal than before. They prepared a calculation of the eccleſiaſtical revenues, which they maintained amounted to the annual ſum of four hundred eighty-five thouſand marks, and contained no leſs than eighteen thouſand four hundred ploughs of land, which they propoſed to divide among fifteen new earls, fifteen hundred knights, ſix thouſand eſquires, and one hundred hoſpitals; beſides twenty thouſand pounds a year, to be applied to the king's own uſe; and inſiſted, that the ſacred functions would be much better performed than they were by fifteen hundred pariſh prieſts, with an annual ſtipend of ſeven marks for each. This addreſs, though refuſed with a ſevere reply, alarmed both the king and the clergy. It was ſufficiently evident, that the doctrine of Wickliffe had ſpread to a great extent among the people, and it was therefore thought neceſſary to put the laws againſt the Lollards in execution. Accordingly ſeveral of them were ſent to priſon, and one, whom we have before noticed, committed to the flames, even while the parliament were ſitting. But theſe rigorous meaſures anſwered not the intention of the clergy. Perſecution always tends to increaſe the numbers of any religious ſect; and the ſufferings of the Lollards augmented their diſciples. The aſhes of one victim, ſcattered by the breath of the reformation, became the ſeed of thouſands.

A. D. 1413.

Henry had for ſome time employed himſelf in fomenting the diviſions which prevailed between the families of Burgundy and Orleans; but the two French princes having agreed to a pacification, the intereſts of the Engliſh were ſacrificed to their mutual convenience, and this effort of Henry was productive of no real advantage; and the bad ſtate of his health hindered him from renewing the attempt, which his more fortunate ſon proſecuted with ſucceſs, againſt the French monarchy. His health had for ſome months been viſibly declining: he was ſubject to fits, which for a time a time bereaved him of his ſenſes; and though yet in the flower of his age, his end was viſibly approaching. He was naturally of a peeviſh, jealous diſpoſition, which at this time gradually increaſed; and he too readily liſtened to the vile ſuggeſtions of his courtiers, who inſinuated, that his eldeſt ſon had formed deſigns upon his life and crown. The breaſt of the king was now filled with anxious fears, which impelled him to remove the prince from his poſt of preſident of the council. Young Henry was greatly alarmed. Fond as he was of pleaſure and diſſipation, he was ſtill poſſeſſed of the finer feelings; and could not without the moſt heart-rending anguiſh reflect, that his own conduct had given too much reaſon for his enemies to aſperſe his character. But ſtill he knew himſelf innocent with regard to his having formed a wiſh to the prejudice of his father's authority; and determined to purſue every method in his power to convince the king of his duty and loyalty. He repaired to court dreſſed in a mourning habit to expreſs his ſorrow; having obtained, at his requeſt, a private audience with the king, he threw himſelf on his knees, and addreſſed him in a ſpeech to the following purport: "My liege and honoured father; it gives me the moſt ſincere concern to find, that I am ſuſpected of harbouring an unnatural deſign againſt your crown and perſon; which I, more than any other ſubject, am bound to reverence and defend. It is true, and I confeſs the ſame with unfeigned contrition, that I have been guilty of many irregularities and exceſſes, for which I have juſtly merited your diſpleaſure. But I call the Almighty to witneſs, who knows the ſecret receſſes of the heart, and never fails to puniſh thoſe who dare to invoke him to ſanctify a falſhood, that I never entertained a thought, inconſiſtent with that duty and reſpect I owe to your majeſty. Thoſe who charge me with contrary intentions ſeek only to diſturb your tranquillity, and to alienate your affections from your ſon and ſucceſſor. I would willingly remove theſe anxieties from your mind; I came for no other purpoſe. Let me beſeech you therefore to permit me to clear myſelf from ſo ſcandalous an imputation. Let my actions be tried by the utmoſt rigour; with the ſame ſeverity as if I was the meaneſt of your ſubjects: and if I am guilty in any reſpect of the atrocious crime laid to my charge; if I have ever uſed an expreſſion indicating diſloyalty, or want of affection, puniſh me as a wretch unworthy the name of ſon or ſubject. I refer my conduct to your inſpection, and will readily ſubmit to any puniſhment you may think proper to inflict. This enquiry, with the utmoſt humility, I demand, both for your own ſatisfaction, and the vindication of my injured honour." This free, ingenuous, and pathetic addreſs, greatly affected the king. He took the prince in his arms; embraced him with tears; aſſured him, that all his ſuſpicions were entirely removed; and that he would never for the future harbour a thought prejudicial to his loyalty and honour.

Henry did not long ſurvive this interview. He was ſeized with apoplectic fits, which returned at certain intervals, and deprived him of all ſenſation. This malady co-operating with ſcruples of conſcience, and an idle prophecy, that he ſhould die in Jeruſalem, diſpoſed his mind to devotional duties, and aſſuming the croſs, he reſolved to conſecrate the remainder of his days to a war againſt the infidels. He imparted his reſolution to a grand council aſſembled for that purpoſe, and began to prepare for his expedition, when his dreadful fits returned. They ſoon, by their frequency, impaired his ſenſes; and having been often in danger of loſing his crown, his imagination ſeems to have been ſtrongly impreſſed with that idea, which increaſed as his ſtrength and reaſoning faculties decayed even to a degree of childiſh anxiety. He would not go to ſleep unleſs it was laid on h pillow, leſt it ſhould be ſeized before he was dead. One day he remained ſo long in a ſwoon, that his ſervants thought him actually dead, when the prince coming in, took up the crown and carried it away. The king recovering the uſe of his ſenſes, and obſerving the diadem was removed, demanded, with an anxious ſolicitude, who had preſumed to take it from his pillow, and being told the prince had carried it away, he ordered him into his preſence. When young Henry appeared, the king with an angry countenance, ſaid, "What would you deprive me of my crown before my death?" "No," replied the prince, "I had not ſuch a thought; but thinking your majeſty was really dead, I took the crown as my lawful inheritance. I am happy in finding my miſtake, and now, ſeeing you alive, with pleaſure reſtore it. May you long live to wear it in peace!" He accordingly replaced the crown on his father's pillow, and having received his bleſſing, retired.

The king was ſeized with his laſt fit as he was paying his devotions before the ſhrine of St. Edward, and was carried into the Jeruſalem Chamber, belonging to the abbot of Weſtminſter; where recovering his ſpeech, and perceiving himſelf in a ſtrange place, he deſired to know by what name it was called, and being told, it put him in mind of the prediction, and he concluded his laſt moment approached. Before he expired, he ſent for the prince of Wales, to whom he gave ſome excellent advice; but expreſſed an uneaſineſs with reſpect to his uſurpation, and told him, that he was afraid his brother, the duke of Clarence, would diſturb him in the poſſeſſion of his throne. The prince obſerved, that being lawful heir, he would endeavour to keep the crown by the ſame methods, by which he himſelf had preſerved it: that if the duke of Clarence behaved as he ought, he would always find him a kind brother; but if he pretended to do otherwiſe, he knew how to make him return to his duty. The king then recommended him to the protection of heaven, and expired a few minutes after, on the twentieth of March, in the forty-ſixth year of his age, and the fourteenth of his reign, being the XXXIſt king of England from Egbert I. By his firſt wife Mary de Bohun, daughter and heir of the earl of Hereford, he had four ſons; Henry, ſurnamed of Monmouth, from the place of his birth, who ſucceeded his father on the throne; Thomas, duke of Clarence; John, duke of Bedford, afterwards regent of France; and Humphrey, duke of Glouceſter. He had alſo two daughters; Blanche, who married firſt the elector Palatine, then the king of Arragon, and laſtly, the duke of Barr. Philippa, who married Eric, king of Denmark. Henry's ſecond wife was Joan, daughter to Charles I. king of Navarre, and widow of John Montfort, duke of Brittany. By this princeſs he had no iſſue.

Character of Henry IV.

This prince was of middle ſtature, and regular form; perfectly ſkilled in all the exerciſe of arms and chivalry. His countenance was the very emblem of equanimity, diſplaying a mind fortified againſt the ſudden reverſes of fickle fortune, neither elated with proſperity, nor dejected with adverſity. Before he aſcended the throne, he enjoyed great popularity; but when the people were led to pity the unhappy fate of the late monarch, they were filled with reſentment, and ready to enter into rebellions againſt Henry; hence, though the executions were much fewer than might have been expected, and were neceſſary for the ſupport of his authority, the temper of the times made them appear cruel. Henry was led to the poſſeſſion of a crown by a train of incidents that ſeduced his virtue. The injuſtice with which he was treated by his predeceſſor; his being baniſhed for no crime; that baniſhment being afterwards made perpetual, and the ſentence rendered more ſevere by a deprivation of his patrimony, induced him to think of recovering thoſe rights, of which he had been ſo unjuſtly deprived: but the ſteps whereby he aſcended the throne, and the means by which he attained that high dignity, were altogether unjuſtifiable; and the depoſition of his near relation, ſubjected to a cruel confinement, which occaſioned his death, will ever remain an indelible ſtain in the character of this prince. A crown ſeems to have been the ſeducing tempter, that corrupted his principles and deſtroyed his good fame; to which had he not aſpired he might have lived without envy, without danger, with the applauſe of wiſdom, and the approbation of virtue, having juſtly acquired the glorious diſtinctions of the deliverer, the protector, and the reſtorer of Engliſh liberty. The circumſtances of his reign evince his perſonal courage, nor are proofs wanting of his refined ſenſe, ſolid judgment, and deep penetration; and it muſt be confeſſed, that he had a remarkable command of temper; maintained his power with admirable prudence; and the regard he ſhewed for the liberties of the people, with the poſſeſſion of many great qualities, fitted him for the high ſtation to which he was raiſed. Though his uſurpation, legally conſidered, is unjuſtifiable, it actually proved a happy preventive of the deſpotic ſway of a weak prince, under the influence of a corrupt miniſtry; and had he gained the regal dignity by a juſt title, without being expoſed to the numerous inſurrections which diſturbed his whole reign, he might poſſibly have paſſed his life with as much honour to himſelf, and advantage to the nation, as any other monarch. The inquietude with which Henry enjoyed his height of power, and the remorſe with which he is ſaid to have been continually haunted, rendered him an object of compaſſion, and affords a ſtriking leſſon to thoſe whom Providence may have placed in the higheſt elevation of life, not to trifle, ſport with, nor infringe the eternal laws of moral obligation, which when, in particular inſtances, once violated, expoſes the mind to all the ſharp upbraidings of an inward monitor; and in ſpite of all the artificial propoſitions of ſceptical ſophiſtry, will, ſooner or later, deprive it of that calm, ſweet, internal tranquillity, the certain effect of conſcious integrity, which is preferable to unenvied greatneſs, even when that greatneſs is ſeated on a throne of royalty.

A. D. 1413. HENRY V. ſurnamed of Monmouth, from the place of his birth, had been educated under the eye of his uncle, the biſhop of Wincheſter, at the univerſity of Oxford. Here he received thoſe ſeeds of education, which though buried for a time deep in the bed of immorality, in due ſeaſon ſprung up, and produced a cluſter of virtues. He was about twenty-five years of age when he aſcended the throne, and the people were inclined to think they ſhould be happy under his adminiſtration; ſeeing they had perceived many indications of a noble and generous ſpirit darting frequently with uncommon luſtre, through the miſt of diſſipation.

Whatever arguments may have been framed in defence of the divine and indefeaſible nature of hereditary right, it has generally been found, in the progreſs of human events, to give place to the more important conſideration of the general good of ſociety. Though Henry V. could urge no more validity of claim than his father, and though the earl of Marche, the lineal heir was ſtill living, the parliament, without ſcruple, placed the royal diadem on his head, convinced that ſuch a ſtep would conduce to the intereſt of the nation. Henry therefore having been proclaimed, immediately after the death of his father, with the uſual ceremonies, was crowned by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, on the ninth of April. He was ſcarcely ſeated on the throne, when he ſent for his former companions, and after acquainting them with his intended reformation, exhorted them to imitate his example, but ſtrictly prohibited them from appearing any more in his preſence, till they had given ſufficient proofs of their having changed their courſe of life; and then diſmiſſed them with preſents. Such conduct afforded Henry's ſubjects a happy omen of his future government; which he began with a general amneſty, and an appeal to heaven, that he would rather chuſe to be removed from life, than exerciſe a tyrannical ſway over his people. Thoſe of his father's wiſe miniſters who had checked his folly, immediately found they had, unknown to themſelves, been paying their court to him, and were received with every mark of favour: even the chief juſtice, approaching him with fearful apprehenſions, received praiſes inſtead of reproaches, and was exhorted by the king, to perſevere in executing the laws with the ſame rigour and impartiality. The ſurprize of all who expected an oppoſite conduct, increaſed their ſatisfaction, and the amiable deportment of the young king appeared brighter than if it had never been ſhaded by his follies. He was alſo not only ſolicitous to repair his own miſconduct, but to atone for thoſe crimes into which his father had been betrayed by policy, or the neceſſity of affairs. He expreſſed his concern for the unhappy fate of Richard; did juſtice to his memory; ordered his corpſe to be removed from Langley, where it had been interred, to Weſtminſter-abbey; and cauſed it to be depoſited by Ann of Luxemburgh, his late queen, with great pomp, and ſolemn funeral rites, at which he himſelf attended as chief mourner. He received the earl of Marche with ſingular courteſy, and by this inſtance of true policy, gained ſuch an aſcendance over the gentle and unambitious temper of that prince, that he ever after continued ſincerely attached to him, and gave him no diſturbance in his future government. He reſtored the family of Piercy to their honour and fortunes; and being deſirous of burying in oblivion all party diſtinctions, he made thoſe who had been advanced without merit give place to men of real abilities. The low and narrow politics of governing by a party, he juſtly ſcorned, and eſteemed wiſdom, united with integrity, as the bulwark of his throne.

Notwithſtanding Henry aſcended the throne under the moſt favourable auſpices, he could not eſcape the envy and hatred of ſome individuals. A conſpiracy was formed againſt him by one Wightlock, who endeavoured to foment a rebellion by poſting papers in public places, containing affirmatives that Richard was ſtill alive. This incendiary being apprehended, was committed priſoner to the Tower, from whence he eſcaped by the connivance of the conſtable, who was diſmiſſed from his office, and one of the wardens, convicted of having favoured the priſoner's eſcape, executed as a traitor. But the attention of Henry was chiefly turned towards France, the theatre of his future glory. A conſiderable body of Engliſh troops ſtill remained in Guienne, and had not only committed dreadful outrages againſt the French, but defeated a body of four thouſand troops under the marſhal de Heli, whom they took priſoner. But the duke of Clarence returning ſoon after with the main body of theſe forces to England, a truce had been concluded, which, as uſual, had been very ill obſerved; for immediately after the death of the late king, the garriſon of Calais, perſuaded, that every truce terminated with the lives of the contracting parties, made an irruption into Bologne, upon which the French government ſent ſtrong reinforcements to Ardres, Gravelins, and the neighbouring places. Hoſtilities alſo commenced by ſea, and a ſtrong ſquadron of French overpowered three Engliſh ſhips, which were deſigned to ſurpriſe the veſſels in the harbour of Dieppe, and killed their commodore. Such was the ſituation of affairs when a new parliament met on the fifteenth of May. The ſeſſion was opened with a ſpeech by the biſhop of Wincheſter, who aſſured them of Henry's zeal to promote the intereſts of the church and ſtate. The commons then preſented an addreſs, deſiring the punctual execution of the laws, and a redreſs of national grievances. They alſo petitioned, that his majeſty would provide for the defence of Ireland, Wales, the Marches of Scotland, Calais, and Guienne. After which they granted a ſubſidy on wool and leather, for four years, together with tonnage and poundage, for one year, and a fifteenth and a half. They complained loudly of the clergy's exacting pecuniary commutations, and the king promiſed to interpoſe his authority with the biſhops, that theſe abuſes might be reformed.

At the ſame time the convocation of the clergy were employed in concerting the moſt effectual methods, for putting a ſtop to Wickliffe's hereſy. The ſects of the Lollards were every day increaſing, and appeared not only dangerous to the church, but even formidable to the civil power. To ſtop their progreſs, Thomas Arundel, biſhop of Canterbury, had obtained an order from the late king, to ſend commiſſions to Oxford, to take information in relation to their doctrines, and chief abettors, when it was found, that Sir John Oldcaſtle, lord Cobham, was at their head, a nobleman, who on many occaſions had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery, whereby he acquired the eſteem both of the late and preſent king. His great character and his zeal made the archbiſhop conſider him as a proper victim of eccleſiaſtical cenſure, concluding, that by indicting him, he ſhould ſtrike a terror into the whole party, and make them ſenſible, that after his death no others could expect the leaſt mercy. But lord Cobham was too great a favourite with the king for the archbiſhop to proceed without his leave. He therefore waited upon Henry, to whom he opened the ſubject of his complaint, endeavouring to perſuade him, that fire and faggot were the only means proper for the extirpation of hereſy, and that the intereſt of religion rendered i abſolutely neceſſary, to proceed againſt that nobleman with the utmoſt rigour. The king, who was no friend to eccleſiaſtical ſeverity, repreſented to the primate that reaſon and perſuaſion were the beſ means for ſupporting truth, and correcting error that he ought firſt to try all gentle methods to bring back the Lollards to the boſom of the church, and that he himſelf would converſe with Sir John Oldcaſtle, and endeavour to reconcile him to the catholic faith. But Henry found all his perſuaſions were in vain; Cobham was too ſteadily fixed in his opinions, to ſacrifice truths of the utmoſt importance, to conciliate the favour even of a ſovereign, to whom he was ſtrongly attached. The king was diſpleaſed at that nobleman's inflexibility; and finding that his own power had no effect, cruelly delivered him up to the primate, with his permiſſion to proceed againſt him to the utmoſt extremity of the laws. The violence of eccleſiaſtical authority was now exerted, and the prelate, aſſiſted by the biſhops of London, Wincheſter, and St. Davids, condemned the devoted lord Cobham to the flames; but he made his eſcape from the Tower before the day appointed for his execution.

A. D. 1414.

The clergy had obtained a proclamation againſt the Lollards aſſembling for religious worſhip, on which, not daring to meet in houſes, they choſe ſome unfrequented place, where they met in the night. Some of them having aſſembled in St George's fields, then overgrown with buſhes, it came to the ears of their enemies, who informed the king, that Cobham was there at the head of twenty thouſand men, with a deſign to kill his majeſty, and ſubvert the government. Henry weakly giving credit to the idle tale, marched againſt them, with a view of attacking them before they had taken their meaſures. Arriving upon the ſpot about midnight, he put ſome of them to the ſword, and took the reſt priſoners. Among theſe were Sir Roger Acton, John Browne, Eſq; and Sir John Beverly, who ſuffered death as heretics and traitors, together with ſixty-three of their followers. Lord Cobham was out-lawed, not having been preſent on this occaſion; but being apprehended four years after, he was drawn, hanged, and burnt on the gibbet for hereſy and treaſon. This ſpirited conduct of the king checked for a time the very idea of hereſy; and many who wiſhed for the reformation of abuſes in the church, diſcovered their diſlike to the ſpeculative doctrines of the Lollards, which they imagined threw diſgrace upon ſo good a cauſe: hence the parliament increaſed the rigours of the penal laws. They enacted, that whoever ſhould be convicted of that hereſy before the ordinary, ſhould not only ſuffer capital puniſhment, but forfeit lands and goods to the king; and that the chancellor, treaſurer, juſtices of the two benches, ſheriffs, and all chief magiſtrates in every city and borough, ſhould ſwear to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to extirpate hereſy. Yet when the king required a ſupply, this very parliament renewed the offer made to his father, and intreated him to ſeize the revenues of the clergy for the uſe of the crown. The biſhops, who could offer nothing equivalent, were greatly alarmed; they offered the king all the revenues of alien priories; but this in all probability would not have diverted the ſtorm, which Chicheley, who was now raiſed to the ſee of Canterbury, effected, by directing the attention of Henry to a very different object. He perſuaded the king to engage in a war with France, in order to recover the provinces wreſted from his anceſtors, and to obtain that kingdom, to which the artful prelate pretended he had a juſt claim. Henry's natural diſpoſition inclined him to follow this advice, and the civil diſſentions in France which had laſted for a long time, and ſtill continued, favoured his ambitious views.

The ſtate of that kingdom was indeed now truly deplorable. Charles VI. had been ſeized with a fit of frenzy, which rendered him incapable of exerciſing his authority; and though he recovered from this diſorder, he was ſo ſubject to relapſes, that his ſenſes were gradually impaired, whereby he was unable to purſue any plan of government. This misfortune gave a full career to the rage of parties. The duke of Orleans, the king's brother, and the duke of Burgundy, his couſin-german, after engaging in moſt violent quarrels, by which the country had been deluged with the blood of its inhabitants, agreed to enter into ſtrict friendſhip, and ſwore at the altar to the ſincerity of their intentions. But notwithſtanding they had invoked heaven as a witneſs againſt them, very little regard was paid to the ſacredneſs of their promiſe, or ſolemn oaths. The duke of Orleans was ſoon after aſſaſſinated in the ſtreets of Paris, by order of the duke of Burgundy. For ſome time he ſtrove to conceal his guilt; but being detected, he openly avowed and endeavoured to juſtify what he had done. Even the parliament of Paris, the ſupreme tribunal of juſtice, on hearing the harangues of the duke's advocate in defence of aſſaſſination, which he juſtified under the name of tyrannicide influenced by faction, and overawed by power, did not condemn this deteſtable doctrine. The commiſſion of ſo baſe a crime, thus ſhamefully vindicated, deſtroyed all truſt and ſecurity; and a reconciliation between the two parties was now impoſſible. The princes of the blood joining with the young duke of Orleans and his brothers, engaged in a terrible war with the duke of Burgundy; and the unhappy king, on being ſometimes ſeized by one party, and ſometimes by another, alternately transferred the appearance of legal authority to each: the provinces were ravaged; the animoſities of the ſeveral leaders every where produced moſt ſhocking murders: and executions were ordered, without legal trial, by pretended courts of juſtice. All the French were divided into two parties, the Burgundians, and the Armagnacs; the latter of whom were the followers of the young duke of Orleans, and were ſo called from that prince's father-in-law the count of Armagnac. Paris was a perpetual ſcene of blood and confuſion; the king and royal family were frequently detained captives by the vulgar on either ſide, and his miniſters ſlaughtered before his face. The butchers of Paris declared for the duke of Burgundy; and committed, with the moſt furious zeal, every kind of outrage againſt thoſe of the oppoſite party. On the other hand, the Armagnacs were ſupported by the fraternity of carpenters; thus the populace ranged themſelves on one ſide or other, and on the prevalence of either party, depended the fate of the capital. Henry perceived the advantage that might be taken of theſe confuſions, and reſolved to make war on the divided kingdom of France.

In order, however, to conceal his real intentions, and to have a plauſible pretence for this ſtep, he ſent over a ſplendid embaſſy to France, with the offer of a perpetual peace and allianee between the two crowns; at the ſame time demanding, in return, the French king's daughter in marriage, with two millions of crowns for her portion; the payment of one million ſix hundred thouſand being the arrears of king John's ranſom; the immediate poſſeſſion and full ſovereignty of Normandy, and the other provinces which had been conquered by the arms of Philip Auguſtus, together with the ſuperiority of Brittany and Flanders. The exorbitant nature of theſe demands ſufficiently indicates, that Henry, notwithſtanding the diſtreſs of the French monarchy, never expected they could be granted. And the terms offered by that court, though greatly inferior, abundantly demonſtrate the conſciouſneſs of their melancholy condition. They agreed to give him the princeſs in marriage, with a portion of eight hundred thouſand crowns; to inveſt him with the entire ſovereignty of Guienne; and to annex to it the counties of Perigord, Rovergne, Xaintonge, Angoumois, and other territories. However, the dauphin, who was a youth of high ſpirit, diſliking theſe conceſſions, and having a mean opinion of Henry, on account of his diſſolute character when prince of Wales, contemptuouſly ſent him, in deriſion, a box of tennis-balls, intimating, that they would afford him a more proper amuſement. Henry, piqued at this ſatirical ſtroke, anſwered, that his balls ſhould be matched with racquets, with which he would play a game that ſhould ſhake the walls of the Louvre. The above terms, offered by the French court, were rejected by Henry, who was determined to erect his ſtandard in the plains of France. The ardour of the nation to follow their ſovereign, exceeded his moſt ſanguine expectations, and freed him from any apprehenſions of his finances being inſufficient for the payment of his forces. The earl of Northumberland levied forty men at arms, and one hundred and twenty archers; the earl of Weſtmoreland the ſame number; the earl of Warwick twenty men at arms, and forty archers; the earl of Suffolk, the lords Zouch, Berkley, d'Arcy, Seymour, Roſs, and Willoughby, contributed four ſhips, one hundred and forty men at arms, and two hundred and eighty archers, and the reſt of the nobility in proportion.

A. D. 1415.

While Henry was thus aſſiduouſly employed in making preparations for a foreign invaſion, he had the mortification to find himſelf in danger from a conſpiracy at home. Richard, earl of Cambridge, ſecond ſon of the late duke of York, having married the ſiſter of the earl of Marche, had entered with great zeal into the intereſts of that family. For this lady being the daughter and heireſs of Lionel, duke of Clarence, the third ſon of Edward III. he became, in right of her, nearer to the crown than Henry, and had reaſon to hope, that on the death of Mortimer, earl of Marche, who had no iſſue, he or his children might ſucceed to the throne. He therefore engaged on his ſide lord Scrope of Marſham, treaſurer of England, and Sir Thomas Grey of Heaton, in Northumberland. They propoſed to crown the earl of Marche; and having exacted from him an oath of ſecrecy, communicated the plan they had formed in his favour; but his fears, or his gratitude, overcoming his ambition, he imparted the whole converſation to Henry. The conſpirators were inſtantly ſeized, and impriſoned in Southampton caſtle, when three of them were indicted before a jury of commoners. The conſtable of that caſtle ſwore, that each of them had confeſſed their guilt to him; and, without any other evidence, Sir Thomas Grey was condemned and executed; but the earl of Cambridge and lord Scrope, pleading the privilege of their peerage, Henry ſummoned a court of eighteen barons, in which the duke of Clarence preſided. The evidence of the jury was read, and brought againſt them; but the priſoners, though one of them a prince of the blood, were not heard in their own defence, nor ſo much as brought into court; but upon this proof received ſentence of death, and were ſoon after executed.

This affair delayed the king's departure till the fifteenth of Auguſt, when he ſailed from Southampton with ſix thouſand men at arms, four and twenty thouſand archers, and about twenty thouſand common infantry, on board a fleet of fifteen hundred ſail. Afrer a quick and eaſy paſſage he landed at the mouth of the Seine in Normandy, about about nine miles from Harfleur, which he immediately inveſted. The place was under the command of Eſtouteville, aſſiſted by ſome of the beſt officers of France, ſtrongly fortified, and provided with a numerous garriſon, who made a gallant defence. But Henry carried on the attack with ſuch unremitted fury, and plied his artillery with ſuch ſucceſs, that a conſiderable breach was made; and the beſieged, finding it impracticable to maintain the place, capitulated, on condition of ſurrendering, if not relieved, a week after Michaelmas. A body of troops, under the command of the marſhal d'Iſle d'Adam, attempted to throw ſuccours into the town, but were repulſed; ſo that the time being expired, the garriſon ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war; and Henry having taken poſſeſſion of Harfleur, peopled it with an Engliſh colony, by cauſing a proclamation to be made throughout England, that all who would ſettle there ſhould have houſes ſecured to them and their heirs. The fatigue of this ſiege, and exceſſive heat of the ſeaſon, had ſo diminiſhed the Engliſh army, that Henry was obliged to think of returning to England; and before he left Harfleur, not above a fourth part of his forces remained in perfect health. Having ſent back his tranſports, which could not ſafely anchor in an open road on the enemy's coaſt, he was under the neceſſity of marching by land to Calais, before he could reach a place of ſecurity. In his march he met with many difficulties, all the bridges of the Somme being broken down, and all the paſſages defended by ſtrong detachments of the enemy. Having at length found means to clear the paſſes, Henry forded the river between St. Quinten and Peronne, and directed his rout towards Blagney. Here he found himſelf in the midſt of an enemy's country, in the ſevere ſeaſon of the year, at the head of a handful of men, exhauſted by diſtemper and fatigue, aud blocked up by an army of one hundred thouſand men. In this emergency he ſent a meſſage to the conſtable of France, offering to reſtore Harfleur, and to repair all the damage he had done; nay, even bind himſelf by oath never more to invade France, if he would allow him to paſs unmoleſted to Calais. The ſame offer had been made by the Black Prince, and this of Henry's was in like manner rejected, the French inſiſting that he and his army ſhould ſurrender at diſcretion. At the ſame time they ſent three heralds to defy him to battle, leaving the time and place to his own choice; he replied, that weakened as his army now was, he would not ſeek an engagement; but as he was determined to make his way to Calais, they might attack him when and where they thought proper. Henry now obſerved from the heights the whole French army drawn up in the plains of Agincourt, and poſted in ſuch a manner, that it was impoſſible for him to continue his march without coming to an engagement. In appearance, nothing could be more unequal than the impending battle. His army conſiſted of little more than half the number which had diſembarked at Harfleur, now almoſt deſtitute of proviſions, and wore down by ſickneſs. The enemy's army, four times more numerous, was headed by the dauphin, and all the princes of the blood, and well ſupplied with accommodations of every kind. Thus Henry's ſituation reſembled that of Edward at Creſſy, and that of the Black Prince at Poictiers; and the memory of thoſe glorious victories, inſpiring his troops with freſh courage, made them hope for the like ſucceſs. The French commanders, vainly confident from their ſuperiority in point of numbers, gave notice on the twenty-ſecond of October to the king of England, that they would engage him on the twenty-fifth. Finding it impoſſible to avoid an action, he accepted the challenge, and preſented the herald who brought it with a rich robe, and two hundred crowns. During this interval of three days, Henry employed every expedient which prudence could ſuggeſt, in order to prepare his men for the approaching combat. He procured them ſuch refreſhment as the nature of their ſituation would afford; he cauſed their weapons and armour to be repaired; he fixed ſharp ſtakes for the defence of his archers; he was conſtantly on horſeback, riding through the ranks of his army, to ſuperintend the œconomy of his camp, and to animate his ſoldiers, reminding them of the great victories obtained by their forefathers in France; yet he gave them to underſtand, that the extraordinary efforts of valour alone, could preſerve them from death or captivity. His affability, activity, confidence, and addreſs, inſpired his ſoldiers with ſuch martial ardour, that far from dreading the numbers of the enemy, they only wiſhed eagerly for the battle, and bore their diſtreſſes with an heroic firmneſs, in hopes of being relieved by a ſpeedy victory. This ſpirit remarkably appeared on the day preceding the battle. Henry having ſent David Gam, a Welch captain, to reconnoitre the poſture and ſtrength of the enemy, on his return, being interrogated by the king concerning the numbers of the French, that brave officer replied, "My liege, there are enough to be killed, enough to be taken priſoners, and enough to run away." Far different from this prudent conduct of Henry, was the arrogant behaviour of the French generals, who ſpent their time in riot and rejoicing, haughtily boaſting their ſuperiority of numbers, and conſidering the ſmall handful of Engliſh, whom they vainly deſpiſed, as victims devoted to ſure deſtruction. They were ſo confident of victory, that they are ſaid to have played at dice for the Engliſh priſoners before they were taken; and to have ſent orders to the neighbouring villages to prepare lodgings for thoſe ſtrangers. On the morning of the engagement, their inſolence and preſumption roſe to ſuch a pitch, that they detached another herald to Henry, to know what he propoſed to give for his ranſom. This inſult he received with juſt diſdain; and deſired the herald to tell thoſe who ſent him, that a little time would decide to whom the ranſom belonged.

The Battle of AGINCOURT named by

As ſoon as it was light on the day appointed for the battle, the two armies marſhalled their forces. The conſtable d'Albert, who commanded the French, was guilty of a capital error, in chuſing a narrow piece of ground, flanked by a rivulet and thick wood, where he could not extend his front ſo as to encloſe the Engliſh, and where his ſuperiority of numbers, inſtead of being an advantage, was a burden and incumbrance. The conſtable divided his army into three bodies; he himſelf, accompanied by the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, with many other nobles, took their ſtation at the head of the van. The ſecond line was commanded by the duke of Alençon, aſſiſted by the duke of Bar; and at the head of the third body were the counts of Marle, Fauquenberg, Dampmartin, and the ſieur de Lauroy. While the French were employed in arranging theſe lines, Henry concealed four hundred lances in a wood upon the right, and about two hundred and fifty choice archers on the left, in a low meadow covered with buſhes. In order to extend his front equal to that of the enemy, he was obliged to form his little army into one line: the right wing, commanded by the duke of York, with the lords Beaumont, Willoughby, and Stanhope, was advanced a little before the center, which the king commanded in perſon, aſſiſted by his brother the duke of Glouceſter, the earl marſhal, and the young earl of Suffolk, whoſe father died at Harfleur. The left, which was called the rear, as it had not advanced ſo far as the other two diviſions, was under the command of the duke of Exeter. Nothing could be more prudent than this diſpoſition, which was made by the advice of Sir Thomas Erpingham, an old experienced ſoldier, who acted this day as Henry's marſhal, and was appointed to give the ſignal for the attack. The king himſelf appeared in front of the army in ſplendid armour, mounted on a ſtately white coarſer, with a golden crown, fixed by way of creſt, to his helmet. Four royal banners were diſplayed before him; he was followed by a great number of led horſes, in rich capariſons, and ſurrounded by the chief of his court and army. The French ſtood for ſome time in order of battle, at the diſtance of two hundred and fifty paces, without proceeding to the attack; and Henry began to think, that they intended to ſtarve him into a ſurrender, which would have been their wiſeſt courſe, as his proviſions were quite exhauſted, and the weather ſo rainy, that it would have been impracticable to have kept the field. Henry immediately rode along the line, and exhorted his ſoldiers to behave like Engliſhmen: and then alighting from his horſe, took his ſtation in the center of the main body, ordering Sir Thomas Erpingham to throw up his truncheon into the air as a ſignal for the attack. Immediately the whole line, raiſing a loud ſhout, ruſhed forward to the charge; but Henry, fearing they would be out of breath before they could come to cloſe fight, ordered them to halt about midway, where the archers planted their picquets, to defend themſelves from the French cavalry. At the ſame time a body of choſen archers advancing ſome paces, diſcharged a flight of arrows which did amazing execution. The French had drawn up before their front line two thouſand four hundred horſe, all, with their riders covered with armour for receiving the firſt diſcharge of the Engliſh arrows; after which they propoſed to break in among the archers, who being once diſordered, their rout was to be completed by the reſt of the army. But this diſpoſition was vain, when oppoſed to the barbed arrow ſent from an Engliſh arm. Every ſhaft took place, and even pierced the armour of the Frenchmen at arms; and the conſtable, ſeeing the moſt advanced of the Engliſh archers finiſhing with their battle-axes and daggers the ſlaughter they had begun, ordered his firſt line to advance, which they did to great diſadvantage; for the horſes, which eſcaped the arrows of the Engliſh, bore their riders headlong through their own ranks, while the heavy armour of the French, both horſe and foot, rendered it extremely difficult for them to move through a miry ſoil to the attack. The Engliſh archers, on the other hand, being lightly armed, and ſupported by a body of pioneers, fell back behind their pointed ſtakes into their ranks, which they kept entire, and gave another general diſcharge of their arrows ſo cloſe and deadly, that the French began to reel through the deepeſt ranks of their firſt column. The troops that lay in ambuſh on each ſide now ſuddenly charging them in flank, increaſed the diſorder, which the archers perceiving, flung their bows; and ruſhing upon them with their battle-axes and daggers, made a terrible ſlaughter. The front line, conſiſting of the beſt troops in France, animated by the preſence of many noblemen, and commanded by the conſtable in perſon, could not ſuſtain the impetuoſity of the Engliſh; and by the narrowneſs of the ground, being prevented from due exertion of their ſtrength, as well as thrown into diſorder, all oppoſition was at an end; while the archers ruſhed in among them, and covered the field with the killed, wounded, and diſmounted. Yet, notwithſtanding the conſtable and many principal officers were ſlain, and even their firſt line entirely routed, the battle ſtill remained undecided; for the ſecond line, commanded by the duke of Alençon, ſtood firm; and on perceiving the rout of the firſt diviſion, advanced to repair the diſgrace of their countrymen; whereupon thoſe of the Engliſh who were fatigued with action retired behind the main body to recruit their ſpirits, and form themſelves anew; while Henry in perſon led up his diviſion to the charge, and a dreadful conteſt enſued, eſpecially round the king's perſon. D'Alençon, in order to ſnatch, if poſſible, the victory from the enemy, commanded eighteen French knights of approved valour, to watch attentively the motions of the Engliſh monarch, and to uſe their utmoſt efforts to kill or take him priſoner. But the genius of Henry ſaved him from this imminent danger. Animated with the ſurprizing ſucceſs of his archers, added to his natural vivacity and courage, the king diſmounted from his horſe, and performed exploits of valour, which aſtoniſhed, not only his own army, but alſo that of the enemy, whom he charged with a fury almoſt irreſiſtible, and was met by d'Alençon with a firmneſs that deſerved a better fate. The French knights, who had never loſt ſight of Henry, made their way ſword in hand to the place where he fought, and one of them ſtunned him with a battle-axe. In all probability he would have fallen a ſacrifice to the aſſault of theſe furious aſſociates, had not David Gam, and two other officers, perceiving the danger that threatened their ſovereign, ruſhed in between him and the aſſailants, and ſacrificed their own perſons for his ſafety. All the eighteen knights paid for their temerity with their lives. Gam, and his two valiant countrymen, were alſo mortally wounded; and Henry, when he had recovered his ſpirits, to ſhew his gratitude for their generous aſſiſtance, knighted thoſe three gallant ſoldiers, as they lay upon the field of battle, expiring of their wounds. Having paid this tribute of acknowledgment to merit and loyalty, the king, to revenge the late attempt upon his life, darted into the thickeſt part of the battle, and was again ſurrounded by a hoſt of foes. His brother, the duke of Glouceſter, who had fought by his ſide, was ſtruck to the ground, and the enemy preſſed in crowds to avail themſelves of the incident. Henry, who was a ſtranger to fear, covered the body of his brother with his ſhield, and defended him with his ſword. While in this critical ſituation, the duke of York advanced to his aſſiſtance at the head of a freſh body of troops. The enemy were intimidated; they fell back; by which means Henry and his brother had time to recover their ſtrength. Another reinforcement immediately followed, and Henry again attacked the French with ſuch fury, that they were unable to ſupport the ſhock, and a horrid ſlaughter enſued. In the mean time, the duke d'Alençon, with a ſpirit worthy his blood and rank, made one furious effort, determined either to retrieve the battle, or ſpare himſelf the mortification of ſurviving the diſgrace of his country. He put himſelf at the head of a choſen body of volunteers, and, cutting away to the ſpot where Henry fought in perſon, ruſhed upon the Engliſh monarch, killed the duke of York by his ſide; and then turning furiouſly towards Henry, cleft his golden crown with the firſt ſtroke of his ſword; but he had not time to repeat the blow; for Henry returned the ſalutation in ſuch an effectual manner as brought him to the ground, and with his own hand ſlew two of his attendants. He endeavoured to ſave the life of Alençon; but the guards were ſo exaſperated at his daring attempt, that they diſpatched him before the king could interpoſe effectually in his behalf. The death of this general put an end to all farther oppoſition. But the third line were ſtill entire, and more numerous than the whole Engliſh army. They were freſh and vigorous, while the victors were faint with the fatigue of action, which was increaſed by a flux, that had for ſome time prevailed among them; yet the French were ſo intimidated by the defeat of the other two lines, and the terrible havock which had been made among their countrymen, that they refuſed to obey the command of their generals; and, inſtead of advancing to the charge, retired from the field of battle; though they ſtill continued in a body, until Henry ſent a herald to declare, that if they remained in that poſture till he ſhould overtake them, he would put them all to the ſword without mercy. Alarmed at this declaration they inſtantly diſperſed, and left him ſole maſter of the field. But before he had time to receive congratulations on his victory, he was informed the French were in his rear, and in poſſeſſion of his camp; concluding, therefore, that they intended to renew the battle, he inſtantly ordered all the priſoners to be put to death, except thoſe of the moſt diſtinguiſhed quality; which cruel order was punctually executed. He then marched toward his camp, and found it already pillaged by a body of fugitives, who retiring by times out of the field, and knowing that the Engliſh camp was but weakly guarded, plundered it while the two armies were engaged, but retired at Henry's approach. The above maſſacre has caſt a ſtain on this glorious battle; but it appeared to Henry unavoidable, from the impoſſibility of the Engliſh being able to guard their priſoners, who are ſaid to have equalled or exceeded their conquerors; and the king's juſt apprehenſions, leſt, during the fight, which he imagined on the point of being renewed, they ſhould turn againſt him. Nothing now remaining to oppoſe his victorious arms, his firſt care was to return thanks to God for ſo ſignal a deliverance and victory; and he ordered proclamation to be made, that it ſhould be aſcribed to divine power alone. He then ſent for Montjoy, a French herald, who had been diſpatched from the dauphin to obtain permiſſion to bury the dead; and aſked him, to whom he thought the victory belonged? the herald replied, to the Engliſh; upon which he deſired to know the name of a village, to which he pointed with his finger; and being informed that it was known by the name of Agincourt, "This action then, ſaid he, ſhall henceforth be called the battle of Agincourt."

In this memorable action, fought on the twenty-fifth of October, which began about ten in the morning, and laſted till five in the afternoon, the French are ſaid to have loſt three dukes, ſix earls, ninety barons, fifteen hundred knights, and ſeven thouſand eſquires, or gentlemen. Among the priſoners, which amounted to fourteen thouſand before the maſſacre, the moſt eminent of thoſe who were ſaved were the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the earls of Eu, Vendome, Richemont, Etouteville, and marſhal Boucicaut. The perſons of chief note who fell among the Engliſh, were the duke of York, with the young earl of Suffolk; and their whole loſs is ſaid not to have exceeded four hundred men. The king having refreſhed his men at Marcoucelly by a plentiful ſupply of all neceſſaries out of the French camp, reſumed his march for Calais, where he arrived without meeting with farther oppoſition. About the middle of November he embarked for England with his priſoners, and, after a dangerous paſſage, landed at Dover. Thence he proceeded to London, and was received by the citizens with all the honours due to the reſtorer of Engliſh glory.

A. D. 1416.

The emperor Sigiſmond had been for ſome time at the court of France, and drew up the plan of a truce which he intended to communicate to Henry. Accordingly he repaired to Calais, where he was nobly entertained by the earl of Warwick, governor of that place, and received ſafe conduct for himſelf and all his retinue, conſiſting of a thouſand horſe, among whom were the count Palatine of the Rhine, the duke of Milan, the marquiſſes of Ferrara, Mantua, and Montferrat; count Bertold of Hungary; the prince of Orange; the duke of Paleſtine; and many others of the German and Italian nobility. While Sigiſmond continued in France, he had aſſumed an air of ſovereignty, that ſeemed to riſe from a notion that emperors enjoyed a power ſuperior to that of kings. Henry, informed of this arrogant behaviour, determined to give his imperial majeſty to underſtand, that the king and people of England knew no earthly ſuperior. Accordingly, the duke of Glouceſter, and other noblemen, were ordered to receive the emperor at his landing, and inform him of this reſolution. He was brought over under the convoy of a magnificent fleet of Engliſh ſhips; and approaching the ſhore, found Glouceſter and his retinue drawn up on the ſtrand, who advancing into the water with their ſwords drawn, ſtopped the boats. This extraordinary proceeding was followed by a declaration from the duke of Clarence, in the name of the king and the people of England, "That if his imperial majeſty was come as a friend, an ally, and a mediator of peace, they were ready to receive him with all the reſpect and honours due to his high dignity; but that the crown and nation of England being free and independent, they were ready to oppoſe his landing, if he claimed any power as a paramount ſovereign." The emperor declaring to the ſatisfaction of all preſent, that his intentions were friendly and pacific, was received on ſhore with the moſt profound demonſtrations of regard. He was met by Henry himſelf at Blackheath, and conducted firſt to London, and then to Windſor, where he was inſtalled, with extraordinary pomp, a knight of the noble order of the garter.

A. D. 1417.

The loſs which the French ſuſtained at the battle of Agincourt, was ſo far from being ſufficient to put a period to the fury of factions in France, that they continued to rage with ſtill greater violence. The diſcredit into which the French miniſters and generals had fallen by the late diſgraceful defeat, encouraged the duke of Burgundy to approach Paris with a great army, thinking to recover the poſſeſſion of the government, and the king's perſon. But his partizans in the city being over-awed by the court, were afraid to join him; on which the duke, deſpairing of ſucceſs, retired with his forces into the Netherlands, where he diſbanded them. The next year the duke was invited to make a new attempt, by the violent quarrels which broke out even in the royal family. Iſabella, the queen, the duke of Bavaria's daughter, had been hitherto the profeſſed enemy to the duke of Burgundy; but having been moſt injuriouſly treated by the other party, that princeſs's implacable ſpirit could not ſtoop to forgive it. The count of Armagnac, who had been created conſtable of France in the room of d'Albert, was obliged by the public neceſſities to ſeize the great treaſures amaſſed by Iſabella; and her expreſſing her reſentment for this injury, he inſtilled into the weak mind of the king a jealouſy of this princeſs, and induced him to ſeize, put to the torture, and throw into the Seine, Bois-Bourdon, her favourite, whom he accuſed of carrying on a criminal converſation with the queen. She herſelf was ſent to Tours, and confined under a ſtrong guard. This injurious treatment induced her to enter into a correſpondence with the duke of Burgundy; and her ſon Charles, the dauphin, a youth of ſixteen, being entirely governed by the oppoſite faction, ſhe extended her animoſity to him; and, with moſt unrelenting relenting hatred, ſought his deſtruction. She ſoon had an opportunity of being revenged; for, in concert with her, the duke of Burgundy, at the head of a great army, entered France, and made himſelf maſter of Amiens, Abbeville, and other towns in Picardy; Rheims, Senlis, Auxerre, Chalons, and Troye, declared themſelves of his party. He took poſſeſſion of Beaumont, Meulant, Pontoiſe, and Vernon, which were in the neighbourhood of Paris; and extending his progreſs towards the weſt, made himſelf maſter of Etampes, Chartres, and other fortreſſes; and at laſt delivered the queen; when flying to Troye, ſhe declared openly againſt the miniſters, who, ſhe ſaid, held in captivity the king her huſband. In the mean time the duke of Burgundy's partizans raiſed an inſurrection in Paris; and Lile Adam, one of the duke's captains, being received into the city in the night, placed himſelf at the head of the people, who inſtantly became ſo ſtrong, that nothing could oppoſe them. They ſeized the king's perſon, while the dauphin, with much difficulty, made his eſcape. They inſtantly butchered great numbers of the faction of Armagnac, and threw the count himſelf, and many perſons of note, into priſon: under the colour of party, murders were daily committed from private animoſity, and at length the populace, breaking into the priſons, killed the count of Armagnac, and the reſt of the nobility who were confined. In this confuſion, ill prepared to reſiſt a foreign enemy, was France, when Henry landed in Normandy, on the firſt of Auguſt, at the head of an army of twenty-eight thouſand men; and finding little reſiſtance, ſoon made himſelf maſter of Falaiſe and Cherburg, Caen and Evreux ſubmitted to him; Point de l'Arche fell into his hands; and having ſubdued lower Normandy, and obtained a reinforcement of fifteen thouſand men from England, he laid ſiege to Rouen, which had a garriſon of four thouſand men, ſeconded by the inhabitants, who amounted to fifteen thouſand. Here the cardinal des Urſins endeavoured to moderate Henry's pretenſions, and incline him towards a peace: but the king fully ſenſible of his advantages, anſwered, "Do you not ſee, that God has conducted me hither, as by his hand? France has no ſovereign: I have a juſt claim to that kingdom: every thing here is in the utmoſt confuſion, and no one thinks of reſiſting me. Can I have a more convincing proof, that the great Being, who diſpoſes of empires, has determined to place the crown of France upon my head?" However, Henry, though under the influence of ambition, carried on a negociation with his enemies, endeavouring to obtain advantages that were more ſecure, but leſs conſiderable. He offered terms of peace to both parties; to the queen and duke of Burgundy, who had the appearance of legal authority, from their having the king in their poſſeſſion; and to the dauphin, who being undoubted heir to the crown, was adhered to by all who had any regard to the intereſt of their country. A continual negociation was alſo carried on between the two parties with each other; while the terms on each ſide were perpetually varying, and the fate of France remained for a long time in the utmoſt uncertainty. At length Henry propoſed to the queen and the duke of Burgundy, to conclude a peace with them; to marry the princeſs Catherine; and to be ſatisfied with receiving all the provinces ceded to Edward III, with the addition of Normandy, of which he was to enjoy the entire ſovereignty. To theſe terms they ſubmitted, and only ſome circumſtances remained to be adjuſted: but during this interval, the duke of Burgundy and the dauphin ſecretly concluded a treaty, in which they agreed to ſhare the royal authority, during the life of the king, and to unite their arms againſt a foreign enemy. This alliance, which appeared to exclude Henry from all his hopes of ſucceſs, proved of advantage to him. It is uncertain whether the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy were ſincere in theſe engagements: however they agreed to an interview, in order to concert the means of expelling the Engliſh: yet it ſeemed difficult to contrive in what manner this conference might be carried on with ſafety. The aſſaſſination which the duke of Burgundy had perpetrated, and his open avowal of that baſe, cruel act, tended to diſſolve all the bands of ſociety, and every reaſon for confidence in him. Hence the duke agreed to every contrivance for their mutual ſecurity, propoſed by the dauphin's miniſters. The two princes went to Montereau: the dauphin lodged in the town, and the duke in the caſtle, which was divided from the town by the river Yonne. The place choſen for the interview was the bridge between them, and two high rails were placed acroſs it: the gates on each ſide were guarded; one by the dauphin's officers, and the other by thoſe of the duke. The princes, each accompained by ten perſons, were to enter the intermediate ſpace by the oppoſite gates; and amidſt all theſe marks of diffidence to conciliate their mutual friendſhip. But no precaution can afford ſecurity where the principles of honour are abandoned. Thoſe who attended the dauphin having been the zealous partizans of the late duke of Orleans, reſolved to ſeize this opportunity of revenging on the aſſaſſin that prince's murder; and no ſooner entered the rails, than, drawing their ſwords, they attacked and ſlew the duke of Burgundy, while his friends ſtruck with aſtoniſhment, made not the leaſt defence, and either ſhared his fate, or were taken priſoners, by the dauphin's retinue. It was at firſt a matter of doubt, whether the dauphin was admitted into the ſecret of this conſpiracy; but the deed having been committed by his moſt intimate friends, who were alſo chief officers of his houſhold, and his detaining thoſe aſſaſſins in his ſervice, fixed the blame of the action entirely upon him. The moſt dreadful conſequences followed the perpetration of this deſperate crime. The inhabitants of Paris, who were zealouſly devoted to the duke of Burgundy, were inflamed with fury againſt the dauphin. King Charles's court entered into the ſame views; and as all that monarch's miniſters were indebted to the late duke for their preferment, and foreſeeing, that if the dauphin recovered the poſſeſſion of his father's perſon, it would involve them in diſgrace, they eagerly endeavoured to prevent, by every means, the ſucceſs of his enterprize. Every ſentiment of honour and patriotiſm, and even perſonal intereſt gave way to the tranſports of revenge. The queen, who ſtill maintained her animoſity againſt her ſon, increaſed the general flame; at the ſame time Philip count of Charolois, the new duke of Burgundy, imagined himſelf bound by all the obligations of duty and honour, to revenge his father's murder. Amidſt this general rage of parties, the expulſion of the lawful heir, the ſubjection to a foreign enemy, and the ſlavery of the kingdom, appeared but ſmall evils, while they led to the gratification of private paſſions. Henry, before the death of the duke of Burgundy, had, after an obſtinate ſiege, taken the city of Rouen: Pontoiſe and Giſors fell into his hands; he even advanced to the gates of Paris, and had obliged the court to remove to Troye. A league between him and the preſent duke of Burgundy was concluded. That prince agreed to all Henry's demands, making no other ſtipulation for himſelf, but the proſecution of his father's murder, and the duke of Bedford's marriage with his ſiſter.

A. D. 1420.

To put the finiſhing ſtroke to this treaty, Henry, accompained by his two brothers the dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter, went ſent to Troye, where a peace was ratified, on the twenty-third of May, by the oath of the contracting parties: the queen and the duke of Burgundy acting as proxies for king Charles. On this important occaſion, Henry preſented the princeſs Catherine with a ring of great value, and the marriage contract was immediately ſettled, though the nuptials were not conſummated till the ſecond of June. After the ſolemnization of the marriage, the two courts proceeded to Sens, which was already inveſted by the Engliſh and Burgundian forces, and after a reſiſtance of ten days, ſurrendered to Henry by capitulation. With the ſame eaſe he ſubdued Montereau; but that of Melun was attended with greater difficulty, Barbazan, the governor, defending the place with the moſt invincible obſtinacy, till compelled by famine to ſurrender. Henry promiſed to ſpare the lives of all the garriſon, except of ſuch as had been concerned in the murder of the late duke of Burgundy; and as the governor himſelf was ſtrongly ſuſpected of having been one of the aſſaſſins, the preſent duke inſiſted on his immediate puniſhment; but Henry, who admired him for his brave and gallant defence, interceded in his favour, and prevented his execution, though he was committed to cloſe cuſtody, in the Chateau-Galliard, where he remained a priſoner upwards of twenty years. The treaty of Troye conſiſted of a great number of articles, the principal of which were; that Henry ſhould marry the princeſs Catherine; that king Charles, during his life, ſhould enjoy the title and dignity of king of France; that Henry ſhould be acknowledged heir to that kingdom, of which he ſhould be regent, and entruſted with the adminiſtration of the preſent government: that the crown of France ſhould deſcend to his heirs; that France and England ſhould for ever be united under one king, but ſhould ever retain their ſeveral diſtinct uſages, cuſtoms and privileges; that all the princes, peers, vaſſals, and communities of France, ſhould ſwear, that they would adhere to the future ſucceſſion of Henry, and alſo pay him obedience as regent: that Henry ſhould unite his arms with thoſe of Charles and the duke of Burgundy, in order to ſubdue the adherents of the preſent dauphin; and that thoſe princes ſhould make neither peace nor truce with him, unleſs by common conſent and agreement. This extraordinary treaty, could be dictated by nothing but private animoſity; and had it taken effect, it is difficult to determine, whether it would have proved moſt prejudicial to England or France. It would have reduced the former kingdom to the form of a province; and with reſpect to the latter, it would have brought on the deſtruction of many great families, whoſe titles being preferable to that of the Engliſh princes, they would have been expoſed to the perpetual jealouſy of the king. Henry's claim was in every reſpect deficient: for beſides the inſuperable objections to which the pretenſions of Edward III. were expoſed, Henry was not heir to that monarch; for if the female ſucceſſion were admitted, the right had devolved to the houſe of Mortimer. Amidſt the hurry of contending paſſions, which actuated the courts of France and Burgundy, theſe conſiderations were overlooked, yet we may reaſonably ſuppoſe they would neceſſarily have revived in more tranquil times. Henry was therefore under the neceſſity of purſuing his preſent advantages, and allowing no time for reaſon and reflection. In a few days after this treaty, he made his public entry into Paris, with great magnificence, when the ſtates of the kingdom, and the parliament, ratified the treaty, and ſwore obedience to the king of England, who aſſumed the reins of government as regent of the kingdom. But the ſeeds of envy were now ſown between the Engliſh monarchy and the duke of Burgundy, the latter of whom took great umbrage at the former's engroſſing the whole direction of affairs, and leaving him a mere cypher in the adminiſtration.

A. D. 1421.

Charles having ſummoned an extraordinary council in the beginning of January, the duke of Burgundy appeared in deep mourning, and demanded juſtice on the murderers of his father. The dauphin, with his accomplices, being ſummoned to appear at the marble table, and paying no regard to the citation, were convicted, attainted, and condemned to perpetual exile; and that prince, on the other hand, appealed to God and his own ſword, from the ſentence, as well as all proceedings that might be carried on to his prejudice, in the name of his father. The remote provinces, which had not been expoſed to the attacks of the Engliſh, ſtill adhered to the dauphin, and even many places, in the neighbourhood of Paris; ſo that Henry had an arduous taſk to perform, before the war could be finiſhed, eſpecially as his troops were extremely diſguſtful to the French nation. Being under the neceſſity of procuring ſupplies, he was obliged to paſs over into England. Having placed Engliſh governors in the fortreſſes he had ſubdued, he committed the government of Paris, during his abſence, to his uncle the duke of Exeter, and the command of the army to the duke of Clarence.

On his arrival in England, about the latter end of February, the queen was crowned, and a parliament ſummoned to meet at Weſtminſter, on the ſecond of May. When aſſembled, the king could obtain only a ſubſidy of one fifteenth: a ſcanty ſupply, which ſhews they were not highly pleaſed with his victories; and that in proportion as the proſpect of their being united to France became nearer, they began to ſee the dangerous conſequences, which might attend that event. Henry had now however other reſources. The provinces he had already ſubdued, ſupported his troops, and all ambitious men in England were allured to his ſtandard. He therefore eaſily raiſed a new army of four thouſand men at arms, and twenty-four thouſand archers, with whom he marched to Dover, the place of embarkation.

During the abſence of Henry from France, the dauphin, aſſiſted by a body of ſeven thouſand Scots, under the command of the earl of Buchan, had defeated the duke of Clarence, Henry's brother in Anjou. The two armies came to an engagement at Bouge, in which the Engliſh, being overpowered by numbers, were defeated, and the duke himſelf was wounded in the face by Sir Allan Swinton, a Scotch knight, and killed by the earl of Buchan. The Engliſh had fifteen hundred men killed and a great number taken priſoners. Among the ſlain were the earls of Kent, the lords Gray and Roſs, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction; and among the priſoners, were the earls of Somerſet, Dorſet and Huntingdon. This was the firſt battle in which the Engliſh were defeated; and the dauphin, in order to reward the conduct of the earl of Buchan, and attach the Scots to his ſervice, created that nobleman a conſtable of France.

But Henry's arrival with his army, appeared more than ſufficient to repair this loſs. He was received at Paris, with great expreſſions of joy, and immediately proceeded to Chartres, which had been for a long time beſieged by the dauphin, who now, on the approach of the Engliſh, raiſed the ſiege, and retired with his army. Henry then took poſſeſſion of Dreux, without oppoſition; after which, at the ſolicitation of the Pariſians, he inveſted Meaux, and carried on the ſiege during eight months. The baſtard of Varus, governor of Meaux, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his obſtinate defence, was obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion. This officer's cruelty was upon a level with his valour, he being accuſtomed to hang all the Engliſh and Burgundians that fell into his hands; and to revenge this barbarity, Henry ordered him inſtantly to be hanged on the ſame tree, on which his inhuman executions had been performed. The reduction of Meaux was followed by many other places, and the dauphin was obliged to abandon almoſt all the northern provinces. This ſeries of proſperity was crowned by the queen being delivered of a ſon, who was called by his father's name. The infant prince appeared to be univerſally regarded as the future heir of both kingdoms; and his birth was celebrated by rejoicings, that were no leſs pompous at Paris than at London.

A. D. 1422. Henry had now almoſt reached the ſummit of his touring ambition, conſidered as a king. By his prudent adminiſtration, he had ſecured the affections of his ſubjects in England: by keeping the king of Scots in his poſſeſſion, he prevented that people from making incurſions into the northern counties: by his undaunted valour, and a concurrence of favourable circumſtances, he had ſubjected, in a ſhort ſpace of time, the greateſt part of the extenſive kingdom of France; but his career of glory was now arreſted by the king of terrors, and all his mighty projects vaniſhed like the miſt of the morning. Through the hardſhips and fatigues he had undergone, he contracted an acute fever, accompained with a dyſentery, which ſoon made him ſenſible that his end was approaching. He ſent for his brother, the duke of Exeter, the earl of Warwick, and ſeveral other noblemen, who happened to be near him, that they might hear his laſt injunctions. Accoſting them with a chearful countenance, he obſerved, that his reign, though ſhort, had been glorious; that though his pretenſions to the crown of France had occaſioned much bloodſhed, yet thoſe calamities, the natural conſequences of war, ought not to be imputed to him, but to thoſe, whoſe obſtinacy and injuſtice had forced him to have recourſe to arms, by refuſing to accept of an honourable peace; that with reſpect to himſelf, he could meet death without the leaſt concern, but could not help lamenting the fate of the infant prince, his ſon, who, from his tender age, was incapable of finiſhing a work he had ſo happily begun. He therefore conjured them, in the name of the moſt High, to preſerve an inviolable fidelity and attachment to the young prince, who was born to be their ſovereign; to watch over his education; and as much as lay in their power, conſole the queen in her affliction: he exhorted them to cultivate the friendſhip of the duke of Burgundy; to detain the priſoners who had been taken at the battle of Agincourt, till his ſon ſhould be capable of managing the reins of government; and whatever accommodation they might think neceſſary to make with the court of France, to preſerve to the crown of England the abſolute ſovereignty of Normandy. He concluded, with expreſſing a deſire, that the duke of Bedford might aſſume the adminiſtration of France, that the duke of Glouceſter might act as regent of England, during the prince's minority, aud that the earl of Warwick ſhould have the care of his ſon's perſon. Having thus delivered his ſentiments concerning the management of public affairs, he enquired of his phyſicians, how long they thought he had to live? when one of them falling on his knees by the bed-ſide, ſaid with tears in his eyes, that without a miracle he could not live above two hours. This declaration he heard with the utmoſt compoſure, and having made confeſſion of his ſins, ordered his chaplain to read the ſeven penitential pſalms. When he came to that paſſage of the fifty firſt pſalm, "Build thou the walls of Jeruſalem," he interrupted him, and declared on the word of a dying prince, that it was his full intention, after he had eſtabliſhed a peace with France, to have made a cruſade againſt the infidels, for the recovery of Jeruſalem out of their hands. This exerciſe of devotion being finiſhed, Henry expired, on the thirty-firſt of Auguſt, in the thirty-fourth year of his age, after a glorious reign of nine years, five months, and eleven days, being the XXXIIId king of England from Egbert I. His body was brought to England, and interred among his anceſtors in Weſtminſter-abbey, with a pomp ſuitable to the grandeur he enjoyed when living, and to the eſteem of his ſubjects; and the queen, in honour of her illuſtrious conſort, cauſed to be laid on his tomb a ſtatue of ſilver gilt, extremely like him, and as large as life. By his queen, Catherine of France, he left only one ſon, named Henry, whoſe miſfortunes in the courſe of his life, ſurpaſſed all the glories and ſucceſſes of his father. Henry's widow, ſoon after his death, married a Welch gentleman, called Sir Owen Tudor, and ſaid to be deſcended from the ancient princes of Wales: ſhe bore him two ſons, Edmund and Jaſper, of whom, the eldeſt was created earl of Richmond; the ſecond, earl of Pembroke. The family of Tudor, firſt raiſed to diſtinction by this alliance, mounted afterwards the throne of England.

The ordinary revenue of the crown, during this reign, amounted only to fifty-five thouſand, ſeven hundred, fourteen pounds, ten ſhillings, and ten pence a year, which muſt have been about one hundred, ten thouſand pounds of our preſent money, and from the cheapneſs of proviſions, was equivalent to about three hundred and thirty thouſand pounds ſterling. The ordinary expence of the government amounted to forty-two thouſand, five hundred, ſeven pounds, ſixteen ſhillings, and tenpence; whence the king had only a ſurplus of thirteen thouſand, two hundred and ſix pounds, fourteen ſhillings, for the ſupport of his houſhold, his wardrobe, the expence of embaſſies and other articles; on which account he was frequently obliged to have recourſe to parliament for ſupplies. War was then attended with an expence, which neither the king's ordinary revenue, nor his extraordinary ſupplies were able to ſupport. Hence the ſovereign was commonly reduced to the neceſſity of borrowing money from all quarters: he pawned his jewels, and ſometimes the crown itſelf; notwithſtanding which, he was often forced to ſtop in the midſt of his victories, and to grant a truce to the enemy, till he could gain a freſh ſupply; and Henry, till within a year of his death, owed debts, which he had contracted when prince of Wales.

Character of king Henry V.

In ſtature, he was ſomewhat above the middle ſize; his countenance was engaging; his limbs genteel and ſlender, but full of vigour. He excelled in all warlike exerciſes; and was able to endure cold, hunger, and fatigue to as great a degree, as the moſt hardy ſoldier in his army. His abilities in the cabinet were equal to thoſe diſplayed in the field; and it is hard to determine, whether his courage or policy deſerve our higheſt encomiums. He had the art, with a moſt engaging deportment, to win the affections of his friends by affability, and of recovering the good opinion of his enemies by clemency and addreſs. He was religious, without ſuperſtition, or enthuſiaſm; juſt, without rigour or partiality; and complaiſant, without mean condeſcenſion, or ſelf-intereſted views. He was no more tenacious of the prerogatives of the crown, than the privileges of the ſubject, and ſwayed his ſcepter with ſuch equal poiſe, that under him virtue never loſt its reward, corruption never found an excuſe, nor oppreſſion a ſanctuary; excepting a few inſtances of religious controverſy; and even theſe he obviated in ſome meaſure as a man, when he was under a kind of neceſſity to tolerate them as a king. The boldneſs of his enterprizes was as remarkable as that perſonal valour with which he conducted them; and his warlike exploits have principally engaged the pens of antient and modern hiſtorians.

The conqueſt of France, conſidered in itſelf, had ſomething in it grand and glorious; yet that conqueſt, with the ſtruggles of the Engliſh to preſerve it, coſt the nation a deluge of blood. Henry could not be ignorant of the weakneſs of his title to the crown of France; yet in ſupport of this he laid waſte the faireſt provinces of that kingdom; at a time too when the civil diſſentions of the French rendered them unable to defend themſelves. But in viewing theſe kind of tranſactions, and eſpecially in drawing the characters of great men, who flouriſhed in former times, we ought never to loſe ſight of the prevalence of predominant paſſions, the ruling manners, cuſtoms and vices of the age, whereby people ſaw not the deformity of a conduct in particular inſtances, which in theſe days cannot be reconciled to the principles of humanity, and much leſs to the precepts of our moſt holy religion. Neglectful of the liberal arts, which expand the human mind, and direct it to more worthy purſuits, untaught in the grand leſſon of univerſal benevolence, the principal objects in thoſe days were war and ſuperſtition. Princes being trained up in arbitrary maxims, conſidered the bulk of mankind as ſlaves devoted to their intereſt and ambition: they were taught to expect forgiveneſs, or that the moſt atrocious crimes were eaſily expiated, by devotional exerciſes, benefactions to the church, or a cruſade in the holy land. Is it to be wondered then, that corrupt practices ſhould flow from ſuch corrupt principles? eſpecially if we conſider, that conſtitutional failures are palliated by the ſlighteſt conſiderations, and conſcience is readily brought over to diſpenſe with the gratification of any ruling paſſion? Henry was not without ambition, the common vice of monarchs; yet conſidered as a king of England, with regard to public liberty and private affections, he was, perhaps, the moſt unexceptionable of all the Norman race. He had no material diſputes with his parliament; he refuſed no ſalutary acts; he adopted no unconſtitutional meaſures; this conduct made the crown ſit eaſy on his own head, and ſtrengthened his ſcepter when committed to delegated power. A diſtinguiſhed warrior he certainly was; and alſo poſſeſſed thoſe milder virtues, which in a peaceful reign would have contributed to the proſperity and happineſs of his people. His forgiving the earl of Marche, is a ſufficient proof of his magnanimity; while his candour and ſincerity are abundantly eſtabliſhed, by that nobleman's relying entirely upon his friendſhip. Dazzled by the luſtre of his character, even more than by his victories, the Engliſh overlooked the defect of his title: the French almoſt forgot that he was an enemy. His care in diſtributing impartial juſtice, in his civil adminiſtration, and in preſerving the ſtricteſt diſcipline in his armies, made ſome amends to both nations for the calamities inſeparable from deſultory wars: with theſe the ſhort reign of Henry V. was almoſt entirely occupied, in proſecuting which he was remarkably ſucceſsful; and had one advantage over many of his predeceſſors, in that he had the happineſs to ſee the fruit of his labours, and to die much lamented in the midſt of his proſperity.

A. D. 1422. HENRY VI. ſurnamed of Windſor, when proclaimed with the uſual formalities at Weſtminſter, was about nine months old; in whoſe nominal reign was fulfilled that antient adage, "Woe to that nation whoſe prince is a child." This done, the duke of Glouceſter iſſued writs in the name of that prince, for a parliament to meet at Weſtminſter, on the ninth of November. The lords and commons paid very little attention to the verbal will of their late monarch: they ſet aſide the name of Regent, with reſpect to England changing it into that of Protector, and advanced the duke of Bedford to that office, inſtead of the duke of Glouceſter; yet they permitted the latter to diſcharge its duties during his abſence. At the ſame time to limit their power, a council was appointed, without whoſe advice and concurrence no meaſures of importance could be determined. Nor would they confirm that part of Henry's will, which appointed the earl of Warwick guardian of his ſon's perſon, but entruſted the care of their infant king to the biſhop of Wincheſter. The two princes, Bedford and Glouceſter, made no oppoſition to this plan of government; for the war in France appearing an object of the greateſt conſequence, they avoided every diſpute that might obſtruct the conqueſts in that kingdom. In leſs than two months after the death of Henry V. Charles VI. of France, paid the debt of nature; and his ſon, Charles VII. was, immediately after his father's death, crowned at Poictiers; a prince of a mild, generous diſpoſition, but indolent, irreſolute, and given to pleaſure. However the French renounced not wholly their attachment to their natural ſovereign; and though moſt of the princes of the blood had been detained priſoners in England ever ſince the battle of Agincourt, their friends and vaſſals were zealouſly attached to Charles; nor was it poſſible for them not to ſee the diſadvantage of being governed by a foreign prince. This was ſoon perceived by the duke of Bedford, and every method that human prudence could ſuggeſt was taken to prevent the conſequence. Charles, though reduced to a very low ebb of fortune, was ſtill maſter of the counties of Berry, Bourbon, Languedoc, Lionnois, Ferrez, Auvergne, a great part of Xaintonge and Poictou, together with the earldoms of Comminges and Armagnac, bordering on the Pyrannees; ſo that his power was ſtill reſpectable, eſpecially as both his officers and miniſters were men of great parts and integrity. On the other hand, Henry was in poſſeſſion of Normandy, Guienne, Picardy, Champaigne, la Brie, the Iſle of France, and the city of Paris, beſides the provinces belonging to the duke of Burgundy, his vaſſal and ally. The duke of Bedford well knew, that foreign aſſiſtance would be neceſſary before he could hope to complete his conqueſt of France. He therefore applied himſelf aſſiduouſly to increaſe the number of his friends on the continent, and had the good fortune to form an alliance with the duke of Brittany, and his brother, the count of Richemont. He alſo prevailed on the Engliſh council to releaſe James, king of Scotland, who had continued a priſoner in England, ever ſince his having been taken by Henry IV. It had been ſuppoſed, that the Scots would never attempt any thing to diſturb the peace of England, while their king was a priſoner in that court; but the late aſſiſtance ſent to Charles, ſufficiently proved, that this opinion was founded on a chimerical baſis: and that a much greater advantage might be procured from releaſing James, who having contracted a friendſhip for the Engliſh, would ſtill continue their firm ally, eſpecially as his obligations would be ſo greatly increaſed by reſtoring to him at once his liberty and his crown.

A. D. 1424. Since the death of Henry V. the war in France had been carried on with various ſucceſs, ſometimes fortune favouring the French, ſometimes the Engliſh. Places were taken and retaken ſucceſſively, without any remarkable advantage. Charles having reduced Yvry, on the frontiers of Picardy, a place of great importance, the regent determined to retake it. At the end of three months, the governor was obliged to capitulate, and agreed to ſurrender the town, if no relief arrived before a certain time. Charles was no ſooner informed of theſe conditions than he employed the neceſſary means in order to ſave the place; and having collected an army of fourteen thouſand men, half of whom were Scots, he ſent them thither, under the command of the conſtable, who was attended by his countrymen the earl of Douglas, the duke of Alençon, the marſhal de la Fayette, the count of Aumale, and the viſcount of Narbonne. When Buchan arrived within a few leagues of Yvry, finding he was come too late, it having ſurrendered, he inveſted Vernueil, which the inhabitants, in ſpite of the garriſon, delivered up to him. Buchan might have retired with the honour of having made an acquiſition of no leſs importance than the place he was ſent to relieve; but on hearing of the duke of Bedford's approach, he ſummoned a council, in which the wiſer part declared for a retreat, repreſenting, that every reaſon invited them to embrace the moſt cautious meaſures, and that this army, being the king's laſt reſource, and the only defence of a few provinces he now poſſeſſed, he ought to avoid giving battle, when not compelled by neceſſity. Theſe prudential conſiderations being however over-ruled, by a vain point of honour, of not turning their back on the enemy, they determined to wait the arrival of the duke of Bedford, who was now advancing at the head of fifteen thouſand men. On his arrival near the camp of the enemy, he took poſſeſſion of an advantageous ſpot of ground, near the walls of Vernueil, flanked by a hill, on which he poſted a body of two thouſand archers, and furniſhed all his infantry with large ſtakes, to check the fury of the French cavalry. The earl of Douglas having ſurveyed the poſition of the Engliſh camp, declared, that in his opinion the French army ſhould ſtand upon the defenſive, and not begin the action, as the enemy had choſen their own ground, where they could not be attacked without great diſadvantage. This prudent advice, which was ſeconded by the conſtable, and every officer of experience in the army, appeared to Aymer, viſcount of Narbonne, a headſtrong, imprudent man, as the effect of timidity; nor did he fail to upbraid the commanders, in expreſs terms, with puſillanimity, and of diſhonouring, by their meanneſs, the arms of France. No anſwer was returned to his invectives; which ſo highly exaſperated him, that, ſnatching up one of the ſtandards, he exclaimed, "Let all who love their ſovereign follow me," and ruſhing immediately out of the line, he advanced to the charge with the moſt irregular impetuoſity. Douglas and the conſtable ſeeing the confuſion that now prevailed in their army, and finding their authority deſpiſed, determined to periſh like ſoldiers in the inevitable deſtruction, which they knew muſt be the conſequence of this headſtrong raſhneſs. The regent had ordered all his cavalry to diſmount, and to place their horſes in the rear of the army. The attack, though made with the utmoſt diſorder, was ſo furious, that a body of their horſe on their right wing, broke the oppoſite wing of the Engliſh, and advanced to the barricade which ſurrounded the horſes, and behind which a body of archers was placed. Theſe diſcharging a ſhower of well-directed arrows, obliged them to fall back: at the ſame time the body of troops who were poſted on the hill ſo galled the Italians, who were marching up in another line, that they fled with great precipitation. This corps of reſerve immediately marched to the ſupport of the main body, where the fight had continued for three hours without any advantage on either ſide; but the victory now remained no longer dubious; they fell upon the flank of the Scots, and ſoon turned the ſcale in favour of the Engliſh. The French horſe were driven back upon their foot, and a dreadful ſlaughter enſued. Douglas and the conſtable perceiving the defeat of their army inevitable, ſcorned to ſurvive the diſgrace, and ruſhing into the thickeſt of the battle, bravely fell in the midſt of their enemies, victims to youthful temerity and foolhardineſs. The headſtrong Narbonne, ſon of earl Douglas, the counts Aumale, Ventadour, and de Tonnere, the lords Granville, Manni, Gamaches, and Guitri, with many other perſons of diſtinction, ſhared the ſame fate. The other principal officers were ſo dangerouſly wounded, that they could no longer give command, ſo that the men, deprived of their leaders, fought at random until they were entirely routed. The daſtardly Italians, who diſperſed in the beginning of the action, hearing that the French had gained the victory, returned for their ſhare of the booty, but met ſuch an unexpected reception from the Engliſh, that not a man would have eſcaped alive, had they not been favoured by approaching night. Five thouſand Scots and French were ſlain in this battle, and ſixteen hundred Engliſh. A great number of the former were taken priſoners, among whom were the marſhal de la Fayette, the lords Goncour, Mortimer, and the duke of Alençon. Next day the duke of Bedford laid ſiege to Vernueil, which ſurrendered on capitulation. Having gained this important advantage, he returned to Paris, to quell an inſurrection that had been raiſed in that city, while the earl of Saliſbury finiſhed the conqueſt of la Maine.

The condition of Charles was now truly deplorable. His adherents were ſtruck with conſternation, and began to look upon his cauſe as deſperate. Every thing ſeemed to forebode approaching ruin; when an event occurred which averted the impending danger, and deprived the Engliſh of a moſt favourable opportunity for completing the conqueſt of France. Jacqueline, counteſs of Hainault, animated by a violent antipathy to her huſband the duke of Brabant, couſin-german to the duke of Burgundy, determined to diſſolve her marriage. She was a princeſs of a maſculine ſpirit, and uncommon underſtanding, and her huſband weak both in conſtitution and intellects. Knowing his family would exert all their power to prevent the pope from ſetting aſide her marriage contract, in order to effect effect her purpoſe ſhe made her eſcape to England, and put herſelf under the protection of the duke of Glouceſter, who being enamoured of her perſon and fortune, ventured to marry her without waiting for the papal diſpenſation, not conſidering the conſequences of an action he had reſolved to perform. Soon after their marriage, he went over into the Low Countries to claim her dominions. The duke of Burgundy exclaimed loudly againſt this conduct, and conſidering himſelf as inſulted by it, marched in perſon to the aſſiſtance of the duke of Brabant. The labours of the duke of Bedford to reſtrain the impetuous temper of his brother were in vain; nor was he able to ſoften the reſentment of the duke of Burgundy. Inſtead therefore of improving the important victory he had obtained at Vernueil, he was under the neceſſity of returning to England, where the departure of his brother had excited contentions in the adminiſtration. This ceſſation of hoſtilities gave Charles an opportunity of recovering from his defeat.

A. D. 1426. The duke of Bedford, after having paſſed eight months in England, found the affairs of France in a very critical ſituation. The duke of Burgundy was greatly diſguſted; the duke of Brittany had done homage to Charles; and the French had begun to recover from the conſternation into which they had been thrown by their frequent misfortunes, their courage being raiſed by an event which had juſt happened. Montargis had been beſieged and reduced to extremity by the earl of Warwick, with a ſmall army of three thouſand men, when the baſtard of Orleans reſolved to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to relieve the town. This general, who was the natural ſon of the prince aſſaſſinated by the duke of Burgundy, and was afterwards created count of Dunois, conducted a body of ſixteen hundred men to Montargis, and attacked the enemy's trenches with ſuch bravery and ſucceſs, that he not only entered the town, but obliged Warwick to raiſe the ſiege. This advantage raiſed the hopes of Charles's party, and eſtabliſhed the military character of Dunois.

A. D. 1427. The duke of Bedford having ſettled affairs in England, returned to France, and revived the reputation of the Engliſh arms; for having ſecretly aſſembled, in ſeparate detachments, a conſiderable army on the frontiers of Brittany, he fell ſo unexpectedly on that province, that nothing could reſiſt his progreſs. All the attempts of its duke were in vain; ſo that after ſeeing the greater part of his territories waſted with fire and ſword, he was not only obliged to renew his engagements with the Engliſh, but likewiſe to ſign the treaty of Troye, acknowledging the duke of Bedford regent of France, and promiſing to do homage for his duchy to the king of England. The conqueſt of France ſeemed now an eaſy acquiſition, the military ſtrength of Charles being nearly exhauſted; and he had lately devoted himſelf to luxury and indolence, as if he had laid aſide all thoughts of oppoſing the progreſs of the enemy. The earl of Warwick had returned to England, and was appointed governor to the king in the room of the duke of Exeter, lately deceaſed; and the earl of Saliſbury arrived in France with a reinforcement of five thouſand men, which he had levied at his own expence in England in conſequence of an agreement with the council. Immediately on his arrival at Paris, the regent conferred on him the command of an army of ſixteen thouſand men, in order that he might reduce the city of Orleans, the only barrier that oppoſed his entrance into the ſouthern provinces.

A. D. 1428. Accordingly, about the latter end of July, the earl of Saliſbury marched from Paris, attended by the earl of Suffolk, lord Talbot, Sir John Faſtolf, and other experienced officers, and reduced all the towns that lay in his rout to Orleans. He paſſed the Loire at Beaugenci, and inveſted the place on the ſide of Sologni, on the twelfth of October. Every precaution was taken by the French for its defence. As the retention of Orleans was of momentous conſequence to the intereſt of their maſter, they took a reſolution of defending it with their lateſt breath. The command was given to count de Gaucourt, an officer of great experience. The troops that formed the garriſon were all veterans, long familiar with danger. The citizens had acquired a military turn, and were extremely well qualified to aſſiſt the regulars in the defence of the place. Many new fortifications were raiſed; the old ones repaired; and the greater part of the buildings in the ſuburbs pulled down. Both the aſſailants and defenders ſeemed inſpired with a ſenſe of honour, and feats of chivalry were daily performed. The deſtitute circumſtances of Charles, would not admit of his raiſing the ſiege; but he found means to evade the vigilance of the Engliſh, and to introduce ſuccours from time to time; ſo that the garriſon, which originally conſiſted of twelve hundred men, was, by the cloſe of December, augmented to three thouſand, and the number of the beſiegers to three and twenty thouſand, by reinforcements received from the regent. The firſt operation on their ſide was againſt a bulwark erected to cover the caſtle of Tourelles, which defended the head of the bridge over the Loire. The Engliſh artillery ſoon demoliſhed the parapets; yet in their firſt attempt to ſtorm it they were obliged to retreat, leaving two hundred and fifty men dead in the breach. This repulſe, however, ſerved only to increaſe their ardour; they continued battering the work with ſuch unremitted fury, that it was at length abandoned, and the Engliſh took poſſeſſion of it without any farther oppoſition. It was now perceived, that while the city could be ſupplied with troops and proviſions, it would be impoſſible to take it. The earl of Saliſbury therefore ordered ſixty ſmall forts, or redoubts, to be erected at proper diſtances round the city; but while he was inſpecting the works, a cannon ball from the beſieged put a period to his life; but his death, though univerſally lamented by the army, did not in the leaſt interrupt the ſiege, which was carried on under the direction of the earl of Suffolk, aſſiſted by the famous Talbot, one of the moſt accompliſhed generals that age produced. Four months had already been ſpent in continual ſallies and attacks, when the regent ordered a convoy of ſalt fiſh to be ſent from Paris, for the uſe of the beſiegers in Lent, eſcorted by a detachment of ſeventeen hundred men, under the command of Sir John Faſtolf, an officer of great valour and experience.

A. D. 1429. Charles having received intelligence of the day on which this convoy propoſed to ſet out, ordered the count de Clermont, at the head of three thouſand men, to attack the Engliſh in their rout. The count came up with the convoy at Rouvrai St. Denis, on the twelfth of February. Faſtolf, apprized of his approach, poſted his men behind a barricade of waggons, where they withſtood the firſt attack of the enemy, who were received ſo warmly that great diſorder enſued; which the Engliſh general obſerving, ordered openings to be made in the barricade, through which his men charged the enemy before they could rally, and defeated them with great ſlaughter. In this action, which was called the battle of Herrings, one hundred and twenty noblemen and officers of diſtinction were ſlain, beſides a great number of private men; but the baſtard of Orleans, who had joined Clermont on this occaſion, retreated to the town with four hundred in good order. This overthrow ſo diſpirited the French king, that he began to deſpair of retrieving his ſhattered fortunes; and an offer was made, that Orleans ſhould be ſequeſtered into the hands of the duke of Burgundy. But Bedford rejected the propoſal; obſerving, "That he was not in a humour to beat the buſhes, while others ran away with the game." This ſarcaſm ſo diſguſted the duke of Burgundy, that he recalled all his troops from the ſervice of the Engliſh. But notwithſtanding this defection, Orleans was every day more and more cloſely inveſted. The utmoſt ſcarcity prevailed in the city, and Charles meditated an inglorious retreat into Dauphine; when his affairs were reſtored by an amazing reſolution. At this dangerous criſis, a country girl delivered him from the danger with which he was threatened, and was the inſtrument of placing him on the throne of his anceſters.

About the latter end of February one Joan d'Arc, afterwards better known by the name of the Maid of Orleans, a native of the village of Danremy, repaired to Vaucouleurs, on the borders of Lorraine. She was about twenty years of age, of an irreproachable life, and had not hitherto been remarked for any ſingularity. She had been ſervant at an inn, where ſhe was accuſtomed to ride the horſes to water without a ſaddle, and to perform all the low offices that are commonly allotted to the men ſervants. A continual recital of the calamities of France, had made ſo great an impreſſion on her imagination, that abandoning herſelf to the tranſports of enthuſiaſm, ſhe miſtook the rovings of her own heated paſſions for the inſpirations of the Almighty, and fancied ſhe beheld viſions, and heard voices from heaven, exhorting her to replace Charles on the throne of France, and to expel the invaders. Her natural intrepidity made her diſregard the dangers of ſuch an attempt; and imagining that God had deſtined her to perform this great work, ſhe threw off the baſhfulneſs natural to her ſex and years; and having got admiſſion to Baudricourt, the governor of Vaucouleurs, ſhe acquainted him with her inſpirations, exhorting him to comply with the voice of God, and to ſecond the heavenly revelations, which impelled her to engage in ſuch a glorious enterprize. The governor at firſt paid little regard to what ſhe ſaid; but, on her frequently renewing her importunate ſolicitations, he allowed her ſome attendants, by whom ſhe was conducted to the French court, then reſiding at Chinon. It is pretended, that Joan was no ſooner admitted to the king than ſhe knew him, though ſhe had never ſeen him before, and he now purpoſely concealed himſelf in the crowd of his courtiers, having laid aſide every thing in his dreſs by which he might be diſtinguiſhed: that ſhe offered him, in the name of the Supreme Being, to raiſe the ſiege of Orleans, and to conduct him to Rheims to be anointed and crowned there; and on his expreſſing ſome doubts of her divine commiſſion, ſhe revealed to him a ſecret unknown to all the world beſides himſelf; and that ſhe deſired a particular ſword, kept in St. Catherine's church at Fierbois, which though ſhe had never ſeen ſhe exactly deſcribed, as well as the place in which it had long lain neglected. Theſe pretended miraculous relations were inſtantly ſpread abroad, that they might make proper impreſſions on the vulgar. Every method was taken to publiſh her predictions; yet, notwithſtanding Charles and his miniſters were determined to carry on the cheat, and countenance the deluſion, they gravely pretended ſcruples, and cauſed to be aſſembled a council of ſage divines, who after having examined Joan's miſſion, declared, with great ſolemnity, that ſhe was ſent from heaven. The maid was then conducted to the parliament, which reſided at Poictiers; and being examined before that aſſembly, they alſo were convinced of her inſpirations, and ratified the pious fraud. This extraordinary engine being thus prepared, it was reſolved to try its force upon the enemy. The Maid of Orleans, at her own requeſt, was armed cap-a-pie, and mounted on a fine horſe richly capariſoned. The ſword of St. Catherine was delivered to her with great formality; and in this martial dreſs ſhe was exhibited to a croud of ſpectators, who received her with the loudeſt acclamations. This inſpired leader was now ſent to Blois, where a conſiderable convoy was prepared of proviſions and ammunition for the beſieged, who were at this time reduced to the laſt extremity. Joan accordingly marched at the head of twelve thouſand choſen men, by whom the convoy was to be eſcorted. She ordered, that all the ſoldiers, before they ſet out, ſhould confeſs to their prieſts; ſhe baniſhed all women of ill fame from the camp; ſhe held in her hand a conſecrated banner, in which was repreſented the Supreme Being holding the earth in his hand, ſurrounded with flower-de-luces, and inſiſted that the convoy ſhould enter Orleans by the direct road from Beauſſe; but the count of Dunois cauſed it to approach by the other ſide, where he was ſenſible the weakeſt part of the Engliſh army was ſtationed. Joan had written to the regent and the Engliſh generals, ordering them, in the name of the Almighty, by whom ſhe was commiſſioned, inſtantly to raiſe the ſiege and to quit France, on pain of ſuffering divine vengeance for their diſobedience. The Engliſh endeavoured to ridicule the maid and her divine commiſſion; obſerving, that the French king, by having recourſe to ſuch a ridiculous expedient, muſt be reduced to a wretched paſs; yet they felt their imaginations ſecretly affected, and waited with ſome anxiety for the iſſue. On the twenty-ninth of April the convoy approached the river, when the garriſon made a vigorous ſally on the ſide of Beauſſe, to prevent the Engliſh ſending troops to the other ſide of the river, while the boats were loading with the proviſions and ammunition deſigned for the city. After Joan had covered the embarkation with her troops, ſhe entered the city in her military garb, and was received by all the inhabitants as their celeſtial deliverer. They were now firmly perſuaded, that under her influence they ſhould be invincible; and Dunois, perceiving the extraordinary effect ſhe had produced in the minds of the people, both friends and enemies, conſented the next convoy ſhould enter by the ſide of Beauſſe. That convoy approached on the fourth of May, when the waggons and troops paſſed between the redoubts of the Engliſh without interruption; while they, who were formerly ſo elated with victory, remained in ſilent aſtoniſhment. The earl of Suffolk was in a very extraordinary ſituation, ſufficient to confound the greateſt capacity. He perceived, that his army in general was overawed with the idea of Joan's being accompanied by a divine power; and inſtead of expelling theſe terrors by the hurry of war, he imprudently waited for the ſoldiers recovering themſelves from their panic, and thus allowed time for theſe prepoſſeſſions to ſink deeper into their minds. The Engliſh, finding that their courage failed, imagined the vengeance of heaven hung over them; and their inactivity, ſo new and unexpected, made the French think ſo too. The Maid of Orleans now exhorted the garriſon to continue on the defenſive; and promiſed all thoſe ſhould have ſupernatural aſſiſtance, who attacked the formidable redoubts by which they had ſo long been kept in awe. Her enthuſiaſtic ardour was ſeconded by the generals. One redoubt being ſtormed with uncommon fury, it was taken, and all the Engliſh put to the ſword, or made priſoners; Sir John Talbot himſelf, who had drawn together ſome troops from the other redoubts, not daring to appear againſt ſo formidable an enemy in the open field. Animated by this ſucceſs, nothing ſeemed impoſſible to Joan and her inſpired followers, for ſuch they now really were. She endeavoured to perſuade the generals to attack the main body of the Engliſh in their intrenchments; but Dunois being unwilling, by too great a temerity, to hazard the fate of France; and ſenſible, that on the leaſt reverſe of fortune all this enthuſiaſm would evaporate, he checked her vehemence by propoſing, before ſhe attempted any other hazardous enterprize, to drive the enemy from their forts on the other ſide of the river, and thus open a communication with the country. Joan ſuffered herſelf to be perſuaded; and theſe forts were vigorouſly aſſailed. However, in one attack the French were repulſed; and the maid being left alone, was obliged to retreat with the runaways; but ſuddenly diſplaying her ſacred ſtandard, animating them at the ſame time with her countenance, her exhortations, and extravagant geſtures, ſhe led them back to the charge, and beat the Engliſh out of their intrenchments. While attacking another fort, ſhe was wounded in the neck with an arrow; on which ſhe retreated for a moment behind her companions, pulled out the arrow with her own hands, and having had the wound quickly dreſſed, headed her troops again, and planted her victorious banner on the enemy's ramparts. Thus the Engliſh were driven from all their fortifications on that ſide, having loſt in different actions above ſix thouſand men; and, what was of greater conſequence, their former courage being entirely vaniſhed, was ſucceeded by amazement and deſpair. Joan, having returned again over the bridge, was received by the citizens as their guardian angel. The Engliſh generals in vain urged, that Joan was not inſpired by God, but the devil; for the ſoldiers, having found from ſad experience that the devil might ſometimes be allowed to prevail, they did not reap much comfort from their urging this opinion. On the contrary, they trembled at the very apprehenſion of being led againſt this tremendous inchantreſs; ſo that the earl of Suffolk, finding it impoſſible to carry on the operations of the ſiege, abandoned the enterprize, after having laid before the place upwards of ſeven months. The very generals ſeemed to be ſtupified with terror; for inſtead of keeping their forces together in a body till they ſhould have recovered from their amazement, they diſtributed great part of them in places they had taken near the Loire, and retired with the reſt to a great diſtance; ſo that the enemy had an opportunity of reducing the towns and caſtles they had thus garriſoned. The French now reſolved to allow them no leiſure to recover from their conſternation. Charles took the field with ſix thouſand men, which he ſent to inveſt Gergeau, in which Suffolk had ſhut himſelf up with part of his army. The place was obſtinately defended during a ſiege of ten days. Joan behaved with her uſual intrepidity; and in leading the attack deſcended into the foſſee, where ſhe was ſtruck on the head with a ſtone which knocked her down; but ſoon recovering herſelf, ſhe continued the aſſault with ſucceſs. Suffolk was forced to ſurrender himſelf priſoner to Renaud, a Frenchman; but before he ſubmitted, aſked if he was a gentleman; on being anſwered that he was, he demanded whether he was a knight? Renaud replied, that he had not yet attained that honour. "Then I will make you one," replied Suffolk; and giving him a blow with his ſword, which dubbed him of that honourable fraternity, inſtantly ſurrendered himſelf. The reſt of the Engliſh army, under the command of Talbot, Faſtolf, and Scales, thought only of retreating as ſoon as poſſible into a place of ſafety; while the French imagined their overtaking them was equal to a victory. The van-guard of the French commanded by Richemont and Xantrailles, fell upon the rear of the Engliſh at the village of Petay on the eighteenth of June, on which the Engliſh were inſtantly defeated and fled, Faſtolf himſelf ſhewing the example of flight to his troops; on which he was, as a puniſhment for this inſtance of cowardice, degraded from the order of the garter. In this action both Talbot and Scales were taken priſoners, and two thouſand men ſlain.

The French writers repreſent the Maid of Orleans, as not only behaving with great courage and activity in battle, but as exerciſing the office of general; conducting all the military operations, and influencing their deliberations in all the councils of war. This appearance the French court endeavoured to maintain; but there is much greater probability that ſhe was prompted in all her meaſures by Dunois, and the other commanders. It is ſufficient praiſe, that ſhe was able to diſtinguiſh the perſons on whoſe judgment ſhe might depend; deliver their opinions as her own; and permit them at times to temper with prudence her enthuſiaſtic ardour. This famous heroine had now performed one part of her promiſe; but the more difficult taſk remained ſtill to be executed, the crowning Charles at Rheims. Before this could be done, it was neceſſary to paſs over a large tract of land occupied by the Engliſh; an attempt which would have been impracticable in any other conjuncture than the preſent. Charles, who had never hitherto expoſed his perſon, allowed himſelf to be carried away by the torrent of his ſucceſs, and the inſtigation of the Maid of Orleans. This interval of enthuſiaſm ſecured his victories. Without proviſions, without reſources, he marched ſecurely at the head of twelve thouſand men through the midſt of his enemies. Troye and Chalons opened their gates at his approach. The inhabitants of Rheims drove out the Engliſh garriſon, and ſent him the keys of the city, which he entered in triumph. The ceremony of his coronation was performed there on the ſeventeenth of July, the Maid of Orleans ſtanding by his ſide in complete armour, diſplaying her conſecrated banner. Charles now appeared more venerable in the eyes of his ſubjects. Numbers immediately joined him; they returned from their prepoſſeſſions and errors, and conceived the utmoſt averſion to the ſhameful yoke of ſlavery they had hitherto endured. Loan, Soiſſons, Chateau-Thierri, and ſeveral other towns and fortreſſes, ſubmitted to their lawful ſovereign. Under this ſtrange reverſe of fortune, the duke of Bedford acted with the moſt conſummate prudence. He employed all the reſources in his power. He detained the Pariſians in obedience by making uſe of careſſes and ſeverity. He alſo renewed his alliance with the duke of Burgundy; and being joined with five thouſand men, which the biſhop of Wincheſter was conducting on a cruſade againſt the Huſſites, he was once more in a condition of taking the field againſt the French, in order to check their rapid progreſs. The maid of Orleans, after Charles was crowned at Rheims, conſidering her commiſſion as accompliſhed, was ſolicitous to return to the place of her nativity; but the count of Dunois, being ſenſible that her preſence in the army might be attended with many advantages, he exhorted her to ſtay till the Engliſh were entirely expelled from France, and all her prophecies ſhould be accompliſhed.

A. D. 1430.

The duke of Bedford now ſtrove to revive the declining ſtate of his affairs, by cauſing the young king of England, who was ſent over by the parliament, to be crowned king of France at Paris, which was done with the greateſt ſolemnity. To induce the duke of Burgundy to act with more vigour, he ceded to him all the places the Engliſh poſſeſſed in Champaigne and Brie; and the duke immediately entered France with a powerful army. He reduced Troye and Soiſſons; and being joined by the earls of Suffolk and Arundel, he inveſted Compeigne. The place was well provided with proviſions, and every thing neceſſary for making a noble defence; and the garriſon was commanded by Flavi, a brave and experienced officer. But Compeigne being conſidered as a city of the utmoſt importance, a detachment of about ſix hundred men, under the command of the Maid of Orleans and Xaintrailles, threw themſelves into the place. At her appearance the garriſon thought themſelves invincible; but their joy was of ſhort continuance. The day after her arrival ſhe headed a ſally upon the quarters of John of Luxemburg, and twice drove the enemy from their intrenchments. However, finding herſelf overpowered with numbers, ſhe ordered a retreat; but, being hard preſſed by her purſuers, ſhe turned upon them, and again drove them back. At this inſtant being deſerted by her friends, and encompaſſed by the enemy, ſhe was at laſt, after having given proofs of extraordinary bravery, taken priſoner by the Burgundians. It was then the common opinion, that the French officers had, from envy of her fame, purpoſely expoſed her to this misfortune. The Engliſh and their partizans, would have received leſs joy in having obtained a complete victory, than they did in getting the Maid of Orleans into their poſſeſſion. Te Deum was ſung at Paris on this occaſion; and the regent, thinking that on the captivity of this heroic female, he ſhould recover his ſuperiority over France, immediately purchaſed her of John of Luxemburg. The Maid of Orleans had a juſt right to be conſidered a priſoner of war, and might expect to be treated with courteſy at leaſt. She had never ſtained her character by one cruel or treacherous action; ſhe had even rigidly obſerved the virtues and decorums of her ſex; and although her conducting armies to battle may appear an exception, yet her conduct in this particular was of ſuch ſignal ſervice to her prince, as rendered her an object of praiſe and admiration. The regent therefore reſolved to cover his violation of humanity, in the proſecution of this brave woman with the cloak of religion. The biſhop of Beauvais, who was devoted to the Engliſh, preſented a petition againſt her, under pretence of her being taken within his dioceſe, in order to have her tried by an eccleſiaſtical court, for magic, ſorcery, and impiety: the univerſity of Paris joined in the ſame requeſt; and ſeveral prelates, among whom was only one Engliſhman, the cardinal of Wincheſter, were appointed her judges. Their court was held at Rouen, then the reſidence of the young king of England; and before this tribunal the maid was brought in her military apparel, loaded with irons. Joan requeſted to be eaſed of her chains; but her judges told her, that ſhe had once attempted to throw herſelf from a tower. This ſhe confeſſed; and owned, if ſhe was able ſhe would ſtill do it. In all her ſpeeches ſhe ſhewed the utmoſt firmneſs. Though teazed with queſtions for almoſt four months, ſhe never betrayed the leaſt weakneſs, nor was any advantage gained over her. The point puſhed by her judges with the greateſt vehemence, was her viſions and revelations. She was aſked, whether ſhe would ſubmit the truth of theſe to her judges, or to the deciſion of the church? She replied, that ſhe was ready to ſubmit them to God, the fountain of truth. Upon this they exclaimed, that ſhe denied the authority of the church, and was an heretic. She then appealed to the pope; but her appeal was rejected. They enquired, why ſhe put her truſt in a ſtandard, conſecrated only by magical incantations? She replied, that ſhe put her truſt in God alone, whoſe image it bore. They demanded, why ſhe held in her hand that ſtandard at the coronation of Charles at Rheims? She anſwered, that the perſon who had ſhared the danger, was entitled to ſhare the glory. On being cenſured for going to war contrary to the decorum of her ſex, ſhe made no ſcruple of aſſerting, that her only deſign was to defeat the Engliſh, and to drive them out of the kingdom. At length ſhe was condemned, as being guilty of all the crimes of which ſhe had been accuſed, with the aggravation of hereſy; her revelations were declared inventions of the devil to delude the people; and ſhe was ſentenced to be delivered over to be puniſhed by the ſecular arm. This unhappy maid, for ſo long a time encompaſſed by inveterate enemies, who treated her with contumacy, brow-beaten by men of ſuperior rank, even by thoſe inveſted with the ſacred character, whom ſhe had ever honoured, at laſt found her ſpirit ſubdued; and the viſionary dreams of inſpiration gave way to the terrors of the puniſhment ſhe was ſentenced to ſuffer. She therefore publicly declared her willingneſs to recant; acknowledged the illuſion of the revelations rejected by the church; and promiſed never more to maintain them. Upon this her ſentence was mitigated to perpetual impriſonment, and to be fed on bread and water during life. But the barbarous inhumanity of her enemies, not thinking this ſentence ſufficient to anſwer all their political views, reſolved on her death. She had conſented to wear a female dreſs; but they, ſuſpecting it was diſagreeable to her, placed a ſuit of men's apparel in her apartment, watching the effects it would produce. On ſight of a dreſs in which ſhe had acquired ſuch fame, and which ſhe imagined was intended for her by the appointment of heaven, all her former ideas revived; and ſhe ventured, while alone, again to put on the forbidden garment. She was detected by her inſidious enemies in that ſituation; and this thoughtleſs, innocent action, was termed a relapſe into hereſy. No recantation was now thought ſufficient, and no pardon could be granted. She was delivered over to the civil power on pretence of hereſy and witchcraft; and on the fourteenth of June, was burnt alive by a ſlow fire, in the old market-place of Rouen.

A. D. 1431.

Such was this infamous ſentence, and ſuch was the miſerable end of that extraordinary heroine, the Maid of Orleans, whoſe uncommon exertions for the good of her country, to which ſhe fell a victim, muſt excite ſurprize and admiration, whether we conſider her actions as the reſult of innate courage, or a heated imagination, or the effects of wild enthuſiaſm.

A. D. 1432.

But this execution was not attended with any advantages to the Engliſh, for we find their affairs every day grew worſe. Chartres was ſurprized by a ſtratagem of the count of Dunois; lord Willoughby, who commanded a body of Engliſh, was defeated at St. Celerin; the fair, in the ſuburbs of Caen, though ſeated in the midſt of the territories belonging to the Engliſh, was pillaged by de Lore, a French officer, who carried away two thouſand perſons, with a very rich booty; and the death of the ducheſs of Bedford, ſiſter to the duke of Burgundy, diſſolved that cloſe connection, that had hitherto ſubſiſted between her brother and the regent; which was followed by an irreconcileable breach.

A. D. 1435.

A congreſs was appointed at Arras, under the mediation of the pope and the council of Baſle. The French offered to cede Normandy and Guienne to the Engliſh, but on condition of doing homage to Charles, conformable to antient cuſtom. This offer was rejected with diſdain, and the Engliſh plenipotentiaries departed immediately from congreſs. Nothing now remained but to adjuſt matters between Charles and the duke of Burgundy; this was ſoon done; and France purchaſed the friendſhip of Philip upon the moſt humiliating terms. Soon after this treaty was concluded, the duke of Bedford died at Rouen. He was juſtly reputed one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed characters of that age; and it is difficult to ſay, whether he ſhone brighter in the field, or the cabinet, whether he was a greater general or politician, and whether he was moſt eſteemed for his valour, his equity, or his moderation.

A. D. 1436. Such parties were formed in the Engliſh council, between the duke of Glouceſter and the cardinal of Wincheſter, as prevented the reparation of national loſſes in France, and paved the way for ſtill greater which enſued; and though the duke of York was appointed to ſucceed Bedford, it was ſeven months before his commiſſion paſſed the ſeals. So that when the duke arrived in France, as regent, he found the capital loſt. The Pariſians, who had always been more attached to the Burgundians than to the Engliſh, after the concluſion of the treaty of Arras, put Paris into the hands of the duke of Burgundy; and lord Willoughby, who commanded the garriſon, which conſiſted only of fifteen hundred men, after diſcovering great valour and preſence of mind, was obliged to retire into the Baſtile; which being inveſted, he was contented with ſtipulating for the ſafe retreat of his troops into Normandy. At the ſame time the duke of Burgundy attempted to reduce Calais with an army of fifty thouſand men, and made himſelf maſter of ſeveral ſmall caſtles in the neighbourhood of that city; but the garriſon harraſſed their camp with ſucceſsful ſallies; and the duke of Glouceſter, landing at Calais with fifteen thouſand men, ſent a herald to the duke of Burgundy, offering him battle. In the mean time the Flemings made a precipitate retreat; whoſe example was followed by Philip; and having drawn up his regulars in good order, he retired to Gravelines; leaving behind him all his baggage and artillery, wich fell into the hands of the Engliſh. Nor was this the only mortification the duke of Burgundy had to ſuſtain; for he was hardly returned to his own dominions, when the maritime parts of his poſſeſſions in Flanders were ravaged by an Engliſh fleet; while he himſelf was in danger of loſing his life in a ſedition at Bruges, after ſeeing the French marſhal, Adam, who delivered up Paris, almoſt torn in pieces by the populace.

Military operations in France were now carried on in a very languid manner. Scarcely could either ſide bring the appearance of an army into the field. The war ſolely conſiſted in the ſurprizal of places, and ravaging the open country by ſmall bodies, ſuddenly aſſembled from neighbouring garriſons. The great abilities of the duke of York enabled him to ſtruggle againſt every difficulty for more than four years; and by the aſſiſtance of lord Talbot, who was created earl of Shrewſbury, he performed actions by which he acquired great honour. Happy would it have been for the people had this puny war prevented other oppreſſions; but the forces of the French and Engliſh were obliged, being deſtitute of pay, to ſubſiſt by plunder. The provinces in all the north of France were laid waſte, the lands left uncultivated, and the cities gradually depopulated. About this time the duke of York reſigned his government to the earl of Warwick; but death preventing that nobleman from long enjoying his dignity, the duke upon his deceaſe, reſumed the government; and during his adminiſtration, a truce was concluded between the king of England and the duke of Burgundy, which the commercial intereſt of their ſubjects rendered neceſſary.

The captivity of the five princes of the blood, taken at the battle of Agincourt, had been for a long time of conſiderable advantage to England, but this was now loſt. Some of them had died, others had been ranſomed: and the duke of Orleans, the moſt powerful of them all, was the only one that now remained in the hands of the Engliſh. This prince offered for his liberty fifty-four thouſand nobles, equal to thirty-ſix thouſand pounds of our preſent money. The duke of Glouceſter's party, and that of the cardinal of Wincheſter, were here divided in their ſentiments. The duke reminded the council of the late king's dying advice, that none of theſe priſoners ſhould be releaſed, till his ſon ſhould be capable of holding the reins of government. The cardinal inſiſted on the largeneſs of the ſum, which was indeed nearly equal to two thirds of all the extraordinary ſupplies annually granted by parliament for the ſupport of the war, during the courſe of ſeven years; and added, that his releaſe was more likely to be advantageous than prejudicial to England. The cardinal's party prevailing, it was determined to ſet the duke of Orleans at liberty, and he was releaſed after a captivity of twenty-five years. The duke of Burgundy diſplayed a noble inſtance of generoſity on this occaſion; he renounced his antient reſentments, and paid the ranſom of a prince who had long been his enemy.

The character of Henry, as he advanced in years, became fully known; and from the weakneſs of his abilities it was plainly perceived, that his reign would prove a continued minority. He had now entered into the twenty-third year of his age; and each party was ambitious of chuſing him a queen. The duke of Glouceſter warmly recommended the daughter of the count d'Armagnac; but the cardinal and his friends had fixed their choice on Margaret of Anjou, the daughter of Regnier, titular king of Sicily, Naples, and Jeruſalem, who was eſteemed the moſt accompliſhed woman of her age, both in body and mind; and ſeemed qualified, not only to acquire an aſcendant over Henry, but to ſupply all his defects. The earl of Suffolk, therefore, in concert with his aſſociates in the Engliſh council, made propoſals of marriage to Margaret, which were accepted. This treaty was ratified in England; and Suffolk obtained firſt the title of marquis, then of duke, and even received the thanks of parliament for his ſervices in concluding it. This princeſs, by reaſon of the oppoſition made by the duke of Glouceſter to her marriage, entered into a cloſe correſpondence with the cardinal and the marquis of Suffolk, who, ſtrengthened by her friendſhip, and animated by their common hatred againſt the duke of Glouceſter, reſolved to effect the ruin of that patriotic nobleman. He was accordingly ſtripped of all his preferments, and even entirely removed from the council board. But this cruel proceeding raiſed ſuch commotions among the people, that his enemies thought it abſolutely neceſſary for their own ſafety, to colour over their baſe conduct with a ſhew of juſtice.

For this purpoſe, to deſtroy a man whoſe popularity might become dangerous, and whoſe reſentment they had cauſe to fear, they ſummoned a parliament to meet at St. Edmundſbury, not chuſing they ſhould aſſemble in the capital, which was ſuppoſed to be too well affected to the duke. A. D. 1447. Having been cited in due form, Glouceſter appeared before this parliament on the tenth of February. The next day he was arreſted, and confined under a ſtrong guard. The people were highly exaſperated at this mode of proceeding, but being perſuaded, that the duke on his trial, would ſufficiently exculpate himſelf from every charge that could be exhibited againſt him, no tumult was excited in his favour. His enemies, however, never intended to bring him to a fair trial. But the lords, who were appointed to be his judges, took no pains to conceal their ſentiments with regard to his innocence. This ſufficiently intimidated the faction; and on the twenty-eighth of February the duke was found dead in his bed. His body was expoſed to public view, without exhibiting any marks of external violence, yet no one doubted of his having fallen a victim to the vengeance of his enemies, who imagined, that his public trial and execution would have been more invidious, than his private murder. Afterwards ſome gentlemen of his retinue were tried as his accomplices, and condemned to be hanged, drawn, and quartered. But they were no ſooner ſuſpended than they were cut down, recovered to life, and received their pardon. Thus fell by the treacherous hand of malice, Humphrey of Woodſtock, duke of Glouceſter, the moſt learned perſon of his age. He founded at Oxford one of the firſt libraries in England. He was a generous patron to men of ſcience and able artiſts of every profeſſion. From his amiable character he was called the good duke of Glouceſter. He was free from all vulgar ſuperſtition and credulity, which in his time univerſally prevailed; of which Sir Thomas More gives the following inſtance. A man pretended that he was born blind, but by touching the ſhrine of St. Alban's had recovered his ſight. Soon after the duke happened to paſs that way, examined the man, and ſeeming to doubt of his being able to ſee, aſked him the colour of ſeveral cloaks worn by the perſons in his retinue; and the man readily telling him, he ſaid, "You are a knave, for had you been born blind, you could not ſo ſoon learn to diſtinguiſh colours;" and immediately the duke ordered him to the ſtocks as an impoſtor. The cardinal of Wincheſter did not long enjoy his triumph over the fall of Glouceſter. He died ſix weeks after him in all the horrors of a guilty conſcience, from having embrued his hands in the blood of the innocent. He is ſaid to have felt more remorſe in his laſt moments, than could have been expected from one hardened, in a long courſe of life, in the mazes of falſehood, known by the name of ſtate policy. By his death, the queen and her favourite, Suffolk, were expoſed to all the effects of thoſe unpopular meaſures they afterwards purſued. However the miniſter for ſome time enjoyed his power; and the next ſeſſions of parliament he was created duke of Suffolk.

A. D. 1448. Charles, king of France, reſtored the adminiſtration of public juſtice in that kingdom, regulated the finances, eſtabliſhed diſcipline among his troops, encouraged commerce, and made his ſubjects forget their former misfortunes. This prince now warmly inſiſted on the performance of the articles in the marriage treaty, by which Charles of Anjou, the queen's uncle, was to poſſeſs the province of Maine. Orders, under Henry's hand, were therefore ſent to Sir Francis Surrienne, governor of Mans, to ſurrender that city to Charles of Anjou. Surrienne, a native of Arragon, who had ſerved the Engliſh above twenty years, diſputed the authenticity of the order, and abſolutely refuſed to deliver up the place; on which a French army under Dunois, laid ſiege to the city. Surrienne made a noble defence, but was at laſt obliged to capitulate; by which the garriſon, conſiſting of two thouſand five hundred men, were ſuffered to march out with all their effects. They retired into Normandy; but being refuſed admittance into any of the fortified towns, Surrienne led them into Brittany, ſurprized ſome fortifications, and the town of Fougeres, and extended his depredations over the whole province. This breach of the truce, in which Brittany had been included, induced the French monarch to demand ſatisfaction from the duke of Somerſet governor of Normandy. Somerſet returned for anſwer, that he had no authority over Surrienne and his followers. Charles, though he was well acquainted with the licentious ſpirit of ſuch mercenary troops, was diſſatisfied with this anſwer; and on application being made to the court of England, inſiſted that thoſe plunderers ſhould not only be recalled, but that all the damages ſuſtained by the duke of Brittany ſhould be repaired; and to render an accommodation impracticable, the damages were made to amount to the enormous ſum of one million, ſix hundred thouſand crowns.

A. D. 1449. Charles, reſolving to take advantage of the viſible ſuperiority, which the preſent ſtate of his affairs gave him over England, declared war againſt Henry, and invaded Normandy with four powerful armies. The towns opened their gates to the French as ſoon as they appeared, and Normandy was ſoon annexed to his dominions. The brave Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, indeed, ſupported his reputation and glory to the laſt. He was, father Orleans obſerves, equal to an army, but he had only a handful of forces. It is true, four thouſand ſuccours arrived from England, which were ſoon after defeated by the count of Clermont at Fourmigni. This was the only battle fought by the Engliſh in defence of their dominions, which had been obtained at a great expence of blood and treaſure. The duke of Somerſet, who was ſhut up in Caen, without the leaſt proſpect of relief, was obliged to capitulate: Falaiſe ſurrendered; and Cherburg, the laſt town in Normandy, that remained in the hands of the Engliſh, opening its gates, Charles within the compaſs of one year, conquered that important province. Guienne ſuffered the ſame fate. Dunois who was ſent thither met with no reſiſtance in the field, and very little from the towns. This province alſo, which had for three centuries formed a part of the dominions of the crown of England, was now united to that of France. To complete the laſt act of national diſgrace, attended with a train of ſucceſſive misfortunes, the ſword of civil war was about to be unſheathed by a pretender, who diſputed the title of the weak prince ſeated on the throne. This was no other than Richard, duke of York, firſt prince of the blood, who was deſcended, by his mother, from the houſe of Mortimer, which enjoyed an inconteſtible title to the crown of England, after the demiſe of Richard II. when the rights of ſovereignty were uſurped by the houſe of Lancaſter. His abilities, courage, and political prudence were very eminent; and he was in poſſeſſion of an immenſe fortune, by ſucceeding to the eſtates of Cambridge, York, and Mortimer; which laſt had been increaſed by an union of the eſtates of Clarence and Ulſter, with the patrimonial poſſeſſion of the family of Marche. His alliances alſo, by marrying the daughter of Ralph Nevil, earl of Weſtmorland, had greatly extended his intereſt among the nobility. The family of the earl of Weſtmorland was more potent than any other in the kingdom. The earl of Warwick was one of that family, a nobleman extremely popular, and ſo amazing rich, that thirty thouſand perſons were conſtantly fed at his expence, in his different manors and caſtles. Allured by his bravery, munificence, and hoſpitality, the military men, and the people in general, bore him an unbounded affection. The duke of York had alſo many other prrtizans, who were attached to him from their hatred of the houſe of Lancaſter.

A. D. 1450. Suffolk was alarmed at his increaſing popularity; and this prime miniſter, having incurred public hatred, and foreſeeing he ſhould be attacked by the commons, ſtrove to over-awe his enemies, by boldly preſenting himſelf to the charge. He roſe in the houſe of peers, and having taken notice of the clamours raiſed againſt him, complained, that after he had ſerved the crown in thirty-four campaigns; after he had lived abroad about ſeventeen years, without once viſiting his native country; after loſing a father and three brothers in the French wars; he thought it exceeding hard, to be even ſuſpected, of having been corrupted by that enemy, whom with ſuch zeal he had oppoſed, and of betraying his prince, who had rewarded him for his ſervices, with the greateſt offices and higheſt poſts of honour. The commons provoked at this challenge, ſent up to the peers an accuſation of high treaſon; but this being not ſupported by evidence, they drew up againſt him a new charge of miſdemeanours, well founded, probably upon facts; for we find the king now greatly alarmed for his miniſter. He perceived, that the commons were determined to carry on the proſecution with the utmoſt vigour, and feared the upper houſe would declare him guilty. He therefore ſent for the lords ſpiritual and temporal to his apartment, produced Suffolk before them, and aſked him what he had to ſay in his own defence. He denied the charge, but ſubmitted himſelf to the pleaſure of the king, who baniſhed him for the term of five years. The lords remained ſilent, but were no ſooner returned to their own houſe, than they entered a proteſt, that their privileges ſhould not be infringed by this ſentence; and that if Suffolk, inſtead of voluntarily ſubmitting to the king's commands, had inſiſted upon his right, he would have been intitled to a trial by his peers in parliament. Every one knew that theſe irregular proceedings were intended to favour the duke of Suffolk, who by enjoying the queen's favour, would, the firſt ſavourable opportunity, be reſtored to his former credit and power. His enemies therefore employed a captain of a ſhip to cruize off Dover, and intercept him in his paſſage to the continent; who ſeizing him near that place without ceremony, cauſed his head to be ſtruck off on the ſide of his long boat, and his body to be thrown into the ſea. Thus ignominiouſly fell William de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, who a few days before, was the moſt powerful perſon in the kingdom; yet no enquiry was made after the authors and accomplices of ſuch an atrocious crime; though the court threatened to ſend an army into Kent, and lay the whole country waſte, in revenge of this inhuman act of violence.

The duke of Somerſet ſucceeded Suffolk in the miniſtry, and in credit with the queen; but he being the perſon who commanded on the continent when the French provinces were loſt, the public, who always judge by the event, ſoon made him the object of their animoſity and hatred. Somerſet was now in the ſame dangerous ſituation experienced by Suffolk, and the parliament was no ſooner broke up, than various commotions were excited in different parts of the kingdom. They were indeed ſoon quelled, but ſufficiently indicated the diſpoſition of the people, and proved a prelude to an inſurrection of a more alarming nature, and which, for ſome time, threatened the nation with very dangerous conſequences.

Notwithſtanding the great intereſt of the duke of York, before he would perſonally appear in ſupport of his pretenſions, he thought it moſt adviſeable to prepare the nation for his deſign, by exciting their affection to the houſe of Mortimer. With this view he engaged an Iriſhman, named John, or Jack Cade, who had ſerved under him as a ſoldier in France, to raiſe a ſedition in favour of the family of Marche, that their title, which had ſo long laid dormant, might once more attract the attention of the public. Jack Cade, who by his courage, capacity, and ſpirit, was well qualified for ſuch an undertaking, having received proper inſtructions from the duke's agents, aſſumed the name of Mortimer, pretending to be the ſon of Sir John Mortimer, who was beheaded for treaſon in the laſt reign; and repairing to the county of Kent, in which the duke of York had a great number of adherents, he collected a ſtrong body of malecontents, on pretence of redreſſing the grievances of the nation, and delivering the people from the burden of taxes. He ſoon found himſelf at the head of a powerful army, ſo as to be in a condition to carry his ſcheme into execution, and advancing towards London, encamped on Blackheath. The court on receiving intelligence of this inſurrection, ſent a meſſage to the inſurgents, demanding the reaſon of their appearing in arms. Cade replied, that they had no deſign to offer the leaſt violence to the perſon of the king, they only deſired to preſent a petition to the parliament, that the miniſters who oppreſſed the people might be removed from the royal preſence. At the ſame time he delivered to the deputies two papers enumerating the grievances of the nation. Among other things they prayed, that the duke of Somerſet might be puniſhed as the principal author of the loſs of Normandy; that the king's council might be filled with the princes of the blood, and not with men of bad principles and corrupt morals, from whom neither happineſs nor tranquillity could be expected. Theſe remonſtrances, however, were ſo far from producing the deſired effect, that the miniſtry thinking themſelves highly inſulted, determined to have recourſe to arms. Fifteen thouſand diſciplined forces, under the command of Sir Humphry Stafford, was ſent againſt the inſurgents. Cade artfully affected to be terrified at the general's approach, and retired with his main body to Sevenoaks, but left a ſtrong body in ambuſcade, to intercept Stafford in his march. The royal army followed without obſerving the neceſſary cautions, and were ſo vigorouſly attacked by Cade's concealed forces, that great numbers of them were cut to pieces, and the reſt ſought their ſafety in a precipitate flight. The general himſelf fell in the action. Elated with this ſucceſs, Cade returned to Blackheath, and demanded, in a ſecond remonſtrance, that the dukes of York, Exeter, Buckingham, and Norfolk, ſhould be recalled to court; that the murderers of the duke of Glouceſter, together with all thoſe who had contributed to the loſs of the Engliſh territories on the continent, ſhould be brought to condign puniſhment. The council, alarmed at the late defeat of their forces, and knowing that the ſecret friends of the duke of York, were on the point of declaring themſelves, reſolved, if poſſible, to purchaſe their ſafety by ſacrificing ſome individuals to the fury of the populace. The lords Say and Cromer, who had rendered themſelves very unpopular, were committed to the Tower; and the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the duke of Buckingham, ſent to treat with the rebels. Cade received them with the utmoſt complaiſance, but told them he was abſolutely determined not to lay down his arms, till the king came in perſon, and granted their requeſts. The effect of this conference was reported to the council, and the king, perſuaded that he had every thing to fear from the fury of the inſurgents, ſet out with his whole court for Kenelworth-caſtle. The citizens of London, alarmed at the ſucceſs of the rebels, opened the gates at their approach, and Cade entered in triumph, at the head of his troops, which had been greatly augmented ſince his victory. As he paſſed by London-Stone, he ſtruck his ſword againſt it, crying, Now is Mortimer lord of London. But he forbad his followers, on ſevere penalties, to commit the leaſt outrage, or give any cauſe of complaint to the inhabitants. Next day being informed, that the lord treaſurer Say was in the city, he cauſed him to be apprehended and beheaded, without any form of trial, and in the evening retired to the borough of Southwark. Thus he continued for ſome days to enter the city in the morning, and retire at night, that he might not give umbrage to the citizens, with whom he at firſt maintained a good underſtanding; but at length, the inſurgents having plundered ſome houſes, and committed other outrages, Cade one morning found the gate of the bridge ſhut, and ſecured againſt him. Attempting to force a paſſage, a battle enſued between the rebels and citizens, which laſted till night put an end to the conteſt. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the chancellor, who had taken refuge in the Tower, being informed by their emiſſaries that the inſurgents were greatly diſpirited by this repulſe, and heartily tired of their rebellious project, drew up an act of amneſty, confirmed by the ſanction of the great ſeal, and found means to publiſh it by night in the Borough. This expedient ſucceeded; and at day-break, Cade found himſelf deſerted by the greateſt part of his followers, and was obliged to take ſhelter in the woods of Suſſex with a few of his friends, who were determined to ſhare his fate. A price was now ſet on his head; and he was ſlain by one Iden, a gentleman of Suſſex, who ſent it to London, for which ſervice he was rewarded with the government of Dover caſtle. At this time a report prevailed that the duke of York intended to return from Ireland, where his ſucceſs had entitled him to public eſteem and confidence; and the council, ſuſpecting that he meant to come with an armed body, iſſued orders in the king's name to oppoſe him, wherever he ſhould endeavour to land; but the duke eluded all their deſigns, by arriving with no more than his ordinary retinue.

A. D. 1451.

Notwithſtanding Cade's enterprize had failed, the duke received ſeveral advantages from it; and this induced him to repair to London, where his adherents waited his arrival with much impatience. Theſe were John Mowbray, duke of Norfolk; Richard Nevil, earl of Saliſbury; his ſon Richard Nevil, afterwards earl of Warwick; Thomas Courtney, earl of Devonſhire; and Edward Brooke, baron of Cobham. The confederates had now an opportunity of projecting their plan without interruption, as the court was on a progreſs through the weſtern counties; and they at length determined that the duke of York ſhould retire to Wales, where the houſe of Marche had an extenſive influence, and there ſecure ſuch an intereſt as might enable him to aſſemble an army at pleaſure. His party was now directed to maintain, in all companies, his right, both by ſucceſſion, and the conſtitution of the kingdom; in conſequence of which the people were divided in opinion, with regard to the pretenſions of the houſes of York and Lancaſter. Many plauſible reaſons were urged by the partizans of both parties. "Richard II." ſaid the friends of Lancaſter, "was dethroned by an act of the nation; and Henry IV. was placed in the ſeat of power by the ſame authority. The right of ſucceſſion was admitted only for the general good, and could not be pleaded to the deſtruction of national tranquillity. Two glorious reigns had conſolidated the poſſeſſion and rights of the reigning family; and the people were bound to allegiance by the numerous oaths of fealty they had taken. Even the duke of York himſelf had renounced claims, to which he might have been entitled, by having done homage to Henry as his lawful ſovereign. To what calamities, added they, would the nation be expoſed, if diſputes on revolutions, which muſt be attended with bloodſhed, were encouraged." It was urged on the contrary, by the partizans of the duke of York, "That the maintenance of order in the ſucceſſion of princes, was the baſis of public tranquillity; that the injuſtice committed by the violation of it, could not be too ſoon repaired; that the lapſe of many ages was neceſſary to give ſtability to uſurpation; that both the depoſition of Richard, and the coronation of Henry IV. had been occaſioned by a popular inſurrection, rather than by a deliberate act of the nation; that the lawful heirs of the crown had, indeed, ſubmitted to neceſſity and force, but had never renounced their rights; and that a revolution, deſtined to eſtabliſh order, ſo far from proving ruinous to the ſtate, would prevent ſimilar diſputes for the future." Theſe arguments were continually repeated, and appeared weaker or ſtronger in proportion to the prejudices of each party.

A. D. 1452.

In ſpring, the duke of York, who was then in Wales, entered England with a formidable army, and, without committing any acts of hoſtility, advanced to London; but, contrary to his expectations, he found the gates of the city ſhut againſt him; and, on his retreating into Kent, he was purſued by the king at the head of a numerous army. Richard now found it neceſſary to temporize; and therefore declared to two biſhops, who were ſent to demand the reaſon of his appearing in arms againſt the government, that his intention was not to renounce his obedience to the king, but ſolely to remove the evil counſellors from his perſon, eſpecially the duke of Somerſet; and that if his majeſty would commit that nobleman to priſon, and detain him there till the enſuing ſeſſion of parliament, he would immediately diſband his forces. The court pretended to grant his requeſt, and Somerſet was put under an arreſt. Without the leaſt heſitation therefore, the duke diſbanded his troops, and viſited the king, not regarding the ſecurity of his perſon. When he was introduced to his majeſty, he accuſed the duke of Somerſet as a traitor, who had ſacrificed his country to his own avarice and ambition; but was not a little ſurprized to ſee that miniſter quit his hiding-place, and offer to vindicate his innocence. Richard now at once perceived the deluſion, as well as the danger of his ſituation. Nevertheleſs the court, being afraid to purſue rigorous meaſures, permitted him to depart, after his having took a new oath of allegiance; and the duke of Somerſet continued to enjoy his influence at court without a rival. The duke of York, on his diſmiſſion, retired to his ſeat at Wigmore on the borders of Wales; during his abode at which place an incident occurred that inflamed popular clamour againſt the miniſtry, and contributed greatly to the ſucceſs of his enterprize. Deputies arrived from Gaſcony, offering to renounce the dominion of France, and to return to their former allegiance under Henry.

A. D. 1453.

The earl of Shrewſbury was therefore diſpatched to the continent with eight thouſand men, in order to aſſiſt the Gaſcons in throwing off the French yoke. He was admitted into Bourdeaux without oppoſition; and being joined in a few days by the remainder of the troops from England, ſoon reduced Fronſac, Caſtillon, and other places. But after having made a conſiderable progreſs in ſubduing the province, he was attacked by a ſuperior force, and he himſelf, together with his gallant ſon the lord d'Iſle, were ſlain in the action. The towns which had been reduced by the Engliſh were inſtantly recovered by the French arms. Bourdeaux again returned to its former maſter, and all hopes of reannexing Gaſcony to the crown of England, were for ever extinguiſhed. Thus fell the valiant Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, than whom the annals of England cannot boaſt a more illuſtrious hero. When advice of this defeat arrived, the people in general exclaimed moſt virulently againſt the treachery and miſconduct of the miniſters, who through indolence or deſign had not furniſhed the earl of Shrewſbury with neceſſary reinforcements. During the prevalence of this diſcontent, a motion was made in the houſe of commons, that as Henry had no iſſue, the duke of York might, conſiſtent with equity of claim, be declared heir-apparent to the crown. This motion gave great diſguſt to the queen's junto, ſhe being ſome months advanced in her pregnancy; and, on the twenty-third of October was delivered of a ſon, called Edward, and created prince of Wales, and earl of Cheſter. Soon after this event, Henry was ſeized with a violent diſtemper, which rendered him not only incapable of diſcharging the important functions of a king, but even maintaining the appearance of royalty. On which, the queen and A. D. 1454. council, finding themſelves unable without this ſupport, to reſiſt the duke of York's party, were obliged to ſubmit to the torrent; and ſending Somerſet to the Tower, appointed Richard lieutenant of the kingdom, with power to call a parliament; and that aſſembly ſoon after created him Protector during pleaſure. Thoſe who thus entruſted one that had ſuch evident pretenſions to the crown with ſovereign authority, were certainly not averſe to his aſcending the throne; yet the duke, inſtead of urging his title, drew back, and appeared irreſolute in receiving the power that was offered to him. He deſired that it might be recorded in parliament, that they conferred this authority upon him from their own free-will, without his applying for it; expreſſed his hope of their aſſiſtance; and not only made it a condition of his acceptance, that the lords ſhould exerciſe that truſt, when appointed of the council, but required, that the parliament ſhould ſpecify and define all the powers of his office.

A. D. 1455. Henry, having in ſome meaſure recovered from his diſtemper, was perſuaded to reaſſume his regal power, annul the lieutenancy of the duke of York, reſtore Somerſet to liberty, and inveſt him with the ſole management of ſtate affairs. Richard, being ſenſible of the dangers to which he might be expoſed for having accepted of the parliamentary commiſſion, ſhould he now ſubmit to its being annulled, levied an army; but without making any pretenſions to the crown, complained of the king's miniſters, and demanded a reformation of the government; and ſoon after a battle was fought at St. Albans on the twenty-ſecond of May, in which the victory was ſoon determined in favour of the duke of York, whoſe enemies loſt about five thouſand men, among whom were the duke of Somerſet, the earls of Northumberland and Stafford, lord Clifford, and many other perſons of diſtinction. Mean time the king, who was wounded in the neck with an arrow, finding himſelf deſerted in the rout of his army, retired to a little houſe which was ſoon inveſted. Notice being brought to the duke of York of the king's ſituation, he poſted thither with the earl of Saliſbury; and both of them kneeling before him, the duke ſaid, that ſince the public enemy was dead, he ſaw none there but perſons ready to obey him. Upon this the king, recovering a little from his fright, intreated the duke, for God's ſake, to put a ſtop to the ſlaughter; aſſuring him, that he was ready to give him all the ſatisfaction he could deſire. The duke inſtantly ordered a retreat to be ſounded, and commanded that no more blood ſhould be ſhed. He then conducted the king to St. Albans, and the next day they returned to London. At the enſuing parliament, Henry declared from the throne, that he was well aſſured of the loyalty of the duke of York, and the earls of Saliſbury and Warwick, and their late conduct was approved of by both houſes. They alſo voted, that the nation was miſguided by the queen and duke of Somerſet, who had abuſed the goodneſs and confidence of his majeſty; that the late duke of Glouceſter had been unjuſtly accuſed, and that there ſhould be a full reſumption of all the alienations which had been made ſince the firſt year of the king's reign.

Though the Lancaſtrian party affected to acquieſce in theſe meaſures, they carefully watched every opportunity to regain their former power. A. D. 1456. The queen, in the duke's preſence, appeared with Henry before the houſe of lords, his health permitting him to act his part with ſome degree of propriety; and he there declared, that being by God's grace in good health, and able to reſume the reins of government, he thought the kingdom wanted no longer a protector, and deſired the parliament to conſent to the duke of York's being diſmiſſed from that office. The contrary party being ſurprized, did not oppoſe this motion; and the houſe of lords, many of whom were offended with the late act of reſumption of grants, giving their aſſent to Henry's propoſal, he was declared to be reinſtated in ſovereign authority; even Richard himſelf acquieſced, and no diſturbance enſued. But the duke's claim to the crown was too well known, ever to allow ſincere confidence to ſubſiſt between the two parties. The confederates, on pretence of having no farther buſineſs at court, retired into Yorkſhire, where they reſided contiguous to each other; but the queen receiving advice that they held frequent conferences, determined to have them arreſted at Coventry, where they were leſs popular than in London. With this view the court was removed thither; and the duke of York, with the earls of Saliſbury and Warwick, were required by letters, under the privy-ſeal, to attend the king about ſome affairs of importance. As Richard had taken no ſteps towards publiſhing his deſign upon the crown, he reſolved to obey the order, and accordingly ſet out with his aſſociates for the place appointed; but being apprized on the road of the queen's intentions, they inſtantly parted; Richard retired to his eſtate at Wigmore; Saliſbury to his ſeat in Yorkſhire; and Warwick embarked immediately for Calais, the government of which place he had obtained after the battle of St. Albans. A. D. 1458. The duke of York and his partizans came to London with a numerous retinue; the archbiſhop of Canterbury having, by his mediation, attempted to effect a ſolemn reconciliation, and for mutual ſecurity took up their quarters near each other. The ſame precaution was uſed by the Lancaſtrian party; while the mayor kept a ſtrict watch night and day at the head of five thouſand men, in order to maintain peace among them. One of the king's retinue having inſulted one of the earl of Warwick's, A. D. 1459. their companions on both ſides took part in the quarrel, and a fierce combat enſued. The earl, apprehending there was a deſign againſt his life, fled to Calais; and this violation of their late engagement enraged the Yorkiſts, while the miſcarriage of their ſcheme chagrined the Lancaſtrians; ſo that both parties made open preparations throughout England, for deciding the conteſt by force of arms. In the mean time the king and queen were making a progreſs through the counties of Warwick, Stafford, and Cheſter; by which means a ſtrong aſſociation was formed in favour of their ſon Edward.

Having received intelligence that the earl of Saliſbury was on his march to join the duke of York in Herefordſhire with a conſiderable army, a commiſſion was granted to lord Audley to aſſemble troops, with a view of preventing the inſurgents from joining. Accordingly he levied an army of ten thouſand men, at the head whereof he overtook Saliſbury, who had proceeded as far as Boreheath, on the borders of Staffordſhire. The two armies were parted by a rivulet with ſteep banks; Saliſbury therefore had recourſe to a ſtratagem, which was attended with extraordinary ſucceſs. He ordered a large detachment of men at arms to advance briſkly to the banks of the rivulet, and diſcharge a volley of arrows upon the royal army. The archers having executed this order, he made a feint of retreating with a ſeeming confuſion. Audley, ſuppoſing the enemy to have actually fled, paſſed the rivulet with great precipitation; when Saliſbury, ſuddenly wheeling about, charged the royaliſts with his whole force, who were entirely defeated, with the loſs of their general, ſeveral principal officers, and two thouſand four hundred men. Saliſbury having thus opened a free paſſage, continued his rout to Ludlow, where the duke of York had raiſed a powerful army. This was ſoon after reinforced by a ſelect body of veterans, which the earl of Warwick brought from the continent, under the command of Sir Andrew Trollop, and John Blunt, both officers of great reputation. Richard now no longer concealed his pretenſions to the crown; and his avowal of the ſame rouſed all the king's friends, who in a ſhort time found their army far exceeded that of the inſurgents. A reſolution was therefore taken to advance towards Ludlow, where they were informed the Yorkiſts lay encamped. When they approached, and a general action was hourly expected, Sir Andrew Trollop deſerted, with the whole detachment under his command; and his treacherous example was followed by ſuch a number, that the faithful adherents to the cauſe, fearing they ſhould be abandoned, diſperſed next day, without ſtriking a ſtroke. The duke of York, with his ſecond ſon, repaired to Ireland; the earl of Warwick to his government at Calais; and the other noblemen to their reſpective habitations; yet bravely reſolving, notwithſtanding ſuch an unexpected diſappointment, again to attempt the retrieval of this ſevere check in their fortunes.

A. D. 1460. Warwick, whoſe popularity had induced numbers of volunteers daily to repair to his ſtandard, determined to make another vigorous effort in favour of the houſe of York; and having fitted out a fleet, with which he made ſome captures at ſea, landed in Kent, accompanied by his father the earl of Saliſbury, and York's eldeſt ſon the earl of Marche. On their arrival at Sandwich they were met by the primate, lord Cobham, and other perſons of diſtinction, with whom they directed their rout towards the capital, which they entered in triumph with an army of forty thouſand men, well attached to the cauſe. On the earl's proceeding from thence, his troops increaſed ſo faſt every day that he was ſoon in a condition to face the royal army, which haſted from Coventry to attack him. The battle was fought near Northampton on the nineteenth of July. The earl of Warwick commanded the right wing; lord Cobham the left; and the earl of Marche the center. The dukes of Somerſet and Buckingham headed the royaliſts, while the queen was at a diſtance to obſerve what paſſed. In the mean time the king remained in his tent, waiting the iſſue of a battle that might ſecure him in the poſſeſſion of the crown, or deprive him of it for ever. The Yorkiſts publiſhed a ſtrict charge throughout the army not to hurt the king's perſon, to ſpare the common ſoldiers, and to fall chiefly upon the officers. The battle began about two in the afternoon, and was fought with great obſtinacy, till lord Grey of Ruthin, who commanded a conſiderable body of the royal army, ſuddenly went over to the Yorkiſts; when the royaliſts, being apprehenſive that others would follow, began to give way, and at laſt were completely routed, with the loſs of ten thouſand men. The duke of Buckingham, the earl of Shrewſbury, ſon of the brave Talbot, the lords Beaumont and Egremont, and Sir William Lucy, were ſlain. The queen fled with her ſon and the duke of Somerſet, without ſtopping to take reſt till they entered the biſhopric of Durham, ſo great was her fear of falling into the hands of her enemies; while the unfortunate ſhadow of a king, continuing in his tent, fell into the hands of his victorious nobles, who paid him all the reſpect he could have received in his greateſt proſperity. He was conducted immediately after the battle to Northampton, where he took up his reſidence for ſome time; after which he returned to London, encompaſſed by a croud of thoſe lords, who, a ſhort time before, had appeared in arms againſt him. The queen, not thinking herſelf ſafe in Durham, retired privately with only eight perſons into Wales; but ſoon after left that retreat, and fled with the prince her ſon into Scotland.

The duke of York, who was in Ireland when the laſt battle was fought, having been informed of the ſucceſs of his friends, arrived at London, and repaired to the houſe of peers, which was then ſitting. He ſtood for ſome time under the canopy, with his hand upon the throne, expecting the lords would deſire him to aſcend. The archbiſhop of Canterbury advancing, aſked him, if he had yet paid his reſpects to the king? He was confounded at the queſtion: but after a ſhort pauſe, replied, he knew not any perſon to whom he owed that reſpect, and then departed. The day following he preſented a writing to parliament, containing the principles on which his claim to the crown were founded. This produced long and very remarkable debates; but at length it was reſolved unanimouſly, that Henry ſhould enjoy the crown during his natural life, and the duke of York be declared his ſucceſſor. In the mean time the queen had raiſed in the northern counties an army of twenty thouſand men, with which ſhe hoped once more to reſtore the dignity of her family. Richard, apprized of her deſign, determined to ſtop her in the beginning of her career; and he was no ſooner informed of her appearance in the north, than he marched haſtily thither at the head of five thouſand men, ordering the earl of Marche to lead the reſt of the army into quarters of refreſhment in Wales, and afterwards join him in the north. As the duke advanced, he was informed how greatly he was outnumbered by the enemy: he therefore threw himſelf into his own caſtle of Sandal, by the advice of the earl of Saliſbury, who obſerved, that the queen, being deſtitute of artillery, could not force the fortification, till the arrival of his ſon the earl of Marche. The queen continued in the neighbourhood of Wakefield, extremely troubled at thus loſing the hopes of a victory, which ſhe flattered herſelf ſhe could eaſily obtain. She therefore employed every artifice to draw the duke of York from his retreat. She placed a conſiderable body of troops in ambuſh out of ſight of the caſtle, and then appearing before the walls, challenged the duke to battle by the moſt inſulting meſſages, ſometimes threatening, at others upbraiding him, that a man who thus aſpired to the crown, ſhould have the cowardice to ſhut himſelf up for fear of a woman. Theſe means ſucceeded beyond her expectation. The duke, ſtimulated by her reproaches, drew out his men into the plain, attacked the queen's troops with undaunted reſolution, and ſignalized his own valour particularly in the action; but, all his bravery was of little avail againſt the great inequality of numbers.

While preſſed by the enemy in front, he was attacked in the rear by thoſe in ambuſh, which threw his little body of forces into ſuch confuſion, that in leſs than half an hour they were routed, and he himſelf was ſlain fighting valiantly on foot. His ſecond ſon, the younger earl of Rutland, who was not above twelve years of age, flying with his governor, was overtaken by lord Clifford, upon Wakefield-bridge, and that barbarian, to revenge the death of his father, who had periſhed in the battle of St. Alban's, plunged his dagger into the breaſt of that innocent prince, whoſe exterior figure and accompliſhments are ſaid to have been extremely amiable. The ſame lord Clifford, finding the body of the duke of York, cut off his head, and encircling it with a paper crown in deriſion of his title, fixed it upon a lance, and thus preſented it to the queen, by whoſe orders it was elevated on the walls of York. The earl of Saliſbury, being wounded, was taken priſoner, and beheaded at Pomfret, with ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction. In this battle three thouſand Yorkiſts were ſlain. Thus fell, in the fiftieth year of his age, Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, a prince endowed with many great and amiable qualities, who ſurely merited a better fate. His claim to the crown was indiſputably juſt, and the fatal effects of his aſſerting it, would in all probability have been avoided, had Henry poſſeſſed the ſpirit of a king, or Margaret that meekneſs, which is the peculiar ornament of her ſex; or had Richard followed the ferocious practice of the times, and waded to a throne in the blood of his enemies, he might perhaps have enjoyed the Engliſh ſcepter, notwithſtanding all the efforts of the houſe of Lancaſter. He left behind him three ſons, Edward, George, and Richard; and three daughters, Anne, Elizabeth and Margaret.

A. D. 1461. The battle of Wakefield inſtead of retrieving the ruined fortunes of the queen, ſerved only to expedite their deſtruction. The brave earl of Marche was inſpired with the moſt implacable reſentment, at the news of his father's death, and determined to hazard his life and fortune, in aſſerting his own pretenſions to the crown. He now found himſelf at the head of twenty thouſand men, beſides thoſe left under the command of the earl of Warwick, and with theſe united forces he intended to go in queſt of Margaret, who marked her route with every inſtance of barbarity, whoſe cruelty he eagerly deſired to retaliate. The queen had begun her march towards London, and being informed of young Edward's deſign, detached Gaſper Tudor, earl of Pembroke, and James Butler, earl of Ormond, with a body of Engliſh and Iriſh troops, to ſtop his progreſs. Edward, informed of the queen's motions, had altered his firſt reſolution of giving her battle, and directed his march towards London; but when he underſtood that Tudor had been ſent againſt him, rather than expoſe himſelf to the danger of being incloſed between two hoſtile armies, he repaired immediately for Herefordſhire, in order to give him battle. Both armies met on Candlemas-eve, near Mortimer's-croſs, and Edward, being greatly ſuperior in numbers, obtained an eaſy victory over the enemy, who loſt near four thouſand men on the ſpot. The earls of Pembroke and Ormond eſcaped, but Owen Tudor, huſband to Catherine of France, and ſtepfather to king Henry, was taken and beheaded at Hereford, with nine other officers. Mean while the queen was in full march towards London, vainly hoping, that as ſoon as her victorious army ſhould appear, the citizens would expel Warwick, and receive her with demonſtrations of joy. Warwick apprehenſive of ſuch an event, marched out with a handful of veterans, to hazard an engagement. The two armies met, and engaged on Bernard's-heath, near St. Albans, where notwithſtanding the inequality of numbers, the conduct and courage of Warwick tendered the fortune of the day for a long time doubtful, till lord Lovelace, who commanded one of the wings, having treacherouſly withdrawn from the combat, the victory declared for Margaret. The vanquiſhed loſt about two thouſand three hundred men in the battle and purſuit, and the perſon of the king, whom Warwick did not chuſe to leave behind him, fell again into the hands of his own party. But whatever ſide detained him, this weak prince was equally a priſoner. Lord Bonville, to whoſe care the Yorkiſts had intruſted him, ſtaid with Henry after the defeat, on his ſolemn aſſurance of a pardon; but Margaret, paying no regard to her huſband's promiſe, ordered him to be beheaded at St Albans, and Sir Thomas Ririel, a warrior of diſtinguiſhed bravery, was treated in the ſame manner. Margaret by her cruelties had ſo incenſed the Londoners, that they refuſed her admittance into the city; yet the lord mayor, at her requeſt, ordered ſeveral waggons loaden with proviſions to be conveyed to her camp; but they were ſtopped at Newgate by the populace, who declared, that the city ſhould not furniſh proviſions for an army, which inſtead of defending, came only to invade their properties. The queen denounced vengeance againſt the Londoners for their oppoſition, which ſhe never had an opportunity of executing; for hearing that the earls of Marche and Warwick had joined their forces at Chipping-Norton in Oxfordſhire, and were in full march to London, ſhe retired towards the north, where ſhe hoped to augment her army, and thereby be able to cope with all her enemies.

Prince Edward, earl of Marche, and duke of York, rejoiced at the queen's thus giving up the metropolis, and entered it amidſt the acclamations of the people. He was in the bloom of youth; remarkable for the beauty of his perſon, affability and bravery. It was now his determined reſolution, not to act within the narrow limits to which his father confined himſelf, but to inſiſt on his claim; to aſſume royal dignity; and to treat all his opponents as traitors. But the appearance of national conſent ſeeming neceſſary previous to this bold ſtep, and the aſſembling a parliament, he ordered the earl of Warwick to marſhal his army in the fields near Clerkenwell; when a great number of people aſſembling to gratify their curioſity, Warwick made an oration to this mixed multitude, wherein he ſtrongly urged the undoubted title of Edward, and reflected, in pointed terms, on the uſurpation and tyranny of the then reigning family. At the concluſion of his ſpeech, the people were aſked, whether they would ſtill have Henry of Lancaſter king? When having univerſally ſhewn their diſlike to the propoſal, it was demanded, if they would accept of Edward, the late duke of York's eldeſt ſon, for their ſovereign? To this they gave their conſent by loud and joyful huzzas. Edward having thus far ſucceeded, called a great council of all the biſhops, lords, magiſtrates, and other perſons in and about London, who aſſembled at Baynard's-caſtle, where, on the fifth of March, they confirmed the popular election, and the new king was the next day proclaimed in London, under the title of Edward IV. After which ceremony the king publicly declared, that his views ſhould be ſolely directed to the welfare and happineſs of his people. Thus was terminated the nominal reign of Henry VI. after it had laſted the ſpace of thirty-eight years and a half; a prince who had long been the ſport of fortune, though he came to the poſſeſſion of a crown even when in his cradle. At the time of his being dethroned, he was thirty-nine years and about three months old. By his queen Margaret, he had only one ſon, named Edward, who was in the ninth year of his age, when his unfortunate father was depoſed.

This reign furniſhes us with the firſt inſtance of a debt contracted upon parliamentary ſecurity. And in the eighth and tenth years of this king, laws were enacted for the due election of members of parliament in the counties, limiting the elections to ſuch as poſſeſſed forty ſhillings a year in land, free from all burthen within the county; a ſum equivalent to near twenty pounds a year of our preſent money.

It was enacted by parliament in the twenty-third year of this reign, that when wheat was ſold for ſix ſhillings and eight pence a quarter, (money of that age) rye at four ſhillings, and barley at three ſhillings and fourpence, it ſhould be lawful to export corn into foreign markets without licence.

There was ſuch a plenty of corn, in the year 1454, that a quarter of wheat was commonly ſold for twelve or fourteen pence; and a quarter of malt for ſixteen or ſeventeen pence of our preſent money.

Mahomet II. in the year 1453, inveſted Conſtantinople with an army of four hundred thouſand men, and after a ſiege of fifty-four days, took it by aſſault. This put an end to the Grecian or eaſtern empire.

In this reign the art of printing was diſcovered at Mentz, in Germany, by John Guttenberg.

Character of Henry VI. during the time of his reign.

He was a king merely in title, without penetration to diſcern or undertake the adminiſtration of government, nor reſolution to withſtand the tyrannical ſway of a cruel queen, and a corrupt, ſelf-intereſted miniſtry; indeed, a natural imbecillity rendered him unable to govern, which was his principal defect: for though deficient in regal qualifications, it muſt be confeſſed, he poſſeſſed many virtues which embelliſh domeſtic life. He was chaſte, temperate, and deliberate; he abhorred cruelty and injuſtice: nay ſuch was his humanity, that he could not conſent to the puniſhment of notorious criminals without reluctance, and he frequently bore the moſt aggravated inſults with a ſerenity of mind, void of the ſhadow of reſentment. Theſe virtues rendered his perſon reſpectable; and though his incapacity made him contemptible in the eyes of his ſubjects; yet at the ſame time his amiable character prevented their contempt from turning into hatred; however, this was not ſufficient to ſupport him againſt the attacks of inſatiable ambition. It is a common obſervation, many are fit for good ſubjects, but few, very few, for good kings. Henry would doubtleſs not only have added to the number who verify this remark, but alſo have contributed to the intereſt of ſociety in general, had his humble lot been to obey that power, from the due exerciſe of which he was prevented by natural infirmity, and a want of mental abilities.

HOUSE OF YORK.

EDWARD IV.

Edward diſcovers ſigns of a cruel diſpoſition—Party diſtinctions of the white and red roſes—Battle in the fields between Touton and Saxton—Margaret eſcapes with her ſon into Scotland—Battle of Hexam—The queen's ſingular diſtreſs before ſhe effects her eſcape into Flanders—Henry impriſoned in the Tower—Edward marries Elizabeth Woodville, widow of Sir John Gray, while the earl of Warwick is negociating a treaty of marriage between him and the French king's ſiſter—The diſguſt this marriage gave to the nobility, and its conſequences—The earl of Warwick and Clarence, Edward's brother, fly to France—Their return; upon which Edward is compelled to fly abroad, and Henry is reſtored to his throne—Edward lands in England with two thouſand men, and levies an army—The battle of Barnet, in which Warwick is ſlain, and Henry again taken priſoner—That near Tewkeſbury, where the Lancaſtrians are totally defeated—Impriſonment of Margaret—Murder of her ſon, prince Edward—And death of Henry VI.—War and peace with France—The fate of the duke of Clarence—Edward prepares for a ſecond invaſion of France—His death and character.

A. D. 1461. EDWARD, the young king, at this time in the twentieth year of his age, was ſcarcely ſeated on his throne, when he diſcovered a diſpoſition very different from that of his father. He ſeemed formed for thoſe ſcenes of ſlaughter he was to paſs through. The very commencement of his reign was marked with blood. A tradeſman in the city, who kept a ſhop at the ſign of the crown, told his ſon, in a jocular manner, that he would make him heir to the crown; this expreſſion being conſtrued as a ſarcaſm, and ſuppoſed to be uttered in contempt of Edward's aſſumed title, the ſhopkeeper was tried, condemned, and ſuffered death for his innocent pleaſantry. But this was only the commencement of thoſe ſanguinary meaſures and party commotions, which almoſt deſtroyed the nobility of England, and laid great part of the country waſte. The whole kingdom was filled with two implacable factions, diſtinguiſhed by the White and Red Roſes; the former being the badge of the houſe of York, and the latter of that of Lancaſter; and Edward was too much diſpoſed to confirm his authority by cruel executions. The ſubtle Margaret, was ſtill employing her influence to diſturb his tranquillity, if ſhe could not effect his depoſition; for he received advice, about eight days after his elevation, that ſhe had collected an army of ſixty thouſand men, ready to devote their lives to her ſervice. But the king depending on the ſtrength of his arms, rather than his election, ſet out from London, accompained by the earl of Warwick, with an army of forty thouſand men, in order to oppoſe her progreſs. On his arrival at Pontefract, he detached the lord Fitzwalter, to ſeize the paſs at Ferry-bridge, on the river Aire, and that nobleman executed the order with equal celerity and ſucceſs; but was not able to defend the place againſt lord Clifford, who attacked him with ſuperior numbers, drove him from the paſs with great ſlaughter, and Fitzwalter himſelf loſt his life in the action. Warwick dreading the conſequence of this diſaſter, at a time when a general engagement was momentarily expected, ſtabbed his horſe in ſight of the whole army, and kiſſing the hilt of his ſword, ſwore, that he was firmly reſolved to ſhare the fate of the meaneſt ſoldier, and to ſpend the laſt drop of his blood in defence of his majeſty.

Edward, far from being diſcouraged by this diſaſter, iſſued a proclamation, granting to every individual in his army full liberty to retire, but denouncing the ſevereſt vengeance againſt thoſe who in the enſuing action ſhould betray the leaſt ſign of treachery or cowardice. Lord Falconbridge was ſent to retake the paſs from the enemy; this he not only effected, but entirely defeated the Lancaſtrians, and ſlew their leader the lord Clifford, a moſt implacable foe to the houſe of York. The two hoſtile armies met at Touton, and while the Yorkiſts were advancing to the charge, it began to ſnow, and a ſharp wind drove the ſleet full in the faces of the Lancaſtrians, and diſordered their ſight in ſuch a manner that they could not eſtimate the diſtance between themſelves and the enemy. The lord Falconbridge, who commanded the van of Edward's army taking advantage of this incident, ordered his archers to advance within ſhot of the enemy's line, and diſcharge a volley of arrows; which order was no ſooner obeyed, than they retired to their former ſtation. The Lancaſtrians feeling the effects of this diſcharge, imagined the Yorkiſts were within reach, and plied their bows till their quivers were exhauſted, without doing the leaſt execution. Falconbridge advanced again with his archers, who now plied the enemy without oppoſition, and ſlew a great number with the very ſhafts they picked from the field, after their own quivers were empty. The bow was then laid aſide, for the ſword, it decided the fate of the battle, which ended in a total defeat of the Lancaſtrians, who were purſued with great ſlaughter, and about thirty-ſix thouſand are ſuppoſed to have fallen. Among theſe were the earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, the lords Dacres and Willes, Sir Andrew Trollop, and many other perſons of diſtinction. Immediately after this important victory, Edward advanced to York, in hopes of ſeizing the perſons of Henry and Margaret, but they had fled to Scotland; and being there joined by the dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, they concluded a treaty with the Scottiſh miniſtry, who received them honourably.

Edward was now maſter of all England and Wales, except Harleigh and Merionethſhire, and a few caſtles in Northumberland, which he did not think it neceſſary to reduce. Having, therefore, ſufficiently provided againſt the incurſions that might be made from thoſe caſtles, he repaired to his palace at Shene, in the neighbourhood of London. The twentieth of June was appointed for his coronation; and in the mean time, by the advice of the earl of Douglas, who long reſided in England, he determined to purſue ſuch meaſures, as might prevent the Scots from affording any important aſſiſtance to queen Margaret. He therefore entered into a particular alliance with the earl of Roſs, lord of the iſles, who had revolted from James, and promiſed to ravage the northern parts of Scotland. During theſe tranſactions, Edward was crowned at Weſtminſter on the twenty-ninth of June, and writs were iſſued for calling a parliament, after the firſt ſeſſion of which, the commons waited on the king with a congratulatory addreſs on his aſcenſion to the throne, requeſting him at the ſame time, to bring to condign puniſhment ſuch criminals as had perſiſted in acts of riot, murder or extortion with impunity, during the late reign. At the ſame time an act was paſſed, confirming the title of Edward to the crown, by right hereditary through the family of Mortimer; declaring Henry VI. an uſurper, and attainting him, his queen, and all his adherents as traitors. The ſame act included the dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, the earls of Northumberland, Wilts, and Pembroke, and a great number of lords and gentlemen, whoſe eſtates were confiſcated. Such conduct muſt not only be deemed partial, but flagrantly unjuſt. John, earl of Oxford, a venerable old nobleman, of untainted reputation, was arreſted on the bare pretence of having engaged in a correſpondence with the queen, and without form of trial beheaded on Tower-hill, together with his eldeſt ſon Aubrey de Vere, and three bannerets. Theſe cruel and arbitrary proceedings could not but diffuſe a ſpirit of diſcontent amongſt the people, as well as indicate the ſuſpicion of Edward of the good will and attachment of his ſubjects.

A. D. 1462.

Margaret made a voyage to France, where ſhe ſolicited ſuccours, and engaged to put Lewis in poſſeſſion of Calais, on the reſtoration of her family to the throne; in conſideration of which, ſhe obtained ſo conſiderable a ſupply, that ſhe was enabled to take the field, and made an incurſion in England. Edward, on receiving intelligence of theſe proceedings, detached baron Montague, with the forces then in hand, to retard her progreſs, till he himſelf could follow with a powerful armament to fruſtrate all her ſchemes. She had already entered Northumberland with a body of free-booters, and her army was ſo conſiderably augmented, that the duke of Somerſet, and Sir Ralph Piercy, imagining that ſhe would ſucceed in her enterprize, joined her with all their adherents, notwithſtanding the late oath they had taken to Edward: yet though thus conſiderably reinforced, ſhe was repulſed by Montague, who reſolving to have the whole honour of defeating Margaret before the king came up, marched directly to Hexam, where her forces were intrenched, attacked them in their lines, and obtained a complete victory. Among the priſoners were the duke of Somerſet, the lords Roſs and Hungerford, the earl of Kyme, and Sir John Finderne, the firſt was executed at Hexam, the laſt at Newcaſtle, and the others at York. This defeat was a terrible ſhock to the houſe of Lancaſter, and their fate conſequent on it was very extraordinary; Margaret with her young ſon, fearing to rely on any perſon's fidelity, took refuge in a neighbouring foreſt, where they were expoſed to the extremities of diſtreſs, and at length attacked in the night by robbers, who ſtripped Margaret of her jewels, and treated her with barbarity: but while the banditti were contending about the booty, ſhe eſcaped with her ſon into the thickeſt part of the wood, where ſhe wandered exhauſted with famine and affliction. While in this deplorable ſituation, ſhe obſerved another ruffian advancing towards her, with his drawn ſword, and ſenſible that her eſcape was impracticable, prudently reſolved to commit herſelf to the generoſity of the out-law. Accordingly taking her ſon by the hand, and aſſuming an air of confidence and majeſty, "Here friend," ſaid ſhe, "ſave my ſon, the ſon of good king Henry." The man ſtruck with her beauty and misfortune, not only vowed to abſtain from all injury on her perſon, but alſo to devote himſelf to her protection. He then conducted them to a village near the ſea ſide, whence they embarked in a veſſel for Flanders, where they were hoſpitably received by the duke of Burgundy, from whoſe court they repaired to that of Margaret's father, Regnier, count of Anjou. Henry was conveyed by ſome of his friends into Lancaſhire, where he reſided a year in obſcurity; but was at length diſcovered and delivered up to Edward, who ungenerouſly committed him cloſe priſoner to the Tower. About this time, Edmund duke of Somerſet, brother to him who had ſuffered at Hexam, and the duke of Exeter, eſcaped to the Low Countries, where they lived in obſcurity, and were reduced to ſuch extremity of wretchedneſs, that they condeſcended to the moſt menial offices, for the bare neceſſaries of life; till at length their quality being diſcovered, they were accommodated by the duke of Burgundy with moderate penſions.

The captivity of Henry, the baniſhment of queen Margaret, and extirpation of the moſt conſiderable Lancaſtrians, ſeemed to have eſtabliſhed the throne of Edward in tranquillity; he therefore embraced this opportunity of conciliating the affections of his ſubjects, whoſe attachment he had reaſon to doubt from his late ſeverity. He publiſhed a general amneſty in favour of all Lancaſtrians, who within a preſcribed term, ſhould ſubmit to his government and take the oath of allegiance. He exerted every talent, concerted and executed every meaſure, that could recommend him to the affection of thoſe, who had imbibed the leaſt ſenſe of virtue or intrinſic merit; but from his former conduct, theſe proceedings appear to have been the reſult of artifice rather than principle; for cruelty is the moſt deſtructive bane to ſociety: yet as the bulk of mankind are captivated with ſpecious appearances, and there are but few, who explore farther than the outſide of things, he rendered himſelf by theſe tranſactions, the darling of the multitude, and mirth and jollity univerſally prevailed. In this ſeaſon of feſtivity, his counſellors adviſed him to turn his thoughts to marriage, that he might have the ſatiſfaction of ſeeing the ſucceſſion ſettled on his own iſſue. He ſeemed to coincide with their opinion, and three matches were propoſed for his acceptance. The firſt was Margaret, ſiſter to the king of Scotland; the ſecond, Iſabella of Caſtile; but theſe were rejected on account of their non-age. The third was Bona of Savoy, ſiſter to the queen of France; and being approved by Edward, the earl of Warwick was appointed ambaſſador extraordinary to the French court, where the princeſs reſided.

Thus commiſſioned Warwick repaired to Paris early in the ſpring, and ſettled the articles of a marriage contract between king Edward and the princeſs Bona, and Lewis appointed the count of Dammarin, his plenipotentiary at the court of London, to finiſh the negotiation. This intended alliance was rendered abortive by a very extraordinary incident. Edward, happening to hunt in Northamptonſhire, viſited Jacquelina of Luxembourg, ducheſs of Bedford, who after the death of her firſt huſband, had married Sir Richard Woodville, by whom ſhe had a daughter, named Elizabeth, married to Sir John Groby, who was ſlain in the ſervice of the houſe of Lancaſter. Her huſband's eſtate being on that account confiſcated, the young widow had retired to her father's houſe at Grafton, and took this opportunity of throwing herſelf at Edward's feet, and imploring a maintenance for herſelf and children. Edward, captivated with her beauty, raiſing her from the ground, returned a favourable anſwer to her requeſt. Confiding in his elevated ſtation and perſonal endowments, he acquainted her with the nature of his paſſion, and propoſed to her terms of concubinage. Theſe ſhe rejected, alledging, that though ſhe was unworthy of being his queen, ſhe thought herſelf worthy of an honourable alliance in a more inferior ſtation. His paſſion now rent by oppoſition on the one hand, and admiration of her ingenuous ſentiments on the other, tranſported him beyond the bounds of reaſon; and he offered to ſhare his throne, as well as his heart, with a woman, whoſe perſonal and mental qualities were worthy the affection of the greateſt princes. The nuptials were privately ſolemnized, at the expence of his liberty, his views of ambition, and his proſpect of ſafety: for the earl of Warwick being informed of Edward's clandeſtine marriage, which he juſtly conſidered as the higheſt inſult that could have been offered to his honour, he inſtantly broke off the negotiation, and returned to England fraught with indignation.

A. D. 1466. Iſabella de Bourbon, ſecond wife to the count de Charolois, dying, that prince began to eſteem Edward more highly than before. He ſaw him firmly ſeated on the throne of England, and triumphing over all oppoſition, and therefore had reaſon to apprehend deſtruction on himſelf, ſhould a junction between Edward and Lewis take place.

Theſe conſiderations induced him to demand the princeſs Margaret, Edward's ſiſter, in marriage; which propoſal was highly acceptable to the Engliſh monarch, as ſuch an alliance would render him the better able to cope with Lewis, whoſe reſentment, on account of his diſhonourable treatment of his ſiſter-in-law, Bona, he had reaſon to expect. He therefore ſigned on the twelfth of October, a treaty of perſonal alliance, friendſhip, and fraternity, with the count of Charolois, and ſent a ſafe conduct to the plenipotentiaries, whom the duke of Burgundy had appointed to treat with the Engliſh court concerting a perpetual peace, and adjuſt the marriage between the count of Charolois and the princeſs Margaret. Soon after Edward's queen was delivered of the princeſs Elizabeth, who proved the happy means of extinguiſhing the fatal quarrel between the houſes of York and Lancaſter. During this tranſaction Edward amuſed the ambaſſadors of France, with the hopes of a perpetual alliance, till the treaty of marriage between the count of Charolois and his ſiſter Margaret was concluded, when ſhe departed from England with a ſplendid train, and the nuptials were ſolemnized at Bruges, with great magnificence. Edward now being at peace with moſt of the princes on the continent, had no reaſon to fear domeſtic troubles; but a ſpirit of diſcontent began to diffuſe itſelf through the nation, which was diſpleaſed at the pride and inſolence of the queen's relations. The earl of Warwick himſelf was ſtrongly ſuſpected, as the family of the Woodvilles had uſed their utmoſt endeavours to render that nobleman odious to the king, who had indeed no reaſon to confide in his attachment, conſidering the ingratitude with which his eminent ſervices had been repaid. He had lately repaired to his government of Calais, in order to ſolemnize his daughter's marriage with the duke of Clarence, and during his reſidence at this place, he ſeems to have ſounded the diſpoſition of the Engliſh nation, by employing his emiſſaries, to excite an inſurrection in Yorkſhire. The people refuſing to contribute to the ſupport of the ancient hoſpital of St. Leonard, near York, they were proſecuted, and their effects diſtrained, and as they imagined this hoſpital ſubſiſted by voluntary contribution, theſe ſuits were conſidered as unjuſt and oppreſſive. This diſcontent was fomented to ſuch a degree, that they roſe in arms, and aſſembled to the number of fifteen thouſand, advanced towards the city of York, which was filled with conſternation, until Warwick's brother, Montague, threw himſelf into the town, with a ſmall body of choſen men, and in a ſally took Robert Hilliard, their leader, commonly called Robin of Rideſdale, whom he ordered to immediate execution. But the rebels, not intimidated by this diſaſter, chuſing Sir Henry Nevil, ſon of lord Latimer, and Sir John Conyers, for their leaders, they proceeded to Daneſmore, in Northamptonſhire, about three miles from Banbury. The king had ordered the earl of Pembroke, to march againſt them at the head of twelve thouſand Welchmen, who were joined by Humphrey Stafford, lately made earl of Devon, with a body of five thouſand archers; but a quarrel enſuing between the two leaders, in the courſe of their march, they ſeparated their forces; and Pembroke, hazarding a battle, was defeated and ſlain. Sir Henry Nevil had been made priſoner in a ſkirmiſh the night before the battle, and killed in cold blood, which enraged the Yorkſhiremen to ſuch a degree, that they gave no quarter to the Welſh, five thouſand of whom were left dead on the ſpot. The earl of Devon alſo was apprehended in his return, by the king's order, and beheaded at Bridgewater. Richard, earl of Rivers, which his ſon John, being ſeized at Grafton, by a party of rebels, underwent the ſame fate at Northampton, by command of Sir John Conyers, who without doing any further miſchief withdrew to Warwick, to wait the arrival of the earl from Calais, by whoſe direction he had hitherto acted.

When Warwick, and his ſon-in-law Clarence, arrived from Calais, and offered their aſſiſtance towards reſtoring the peace of the nation, Edward not only received them with apparent complacency, but even appointed Warwick chief juſtice of South Wales, conſtable of Cardigan, and ſeneſchal of all the courts and foreſts in the counties of Caermarthen and Cardigan, offices vacated by the death of the earl of Pembroke. He likewiſe publiſhed an amneſty, in favour of Conyers and his followers, who had increaſed to ſixty thouſand. Commiſſioners of array were likewiſe iſſued, for raiſing the militia of Norfolk, Suffolk, and other maritime counties; and the queen's brother, Anthony Woodville, now earl of Rivers, was ſent to ſea with a ſtrong ſquadron, to prevent the landing of any foreign troops. A grand council having aſſembled on the ſixth of November, Edward aſked the advice of the prelates and nobility about providing a huſband for his daughter Elizabeth, preſumptive heir to the crown of England. They concurred in recommending George, the ſon of Montague, as the moſt eligible match for the young princeſs. Their opinion being approved by the king, letters patent were granted, promoting that young nobleman to the dignity of duke of Bedford. This teſtimony of the king's favour could not but be agreeable to Warwick, and his brothers, who began to live on good terms with Edward, till their harmony was interrupted by an artifice of the miniſtry, who were jealous of the revival of the intereſt of the Nevils.

A. D. 1470. The king was invited by the archbiſhop of York, one of Warwick's brothers, to an entertainment at his ſeat of More-park; and while the gueſts, according to the cuſtom of the times, were waſhing their hands before ſupper, John Ratcliffe, afterwards lord Fitzwalter, told the king privately, that the archbiſhop had provided an hundred men at arms, to carry his majeſty to the caſtle of Middleham. Alarmed at this intimation, Edward made a pretence to go out, and taking his horſe, rode full ſpeed to Windſor. His ſudden departure was highly reſented both by the archbiſhop, and Warwick, as well as by his ſon-in-law Clarence, who were perſuaded, that it was a plot formed to ruin their reputation with the public; the former animoſity was revived, and both ſides reviled each other with the moſt fell rancour. The king's mother, endeavoured to effect a reconciliation, and they met at their ſeat at Baynard's-caſtle, but their mutual hatred was too ſtrong and inveterate to be removed at this interview. However Edward gave commiſſion to Warwick and Clarence to array men in the counties of Warwick and Worceſter, in order to quell an inſurrection in Lincolnſhire, excited by Robert, ſon of lord Willes, Sir Thomas Dymock, and Sir Thomas de la Launde. But it was found, on ſtrict enquiry, that Warwick and Clarence, had encouraged the leaders to raiſe the diſturbance; Edward therefore ordered lord Willes and Dymock to repair to London, to give an account of the inſurrection. Accordingly they ſet out, but hearing on the road, that the king was incenſed againſt them, as the authors of the commotion, they fled for refuge to Weſtminſter-abbey, whence they were drawn by the king's promiſe of pardon; and the lord Willes, by Edward's command, wrote to his ſon, deſiring him to lay down his arms and ſubmit to the king's mercy. But this advice Robert rejected, and Edward, marching againſt him to Stamford, was ſo provoked by his obſtinacy, that he ordered his father and Dymock to be beheaded. This inhuman act incenſed him to ſuch a degree, that, though his army conſiſted of undiſciplined bandittti, he determined to revenge his father's death, and attacked Edward with great fury, on the fourteenth day of March. The battle was maintained for ſome time with equal obſtinacy on both ſides; but the rebels were at length obliged to yield to the ſuperior diſcipline of the royaliſts, who defeated them with great ſlaughter. Ten thouſand men are ſuppoſed to have fallen in this action, and the general, with Sir Thomas de la Launde, being taken priſoners, were executed immediately after the battle. Edward now obliged Warwick's brother to reſign what he enjoyed of the Piercy eſtate, with his patent for the title of Northumberland, and by way of equivalent, created him marquis of Montacute. In conſequence of his reſignation, Henry Piercy was created earl of Northumberland, reſtored to all his eſtates, and appointed warden of the eaſt and middle Marches towards Scotland. John Tiptot, earl of Worceſter, and conſtable of England for life, was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland, in lieu of the duke of Clarence, upon whoſe head, as well as that of his father-in-law, a price was ſet by the government. The king, at the ſame time, iſſued a declaration, importing, that George, duke of Clarence, and Richard, earl of Warwick, had formed an unnatural deſign to dethrone his majeſty; that they had encouraged Willes in his rebellion; that the king had ſummoned them to vindicate themſelves from theſe charges; but, that inſtead of obeying his ſummons, they had gone into Lancaſhire to augment their forces, in order to accompliſh their iniquitous deſign; that notwithſtanding theſe repeated acts of rebellion, he was ſtill diſpoſed to pardon them, on their ſubmiſſion, and giving ſecurity for their future behaviour; and with that view, he again ſummoned them to appear before him, on or before the twenty-eighth of March, on pain of being declared rebels and traitors. They not having complied with this order, another proclamation was iſſued at Nottingham, on the thirty-firſt day of March, denouncing them rebels and traitors, offering a reward for their perſons, and forbidding all his majeſty's ſubjects, on the ſevereſt penalties, to afford them any aſſiſtance. Mean while Warwick and Clarence embarked at Dartmouth, for Calais, but on their arrival before the place, the cannon were fixed upon them ſo, that they were obliged to ſtand out to ſea; and the ducheſs of Clarence was at this time delivered of a ſon, named Edward, afterwards earl of Warwick. They then continued their courſe towards Normandy, and landed at Harfleur, where they were hoſpitably received by the baſtard of Bourbon, lieutenant of the province, whence Warwick and Clarence repaired to Amboiſe, where they were honourably entertained by Lewis; who, ſenſible that a civil war in England would free him from all attempts of the dukes of Burgundy and Brittany, allies of Edward, promiſed them a powerful aſſiſtance; and in the mean time, ſent for Margaret of Anjou, in order to effect a reconciliation between Warwick and that princeſs. She conſidered Warwick as the original ſource of all the calamities, in which herſelf and family had been involved, and the moſt inveterate animoſity ſubſiſted between them. The accommodation, however, was eaſily effected, becauſe it tended to further the deſigns of both; for Warwick wanted a pretence for dethroning Edward, and the moſt ſpecious he could uſe, was the reſtoration of Henry, which project he could not attempt, without the queen's conſent; whereas Margaret on the other hand, ſaw no hopes of reſtoring her family, without the concurrence of Warwick, and therefore made no difficulty in uniting her intereſt with that of her ancient enemy. The French monarch acted as mediator between them, and a treaty was at length concluded, on condition that the duke of Clarence, and the earl of Warwick, ſhould uſe their utmoſt influence for Henry's reſtoration; and that the queen ſhould engage upon oath to veſt the adminiſtration in them, during the life of Henry, or the minority of his ſon, in caſe of his acceſſion to the throne, before he ſhould be of age; and that the prince of Wales ſhould eſpouſe Anne, the younger daughter of the earl of Warwick. This laſt article was immediately carried into execution, by which means the earl of Warwick became equally allied to the houſes of York and Lancaſter.

Edward paid very little regard to this tranſaction, imagining, that the earl of Warwick, who had been forced to quit the kingdom for want of ſupport, could never in his abſence, perſuade the people to riſe in his favour. He therefore neglected all precaution, and abandoned himſelf to riot and debauchery. While he was thus immerſed in ſenſuality, his miniſtry gratified their private reſentment, by ſuch acts of cruelty and oppreſſion, as branded the character of their maſter with indelible infamy. All perſons of any rank, ſuſpected of attachment to the houſe of Lancaſter, were proſecuted, plundered, or forced into exile. Many of theſe retired into France, and related their ſufferings to the earl of Warwick, whom they importuned to return, and redreſs the grievances of his country. In the mean time the king found means to enter into a private negotiation with his brother the duke of Clarence, who promiſed his aſſiſtance whenever it ſhould be requiſite. This declaration freed Edward from all apprehenſion; and he reſumed his licentious courſe, confident that all Warwick's ſchemes would prove ineffectual. Being thus lulled in deluſive ſecurity, the earl having obtained a ſmall ſupply of money and troops from Lewis, determined to embark for England under the convoy of a French fleet, commanded by the baſtard of Bourbon. The duke of Burgundy, however, blocked up the mouth of the Seine with a more numerous fleet, in order to intercept Warwick in his paſſage to England. But notwithſtanding theſe precautions, Burgundy's fleet being diſperſed by a ſtorm, Warwick embarked at Havre-de-grace, and landed at Dartmouth in the month of September. Edward rejoiced at his arrival, in vain confidence of his falling into his hands. Warwick had no ſooner landed, than his countrymen flocked to his ſtandard in ſuch numbers, that in a few days he found himſelf at the head of ſixty thouſand men, with whom he began his march againſt Edward, who had gone into the north to quell an inſurrection raiſed by the lord Fitzhugh, who had married Alice, ſiſter to the earl of Warwick. At the king's approach he fled into Scotland, and Edward repaired to York, where he firſt heard that Warwick had landed, and proclaimed Henry VI. king of England; publiſhing at the ſame time an order to all his ſubjects, from ſixteen to ſixty, to arm againſt Edward, and expel that uſurper. Edward immediately advanced to Nottingham in his way to London; but Warwick, reſolving to engage him before he could reach the capital, came in ſight of him within three miles of Nottingham, and drew up his army in order of battle.

Edward relied without miſtruſt on the fidelity of the marquis of Montacute, though the brother of his enemy, and a nobleman whom he had ſo lately deprived of the great eſtate and honour of Northumberland. He had raiſed ſix thouſand men, with whom he followed the king at a diſtance, as if he intended to join his majeſty; but he no ſooner heard of Warwick's approach to the royaliſts, than he haſtened his march in order to attack the rear of Edward, who had no notion of his deſign, until he was within two miles of his camp, and the ſhouts of "Long live king Henry," reſounded from all quarters. Greatly alarmed, he called a council of war, in which the lord Haſtings gave it as his opinion, that great part of the army would deſert to the earl of Warwick; or, that even though they ſhould retain their allegiance, they would not be able to cope with the inſurgents, who were thus ſtrengthened by the revolt of Montacute. He therefore adviſed the king to conſult his perſonal ſafety by retreating to the ſea ſide, where he might find an opportunity of eſcaping into Holland. As the danger was ſo imminent, Edward, in compliance with this advice, ſet out at midnight for Lynne, without money or baggage, attended only by a guard of eight hundred horſe. He then embarked in that harbour for Holland, with his brother Glouceſter and a ſmall retinue, and after having narrowly eſcaped a fleet of Eaſterlings, landed at Alkmar. Immediately after the king's departure, his army laid down their arms and ſubmitted to Warwick, who immediately directed his rout towards London, which he entered in triumph in the beginning of October, and removed Henry from the Tower to the biſhop's palace, while Edward's queen took refuge in the ſanctuary of Weſtminſter, where ſhe was delivered of a ſon called Edward.

This ſurprizing revolution was effected in the ſpace of eleven days; and all the judges, ſheriffs, and coroners of the kingdom, were removed from their places; Ladſtroker, prior of St. John's, was appointed treaſurer; the archbiſhop of York, chancellor; the earl of Warwick, admiral of England; and the duke of Clarence, lord-lieutenant of Ireland. No perſon was put to death on this occaſion, except John Tiptot, earl of Worceſter, who fell a ſacrifice to public hatred as a corrupt miniſter, and ſuch a monſter of cruelty, that he was ſtigmatized by the appellation of John the Butcher. Being taken on the top of a high tree in Huntingdonſhire, he was conveyed to London, condemned and executed on Tower-hill. On the twenty-ſixth of November a new parliament was called, in which Edward was declared a traitor and uſurper, and therefore decreed to have forfeited his eſtate and effects; all ſtatutes enacted by his authority were annulled, and the duke of Glouceſter and all his adherents attainted. The crown was ſettled upon Henry and the male iſſue of his body, and in default thereof, on the duke of Clarence, and his deſcendants; and that prince, with the earl of Warwick, were appointed regents of the kingdom during the minority of young Edward, according to a prior agreement. At the ſame time Clarence was declared heir to his father, the late duke of York, and reinſtated in all his poſſeſſions and honours. Montacute was pardoned for his late adherence to Edward, and rewarded for his late defection with a grant of ſeveral manors; the dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, the earls of Oxford, Richmond, Pembroke and Ormond, were reſtored to their eſtates and dignities.

A. D. 1471.

Edward met with a very indifferent reception from his brother-in-law the duke of Burgundy, to whom the news of his death would have been more grateful than the account of his exile. He was now in the utmoſt perplexity; Lewis had declared war againſt him, and he was fearful of incurring the joint enmity of France and England, ſhould he aſſiſt the exiled king. However, after the ſolicitations of the ducheſs, and the remonſtrances of Edward, backed by the moſt ſolemn promiſes of future ſervices, he contrived an expedient by which he was enabled to accommodate the fugitive king without incurring the reſentment of Warwick. He privately advanced a ſum of money to certain merchants, who fitted out four large ſhips at Terveer, a free port in Zealand, and hired fourteen veſſels belonging to the Eaſterlings, to convoy Edward to England, on the coaſt of which they were directed to continue fifteen days, in order to conduct him back, in caſe his attempt ſhould prove ineffectual. Edward being thus furniſhed with ſhips and money, embarked at Terveer; and he had no ſooner departed from Holland, than the duke of Burgundy, by proclamation, prohibited all his ſubjects from affording him any aſſiſtance, either directly or indirectly. The Engliſh monarch, attended by the lords Haſtings and Say, and about two thouſand men, attempted a deſcent on the coaſt of Eſſex; but being repulſed by a brother of the earl of Oxford, he ſtood away to the northward, and landed at Ravenſpur in Yorkſhire about the latter end of March, hoping that the inhabitants would flock to his ſtandard, on his producing the letters of invitation he had received from the earl of Northumberland. But he met with a very cold reception, and the inhabitants of Holderneſs took up arms to oppoſe his progreſs.

But truſting to the loyalty of the inhabitants of York, of which he was ſecure, though the magiſtrates were devoted to Warwick, he marched towards that city, and was viſited by a deputation of the aldermen, who deſired him to take another road, that they might not be under the diſagreeable neceſſity of refuſing him admittance. He now repeated his former declarations, and expoſtulated with them on the cruelty of refuſing him admittance into a city from which he derived his title, and on which he had conferred ſo many favours; but he depended on the attachment of the inhabitants, more than the power of his eloquence: nor was he diſappointed. His partizans raiſed a diſturbance in the city; and the magiſtrates, unable to reſiſt the torrent, went forth to offer him the keys of the city, and ſtipulate for their being exempted from pillage. Theſe propoſals being agreed to, Edward was admitted into York. He alighted at the cathedral, where, by a ſolemn oath, he ratified his former proteſtations, that he would remain a loyal ſubject to Henry, and leave his demand, touching his private inheritance, to the deciſion of parliament. Having thus made himſelf maſter of York, his army daily increaſed; till having aſſembled a conſiderable body of troops, he left a ſtrong garriſon in the place, and directed his march towards London.

Commiſſions of array were now iſſued to the duke of Clarence, and the earls of Warwick and Pembroke, for raiſing forces to repel the invaders; and the marquis of Montacute, lately appointed warden of the Scottiſh Marches, was ordered to intercept Edward in his march to York, and attack him before he could aſſemble his army. But this nobleman, inſtead of complying with his orders, remained quiet in his camp at Pontefract, and ſuffered Edward to paſs unmoleſted within four miles of his ſtation; who having reached Nottingham, was joined by Sir William Stanley, Sir William Parr, and a great number of other gentlemen with their vaſſals. Encouraged by theſe ſuccours, he openly avowed his claim to the crown; and his numbers were hourly increaſed during his march towards London. Warwick having levied a body of troops, proceeded to Leiceſter in order to join his brother Montacute; but ſuffered his adverſary to continue his march to London, imagining that the citizens would hold out till he ſhould come to their aſſiſtance. This might have been the caſe, had the archbiſhop of York, to whoſe care the perſon of Henry and the city of London were committed, been true to the intereſt of his brother Warwick; but he had made peace with Edward, who, by his connivance, was received into the city, and ſeized king Henry in the palace of the biſhop of London. The archbiſhop was apprehended to ſave appearances, and committed to cuſtody; but releaſed in two days, and indulged with a pardon.

Warwick, being joined by Clarence and Montacute, advanced towards London; and on the thirteenth of April encamped on a heath near Barnet, the town itſelf being occupied by the troops of Edward, who had come thither to give him battle, in conſequence of a promiſe he had received from Clarence, that he would deſert to him with all his forces. The night previous to the action, Richard, duke of Glouceſter, repaired, without any ſafeguard, to the tent of Clarence, where the two brothers embraced with marks of the moſt cordial affection; and after ſome private conference, went off together towards Edward's camp, with about twelve thouſand followers. Immediately after this baſe deſertion, Clarence ſent a meſſenger to Warwick to apologize for his conduct, and acquaint him, that he had made his peace with Edward, who had promiſed to pardon him upon his ſubmiſſion. But the earl rejected his meſſage with juſt diſdain, ſaying, "He had rather be himſelf, than a falſe and perjured duke; and that he was determined not to put up his ſword, until he had either gained his point, or loſt his life."

In the morning of the fourteenth of April, the hoſtile armies were within bow-ſhot of each other, drawn up in order of battle, and a dreadful charge enſued, with incredible fury. The troops of Warwick, though inferior to the enemy in number, fought with the utmoſt reſolution, conſcious that if taken, they would undergo the fate of rebels; and the earl himſelf was determined to conquer or die on the ſpot. So furious was their charge, that Edward's firſt line was forced to recede; and ſome of his forces riding full ſpeed to London, alarmed his friends with a report of his defeat. In this critical juncture, he commanded his body of reſerve to advance, and charge the enemy in the flank; and this expedient was the more ſucceſsful, as the earl of Oxford had repulſed the Yorkiſts ſo far, that Warwick's main body was left unguarded. Oxford, however, no ſooner recollected this circumſtance, than he wheeled about, in order to reſume his ſtation, and that diſpoſal occaſioned the loſs of the battle. His device on his arms and enſigns was a ſtar, darting rays, and that of Edward was a ſun. The followers of Warwick, obſerving a ſtar approaching through the medium of a thick fog, miſtook it for Edward's ſtandard, and fell on their friends ſo furiouſly, that they were broken and diſperſed, before the earl could rectify the fatal error. Theſe laſt, ſuſpecting they were betrayed, fled towards the enemy with great precipitation; other parts of Warwick's army ſeeing them fly, imagined they had been charged in the rear, and that they themſelves had of conſequence been ſurrounded; they began to be ſeized with conſternation, and univerſal confuſion enſued. Edward at this critical juncture availing himſelf of their diſorder, renewed the charge with freſh vigour, and Warwick in vain exerted his utmoſt efforts, to rally and re-animate his diſperſed forces. On this occaſion he ſent off his horſes, determined to fight on foot, and ſhare the fate of the meaneſt ſoldier in his army. But all his gallantry was ineffectual; ſo that at length, having acquitted himſelf as a moſt conſummate officer and undaunted hero, he ruſhed into the thickeſt of the fight, and fell covered with wounds; and his brother Montacute endeavouring to ſupport him, met with the ſame fate. The death of theſe two generals put an end to the battle, and about noon Edward gained a complete victory.
